FLORESTAN's passionate dreaming of Leonore, with which we suppose in the finished overture the introduction closes, passes into the representation of Leonore herself in the chief subject of the Allegro. We find in this the same intention as in the corresponding portion of the first overture; but in these two later compositions such intention is carried out with an entirely different musical rendering, and with perhaps this modification of its meaning, namely, that in the first overture the idea is suggested of the heroine, having been impelled by her "innere Triebe" till she had engaged herself to Rokko in the prison, is satisfied by the supernatural power of presentiment that she has reached the goal of her desires, and, exulting in this attainment, awaits with strengthened ardour the fitting opportunity which she feels must be at hand for these desires to be fulfilled; whereas, in the second and third overtures it seems that the impulse still excites her; that she knows no satisfaction, but finds fresh stimulation to her desire in every nearer approach to its attainment:—thus in both renderings we have the presentation of Leonore in the same situation—that is, as she is supposed to be at the commencement of the opera, but with a different consideration of the feelings which this situation induces in her. The joyousness that characterises the chief subject of the first overture is replaced by earnest anxiety in the subject of these later compositions, by the restless earnestness of an ever-growing desire, which is, however, so far remote from morbidity, as it finds food for hope in the most unpropitious circumstances, and stimulate to new endeavours, even in disappointment. The syncopated accent of the subject, still more the prolonged appoggiatura which gives to it such effect of thrilling intensity, most of all the obstinate endurance of the tonic pedal, which ever continues to feed that excitement in the hearer, that it expresses in the heroine: these are the technical characteristics which distinguish the subject, and which gives to it so eminently, in our appreciation, the coloring of highly-wrought passion, and that particular signification which we have attempted to describe. There is a prodigious masterstroke in the finished overture in the introduction of four bars' further prolongation of the dominant harmony upon the tonic pedal, with the combined force of the entire orchestra, immediately before the final resolution of this dissonance, and the resumption of the subject with one of those unisonous effects in which Beethoven so wondrously displays his power. The four bars here introduced at least double the effect of all that has preceded them, and, by delaying the climax of the passage thus much beyond its evidently natural sense first conceived period, they not only increase the excitement, of which we have spoken as being a remarkable distinction of the whole subject, to the utmost possible degree, but give all the additional weight and importance to the resolution as it can acquire from our almost painfully protracted expectation of it, such expectation being fully realised. It is curious to observe in this, how some of the best points in a great work are the results, not of the ready inspiration of genius, but proceed from the matured deliberation of the carefully-studied artist, who, having the glorious materials with which nature has endowed him to work upon, can, with one touch of mastery, give a value to his first conceptions so far above that of the brightest natural inspiration of uncultivated genius, as to mark his finished works with the stamp of classicality, and to distinguish the immortal from the ephemeral. The feeling of exaltation that more especially characterises the subject of the first overture is now unmistakably portrayed, but with a more exalted, a more fervent expression, in the grand, broad expansive effect the subject assumes in the new form here given to it, in the only preface of quavers that grows out of it, and in the further partial resumption of it to which this leads. This very long continuance of the key of C major, in this portion of the movement, renders it necessary for the desirable relief, in the proper disposition of which lies the great art of musical construction and the great skill of the composer; to make a further digression from the original tonic, for the second subject, than the ordinary modulation to the dominant, which the general custom of all composers has established as the regular proceeding through which to conduct the plan of this form of composition, and, therefore, in this overture, as in his pianoforte sonata, in the same key, dedicated to Count Waldstein, and in others of his works written in the same very extensive form, Beethoven has had the art, by modulating to the more remote but still closely related key of the third instead of the fifth of the original, to preserve the feeling of tenacity undisturbed, and, at the same time, to give a very decided change of colour to the general tone of the composition, which, without so strong a relief as is thus obtained would scarcely escape monotony. This choice of the major key of the third of the original scale for that important portion of the movement comprised in what usually constitutes the dominant subject, is further justified by the sequel, and to this we shall again allude, as occasion presents itself. Now let us observe how the plan of the movement lends itself to the poetical expression which it is the object of the movement to embody. The descent in unison upon a section of the subject to F sharp, the supertonic of the key of E major, in which, as we have shown, the remainder of the first part of the movement stands, produces a marked change in the exultant feeling of confidence in approaching success which had been so rejoicefully conveyed in all that has gone before of this tutti for the full orchestra, and in the poignant effect of the prolonged appoggiaturas in the section of the subject now given, which here occur on very peculiar intervals, producing against the harmony-notes the most sensitive dissonances, we find a most touching expression of the keen anguish with which this great heart of our heroine—greatest in the greatness of its love—is pierced by regret for that which has necessitated her exertions, even in the moment when they are about to triumph. When we have the powerful resolve to conquer all such, however natural emotions, and in the restless struggle to remove the cause for her despair, desperately to annul within her the capacity of desperation. So come we to the half close on B which introduces the second subject, and we are struck with a very important improvement on the finished overture upon the sketch, in the omission of a passage of many bars, which presents an entirely new idea that appears nowhere else in the course of the movement, and that doubtless must have been intended as the vehicle of some important expression, but which expression it, to us, wholly fails to convey. Beethoven shows, by his retrenchment of this passage, that he felt the inadequacy of the idea to the expression he must have designed in it; and he shows more, namely, his masterly power of criticising his own production in the rejection of an unworthy idea, and in the admirable condensation of the plan at a point where an extension of it even by more interesting matter would have given lengthiness to the movement and so frustrated the effect of the whole.

MISS HELEN FAUCIT, the celebrated actress, was married at St. Nicholas' Church, Brighton, on Monday last, to Theodore Martin, Esq., of James Street, Buckingham Gate. The "happy couple" are now in Paris for the honeymoon.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

On Saturday the Figlia del Reggimento brought back Madame Sontag in her old part of Maria. The charming artist never sang more deliciously—never acted with more naïveté and fascination. She created the greatest enthusiasm in every scene, and in the lesson scene made quite a furor.

The event of the evening, notwithstanding, was the first appearance of Mademoiselle Fanny Cerito, after an absence of some years. All the subscribers in town were present, and many, no doubt, remained in town, and many more came to town, for the express purpose of witnessing the debut of one of the most popular dancers of the most quarter of a century.

It has been rightly said that Cerito has a distinctive character in her dancing. Without some peculiarity to mark her from the general run of those in her profession, Fanny Cerito could not have been the great artist she is. Taglioni possessed that distinctive character. So did Fanny Elssler. So does Carlotta Grisi. So does Rosati. So Amelia Ferraris. But in addition to her individualizing property, Fanny Cerito combines the greatest powers with the greatest charms. Perhaps her dancing possesses more infantine grace than that of any of her compatriots. In truth she appears a very grown up child on the stage, every attitude and motion recalling the springing days of childhood. We do not bow to certain authorities and classify Cerito with the merely physical artists. We perceive in her the reflection of youthful grace, she inspires us with a poetical feeling, and consequently we cannot remove her from the purely ideal. We confess that Cerito is the very incarnation of hilarity and buoyancy, the embodiment of joy. She is the quintessence, nay, the essence, yea, the oct-essence, verily, the novem-essence—seeing her style is new as well as charming—of animal spirits in a state of exuberance. On Saturday when she appeared her reception was uproarious. The habitués manifestly had not forgotten their favourite danseuse, who from 1840 to 1844, divided the Pas de Quatre palm with Taglioni (the Taglioni) Carlotta Grisi and Lucile Grahn. They had not forgotten the minuet with Fanny Elssler, the pas de trois in Alma, and the pas de l'Ombre in Ondine. Neither had they forgotten the smiling, homely face of the captivating artiste herself; nor the voluptuous figure, ripe and round as a melon in season; nor the winning ways which unconsciously made bankrupt hearts; nor the thousand indescribable allurements which live in the memory, but escape description and utterance. Cerito came back like an old lover to a widower, again and legitimately to be worshipped, wooed and won.

We shall not attempt to go into detail of Cerito's performance. She appeared in the old ballet Ondine, and danced her own pas de l'ombre in a hurricane of applause, and the pas from the Lac de fées with the same success. Every one remained to the end to pay fitting homage to the charming danseuse, who was summoned at the end, and deluged with plaudits.

Tuesday was the last subscription night. Anna Bolena was revived for Madame Barbieri Nini; and Cerito reappeared in Ondine.

Anna Bolena can only hope to keep possession of the stage by means of some great lyric artist, like Pasta. The music, though well written, and sometimes effective and highly dramatic, is heavy and uninteresting. The first finale is perhaps of the finest morceau d'ensemble Donizetti ever wrote. It is written closely after the manner of Rossini, and unmistakably betrays the master hand. Most of the last act is dull in the extreme, the pleasing aria, "Vive tu," however, helping to enliven it a good deal.

Of Madame Barbieri Nini's Anna Bolena we can speak in very high, but not unqualified, terms of praise. Madame Barbieri Nini is an immense artist—perhaps, too much of an artist. Every note and letter is studied and elaborated to perfection. In this respect she might well be a sister of John Kemble—that is any sister, except Mrs. Siddons, who in art was no sister of the renowned "John." This Madame Barbieri Nini's art degenerates into artifice. She lacks but the ars celare artem to constitute her one of the greatest artists the world has produced. But Madame Barbieri Nini leaves all to art and little to nature. Her acting and singing throughout the opera was extremely fine, sometimes unsurpassingly so, and were it not for the too frequent exaggerations and elaborations would have been one of the finest performances we have seen for years. Her first song, "Come, innocente Giovane," was magnificently given, with every charm which art could supply or fancy dictate, but was overloaded at the end with fortiure, which though dazzling and wonderfully novel and brilliant, was felt to be de trop. This feeling helped to marr the success of her effort. The immense execution displayed in the repeat was not so long, and consequently not so obtrusive. Madame Barbieri Nini was recalled with enthusiasm.

It is not our purpose to follow the performance in detail. A good notion of it may be gathered from what we have just stated. If it be demanded of us whether the Anna Bolena was better or worse than the Lucrezia Borgia. Our answer is, it was neither better, nor worse; it had the same excellencies, the same indications of high art, the same energy and power, the same passion and feeling, the same drawbacks in personal contortions, the same exaggerations, the same struggles for effect. If we were more closely pressed, we should say, perhaps, that we preferred her singing in Lucrezia, and her acting in Anna. Notwithstanding what we have said—we have judged the artist rigidly and righteously—we must express our conviction that Madame Barbieri Nini's Anna Bolena is a very great performance, and as such only have we ventured to criticise it.

Lablache, in Henry VIII., as the Times quaintly observed, "looked like a page torn from the History of England!" Albert Smith would have added, "folio edition." The performance of the stupendous basso was as powerful as ever. We liked Calzolari as Percy, although he did not display any great amount of feeling. Madame Ida Bertrand was excellent in Smeaton, and Madame Guiliani made one of the best Catharine Seymours we ever saw. She sang delightfully, and acted with unusual feeling. In short the Opera was well given throughout, and merited the applause it obtained.

Cerito repeated her performances in Ondine, and was again received with unbounded acclamations.

On Wednesday the performances at playhouse prices commenced. The reduction movement we augured confidently would be sure to fill the house with money. Our prophecies always come off. On Wednesday, Thursday, and last night the theatre was filled in every part, and to-night, we understand, every place is let. Of course the theatre will be kept open for a week or two more, as long as the money keeps pouring in.

The performances on Wednesday consisted of an act of Lucrezia Borgia, Don Pasquale, with the ballet entertainments, La Manola for Fanny Cerito, and Ondine.

On Thursday, the first act of Lucrezia Borgia, La Manola for Cerito, the Barbiere di Siviglia, Lablache's last appearance this season, and the Pas de l'Ombre from Ondine.

Last night Sonnambula was given with Sontag, Calzolari and Lorenzo. The opera was followed by the Grand pas de cinq from the Metamorphoses, danced by Mdles. Amalia Ferraris, Rosa, Esper, Jullien and Lamoureux. This was succeeded by the last act of Anna Bolena, and the evening wound up with the divertissement from Il Prodigio.

To-night Cruvelli, green with her well won laurels at Worcester, will appear as Norma—in the first act only, and Madame Sontag will perform in one act of La Figlia. Various other entertainments, too numerous to specify, will succeed.

Next week we intend giving our review of the season.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

An extra night was given on Friday—last night week—when Otello was played for the first time this season, and the second act of Der Freischutz was added. The entertainment, however, so excellent, and so varied, failed to attract more than a moderate audience. The reason is not obvious. Perhaps Rossini and Weber are out of date, and are no longer the loadstones of theatres. Perhaps, being Friday, the aristocrats would not come, more especially as they were not in London. Perhaps, the supporters of the Royal Italian Opera reserved themselves for Mario, Viardot, and the Prophete, and postponed their visit for the Meyerbeer night. Whatever may have been the cause, the renters had the pit almost to themselves, and made quite a festival time of it.

We can tell the absentees, they had a great loss in not hearing the performance of Otello, which, in general, left little to be desired. Tamberlik was in prodigious force and sang throughout with tremendous power and fire. The famous duet between him and Ronconi in the second act created quite a furor, and was encored with acclamations. The audience would fain have it a third time, but Mr. Costa very properly put his veto upon the demand, and went on with the piece. In the last scene, one of the finest and most dramatic Rossini ever wrote—not melodramatic, like Meyerbeer and the modern romancists, but subtle, simple, and intense, without effort or elaboration, the pure dramatic—we admired Tamberlik amazingly. It was just the music and the scene to suit him. Every thing in this scene depends on legitimate singing and acting. There is no need for display of voice or gesture. All is free, and natural. Tamberlik's earnest and unpretending manner made the scene real and impressive, while his declamation and magnificent singing rendered it in the highest degree interesting. We grant that the last scene of Otello hardly comes up to the exigencies of modern taste. When the opera was written, Rossini did not consult the prurient sensibilities of the go-a-head classes. He left that to the romantic school, who followed in his wake.

Grisi's Desdemona has always seemed to us to be one of her most charming impersonations. She was in excellent voice on Friday, and sang the music very beautifully, more especially the exquisite ballata, "Assisa a pie d'un salice" (taken from Shakspeare, by the way, although Shakspeare never wrote it—the very words, "A poor soul sat sighing under a willow"—we quote from memory, having only two editions of the poet at hand), and the pathetic prayer, "Deh! Calma O Ciel."

Ronconi made Iago as conspicuous as it was possible to make a part by no means prominent or worthy. In the duet, as we have said, he materially aided in creating the enthusiasm excited. With Ronconi's fine intelligence and dramatic fire it was impossible for him not to endow the character of Iago with some interest; nevertheless, the part, vocal and histrionic, is almost entirely worthless, it being sacrilege to call it even a shadow of the huge original.

Tamburini should have played Elmiro, although Elmiro, Brabantio's Rossinian's successor, is no improvement on Shak-peare. Tagliafico, however, did his best with it, and Tagliafico's best is not to be despised.

Signor Ciaffei played Roderigo, and had a cold.

If the performance of Otello did not create a great sensation outside doors, it certainly did inside. The opera was received throughout with immense enthusiasm, and Grisi and Tamberlik were called for after each act.

Of the second act of Der Freischütz it is unnecessary to say anything. The house was empty long before the curtain fell, proving that Weber's star is at present not in the ascendant.

Don Giovanni was given for the last time on Saturday. Madame Viardot repeated Donna Anna. Donna Anna is not one of Madame Viardot's most splendid assumptions. Madame Viardot has neither voice, nor stamina, nor appearance for Donna Anna. Donna Anna should have remained in possession of Grisi and not have been given to Madame Viardot. Madame Viardot next year would do well to give back to Grisi the part of Donna Anna. Such is all we have to say about the performance of Don Giovanni, which taken as a whole did not go entirely to our satisfaction. The house was tolerably attended.

I Puritani on Tuesday attracted a very full attendance. Mario for ever! The name of the great tenor in the bills is a tower of strength, as the management must have long ere this found out. For ourselves we never greatly affected Mario in one of Rubini's parts, nor does Arturo in the Puritani constitute an exception. Mario cannot give his heart to the sentimental whine-music. He requires passion and vigour to bring out his powers to the full. Neither the melting "A te O cara," nor the die-away "Ella tremante" suit Mario. He is much more at home in the "Tu m'ami," or the death scene in Lucrezia Borgia. Tamburini, as we have said, is out of place in Georgio, and Ronconi not in place in Riccardo. Nor is Grisi exactly what she was some fifteen years back, when Puritani was first produced, and she was in the zenith of her glory; so that the performance cannot exactly be entitled a chef d'œuvre. Nevertheless, Grisi achieved some grand things on Tuesday night, and the audience was too delighted and rapt to draw any unfair comparisons.

Madame Viardot and the Prophete made their last appearance on Thursday. The house was crowded to excess.

To-night the season closes with the Huguenots. Whether, following the example of Her Majesty's Theatre, the management intends to give a few performances at reduced prices we cannot say. Nothing has been announced.

Next week we shall give our resumé of the season.

Dramatic Intelligence.

FRENCH PLAYS. ST. JAMES'S THEATRE—This house closed for the season on Saturday last, with La fille de l'Avaro, in which Mr. Bouffé was as great as ever. If during his forced secession from the stage, Mr. Bouffé has through severe illness lost a little of that energy which he sometimes threw into the violent scenes of this part, he more than made up for such a deficiency by his elaborate finish of the other phases of the character. We are no partisans of the ranting school, and have more than once expressed our conviction that effect is not necessarily the result of forcing the voice or straining the lungs by over-exertion. The greatest actress of modern times, Mdlle. Rachel, is the best example we can mention in support of our hypothesis, and M. Bouffé also further bears us out in our argument, for the representation of Saturday last, presented us with a picture so finished in all its details, so minutely worked out, and, withal, so full of real force and energy, that we could not but consider that we had lost nothing on the whole by this toning down, and we were, moreover, forcibly struck by the artistic care with which the great actor contrived to turn to account even his physical failings.

With this performance finished the season of French Plays for 1851, a season somewhat shorter, it is true, than any we have had since seven or eight years, but remarkable for the long duration of Mademoiselle Rachel's engagement and the production of several new pieces, in which she played a principal part. The engagements have, as usual, comprised the élite of the Parisian companies, comprising the names of Mdles. Rachel, St. Marc, Scriwaneck, Octave, Judith, and Messrs. Raphael Felix, Bouffé, Regnier, Lavassor, Lafont. The month of May was dedicated to the lighter productions of the French stage. Two new pieces were played, both of which were successful. Bataille de dames is one of the most amusing pieces of the modern repertoire, although not remarkable for either novelty of plot or display of wit. L'Amour à l'aveuglette is of Palais-Royal extraction and teeming with broad humour from beginning to end. M. Regnier also performed in the Comaraderie this season, but remembering the great cast of last year, this master-piece of Scribe's failed to attract the attention of the public. Yet M. Regnier has gained in public estimation and made us yearn for an actor of equal merit for the English stage. M. Lafont continues to be a universal favourite and will be so long as genuine comedy and gentlemanly bearing are understood and appreciated in this country as they deserve. M. Lavassor, as usual, commanded the ready laugh of his audience, having undertaken the arduous task of amusing them by his sole efforts and having admirably succeeded in doing so. His Fete à la représentation de Robert le Diable is an admirable burlesque both on Mr. Scribe's libretto and on Meyerbeer's music. His magister du village is replete with genuine comedy. Of M. Bouffé we have already given our opinion, and we sincerely trust that another year will send him back to us with renewed vigour and unimpaired faculties. Mademoiselle Judith is a clever actress and a great acquisition to the French stage; Mdlle. St. Marc evinced considerable progress in her profession and with study, may still occupy a high position. Mdlle. Rebecca Felix made her first appearance in the part of Catarina in Victor Hugo's play of Angelo; she evinced considerable aptitude for the stage and holds us the promise of being both an intelligent and careful actress. Mdlle. Rachel has, however, been the principal attraction of the season. In addition to her impersonations of the classical drama, we have had an opportunity of judging her in a totally different range of characters; the result, considering the choice of pieces, has been perfectly satisfactory. Mdlle. Rachel has opened a new vein of riches for her great talents and displayed capabilities of the very highest order, apart from the solemnity of the school of Corneille and Racine. However we may condemn the feeling which pervades such productions as Angelo and Valeria, we cannot but admire the versatility of talent displayed by the great tragedienne in the part of Thisbe and the double impersonation of the Roman empress and courtesan in Valeria; neither can we allow the modest and unassuming Mdlle. de Belle Isle to pass without a warm tribute of admiration.

To Mr. Mitchell we tender our best thanks, for the tact and superior discrimination which he has displayed both in the choice of his actors and the style of entertainment offered to the public. The same unvarying good feeling exists between Mr. Mitchell and his subscribers, and this is the natural result of a perfect entente of their wishes and a resolve to carry out to the very letter the promises made in the original prospectus. We are happy to say that the houses have been unusually good, more particularly during Mdlle. Rachel's performances, and we trust that the manager has as good cause to be pleased with the public as they with him.

J. de C.—

ST. JAMES'S.—A group of flowers in worsted work, or a portrait of F. M. the Duke of Wellington in Berlin wool, looking very mathematical and square-y, if we may be allowed to use the word, is all very well in its way, although we frankly own that we should prefer a penny lithograph if we were desirous of obtaining anything like a true representation of the horticultural productions we have mentioned, or of the "Hero of a hundred fights." The case is exactly the same with the two young ladies, Kate and Ellen Bateman—of the ages of eight and nine respectively—who appeared last Monday at this theatre, in the characters of Richard III. and Richmond. As prodigies they are certainly very excellent, but as representatives of the two principal characters in Shakspeare's drama they are simply absurd. If a parrot could be taught to go beyond the usual limits of a parrot's vocabulary, and extend its usual hospitable question of inviting itself to take "a cup of tea, pretty Poll," or its warlike command, "make ready, present, fire!" to blank verse, then we say that even the Bateman children, clever as they—as children—are, would be obliged to yield the palm to the parrot. Such performances in our estimation are a desecration of the stage. Besides this they are injurious to the children themselves. If a foal is ridden too soon it will not last long, and if a child's talents are called into requisition too early they will end in miserable mediocrity. Witness those former wonders, Masters Betty and Burke. In addition to this, these juvenile impersonations injure the children themselves, for, as Hamlet has it—"Will they not say afterwards, if they should grow themselves to common players (as is most like, if their means are no better) that Barnum does them wrong, to make them exclaim against their own succession?"

After the tragedy there was a little vaudeville, entitled "The Young Couple," which was far better adapted for the two little girls. As we said before, as prodigies they were certainly very excellent, but it grieves us to see the stage lowered by such exhibitions.

At the other theatres there has been no novelty save at the OLYMPIC, where a production called "A Night's Adventure," met with the disapprobation of a sensible audience last Monday, although it is still running. The sooner it runs away entirely the better.

"What's in a name," says Shakspeare. A mistake sometimes, as was the case in our last week's article on the SURREY, in which we printed the name of Valentine for that of Marguerite, which was the rôle sustained by Miss Annie Romer, who has since repeated it several times with even more than the great amount of success we chronicled in our preceding number.

Miscellaneous.

EGYPTIAN HALL, PICCADILLY.—A new feature has just been added to the admirable moving diorama of the Holy Land, which promises to become highly attractive. With the well-defined art of the painter nature has been very judiciously blended, the latter being in the shape of a party—male and female—consisting of about fifteen, called the "Syro-Lebanon Company," who illustrate the diorama in question. They are natives of the neighbourhood of Mount Lebanon, and have recently arrived from Aleppo, and they consist of musicians, singers, and story-tellers. They appear in the oriental costumes of Arabia, Syria, and Palestine, and represent the manners and customs of their country in a series of groups, both picturesque and instructive. Amongst other matters of interest, they illustrate a marriage ceremony, which, from the peculiarity of such eastern rites, combined with the ease and grace of their performance, is highly interesting. They also realize the dioramic scenes as they pass before the spectator, and sing the melodies of their land, which, although somewhat strange and grating occasionally to the musical ear, are nevertheless useful and amusing, as showing Syrian ideas of lyrical art. We believe this diorama of the Holy Land is the only exhibition in London illustrated by people from the country depicted; and as they convey to the mind both amusement and instruction, the Syro-Lebanon Company will doubtless reap a full share of public patronage. The personal attractions, also, of some of the party are not to be overlooked; and in addition to the general effect, the performers are accompanied by a very intelligent native interpreter, educated in Aleppo, whose knowledge of our own language and suavity of manners are well calculated to render him an acquisition to this justly popular exhibition.

EXETER-HALL.—The Messiah was performed last night by the members of the Sacred Harmonic Society. The principal vocalists were Madame Clara Novello, Madame Macfarren, Mr. Benson, Mr. Manvers, and Mr. H. Phillips. Madame Macfarren made her first appearance at Exeter-hall, and created a decided impression by her fine rendering of the contralto music. She supplied the place of Miss Dolby, who was absent at Worcester, being engaged in the festival. Miss Dolby could hardly have found a better substitute than Madame Macfarren.

TOM COOKE AND SIR JAMES SCARLETT.—The following amusing anecdote of the well-known "Tom Cooke," the actor and musician, is extracted from a spirited sketch of his doings by "An Old Stager" in the Sunday Times:—"At a trial at the Court of King's Bench (June, 1833) betwixt certain publishing tweedle-dums and tweedledees, as to an alleged piracy of an arrangement of the "Old English Gentleman"—an Old English air, by the bye—Cooke was subpoenaed as a witness by one of the parties. On his cross-examination by Sir James Scarlett, afterwards Lord Abinger, for the opposite side, that learned counsel rather flippantly questioned him thus: "Sir, you say that the two melodies are the same, but different; now what do you mean by that, sir?" To this Tom promptly answered, "I said that the notes in the two copies were alike, but with a different accent, the one being in common time, the other in six-eight time; and, consequently, the position of the accented notes was different." Sir James: "What is a musical accent?" My terms are a Guinea a lesson, sir." (A loud laugh.) Sir James (rather ruffled): "Never mind your terms here. I ask you what is a musical accent. Can you see it?" Cooke: "No." Sir James: "Can you feel it?" Cooke: "A musician can." (Great laughter.) Sir James (very angry): "Now, pray, sir, don't beat about the bush, but explain to his lordship (Lord Denman, who was the judge who tried the cause) and the jury, who are supposed to know nothing about music, the meaning of what you call accent." Cooke: "Accent in music is a certain stress laid upon a particular note, in the same manner as you would lay a stress upon any given word for the purpose of being better understood. Thus if I were to say, 'You are an ass,' it rests on ass; but if I were to say, 'You are an ass,' it rests on you, Sir James." Reiterated shouts of laughter by the whole court, in which the bench itself joined, followed this repartee. Silence having been at length obtained, the judge with much seeming gravity, accosted the chap-fallen counsel thus:—Lord Denman: "Are you satisfied, Sir James?" Sir James (who, deep red as he naturally was, to use poor Jack Reeve's own words, had become scarlet in more than name), in a great huff, said, "The witness may go down."

MR. W. DORRELL.—This eminent pianist has returned to town after a visit to Paris, where his talent was duly appreciated. Mr. Dorrell received an invitation from Louis Napoleon, the President of the Republic, to be present at the festivities given in honour of the visit of the Lord Mayor of London to the city of Paris, and met also with much attention from the haut ton, as well as from the musical celebrities of the "city of pleasure."

CATHERINE HAYES.—The near approach of this gifted lady's departure for America calls upon us for a few words respecting her—not to herald her arrival or to anticipate her success—but to state, honestly and fairly, the grounds upon which she is fully entitled to the utmost quantity she can receive. Catherine Hayes is a native of the Emerald Isle, where she is generally termed "the Swan of Erin," but whether in deference to her musical position, or in contradistinction to her only rival, Jenny Lind, termed "the Swedish Nightingale," it is not at all necessary to inquire. This interesting lady is a native of Limerick; and her good conduct and great talent having obtained for her the patronage of the late bishop thereof, she became, through such influence, a pupil of Signor Sapia, in Dublin, and subsequently of Emanuel Garcia, in Paris, and of Felice Ronconi, in Milan. It was therefore utterly impossible that genius of her high order could do otherwise than reach a full degree of perfection under such tuition; and thus we find that after going through the ordeal of three years' practice in Ireland, from her début in 1841 until October 1844, she started for the continent in that month. It is unnecessary to follow this artiste through her varied career in every part of Italy, from 1844 to 1849; but it is only an act of justice to state that, in the theatre of every country she visited, she left behind an indelible recollection of her commanding powers. Catherine Hayes made her début at Covent Garden Theatre, in April, 1849, and confirmed with us the impressions she made upon others. Nor must it be forgotten that she created this excitement when the public mind had by no means recovered from the extraordinary frenzy it had been thrown into by the appearance of Jenny Lind—a degree of furor still more manifestly indulged in by the Americans, amongst whom our fair countrywoman will have to encounter the same degree of comparison. The advantages of Catherine Hayes are youth, beauty, and genius. She is the first of British singers, and we have not one moment's doubt that she will meet with a reception in America that will be equal to the brightest dream of her own enthusiasm, or the expectations of her friends. Her talent and her station in art are European; and America has ever corresponded to the decision of Europe, in a desire to cultivate that refinement in the one, which necessarily leads to its adoption in the other great empire of the world. There is something highly fascinating and deeply interesting in contemplating the flight of a young and brilliant creature like this, wafting in person the gifts of her gentle nature to a far and a foreign land. Apart from all the pecuniary views that such speculations arise and end in, no higher compliment can be paid to any country than the desire of a stranger from other lands to receive its welcome, to court its inquiry, and to obtain its sanction. Catherine Hayes will arrive in America in the bloom of her days, in the zenith of her talent, in the height of her popularity, and in the fulness of public expectation.—Globe.

MARRIAGE OF MISS HELEN FAUCIT.—In the usual column, under the head of marriages, will be found the announcement of the marriage of the accomplished and graceful actress, Miss Helen Faucit, to Theodore Martin, Esq., a gentleman well known in the literary circles as the Bon Gaultier of Tait's Magazine, and the translator of that charming little drama, King René's Daughter, in the delineation of which Miss Faucit reached the heart of every auditor. We are sure that, among her numerous admirers in this locality, there will be a general expression of sympathy in the step she has taken, and a heartfelt hope for her future happiness. We are not yet aware if it be her intention to continue on the stage, but from the circumstance of there having been no announcement to the contrary during her recent performances at the Olympic Theatre, London, we live in the anticipation that the finest illustrator of Shakspeare now on the stage, and altogether the most poetic of modern dramatic artists, will still remain to grace the profession of which she is so distinguished an ornament.—Manchester Examiner.

ON THE ORIGIN OF INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC.—The first mention that we have of music or musical instruments is in Holy Writ, where we are told, in the 4th chapter of Genesis, 21st verse, when the sacred penman is enumerating the posterity of Cain, that "Jubal was the father of all such as handle the harp and organ," from which it is most probable that he was the inventor of instrumental music; and it is also probable that the idea first originated in him hearing the sound produced by the percussion of the metals used in the workshop of his brother, Tubal Cain, who, we are told, worked in brass and iron. From an account given by the Padre Martini, he imagines that Adam was instructed by his Creator in every art and science, and that a knowledge of music was of course included—a knowledge which Adam employed in praising and adoring the Supreme Being.

The learned Padre, however, subsequently attempts to prove that Tubal was the inventor, not only of instrumental, but of vocal music—a position inconsistent with the idea that Adam derived the knowledge of the latter from the Most High, and which is not borne out by the sacred text, where Jubal is mentioned as the inventor of instrumental music only.

Though the records of the state of music in the antediluvian period of the world are so scanty, yet it would not be wrong in supposing that, in the sixteen hundred years and upwards which elapsed between the creation and the deluge, considerable progress was made in the science, and that various wind and stringed instruments were then invented to accompany the voice; for we are told in the 4th chapter of Genesis, 26th verse, that in the days of Seth, about the period of the birth of Enos, viz. 3664 years B.C., "men began to call upon the name of the Lord," and appears to have been the first introduction of music into religious rites.

This is all that can be predicted of music before the flood; and though the deluge swept away all the glory and grandeur of the antediluvian world, yet we cannot suppose that Noah and his family were ignorant of the arts and sciences taught before that event. Accordingly, we find that tradition carries back the invention of many arts to the period when that patriarch lived and walked upon the earth; and we undoubtedly see in him the original of more than one of the deities of Egypt and Greece.—From H. Tomlinson's Lectures on Ancient Music.

MISS CATHERINE HAYES' farewell concert at Liverpool takes place on Monday. The vocalists who assist the "Irish nightingale" are Miss Williams, Mr. Augustus Braham, and Herr Mengis. Signor Sivori is the violinist, and Mr. Lavenue the conductor.

MISS STEELE.—We regret to hear that this talented vocalist met with a severe accident, a short time since, when crossing a crowded thoroughfare in the City. We are, however, pleased to learn that the fair cantatrice is rapidly recovering, and will be able soon to resume her professional duties.

THE SPANISH DANCERS, who made their début a few weeks since at her Majesty's Theatre, have been engaged by the lessee of the Liverpool Theatre, where they have been received with great enthusiasm by crowded audiences.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.—Macfarren's popular opera, Kiny Charles the Second, will be produced shortly at this theatre, with Mr. W. Harrison, and Miss Pyne in their original part. It is also reported that Madame Macfarren will be engaged for her original character, Julian.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

W. S. YORKSHIRE.—The works will be reviewed in their turn. We thank W. S. for his communication.

OUR GRAY'S INN correspondent is informed that the "OPERATIO STARS" have all been written expressly for, and published in the Musical World. The numbers in which they have individually appeared we have not time to ascertain. Consult index of two last volumes. The composer of Maritana is at present in New York.

Advertisements.

NEW VOCAL TRIOS, QUARTETTS, ETC.,

PUBLISHED BY WESSEL & Co.

TRIOS FOR THREE SOPRANOS.

Czernschmann.	"This Salem from thy Lover,"	3s. 0d.
Cachner.	"Spring,"	2s. 6d.
	"Invitation,"	3s. 0d.
	"Song of Praise,"	2s. 6d.

QUARTETTS.

Bateman.	"The Angel of the Flowers,"	2s. 0d.
English Glee.	"Sally in our Alley,"	2s. 6d.
	Three Anthems by Charles J. Yates,	2s. 6d. to 4s. 0d.

All the Songs, Duets, Trios, Quartetts, Quintetts, and Choruses, &c., in Fidelio, are published by Wessel & Co., 220, Regent-street.

IMPROVED BRASS MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

PATRONISED BY HER MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY THE QUEEN
AND THE BRITISH AND INDIAN ARMY.

J. KOHLER, 35, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN,
J. begs to direct the attention of Regimental Bands to his New Patent Lever Instruments with the latest improvements, which surpass all others for simplicity of arrangement and purity of tone. Combinations in harmony never before attempted by any Brass Instruments, may now be executed with perfect ease. Private and Regimental Bands supplied with all kinds of Musical Instruments direct from the Manufactory; and as all these Instruments are made under J. KOHLER's own superintendence, they are warranted to withstand the climate of all countries. Efficient Band Masters supplied.

NEW DUETS FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

THALBERG	...	Beatrice di Tenda.
ROSELLEN	...	Deux Melodies de Donizetti, 1 and 2.
ROSELLEN	...	Val D'andore.
WOLFF	...	Yalse Original.
WOLFF	...	Beatrice di Tenda.
SILAS	...	La Primavera, Ragatelle.
KALLIWODA	...	Invitation à la Danse.
OSBORNE	...	Pluie de Perles.
SCHULTZ	...	Duo L'espagnola.
BEYER	...	Krieger's Lust March.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 301, Regent-street.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY, EXETER HALL.

CONDUCTOR, MR. COSTA.—FRIDAY NEXT, 5th SEPTEMBER, Mendelssohn's ELIJAH. Vocalists—Madame Clara Novello, Miss E. Birch, Miss Dolby, Miss M. Williams, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Whitehouse, and Herr Formes. The Orchestra, on the most extensive scale, will consist of (including 16 double basses) nearly 700 Performers. Tickets, 3s.; Reserved, 5s.; Central Area, numbered seats, 10s. 6d. each; at the Society's Office, 6, in Exeter Hall, or of Mr. Bowley, 53, Charing Cross.

SCHOTT & CO.'S POPULAR PIANOFORTE WORKS.

Ascher, Joseph.	Les Gouttes d'eau	3s. 0d.
Burgmüller, F.	Blanche. Polka Mazurka	2s. 0d.
Beyer, Ferdinand.	Krieger's Lust March	2s. 0d.
"	Alpenhorn	2s. 0d.
"	Rheinschnaucht	2s. 0d.
"	Irene and Agathe	2s. 0d.
"	Standard Bearer	2s. 0d.
"	Schubert's Standchen	2s. 0d.
"	Les Perles du Nord, No. 1—12, in 12 books, each	2s. 0d.
"	Fleurs mélodiques de la Russie, No. 1—4, 4 books, each	2s. 0d.
"	Bluettes du Nord, No. 1—6, 6 books, each	1s. 6d.
"	Prussian March	1s. 0d.
"	Polka March	1s. 0d.
"	Aza la Polka	2s. 0d.
"	Camelia	1s. 0d.
Brisson, Fred.	L'Arabesque	2s. 0d.
"	Le chant du Rossignol	2s. 0d.
"	Bousoir Mr. Pantaloon. Impromptu.	3s. 0d.
Goria, A.	Etude de Salon	2s. 0d.
"	Caprice Nocturne	2s. 0d.
"	Iléverie	2s. 0d.
Gottschalk, L. M.	Bauanier	2s. 0d.
"	Ossian	2s. 0d.
"	Ma. ceillier	3s. 0d.
Hamm, J. V.	Milanolib March	1s. 0d.
Kühner, W.	Jovialk. Waltz.	2s. 0d.
Marcaithou.	I. diana Waltz.	2s. 0d.
Slawy, Ludwig.	Soldier's Polka	1s. 0d.
"	Castanets Polka	1s. 0d.
Talesy, A.	Polka. Redowa de Salon	1s. 0d.
"	Aminta. Polka Mazurka	1s. 0d.
"	Nocturne	1s. 0d.
"	Les Monténégins, Fantaisie	2s. 0d.

Schott & Co., 89, St. James's-street.

GREAT DISCOVERY IN HARMONY.

Now ready, price 5s.

THE PRINCIPLES OF NATURAL HARMONY, being a Perfect System founded upon the discovery of the True Semiotic Scale, by J. J. Haite. London, Published by the Author, 76, Leadenhall-street. To be had of Messrs. Ever and Co., Newgate-street, and Messrs. Cocks and Co., New Burking-street.

THE ORGANIST'S COMPANION,

BY JOHN GOSS, Organist of St. Paul's Cathedral. A series of voluntaries, for the commencement, middle, and conclusion of divine service; also, a collection of interludes or short symphonies, to be played between the verses of the psalms or hymns, in numbers 2s. 6d. each, or 4 vols., 13 each.

PAROCHIAL PSALMODY.

A COLLECTION of Ancient and Modern tunes; also a variety of favourite responses to the Commandments, with directions for chanting, with an accompaniment for the Organ or Pianoforte, by John Goss, price 6s.

SACRED MELODIES.

SELECTED from eminent composers, and arranged for one or two voices, with an accompaniment for Organ or Pianoforte, by J. Goss, Organist of St. Paul's Cathedral. Price 6s.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 301, Regent-street, and 67, Conduit-street.

THE POPULAR SONG OF THE DAY.

"TALK OF HIM THAT'S FAR AWA," composed by THOMAS CHANTREY. A new edition of which is just issued, may be had at ADDISON & HOLLIER'S, 210, Regent-street, London. For simplicity, elegance, and originality of melody, it is unrivalled.

Also, by the same author, "Why wilt thou not love?" and "The dream is past."

JOULE'S DIRECTORIUM CHORI ANGLICANUM.

Second Edition, price 1s., in cloth 1s. 6d.

"THE most complete Choral Service book that has yet appeared." Dedicated by permission to the Lord Bishop of Manchester. For highly favourable reviews see "Christian Remembrancer," "Theologian," "Parish Choir," &c. &c. London: J. A. Novello.

A few copies of the quarto edition, price 15s., still on hand.

HEALTH WHERE 'TIS SOUGHT!

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—Cure of a disordered Liver and Stomach, when in a most hopeless state.—Extract of a letter from Mr. Matthew Harvey, of Chapel Hall, Airdrie, Scotland, dated the 15th of January, 1850.—To Professor HOLLOWAY, Sir,—Your valuable Pills have been the means, with God's blessing, of restoring me to perfect health, at a time when I thought I was on the brink of the grave. I had consulted several eminent Doctors, who, after doing what they could for me, considered my case hopeless. I had been suffering from a Liver and Stomach complaint of long standing, which during the last two years got so much worse, that every one considered my condition as hopeless. I, as a last resource, got a Box of your Pills, which soon gave relief, and by persevering in their use for some weeks, together with rubbing night and morning your Ointment over my chest and stomach, and right side, I have by their means alone got completely cured, and to the astonishment of myself and everybody who knows me.

(Signed) MATTHEW HARVEY.

These celebrated Pills are wonderfully efficacious in the following complaints:—
 Ague Constipation of the Bowels Liver complaints Tumours
 Asthma the Bowels kinds Lumbago Ulcers
 Bilious Com- Consumption Fits Piles Worms of all plaints Debility Gout Rheumatism kinds Blotches on the Dropsy Head-ache Scrofula or King's Weakness, from Skin Dysentery Indigestion Evil whatever cause
 Bowel complaints Erysipelas Inflammation Sore Throats &c., &c.
 Colic Jaundice Tic-Douloureux

Printed and Published, for the Proprietors, by MICHAEL SAMUEL MYERS, of No. 1, Stradley Villas, Stradley Road Clapham Road, in the parish of Lambeth, at the office of MYERS and Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, in the parish of St. Paul, where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed, post paid, To be had of G. Purkiss, Dean Street, Soho; Allen, Warwick Lane; Vickn, Holywell Street, and at all Booksellers.—Saturday, August 30, 1851.

The Musical World.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s.; Half year, 8s.; Three Months, 4s.; (Stamped Copies 1s. per Quarter extra,) payable in advance, to be forwarded by Money Order, to the Publishers, Myers & Co., 22, Tavistock-st., Covent Garden.

No. 36.—VOL. XXIX.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 6, 1851.

Price Fourpence.
Stamped Fivepence.

FIDELIO AND THE CHRONICLE.

A PARLIAMENTARY reporter of the Morning Chronicle, appointed by the careful directors to review the operatic season at Covent Garden, thus delivers his opinions about Fidelio :—

"Fidelio had been long demanded by a small band of Beethovenites, who profess to see in its score the most exalted type of musical composition. It was given, but totally failed to excite or to interest the general public, and for this good reason, the music is symphonic in its character, not dramatic. It appeals to the technical knowledge and scientific appreciation of profound musicians, who have long admired the masterly style in which the strange and eccentric feats of harmonic and contrapuntal combination and arrangement in which it abounds, have been managed by the deaf composer, but so far as the interpretation, by these feats of emotion and idea, from the composer to the audience goes, the opera of Fidelio has proved utterly unsuccessful, and is not likely again to be revived."

The writers of the "fast" school ought to adorn this reporter with a beard of gold. Such courage as he has shown is unexampled. The short-hand men are a hardy race, and will stick at nothing. It is not so much with them what to say, as to say something. "Doing a column" is every-day work, and the subject all one, so there be words enough to fill the space required.

The contempt for truth exhibited by the parliamentary reporter is to be admired, although it bears hard upon Beethoven. An opera, however, which, for nearly half a century has delighted Europe, stands in no need of argument to show that it possesses the elements of popularity; and the apathy of a tribe of imaginary comic authors will not, we think, go far to prove the contrary.

But more than his contempt for truth must the Parliamentary Reporter's contempt of history be extolled. He gravely tells his readers that Fidelio cannot excite or interest the general public—because so and so—while, had he consulted Mr. Shirley Brookes, his learned collaborateur would have informed him that Fidelio has been exciting and interesting the "general public" of the civilised world since 1805!

The reasons which the Parliamentary Reporter sets down in explanation of the failure of Beethoven's opera are bold, but not clear: "The music is symphonic in its character, not dramatic." It would be cruel to ask the Parliamentary Reporter what he means by "symphonic," since, in sober truth, he means nothing, and his words convey triumphantly the vagueness of his thought. Nor is the following much more lucid: "The masterly style in which the strange and eccentric feats of harmonic and contrapuntal combination and arrangement in which it abounds, have been managed by the deaf composer," &c. Here is an array of words—here a cloud of dust effectively to blind the reader! Pistol himself, the great master of balderdash, could not have beaten it.

"—— Have we not Hiran here?"

said the fast ancient—intending about as much by that speech as the Parliamentary Reporter by what we have cited.

The conclusion would bother Hermogenes—"but so far as the interpretation, by these feats of emotion and idea, from the composer to the audience goes, the opera of Fidelio has proved utterly unsuccessful, and is not likely again to be revived. How to unravel this puzzles us:—interpretation, from composer to audience, BY FEATS OF EMOTION AND IDEA, proving unsuccessful, and not likely to BE REVIVED—this is the gist of the phrase, having got which, we are as much in the dark as before. We have heard of feats of strength and agility, but "feats of emotion and idea" are out of our vocabulary; we have heard of the revival of an old play, but the revival of an opera, "so far as interpretation goes," has never before been suggested. It was left for the Parliamentary Reporter to unlock this new repository of words and phrases, and lay them before his readers pell mell, as he took them from the cupboard of his brain.

To conclude, we feel moved to cry out, with Trimalchio's freedman: "May we never prosper, but we'll teach these Gelæ better manners!"—[The Gelæ were a fast tribe of European Scythians, and, in the time of Petronius, the expression was proverbial, as a synonyme for barbarians.]

WORCESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(FROM OUR OWN REPORTER.)

WORCESTER, Aug. 30th.

ON Thursday, the collection for the charity at the Cathedral amounted to £165,—£4 above that of 1848. There were about 800 persons present, which was more than 100 beyond the attendance on the third morning of the previous meeting.

The fine weather, happily continuing, proved of essential service to the third and last concert on Thursday evening. Between 700 and 800 assembled in the College-hall, and the youth and beauty of Worcester were exhibited to conspicuous advantage. The concert went off with the greatest eclat, and although, owing to the want of rehearsals, mistakes and blunders were frequent in the accompaniments to the vocal pieces, these by no means interfered with the hilarity of the audience, who had evidently come with a determination to be pleased.

The programme commenced with an interesting selection from Weber's opera of Euryanthe, comprising the overture, introduction, several choral and concerted pieces, and solos. The principal vocal parts were sustained by Madame Castellan and Miss Dolby, Messrs. Sims Reeves and Machin. Herr Formes being absent from indisposition, an apology was made for him by Sir Charles Hastings (one of the stewards), who promised as an amende, an extra song by Mademoiselle Sophie Cruvelli, and a solo on the concertino by Mr. R. Blagrove, with which the audience testified their satisfaction by applause. The pieces that produced the greatest effect in the Euryanthe selection were, the march, chorus and quartet, "Hail ye heroes" (solos by Madame Castellan, Miss Dolby, Messrs. Lockey, and Machin), which was encored; the duet, "Now let my soul" (Madame Castellan and Mr. Sims Reeves), and the air "Soft airs" (Mr. Sims Reeves). Mademoiselle Cruvelli, who appeared four times, bore away the largest share of the honours of the evening. She was in splendid voice, in great spirits, and sang with unusual animation and brilliancy. Her first performance was the well-known aria of De Beriot, and Benedict, with the waltz cabaletta "Prendi per me," which she introduced with so much success early in the present season, at one of the concerts of Her Majesty's Theatre—a dashing and energetic display of vocal facility. Her next was the rondo finale from Sonnambula. "Ah non giunge" (accompanied on the pianoforte by Mr. Mori), which she sang for the first time before an English audience. Into this Mademoiselle Cruvelli threw her whole heart and soul, and introduced some cadenzas and fortiture, embracing the entire compass of her voice, which were quite as new as they were extraordinary. A more joyous and irresistible piece of singing could not be imagined, or more thoroughly expressive of the feelings that are supposed to animate the bosom of the happy Amina, cleared of suspicion, and restored to the affections of her lover. The substituted morceau, by general desire, was Verdi's "Ernani involami." The Worcester amateurs are evidently partizans of Verdi.

Each of Cruvelli's performances was received with rapturous applause; but that which roused the enthusiasm of the audience to the highest pitch was the "Ah non giunge," which she was called upon to repeat, in a manner too unanimous and decided to be resisted with courtesy. The other points of the concert worthy notice were Madame Castellan's "L'amor suo" a finished and effective performance; a ballad of Schubert, nicely sung by Miss Williams, with a concertina accompaniment by Mr. R. Blagrove; "Nobil signor," from the Huguenots, given with grace and fluency by Miss Dolby; and the grand scena from Der Freischütz, extremely well executed by Miss Birch. Miss Dolby also introduced a Scotch ballad, "Bonnie Dundee," which pleased mightily, and was encored. The duet, "Si quello io son," from Verdi's Attila, by Mademoiselle Cruvelli and Mr. Sims Reeves—a poor composition, unworthy of the performers—although well sung, made no impression; nor was its effect improved by a contre-temps on the part of the orchestra, which necessitated a halt, and a new beginning. Such mishaps are really unpardonable at a concert the charge for admission to which is 10s. 6d. The performances terminated with the National anthem, the principal solo verses by Madame Castellan and Mademoiselle Cruvelli. Altogether, this concert was inferior to the others in point of selection. The only orchestral piece (except the Euryanthe) was the overture to Fidelio, and the want of an instrumental solo was strongly felt. Good concerts without rehearsals, however, are impossible; and as rehearsals at the triennial festivals would seem to be equally impossible, we presume they are not to be expected.

Another fine day brought the festival, as far as the musical performances are concerned, to a close, in a brilliant and prosperous manner. Upwards of 1,200 persons assembled in the Cathedral to hear the Messiah, which was executed in a very effective manner. The principal singers were—Madame Castellan, Mademoiselle Cruvelli, Misses Birch and Dolby, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Machin and Herr Formes. To Cruvelli were assigned the air, "Rejoice greatly," and the song "How beautiful are the feet." From her execution of the former, the finest bravura in the whole range of Handel's oratorios, we are convinced that a careful study of this grand school of vocal music would soon insure Mademoiselle Cruvelli the flexibility of voice and smoothness of execution in which she is sometimes wanting. It was a striking improvement on her "Let the bright Seraphim." The accentuation was more decided, the rapid divisions were accomplished with greater ease and equality, and the distances taken with more certainty and point. Her reading of the music was unexceptionable, and a marked advance was noted in her pronunciation of the English words, which, while more correctly delivered, were not flurried and slurred over as on the former occasion. "How beautiful are the feet" is a much less difficult matter. Madlle. Cruvelli sang this divine air with a chasteness and purity of style that left nothing to be desired, giving the text with scrupulous fidelity. The peculiar beauty of her voice was, perhaps, never more advantageously displayed. At the usual signal from the Bishop, Mademoiselle Cruvelli repeated the air. The compliment was amply merited. Her success in these first attempts in the music of the oratorio composers will, it is to be hoped, act as a spur to the ambition of the young singer, and open her eyes to the fact that music is not entirely confined within the limits of the Italian Opera, but that a higher, if a less exclusively showy style exists, which, to be a perfect and accomplished mistress of the vocal art, should be studied with no less assiduity than the other. With the exception of Madame Castellan's "But thou didst not leave," one of the most expressive performances of the morning, there is nothing new to speak of in the general execution of the oratorio. Misses Birch and Dolby sang the other airs for soprano and contralto, and Mr. Sims Reeves and Herr Formes those for tenor and bass, in their best style, and Mr. Machin, in "Why do the nations," gave good signs of having recovered from his indisposition. The sublime choruses were for the great part most effectively given, and during the execution of "Glory to God," and the "Hallelujah," the audience remained standing, according to approved custom. "Worthy is the Lamb," with its elaborate and magnificent "Amen," brought out the combined strength of organ, orchestra, and chorus with fine effect, and made a grand and impressive climax to the festival. On leaving the Cathedral, the streets all the way up to Foregate-street were lined on either side with spectators, anxiously watching the equipages and their inmates as they passed. The bells of the church rang merry peals, and the whole scene, enlivened by the sunshine, wore an unusual aspect of busy gaiety.

The collection at the doors for the charity amounted to £199 9s. Among the audience were remarked Sir Robert Throckmorton and Lord Southall and family, who on this occasion made the only exceptions to the general absence from the meeting of the nobility and gentry of the Catholic persuasion, in the three counties, which we noted yesterday. The other visitors of note comprised nearly all those in our former list, with the addition of Mr. Babington Macaulay.

On the whole, the results of the 128th anniversary of the meetings of the three choirs has surpassed expectation. It has had the Crystal Palace, unfavourable weather, and other disadvantages to combat; but has succeeded so well in spite of them, that it is to be hoped there will be no more talk of discontinuing the festivals. It would be odd indeed, if three such rich counties as Worcester, Hereford, and Gloucester, could not support the comparatively trifling risk which even a more than average unprosperous meeting might entail. Neither the possible tax on the pocket, nor the bigoted opposition from certain quarters, ought to have any influence where such a useful and praiseworthy charity is concerned as that which affords relief to the widows of the poorer clergy, and supplies the means of support and education for their orphan progeny. Stringent reform is called for in the general management of the musical department of these festivals. That, however, under the actual circumstances, appears to be out of the question; until it be obtained, nevertheless, the triennial meetings can never be expected to exercise much influence upon art, however they may promote the ends of benevolence.

The meeting wound up last night with the usual dress ball at the Guildhall, which was very fully attended. We should have mentioned that the hospitality of the Bishop, the Dean, and other distinguished inhabitants of Worcester, has been munificently exercised during the meeting in favour of the visitors, and that the usual attention and civility were experienced at the hands of the Rev. Robert Sarjant, hon. sec.

The results of the festival, will, in a pecuniary point of view, be very unsatisfactory. The falling off in the receipts for the charity for the relief of clergymen's widows and orphans, however, will not be so considerable as at one time had been expected, the receipts on Thursday and Friday having been larger than had been anticipated. The following return gives a comparative view of the receipts for the charity at the Worcester Festivals of 1848 and 1851:—

	1848.	1851.
Tuesday . . .	£300	£302
Wednesday . . .	283	216
Thursday . . .	162	165
Friday . . .	213	201
	£958	£884

Of the above 884l. the members of the corporation of Worcester, who attended the festival in state on the first morning, contributed 23l. The collection at Gloucester last year was 862l., and at Hereford, in 1849, 833l. Worcester, however, always realises the largest collection. It is anticipated that when the general accounts come to be made up, they will show a considerable deficiency, which would have to be made good entirely by the stewards but for the prescience of the managers, who have secured a guarantee fund from the public amounting to nearly 800l. The attendance at the morning performances, compared with those at the morning performances of 1848, showed the following result:—

	1851.	1848.
Tuesday morning . . .	1,282	1,497
Wednesday morning . . .	1,200	1,400
Thursday morning . . .	739	602
Friday morning . . .	1,220	970
	4,441	4,469

The falling off, therefore, in the attendance at the morning performances was trifling, but it is at the evening concerts that there has been such a decline in point of attendance.

In connexion with the festival, the following strange letter has been published in to-day's Worcester paper.

"Tibberton, near Droitwich, Worcestershire, Aug. 25.

"My Lord,—On Saturday afternoon I received a card from the Mayor of Worcester, inviting me to a public breakfast on Tuesday next. The invitation seemed to take it for granted that I was going to attend the Musical Festival. Unless your Lordship, who I perceive is president, can show me that such an assemblage of opera and theatre performers within the walls of the cathedral is not making God's house of prayer a den of thieves, I must, as I have hitherto done, avoid such a mixture of sacred and profane persons and things, for I know it to be contrary to God's most holy word, to the teaching of the primitive church, and of the united church of England and Ireland.

"I write to thank the Mayor for his courtesy (believing that, with many excellent persons, he errs in ignorance), but declining his invitation, and it is my intention to publish this letter early to-morrow morning.

"I have the honour to be, my Lord, praying to God to give you grace to remove all scandals from your diocese,

"Your Lordship's faithful, sorrowful, and most humble servant and presbyter,

"LUCIUS ARTHUR, Curate of Oddingley.

"The Lord Bishop of Worcester.

"P. S.—I direct my messenger to wait for an answer, if your Lordship should see fit to send me one.

"L. A.

"Through some mistake he has not met me here as I expected. "Worcester, Tuesday Morning."

GARCIA AND TAMBERLIK IN LIVERPOOL.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERT.

Though the concert of Tuesday night week did not introduce to our notice so many vocalists as we are accustomed to hear at the full-dress reunions, yet those who appeared on this occasion possess talents so rare and so great, and the pleasure they gave to the audience was so unmistakable, that none regretted the committee having had an eye more to the quality than quantity of the vocal talent whom they had engaged. In fact, we have often thought that the committee have erred in introducing so many vocalists at their concerts, so that even the most celebrated have had little opportunity of giving their listeners a full and adequate idea of their abilities. Another reason, however, why only two vocalists appeared on this occasion was, the difficulty of engaging artists of great talent, except at an outlay which it would have been unwise to incur. Cruvelli, for instance, quite a new singer, suddenly pushed into fame, demanded, we believe, 350l. for two concerts, and Alboni, certainly an unrivalled singer, valued her labours for the same period worth 240l. However, the committee and the subscribers managed to do without either of the above ladies, for Signor Tamberlik and Viardot Garcia are undoubtedly two great and acknowledged vocalists, and the enthusiasm they created on Tuesday evening proved most truly that, when the people of Liverpool meet with true talent they can recognise its presence, and receive it with as much enthusiasm as the self-satisfied dilettanti of London and Paris.

Madame Viardot Garcia first sang in the Philharmonic Hall at the opening festival, when she created a most favourable impression, though at the time suffering from severe illness. As our readers are aware, she is a sister of Malibran, though greatly inferior as a vocalist, to that wonderful genius. Unlike her, Madame Viardot has struggled long against the disadvantages of a voice originally harsh and limited in compass; but patience and unwearied assiduity, joined to a thorough knowledge of her art, have made her one of the greatest operatic vocalists now on the stage. She is, in fact, a perfect mistress of her art, capable of giving due and unwonted effect to all kinds of music. Whether in simple, pathetic strains, or arias requiring the utmost brilliancy of execution, she is equally effective and pleasing. As an actress her talents are unsurpassed by many; and on the Italian stage she holds a very high position. Her only fault is a tendency to over-elaboration of caricature; but this is the result of a genius which is ever aspiring. Like Tamberlik, she is one of the principal supports of the Royal Italian Opera, where her impersonations of Fides, Donna Anna, Valentine, Adina, &c., have been witnessed with the utmost enthusiasm. Madame Viardot Garcia is also a composer and a linguist, singing to admiration either in German, Spanish, French, or Italian, all of which languages she speaks fluently. As our readers may remember, she is also acquainted with some of Handel's masterpieces, and able to render them most effectively and intelligibly in English.

On the present occasion her first air was a quaint Sicilienne, by Pergolesi, somewhat similar to one of our old Christmas carols, and, like them, remarkable for its quaintness and abrupt changes in the melody. Madame Viardot sang it with great expression, displaying great vocal facility in a crescendo at its termination. Being encored, she sat down at the piano, and dashed off two Spanish ballads with so much comic feeling, that the audience, who did not know their meaning, could not refrain from laughing. Her next effort was in a style totally different: namely, the beautiful, but hackneyed, finale to Sonnambula, which every vocalist of pretension has attempted with varied success. Madame Viardot invests it with quite a new colouring, singing it with a degree of fervid, passionate expression, which stirs every heart. She poured out a flood of the strangest and most intricate fioritura with an intrepidity and volume of sound absolutely startling. A more extraordinary display of vocal endeavour was assuredly never heard in Liverpool. The delight and wonder of the audience was divided, and the air was re-demanded with enthusiasm, and repeated with truly increased effect—the fresh variations introduced being even more daring and brilliant than the previous ones. She also sang with Tamberlik in a duet from the Favourita, and one from Roberto Devereux, in which both artistes displayed their vocal and dramatic style of singing most admirably.

Signor Tamberlik made his debut in Liverpool at this concert, and fully bore out the unanimous laudations which he has received from our metropolitan contemporaries. His presence in England, like that of Alboni, is one of the offsprings of the rivalry between the two operas; to which we are also indebted for the appearance of Sontag, Ronconi, Crivelli, Barbieri Nini, and other great artistes, who had no chance of obtaining a hearing here when Mr. Lumley was an operatic emperor. Recommended by Ronconi, who sang with him in Verdi's operas, at Barcelona, he was engaged by Mr. Gye for the Royal Italian Opera, where he made his first appearance in Masaniello, in Auber's opera, on the 4th of April, 1850. Though suffering from the fatigues of a hurried journey, and with the disadvantages of having had only one rehearsal, his debut was a complete triumph. His voice is one of the purest tenors ever heard; inferior in sweetness and suavity, perhaps, to Mario's, but unsurpassed for the ringing brilliancy of its high notes, which he gives out direct from the chest, with startling power and bell-like clearness. His lower tones are somewhat husky; but in airs requiring brilliancy of execution and manly vigour, he sings with so much taste, energy, and skill, that the most apathetic listener cannot but feel that a singer of the rarest powers is moving him to unwonted enthusiasm. This season he has been, in consequence of the serious illness and lassitude of Mario, one of the mainstays of the Royal Italian Opera, and a great favourite, both with the general public and the most critical judges. The Queen and Prince Albert have shown their appreciation of his talents in a very marked manner; and those who were at Covent Garden when he sang, "Il mio tesoro," so magnificently, may perhaps remember that the occupants of the royal box were as eager as any of the audience in applauding this unwonted display of vocal talent, which was encored rapturously each night Don Giovanni was performed. We have perhaps, dwelt somewhat longer than we intended on Signor Tamberlik; but, as we consider him to be one of the greatest vocalists that ever appeared in England, we think our readers will pardon our prolixity.

On his appearance to sing the famous Parcarole, from Masaniello, he appeared somewhat nervous, and sang the first verse rather flatly; but, on its repetition, he gave evidence that rumour had not exaggerated his powers. His voice, though slightly tremulous and husky, sounded rich and sonorous; and when he touched upon some of the higher notes it sounded clear and full. His great triumph, however, was in the divine air, from Don Giovanni, "Il mio tesoro," in which he reached C in alt with the utmost apparent ease. It was given direct from the chest, without any tremulousness, and with the most passionate energy. In fact, his singing of this air was all that the most fastidious listener could desire; the style was chaste and tasteful, and the expression varied and truthful in the highest degree. It is almost needless to state that he was uproariously recalled, and repeated the air with undiminished excellence and effect.

The only instrumental solo was one on the violin, by Mr. E. W. Thomas, which gave great satisfaction. The music (F. David's variations on an air by Schubert) was difficult and, at times, pleasing. Mr. Thomas displayed a perfect command of all the resources of his instrument, and, without any mechanical trickery or eccentricity, he overcame all difficulties with graceful ease. In the more quiet passages his tone was pure, and characterised by much feeling and delicacy of execution.

The choir, with the exception that they were at times unsteady, gave universal satisfaction; and, in addition to two well-known madrigals, they introduced one, entitled "The Silver Swan," by Orlando Gibbons, organist to James the First; and a four-part song, by Mendelssohn, "The Hunter's Farewell." The first felt flat, but the latter, a most delicious and melodious inspiration, was exceedingly well sung and received. The band played three overtures, the only novelty being that to Mendelssohn's operetta, "The Son and the Stranger," lately revived at the Haymarket Theatre. Though only composed for private performance when Mendelssohn was very young, it possesses all his distinguishing characteristics. The melodies are spontaneous and flowing, and the scoring most effective and judicious. It was played by the band con amore, and loudly applauded. The concert, which was one of the best—in fact, we may say the best ever given by the society—concluded at an early hour with the overture to Così fan Tutti, which the band were playing as the audience rose en masse to retire. The next concert will take place at the end of September, on which occasion the programme will consist of a choice selection of miscellaneous music sung by two artistes of great talent—Miss Louisa Pyne and Herr Carl Formes—both of whom have gained fresh honours during the past season, their improvement having been frequently and highly eulogized by our metropolitan contemporaries. (Liverpool Paper.)

MUSIC AT MANCHESTER.

(From our own Correspondent.)

At length your crowded and busy London Season is drawing to a close. The last cheap nights announced at the Opera terminated last Saturday, whilst many of the stars that have shed such brilliant lustre on your musical season, have already changed their sphere of influence; consequently, you may spare an odd corner, now and then, for an old correspondent in the provinces. But, "alack, and well-a-day," unless we have a speedy change for the better, "Music at Manchester" will become a dead letter to write about. Up to the present moment, we do not know when we had so barren a time of it as this very great Exhibition year of 1851. London has not only attracted all the folks, but all the talent—musical amongst the rest. Charles Hallé has been with you all the season, merely coming to Manchester to a very few concerts given at our Concert Hall, where, of course, he is the regular conductor, and where your correspondent, not being a subscriber, is inadmissible.

The last truly great performance we "assisted" at in Manchester as a concert, was the final one given in the ever-to-be-regretted Assembly Rooms, on the 11th January!! Ernst, Hallé and Lidel, with Miss Williams, made that a memorable night with us. It is now September, and the only really good public concerts that have taken place in that long interval, have been the three farewell concerts of Miss Catherine Hayes last week. Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, the 28th, 29th, and 30th August. We were only present on one occasion—the middle night of the three—but understand that the Hall was filled to excess on each of the other two evenings, which must have been satisfactory, in a pecuniary sense, to all parties concerned, and not a little gratifying to Miss Catherine Hayes herself.

The artists assisting Miss Hayes, were Miss Williams, Miss Rebecca Isaacs, Mr. Augustus Braham, and Herr Mengis, with "little" Lavenu, as you familiarly style him, as conductor, and little Sivori—become greater than ever—as solo violinist. A very respectable parti, and the concert would have been really very first rate; but—oh these buts!—there was no orchestra—no band! Mere pianoforte concerts—even in spite of such intelligent and really clever accompanying as that of Mr. Lavenu—do not do in a large space like the Free Trade Hall. The programmes have an inevitable tendency to run to seed, in the ballad direction; and ballad after ballad, however great the vocalist, to our taste becomes monotonous and wearisome. The only advantage in the system that we can discover, accrues to the concert givers themselves; provided they can attract such large audiences without a full orchestra, they have the receipts to divide amongst fewer hands.

To speak of the concert we heard—or rather of the portion we heard—we must begin with Sivori, who had just commenced his Lucia fantasia as we entered the hall. We were very much astonished, as well as delighted, to hear Sivori infuse so much pathos and intense feeling into this performance. Of his unerring intonation and powerful tone we had a vivid remembrance, but hardly supposed him capable of affecting the feelings and sympathies of his audience to such an extent, a la Ernst, as he did on Friday night, in Donizetti's impassioned strain. Sivori comes back to us immensely raised in our estimation in consequence. His second solo was the one—we have had perhaps too much from everybody on the violin—the eternal "Carnival," it was marvellously played of course, and, of course, encored; but wisely, on Sivori's part, another theme was given in lieu of it, again exhibiting his amazing command of all possible and impossible difficulties on the instrument; nevertheless, the plaintive finale to Lucia, lingered fondly and tenderly in our memory long after the concert was over. Sivori's triumphs over all difficulties we had witnessed and heard before, but it was the first time we had heard him so eminently successful in expression—that true aim of all great artists.

Miss Rebecca Isaacs sang very nicely Mozart's "Vedrai carino," and Wallace's ballad, "A Lovely Youth." We had two ballads of Lavenu's—one for Miss Catherine Hayes, and one for Mr. Augustus Braham; another ballad of Wallace's, with a pretty flowing accompaniment, "Sweet and Low," for Miss Williams; a very pretty duet of Mendelssohn for Miss Hayes and Miss Williams, "I would that my Love;" a duet from Billy, for the two gentlemen, "Ola bella imminente;" another ballad, (oh these ballads) Balfe's this time, "In this old chair;" and Miss Hayes's cavatina, "O luce di quest'anima," from Linda, were all we stayed to hear.

With most of the vocalists we were well pleased; but with Miss Catherine Hayes especially delighted. The song from Linda, showed Miss Hayes's powers to great advantage, as did also the Mendelssohn duet for her and Miss Williams. Another song of Miss Hayes's got encored, and the audience clamoured loudly for "Prince Charlie," which was down for her in the programme, but for some unexplained reason had been changed. With the greatest possible good humour, Miss Hayes instantly turned round to Mr. Lavenu and giving him the hint, made the hall ring again with the favourite (Scotch ballad this time), "Cam' ye by Athol, lad wi' the Philibeg."

Altogether Miss Catherine Hayes leaves behind her an impression on her Manchester friends, which cannot be readily detached, who, we are sure, will be glad to welcome her with open arms, on her return from her American trip.

There was a concert at the Concert Hall last week, Viardot, Garcia, Tamberlik, Polonini, and Miss Viennedy on the harp, this week—Sontag and Tagliafico appeared there on Wednesday night.

Of Miss Hayes's singing, a better notion than we could give may be formed from a notice from the Manchester Examiner, on the last concert, which we extract and send you. Not having attended the first and last concerts, and having only heard a part of the second, we are bound in some measure to supply the deficiency.

"The announcement, some time since, that Miss Catherine Hayes was about to give three farewell concerts previous to her departure for America, made quite a stir among the musical people of Manchester, and all who entertained a true feeling for what is high and pure in art, seemed anxious to pay homage to the 'British Nightingale,' and to give her a parting cheer before crossing the Atlantic.

"Catherine Hayes undoubtedly takes rank among the most perfect vocalists of the present day, not as an English singer, but unquestionably as one of the prima donnas of Europe. Educated in Italy, and under the best professors,—having a deep love for her profession, and possessed of enthusiasm, which is the parent of zeal and perseverance, she is a perfect mistress of her art. Nature has done an immense deal for Catherine Hayes, but Catherine Hayes has not left all to nature. Nature has endowed her with a most exquisite voice, of unusual capabilities, with feeling, development, taste, expression, and a keen perception of the beautiful; but the artist has come nobly to the assistance of the goddess, and shown herself a worthy handmaiden. The best proof how largely art has assisted nature is exemplified in the very great improvement made by Miss Hayes as a singer since she first visited London. A parallel case to this we do not remember, except in the instance of Pasta; but she took years, were Catherine Hayes took only months, to become one of the greatest singers of her time.

"It may easily be imagined that the reception given to Miss C. Hayes on her entrance was of the warmest kind. She was received with a general shout, which was prolonged for several minutes. She looked remarkably well, stouter, we think, in person, than when we last saw her, and stronger in appearance. Her first song was the 'Ah! mon fils,' from the Prophete, which, according to all the London papers, she has made entirely her own, in the teeth of comparisons with Viardot and Alboni. All were naturally anxious to hear what they had read and heard so much about, and as we ourselves had a vivid recollection of Viardot's singing in the Prophete last season, we perhaps were more anxious than anybody else. The fair artist more than satisfied ourselves. Her singing the 'Ah! mon fils' is literally a chef d'œuvre. We do not think we ever heard any piece of vocalisation which more thoroughly pleased and astonished us. It requires a great compass of voice to manage the 'Ah! mon fils' satisfactorily. Madame Viardot, by her extreme art, if not satisfactorily, contrives to manage it. Alboni manages it, and satisfactorily too, but she wants the soprano brilliancy in the upper notes to give the aria its true effect. Catherine Hayes, in her voice, leaves nothing to be desired. Her upper notes are as clear and ringing as a bell; the middle voice round, full, and sweet; and the lower voice, without losing the distinctive character of the other two registers, possesses the depth, strength, and sonority of the true contralto. These three divisions are blended together with singular art, and constitute a perfect organ of nearly three octaves in extent. We may conscientiously affirm, we never heard a pure soprano with such a middle and low voice. Herein Catherine Hayes possesses an enviable advantage over Jenny Lind, whose voice is circumscribed in the lower division; and herein also may be said to lie the power of the singer in varying the expression, which renders Catherine Hayes's ballad singing so irresistibly touching. The 'Ah! mon fils,' we repeat, was a superb effort of vocalisation, and created a perfect furor. Miss C. Hayes next gave Wallace's ballad, 'Why do I weep for thee?' with inimitable feeling and taste; and again roused the whole house to an unusual pitch of ecstasy: an encore and subsequent rapturous acclamations were the inevitable consequence. Her third essay was the never tiring and exhilarating rondo finale, 'Ah! non giunge,' from Sonnambula; which, as a brilliant display in the Italian bravura style, we have seldom heard equalled. By-the-by, Catherine Hayes has one of the most perfect and beautiful shakes we ever heard. All the cadences were striking and novel, and the entire performance was instinct with characteristic hilarity and animal spirits. The audience, towards the end, became so excited that they could hardly contain themselves or keep their seats. The burst of applause that followed the rondo was quite deafening, and, of course, nothing but a repetition would satisfy the thoughtless multitude, despite the fatigue the fair artiste must have undergone. The encore was followed by the same tumultuous demonstrations. "Miss C. Hayes's last effort was in the Irish ballad 'Kathleen Mavourneen,' which she appears to sing everywhere with unbounded success. As a specimen of pure ballad singing, Miss Catherine Hayes's 'Kathleen Mavourneen' cannot be surpassed, and has not been equalled since the days of Miss Stevens. How exquisite the tone of voice,—so tender, plaintive,—and how charming the expression! How simple and unpretending the style! How irreproachable the taste! In short, 'Kathleen Mavourneen' is perfection,—the very ne plus ultra of ballad singing.

"On considering the talents and acquirements of our English prima donna after the conclusion of the concerts of Thursday and Friday evenings, what principally impressed itself upon us was the great versatility which she so satisfactorily demonstrated. In the grand declamatory French school we had one of the highest examples in Meyerbeer's 'Ah! mon fils.' The 'Ah! non giunge' furnished a brilliant specimen of the Italian bravura; and the English and Irish ballads afforded two instances of the homely and quiet school of vocalisation. Perhaps to a singer possessed of Miss C. Hayes's power, this last may be the most difficult to achieve; but, difficult or not, no one can sing a simple ballad more simply than Catherine Hayes. Never was success more decided and universal, never was enthusiasm more hearty and general; and never, we may add, did any artist deserve more from an admiring public. Miss C. Hayes sails for America on Wednesday next. She takes with her the good wishes and honest prayers of all that know her. She is about to cross the Atlantic, and make war on the hearts of the Americans. Of her success there can be no doubt. With our best wishes for her health and happiness, and with real admiration for her great talent, we bid farewell for a while to 'Kathleen Mavourneen.'"

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

The miscellaneous performances and reduced prices have continued to keep up their attractions during the week. On Saturday there was one of the most crowded houses ever witnessed at Her Majesty's Theatre. Hundreds were turned away from the doors who received tickets for another night, and hundreds more were satisfied with being transferred from the pit to the gallery, where, if they could procure standing room, they had a view of the stage. The evening's entertainments consisted of the first act of Norma for Cruvelli, Pardini, and Madame Guilian; the second act of Figlia del Reggimento, for Sontag, Gardoni, and Frederick Lablache; a selection from Der Freischütz, for Madame Fiorentini; the last act of Lucrezia Borgia, for Madame Barbieri Nini; together with sundry divertissements invoking the talents of Carolina Rosati, Amalia Ferraris and the corps de ballet. Here was quantity and quality both, and variety to boot, and we are not astonished at the enormous crowds that rushed to Her Majesty's Theatre on Saturday night. The names of Cruvelli and Sontag were in themselves load-stars of attraction, enough to fill the house. For our own part we set ourselves in toto against these hodge-podge performances, and should rate them, and soundly too, but that the reduction nights seem to be exceptional, and plead for immunity.

On Tuesday Norma was given, arranged in one act, for Cruvelli, Madame Guilian, Pardini, Mercuriali, and Casanova; followed by the divertissement, "La Saltarelle," for Rosati and M. Silvain; succeeded by act first of Lucrezia Borgia for Madame Barbieri Nini, Mdle. Ida Bertrand, Gardoni, &c.; concluding with the divertissement from Il Prodigio.

The performance on Wednesday consisted of Lucia di Lammermoor—produced for Madame Barbieri Nini, her first appearance here in the part of the heroine—with selections from Linda di Chamouni for Sophie Cruvelli, Marie Cruvelli, and Sims Reeves; and, in the ballet department, the Pas de Cinq, by Mdles. Caroline Rosati, Rosa, Esper, Jullien, and Lamoureux; and the divertissement, revived for this occasion, Le delire d'un Peintre, with Rosati, Petit Stephan, and M. Silvain.

On Thursday night was given the mangled remains of Fidelio, all the first act being omitted, all Jacquin's music in the second act, and nearly all Pizarro's music. Signor Coletti having left at the close of the legitimate season, it was no easy matter to supply the place of the stentorian barytone, more especially in Beethoven's music, and at a short notice. Signor Lorenzo, a zealous and good artist, who is entitled to unqualified praise for his exertions during the past season, undertook Beethoven's music and at a short notice. But Beethoven's music is no coquet to be lightly won, and at a glance, and so, Signor Lorenzo, not having time, made no impression on her, and gave her up as hopeless till time and opportunity convened. To be sure Signor Lorenzo manfully came on the stage as Pizarro, and looked as black and murderous as heart could desire, and made voluminous tragic points which, in any other theatre besides a theatre lyric, would have brought down the house; but where were the notes, Signor Lorenzo, where were the notes? And echo answers, where! Well, Signor Lorenzo, we blame you not, nor does it detract from your merit one jot that you were unable to master Beethoven's music at a glance and a thought. Signor Mercuriali's unexpected departure, we suppose, was the cause of the first act being omitted. Again the play-house prices step in, and cast a veil between the performance and our anathema. After the crumbles from Fidelio, Sims Reeves sang the last scena from Lucia, and Madame Barbieri Nini appeared in the last acts of Anna Bolena. These fragments were followed by the Pas de Fascination from Alma, danced by Mdles. Rosati, Rosa, Esper, Jullien, and Lamoureux; the whole winding up with the first act of Masaniello, in which the inimitable Monti and the charming Fiorentini were conspicuous.

Last night Sonnambula was repeated with Sontag, Calzolari, Lorenzo, and Mdle. Feller. It was preceded by the last act of Lucrezia Borgia, for Madame Barbieri Nini. After the Sonnambula, the Pas de Fascination was given as on the previous night and selections from Norma for Cruvelli, Guilian, and Pardini; concluding with the Prodigo divertissement.

To-night the theatre will positively close. The performances announced, are selections from Figlia del Reggimento, the last act of Anna Bolena, the Pas de Cinq, extracts from Ernani, and an unmentioned ballet.

Our resumé of the season is necessarily postponed until next week.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

RESUME OF THE SEASON

ON Saturday night, the last of the season, Meyerbeer's Huguenots was performed, on the whole, in a more perfect and effective manner than on any previous occasion during the present year. Grisi was never more energetic and superb. Mario, as though to atone in one effort for all past deficiencies, completely surpassed himself in the great scenes of Raoul. To hear him in the sestet, and in the celebrated duet with Valentine, it was scarcely possible to believe that anything had ever been the matter with his voice. Madame Castellan, Mademoiselle Angri, Tamburini, Tagliafico, and last, not least, Formes, exerted themselves to the utmost, in their several parts, to do honour to the farewell representation, and the result was an ensemble rarely excelled, even at the Royal Italian Opera. The furore created by the duet of the fourth act, and the enthusiasm with which Grisi and Mario were twice recalled to be overwhelmed with plaudits and other marks of favour, reminded us of the Huguenots in 1848, when that opera was first represented on the Italian stage, and made so deep an impression on the public. The performances terminated with the National Anthem, in which Castellan, Grisi, and Angri sang the principal verses. The house was a "bumper."

Although the most successful in its pecuniary results since Covent-garden Theatre was opened as an Italian Opera, the fifth season, just brought to a close, has by no means been distinguished for novelty. The prospectus, issued in the month of March, offered a list of eight operas, five of which were "positively" to be produced. Of these, however, we have only had three—Il Flauto Magico, Fidelio, and Saffo—the last a failure. The management was forestalled in the Enfant Prodigue by the other house, while it was well known that Mr. Gye had purchased the copyright. Of the thirty-three established works, moreover, at the immediate disposal of the theatre, only fifteen have been played during the season of sixty-seven nights—Semiramide, La Donna del Lago, La Guzza Ladra, Otello, Norma, I Puritani, the Huguenots, Robert le Diable, the Prophète, L'Elisir d'Amore, Lucrezia Borgia, La Favorita, Don Giovanni, Masaniello, and Der Freischütz. The most attractive of these have been Don Giovanni, Lucrezia Borgia, and the three operas of Meyerbeer, to which, with the addition of Il Flauto Magico, the one successful novelty, the prosperous issue of the speculation must chiefly be traced. It is questionable, however, whether the bona fide subscribers, to boxes, stalls, and season tickets, who handed over so many thousands of pounds to the treasury, anticipating variety no less than excellence in the performances, have not good cause for complaint. The general visitor, who selects his nights, and pays his money on particular occasions, has every reason to be satisfied, since he has heard the operas of his predilection performed by his favourite artists, aided by a first-rate orchestra and a numerous chorus. But the subscriber has had no choice. Tempted by the prospectus, he laid down his money, and relied on the good faith of the direction for the quality and extent of his amusements. If these did not come up to what he had a just right to expect, no one can blame him for protesting; and it is our unpleasant duty to record that a great number of subscribers have protested earnestly upon the grounds suggested. On the other hand, what the subscribers have really heard has been generally unexceptionable in regard to the style of performance, although the influenza, and other hostile causes, have been continually at work, to promote delays, incur disappointments, and damage voices. Let us, however, take a rapid survey of the prominent events of the season, in the order of their occurrence:—

The theatre opened on Thursday, April 3 (instead of Saturday, March 29, as had been announced), with Rossini's Semiramide, supported by Grisi, Angri, Salvatori, and Tagliafico. Six months' repose had been of essential benefit to Grisi, who was in glorious voice, and acted more admirably than ever. Her reception was, as it deserved to be, enthusiastic; and we may at once say that to the indefatigable exertions of this great and popular performer, who has never on one occasion been absent from her post, the management owes a deep and lasting debt of gratitude. Angri was welcomed with satisfaction as representative of the principal contralto characters, in lieu of Mademoiselle de Meric, who the year before had vainly essayed to sustain them with the requisite weight. Salvatori, a barytone, coming with a great reputation from abroad, failed to make an impression, his voice being materially damaged by what was presumed to be "a severe cold and hoarseness." Subsequent repetitions of Semiramide, however, proved that the "severe cold and hoarseness" had been unjustly accused; and the ultimate conclusion arrived at was that the new Assur had lost his voice altogether—not, like Falstaff, with "hallooing of anthems," but with singing in the operas of Verdi. On Tuesday, April 8th, Masaniello was revived, and Tamberlik, Formes, and Madame Castellan, made their first appearance. Tamberlik, whose success, the previous season, had at first been doubtful, then progressive, and at last so complete as to place him side by side with Mario, the greatest tenor of the day, was at once recognized by the public as an established favourite—a distinction fully warranted by this and subsequent performances. Formes had a difficult task to accomplish, coming forward as substitute for Massol, who had already made so great an impression in the part of Pietro. Nevertheless, he went through the ordeal "with flying colours," and his Pietro was praised for its force and originality. Madame Castellan, always a favourite, was pronounced superior to Madame Dorus Gras, her predecessor in the part of Elvira. Madame Ballin, as Fenella, was more active than ideal; but Mademoiselle Louisa Taglioni helped to give life and spirit to the characteristic dances, otherwise but poorly supported. At this juncture Signor Tamberlik fell ill, and on two successive nights the subscribers and the public were obliged to accept Semiramide in lieu of Masaniello and Roberto il Diavolo. The fracas induced by these disappointments, particularly on the occasion when Roberto had been announced, and the presence of Majesty anticipated, will be remembered, as an ominous prelude to the Easter recess. In short, but for Grisi, the avant saison must have been termed a fiasco. The laurels of the management, however, were shortly retrieved.

The after-Easter season was inaugurated by no means auspiciously. The first performance was the Huguenots (April 22), which was attended by two contretemps;—a sudden loss of voice experienced by Mario, who began the opera with all his wonted force, but, as the representation progressed, became gradually deprived of his resources; and an indisposition of Mademoiselle Angri, which necessitated the substitution of a new soprano, Mademoiselle Brandi, as the Page. The part of Urbain having been composed by Meyerbeer for a soprano, Mademoiselle Brandi was enabled to sing the music according to the score, and acquitted herself so well that Mr. Gye immediately secured her services for the remainder of the season. There were other less important changes. Tagliafico replaced Massol as Nevers, and Polonini Tamburini as St. Bris; but neither could be regarded as an improvement on the original cast. Roberto il Diavolo was given on the following Thursday, Tamberlik as Roberto, Grisi as Alice, Castellan as Isabel, and Stigelli, a new German tenor vice Mario, in the small part of Rambaldo, which the spoiled favourite of the public declined to play again, although he had made so great an impression in it the year previously. Stigelli's success, however, was unequivocal, and led to his engagement for the rest of the season. Thus two good acquisitions, not mentioned in the prospectus, were insured to the establishment—a soprano comprimaria and a secondo tenore. Mademoiselle Brandi has certainly not atoned for the loss of Mademoiselle Corbari, but Signor Stigelli, in the position assigned him, has been of unquestionable utility. At the next performance of the Huguenots Mademoiselle Angri, having recovered, resumed the character of Urbain, while, as a contretemps, Herr Formes was this time so indisposed that he could scarcely get through the performance. To judge by its frequent appearances on the stage of the Italian Opera, one might almost have imagined that the influenza had been especially attracted to London by the fame of the Crystal Palace; "in the memory of the oldest habitué," its inroads upon the throats of singers and songstresses had never been so incessant and persevering. La Donna del Lago, produced on the 8th of May, brought Mario and Tamberlik together, Grisi and Angri in their old parts of Elena and Malcolm, and a new basso giusto, Signor Bianchi, in the character of Douglas. Signor Bianchi made little or no impression. Lucresia Borgia on the following Saturday, drew an immense house, and renewed all the ancient glory of "the incomparable pair," who outdid themselves, and thoroughly captivated the audience. Signor Salvatori, the new barytone, played Alphonso, and proved, beyond further controversy, that he had lost his voice, and that, nevertheless, he was an intelligent and clever actor. At the repetition of La Donna del Lago, Castellan replaced Grisi as Elena, and acquitted herself to general satisfaction. On the 17th of May Tamberlik achieved a new and legitimate success as Giulio (Max) in Der Freischütz, the music of which part, according to unanimous opinion, was then heard for the first time properly executed. Mademoiselle Bertrandi, as Annette, made an advance in public estimation, and Tagliafico was considered a good substitute for Massol, in Chiliano. Madame Castellan was Agatha, and Formes Caspar, the part in which he first appeared at the Royal Italian Opera, in 1850. Meanwhile Fidelio, continually advertised and continually postponed, on this and that pretext, was demanded with one voice by the subscribers, the public, and the press. Positively announced for the 22nd—vice La Favorita, withdrawn in consequence of the indisposition of Mario—it was again put off, through the illness of Formes, and Masaniello substituted, Tagliafico playing the part of Pietro, in place of Formes, with great credit. The delay in the production of Fidelio caused great dissatisfaction among the subscribers, and endless were the speculations as to the probable cause. Some would have it that Madame Viardot Garcia had insisted upon playing the part of Leonora, and that the opera would be further postponed until the arrival of that celebrated artist. This was the prevalent opinion, and, for the time, arrested the course of remonstrance, until the unexpected and brilliant débüt of Mademoiselle Sophie Cruvelli at the other establishment put the management on the alert, and Fidelio was forthwith produced (May 27) with Madame Castellan as Leonora. With the highest respect for the gifts and accomplishments of this charming artist, they do not bring within her reach such a character as Fidelio. Hamlet without Hamlet is not to be tolerated, nor Fidelio without Fidelio; and though the Florestan of Tamberlik and the Rocco of Formes were first-rate, the Jacquino of Stigelli unexceptionable, and the orchestra and chorus (the latter by no means perfect, however,) greatly superior to those at the other house, the chef d'œuvre of Beethoven failed to produce the effect anticipated, and, after two representations, was abandoned to Mademoiselle Cruvelli and Her Majesty's Theatre, where it has remained one of the constant attractions of the season. Norma was revived (June 3), and Grisi reaped fresh laurels in one of her most superb impersonations, to which additional interest was given by the success of a new aspirant at the other house. As with Jenny Lind, so it was with Mademoiselle Cruvelli; the public held their faith unshaken in Grisi's Norma. Were twenty more to come, one after the other, as good or better than Mademoiselle Cruvelli's, the public would, we feel satisfied, remain firm in their conviction. Grisi's Norma is the nearest to what Pasta's was, and, if Pasta's be the model, Grisi's must be now accepted as the beau idéal of the Druid priestess. Tamberlik's Pollio was again welcomed as the best the stage has known, while Mademoiselle Bertrandi's Adalgisa made every one regret the loss of the charming and intelligent Corbari. Formes was the Orovoso.

The chronic "influenza" of Signor Salvatori led to his retirement; and, uncertain about the proceedings of Ronconi, always an irresponsible subject, the management could devise no better expedient than the re-engagement of Signor Tamberlini, who, at the first summons, came post-haste from St. Petersburg. Tamberlini made his rentrée (June 5) as Don Giovanni, in which he proved himself still unrivalled, and was received with special favour. To the Donna Anna of Grisi, the Zerlina of Castellan, the Leporello of Formes, the Masetto of Polonini, and the Commandatore of Tagliafico, it is unnecessary to allude; but it is only just to name the Donna Elvira of Mdlle. Bertrandi as her most successful effort. The great feature of the performance, however, was the first appearance of Tamberlik as Don Ottavio, which he was invited to undertake in consequence of a fresh indisposition of Mario. No assumption of the popular tenor raised him so high as this in the estimation of the public. His "Il mio tesoro" electrified the house, and his careful and studied acting elevated the part of Don Ottavio to an importance which it had never previously assumed. During the remainder of the season Tamberlik has retained the character, and is likely to retain it so long as he remains at the Royal Italian Opera. As an incident worthy of record, in connection with Don Giovanni, we may mention that the Queen attended the second representation (for the first time), and was so much pleased that the opera was repeated a third time shortly afterwards, at the especial desire of Her Majesty, who, moreover, suggested certain alterations in the last scene, which had been frequently urged by ourselves. These alterations were, of course, adopted.

On Saturday, June 21, Madame Pauline Viardot Garcia made her first appearance this season in her celebrated character of Fides. The cast of the Prophète was the same as last season, with the single exception of Signor Stigelli, who, as Jonas, the Anabaptist, did much to aid the general effect. The Fides of Madame Viardot retained all the peculiarities and excellencies for which it has been remarked; but the exaggeration of style, which is her chief drawback, was more evident than before, both in her acting and singing, while her voice showed evidences of fatigue, which subsequent performances made further manifest. Mario's Jean of Leyden was more noble and picturesque than ever. On the 8th of July the celebrated comedian, tragedian, and singer—tría juncla in uno—Ronconi, whose arrival, after endless conjectures and disappointments, was at length established by his own assertion viva voce, made his bow in I Puritani, as Riccardo—perhaps the feeblest of all his assumptions, Tamberlini being the Giorgio. Ronconi's reception was highly flattering. Mario being again out of order, the chief weight of the opera fell upon the shoulders of Grisi, who, as usual, was found quite equal to her task. On the following Thursday the Queen visited the theatre in state, and Mozart's Il Flauto Magico was produced with immense and well-deserved success. The cast included Grisi, Viardot, Mario, Ronconi, Formes, Stigelli, and Madame Anna Zerr, who was engaged expressly to play the character of the Queen of Night, and whose execution of the two great and difficult airs proved her to be a vocalist of extraordinary gifts, and created the highest degree of enthusiasm. The other features were the Papageno of Ronconi, a piece of imitable humour, and the Sarastro of Formes, the most legitimate and impressive of all his impersonations. At the second performance, Mdlle. Anna Zerr being indisposed, Miss Louisa Pyne attempted the part of the Queen of Night, with what success has been recorded. On the 26th the Elisir d'Amore was revived, with the same cast as that of the previous season, one character excepted—Nemorino, which was sustained by a new tenor, Signor Ciaffici. That one character made all the difference. Mario could not easily be replaced by any one, much less by Signor Ciaffel, who completely failed to satisfy the audience. The irresistible fun of Ronconi's Dulcamara, the racy humour of Tamburini's Belcore, and the artificial vivacity of Madame Viardot's Adina were insufficient to compensate for Mario's singing in the "Una furtiva lagrima," which every opera goer must remember for its incomparable grace and pathos. The opera, in consequence, with all the merits of its execution, did not attract, did not create the same excitement as the year before, and was at once withdrawn. The next revival was La Gazza Ladra (Aug. 2), with Grisi, Marie, Angri, Ronconi, Tamburini, &c. Of this performance there is nothing particular to adduce, except that, bating the obstinate hoarseness of Mario, which has afflicted himself and the public at fitful intervals during the whole season, the performance was beyond reproach.

The anticipated "grand event" of the year—the first representation of the much talked of opera, Saffo, libretto by M. Emile Augier, music by M. Charles Gounod—took place on Saturday, August 9. Saffo had been pre-apostrophised as a masterpiece, and M. Gounod as another Beethoven. The new opera, according to some, was the most extraordinary first work ever written, and its composer the most rising musical genius of the age. Anticipation was on tiptoe, and the world was prepared to be astonished. Alas for the uncertainty of all things under the moon! Instead of a masterpiece, Saffo turned out to be the unfinished essay of an inexperienced musician, in which want of invention and want of scholarship went hand in hand, the chief characteristic being a kind of laborious dulness. Madame Viardot, like a true and conscientious artist, worked with a zeal worthy of a better cause; but all her efforts were unavailable; the music strained her physical resources so terribly that her efforts produced pain rather than pleasure in the end, and no "grand moment" made up for the "assommans quarts d'heure." Tamberlik did wonders in a part that had nothing to redeem it from common-place; Tamburini managed with consummate art to render an unmeaning buffoon almost, if not quite, amusing; Stigelli, Maralti, Rommi, and the rest, tried their utmost with music that had neither melody nor rhythm; and Mr. Costa, who had bestowed more pains and rehearsals upon Saffo than upon Zauberflote, Fidelio, Moise, the Huguenots, or the Prophete, used exertions with his band and chorus, that, without hyperbole, might be apostrophised as colossal. But all to no purpose. Ex nihilo nihil fit. Out of Saffo nothing can be got. As well attempt to make grapes grow out of a bare rock, or to obtain a bucket of fresh water from the depths of the sea. The most perfect execution that art and indefatigable industry can insure would fail to make Saffo effective, however it may be relished by a few who have the key to its esoteric beauties. Its failure at the Royal Italian Opera, notwithstanding the praiseworthy efforts of the management to render every possible justice to author and composer, was notorious; and the empty benches on the second night fully justified Mr. Gye in withdrawing it from the bills.

Madame Viardot appeared as Donna Anna on one or two occasions, and Mdlle. Guiseppe Morra made her debut as Adalgisa in Norma. The Adalgisa of Mdlle. Guiseppe Morra, even more than that of Mdlle. Brandi, made us regret the absence of Corbani.

Mdlle. Vintale, announced as a new contralto, appeared as one of the attendants on the Queen of Night in the Flauto Magico, with Miss Lanza and Mdlle. Brandi, and emulated her associates in singing out of tune.

The last production of the season was Rossini's Otello (August 22), in which the brilliant success of Grisi, Tamber-lik, and Ronconi as Desdemona, Otello, and Iago, has been too lately recorded to render any further observations necessary.

From the foregoing it may be gathered that the policy of the direction has been to adhere to the past, the only successful novelty having been Mozart's Il Flauto Magico. Mario's intervals of convalescence, when, both as a singer and as an actor, he attained positive greatness; Tamberlik's rapid rise to the height of popular esteem; the unexpected co-operation of Tamburini, always a great artist, and unrivalled in certain characters; the growing reputation of Ronconi, now for the first time entirely understood and appreciated by the English public; the gradual and marked progress of Formes; and, last not least, the unimpaired powers of the untiring and magnificent Grisi, must be noted as facts that have largely influenced the prospects of the season and helped to fill the coffers of the treasury. Angri, a deserved favourite, has appeared too rarely; and several nights that have been sacrificed to unproductive representations might have been better employed in bringing her forward in one or two of her best parts. The superintendence of the musical department by Mr. Costa, has been, as usual, productive of excellent results. The band under the direction of that distinguished conductor, in spite of one or two changes in principal instruments, and a slight reduction in numbers, is still the band par excellence. The chorus, however, not only diminished in numbers but fallen off in strength, stands in need of renovation. In the scenic department, and that of supernumeraries, the exertions of the management have been less munificent than in former years, nothing very new or splendid having been exhibited in the way of costume or decoration, while the subordinates, or acting chorus, have been largely curtailed. We are not advocates for needless outlay or superfluous profusion, but a line should be drawn between extravagance and inefficiency. In the matter of rehearsals we have the same complaint to make as last year. With the means at his disposal, the performance at the Royal Italian Opera might rival those of the Grand Opera of Paris in perfection of detail, as they already more than equal them in spirit—but it is our duty to say that, during the whole season, not one opera has been thoroughly well rehearsed, with the single exception of M. Gounod's Saffo. The management must not overlook the fact that the English public is every day getting more particular, and less ready to put up with careless and unfinished performances. The Royal Italian Opera has won a European reputation, and it depends upon those at the head of the direction to guard or abandon it. Once lost, it will not easily be regained.

We believe we may safely conclude with the information that Mr. Gye, who, by judicious reductions of the expenses (every person engaged in the establishment from the "prima donna assoluta" to the absolute doorkeeper, having willingly submitted to a decrease of salary), and by general wise management, has contrived to render an establishment once attractive and ruinous now attractive and profitable—will continue sole director of the theatre, and that many engagements of importance have already been completed for the ensuing season. So, with the best wishes for its continued prosperity, we bid farewell to the Royal Italian Opera until 1852.

Mr. Vandenhoff and his daughter are performing at the Queen's Theatre, Liverpool, appearing for the first time on Tuesday evening, in The Stranger.

Dramatic Intelligence.

HAYMARKET.—We have very great satisfaction—a satisfaction which we doubt not will be shared by all our readers—in announcing that Mr. Webster has so far recovered from his late serious indisposition as to be able to make his re-appearance at this theatre. Even when well, Mr. Webster's time is so much taken up by his managerial duties, that he plays far too seldom for his admirers—whose name is legion—and, therefore, his illness was the more to be regretted, as it deprived the public of the already rare opportunities they had of seeing him. We have not the honour of knowing Mr. Webster's physician, nor do we think, like old Montaigne that "Les medecins ne se contentent point d'avoir la maladie en gouvernement; ils rendent la santé malade pour garder qu'on ne puisse en aucune saison eschapper leur auctorité—a proceeding which certainly bears a strong family likeness to the custom attributed to those gentlemen of the present day who, like tom-cats, pass most of their time on the tiles in the exercise of the honourable calling of bricklayers, and who are accused of making two fresh holes in the roof for every old one that they patch up. We do not, we say, think as badly of physicians as old Montaigne, whose opinions on this subject were shared by Molière and Le Sage, but we certainly cannot help wishing that Mr. Webster would imitate the custom patronised by that celebrated potentate, the Emperor of China, who pays his medical attendant as long as he, the Emperor, is in perfect health, but stops his allowance directly he feels unwell. Perhaps this method may be attended with beneficial results, but whether it would be or not we cannot pretend positively to decide, and will therefore content ourselves on congratulating Mr. Webster on his return to the active duties of his profession. The characters Mr. Webster has appeared in, are Tartuffe, in Mr. Oxenford's classical translation of Molière's chef d'œuvre, and Charles Torrens in The Serious Family. His conception and rendering of both these rôles are too well known to require us to enter into their merits, which, in fact, are so many that we are afraid we should not find room, in the space allotted to us, to enumerate them; we will simply say that we never beheld Mr. Webster play with more verve and spirit. In the Tartuffe especially, his acting was marked with the greatest tact and delicacy, conveying to us with consummate skill not only the more prominent parts of the character; but all those little nuances, all those fine touches of light and shade which expose to our view the inmost workings, the most secret thoughts of the fawning, specious impostor, such as he was intended by the genius of Molière, and such as he, unfortunately, exists but too frequently at the present day. It says much for Mr. Webster's profound study of nature, that he can present us with such a life-like picture as is his Tartuffe.

ADELPHI.—Green Bushes is still playing at this popular place of amusement with undiminished attraction. Since our last notice, Mr. G. Honey has continued to act for Mr. Wright, who is not yet, we are sorry to say, sufficiently recovered to resume his professional duties. Mr. G. Honey is increasing daily, or rather nightly, in public estimation, and we see no reason to alter our former opinion, that he will very soon become a very great favourite with every class of theatre-goers. We are the more pleased at his success, because he is emphatically a conscientious actor, one who does not imagine that his own part is the "be all and the end all" in a piece, but feels that when an author has taken pains to produce a serious effect in any scene, he certainly does not desire that effect to be destroyed for the sake of procuring a round of misplaced applause, which, however gratifying to the "funny man" who produces it, cannot fail of injuring the ensemble of the play. The old and successful burlesque of Taming a Tartar has been the second piece. Madame Celeste as Mazourka is as attractive and fascinating as ever. The house has been crammed every night.

Provincial.

REDCAR.—The connoisseurs of Redcar and its vicinity, on Friday week, enjoyed a great treat in attending Mr. Lawson's concerts, held in the Zetland Rooms, the artistes present being Mrs. Sunderland, Mr. Ryalls, Mr. H. V. Lewis, and Mr. Lawson. Mrs. Sunderland, though suffering from indisposition, sung with great brilliancy and pathos. We were particularly charmed by her rendering of Handel's song, "Sweet Bird," in which she was accompanied on the violin by Mr. H. Lawson. The duet, "I've wandered in Dreams," sung by Mrs. Sunderland and Mr. Ryalls, was loudly encored; and Barnett's celebrated trio, "The magic wave scarf," sung by particular desire, was given in a spirited and highly dramatic manner. Mr. Ryalls, the popular ballad singer from the Liverpool Concerts, was loudly encored in the old songs, "The Thorn," "The Sailor's Journal," and "Sally in our Alley." This gentleman has an excellent voice, and his style forcible, pure, and original. Mr. H. V. Lewis accompanied on the piano efficiently. This gentleman, in his accompaniments, never obtrudes or thrusts his performance forward, to the sacrifice of the voice, as is so often done. His fantasia was received with great applause. Mr. Lawson's solos on the violin, "Irish airs," by Lawson, and "Carnival de Venice," by Paganini, were both loudly encored; for the former he substituted De Beriot's seventh air with variations. It is the first time we have had the pleasure of hearing this talented young violinist; we feel certain that ere long he will take his place amongst the heads of his profession. He is a native of Whitby, though at present resident in Liverpool, and has studied in Germany under Mollique. We hope to have the pleasure of a visit from Mr. Lawson and his accomplished companions next year, and venture to promise him a better reception than he had on the present occasion, as we can assure him that the feeling here appears one of unmixed approbation.—Yorkshire Gazette.

MANCHESTER.—A grand concert was given on Monday evening in the Concert Hall. The following was the programme:—

PART FIRST.

Overture	"Preciosa"	Weber.
Duo...Signor Tamberlik and Signor Polonini...	"Sara il morir" (Massaniello)	Auber.
Aria...Madame Viardot...	"Se i miei sospiri"	Stradella.
Song...Signor Polonini...	"Pro peccatis" (Stabat Mater)	Rossini.
Concerto—harp...	Miss Kennedy...Reminiscences of England	Parish Albers.
Grand Aria...Signor Tamberlik	"Di noble fama" (Oberon)	Weber.
Duo.. Madame Viardot and Signor Polonini...	"Chia va la" (Les Huguenots)	Meyerbeer.

PART SECOND.

Overture	"Nozze di Figaro"	Mozart.
Duo...Madame Viardot and Signor Tamberlik...	"Un tenore core" (Roberto Devereux)	Donizetti.
Song...Signor Polonini..."Piff, Paff" (Les Huguenots)		Meyerbeer.
Fantasia—harp	Miss Kennedy
Musicale		Bochsa.
Spanish Ballads	Madame Viardot.
Barcarolla.. Signor Tamberlik. "Amici piu bello" (Masaniello)		Auber.
Trio...Madame Viardot, Signor Tamberlik, and Signor Polonini "Guai se ti fugge" (Lucrezia Borgia)		Donizetti.
Overture	"Fra Diavolo"	Auber.
Conductor.....	Mr. Charles Hallé.
Leader	Mr. Thomas.

Notwithstanding the absence from Manchester of many families at this period of the year,—some visiting the Great World's Exhibition, in London, others gathering health at the several watering places, to which they are so cheaply and so swiftly carried by the various railways,—the concert of Monday evening was crowded, causing a rise in the thermometer far beyond what may be considered comfortable. The principal attractions were Madame Viardot and Signor Tamberlik, both coming to us with well-earned reputations from the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden. Viardot has won her way to fame by earnest study, and a dash of that genius which placed her sister, poor Malibran, among the few who reach the highest rank of their profession. With a voice deficient in quality and power, she has mastered the difficulties of her art, improving the advantages of industry by those of intelligence and taste. She delivered the prayer from Stradella with grace as well as impassioned feeling; the duet from Les Huguenots showed how acute was her dramatic preception; whilst the playful delivery of the Spanish ballads, in which she was encored, evinced a thorough acquaintance with the peculiar and varied characteristics of style. We might add, by the way, that her own accompaniment was not the least interesting part of her performance. Signor Tamberlik is, indeed, a great artist, with a pure chest voice of extraordinary compass—we heard him the other evening, in Otello, reach C in alt—he aims more at pure declamation than at florid ornament. It is not in a concert-room, however, that either of these vocalists are to be fully known or duly appreciated; they are actors as well as singers, true artists wanting the scope of dramatic situation for the display of those intellectual powers which they have so finely wedded to music. It is not quality of tone or brilliancy of execution that we look for in such as these, but something beyond, beautiful as they may be.

Polonini sang with care and good taste, particularly the "Pro peccatis." The "Piff, paff" is scarcely within his reach, whilst we lose much of its character and effect when taken from its place on the stage. Miss Kennedy, at present a resident in Manchester, gave her two performances on the harp with great skill, introducing in the finale of Boells's "Mosaïque Musicale" the varied harmonic, glissando, arpeggio, and other harp effects, with great facility of execution. She has acquired at the same time a very considerable volume of tone, and is a decided artist; her reception may be considered most flattering. Owing to the inaccuracy of the orchestra parts, she was accompanied by Mr. D. W. Banks on the pianoforte. With this exception the orchestra was fully employed throughout the evening,—a pleasant indication both as to the energy of the committee in the enforcement of rehearsal, and the docility of the artists in their attention to such demand. A sign of progress in the right direction. The overtures were well played, and we must also compliment the conductor and his forces on the manner of executing the very difficult instrumentation which accompanies the duo from Les Huguenots, sung by Madame Viardot and Signor Polonini. There was less of the hackneyed music of the modern Italian masters introduced on the present occasion,—another advance in the right path. In the absence of Mr. Seymour, who is engaged for the Worcester festival of this week, Mr. Thomas, of Liverpool, ably filled the post of leader. There was a talk in the room of some material alterations in the building, amongst them, the introduction of side galleries, which we hope may not interfere with its present beauty of form, or the facility of hearing.—Manchester Examiner.

FIDELIO.

(Continued from our last.)

The second subject, opening with the first notes of Florestan's aria (the phrase that is so much worked in the introduction of these two overtures), indicates Leonore's tender memory of her mutual happiness with her husband lover, "fled in the spring days of life," and the quite unexpected, novel, and very striking transition into the key of F natural, cannot but be intended to convey that sentiment which has been so favourite with the poets, and which must, in spite of philosophy, have some time been at home in every sensitive heart, or, it might in this instance be better described as the tenfold coldness that chills the vacant ruins from the warmthless glitter of the brightest star of memory which illuminates without glow, which shines but to show its distance and so prove that it is unattainable, for Leonore lives again for a brief moment the "joy, once lost" in her joyous recollection of its transport. But by this she is only quickened to a deeper sense of anguish in the thus forced comparison of what was with what is. Beautifully is the impatience of her grief depicted in the short sequence upon this next highly impassioned phrase, and in the contraction of the phrase at its third repetition. Suddenly, by a strong effort of the will, the course of sorrow is checked, and we find our heroine, unable to elude the pangs that pierce her inmost heart, heaving a deep sigh, and forming the firm resolve to draw from these very cares that oppress and threaten to overpower her, new strength for the great cause which she has undertaken, and which, but for such stimulants, she, even she, might not have the persevering energy to accomplish. Such is the impression we receive from the prolonged chords of the supertonic and dominant that bring us back to the key of E major, and from the extended crescendo passage, which leads to a kind of close upon the dominant; and here the recurrence of a fragment of the original subject suggests again, the innermost impulse that excites in Leonore constant unrest until she shall have created anew her own happiness in the rekindling of her husband's. In this place the fragment of the subject derives new interest from the new form in which it appears, it being answered now in close imitation and thus made to produce a prodigiously broad and energetic effect. More and more energetic becomes this passage as it continues itself in the working of the section of the subject upon which it is formed, until it leads to a full close on E, that gains the greatest force from its long protraction, and then a remarkably bold succession of syncopated chords for the full orchestra makes a noble and powerful climax to the first part of the movement, which is so redundant in ideas and so replete with interest that anything less exciting than this conclusion would disappoint the expectations and dissatisfy the requirements in the hearer, so irresistibly stimulated by all that precedes it. Thus is depicted Leonore impelled to the accomplishment of the greatest deeds, the endurance of the greatest sufferings (a still higher test of heroism), and feeling all obstacles to break away beneath her sovereign will to surmount them. In all this portion of the movement the two overtures agree almost bar for bar with each other, but there are in the finished work such elaborate modifications of the detail as prove the composer to have considered and reconsidered point by point, and phrase by phrase, with the utmost possible care, and with the determination that, at whatever cost of laborious contrivance or sacrifice of favourite fancies, he would not dismiss his work until he should have moulded it into the nearest approach to perfection which his masterly powers and consummate artistry could produce. These modifications, (although very important and, however minute, such as materially to influence the general, even as well as the particular, effect,) are not susceptible of verbal explanation; we must refer therefore our readers who are interested in the subject to the two scores, a comparison of which affords one of the most remarkable insights into the workings of a great man's mind that all the treasures of the musical art have laid before the world.

"Joy, once lost, is pain;"

From this point the plan of the two overtures materially differs, and, for the sake of clearness, we shall proceed therefore with our remarks upon the finished work alone, and then enumerate the chief features of the earlier composition and the most important variations from it that appear in the other.

A passage without harmony, formed of the third bar of the subject which has been already much elaborated, and which is still to constitute a very prominent feature in the movement, leads us by gentle gradation from the ebullition of noble energy, by which we have been borne away as by the overflowing of a mountain torrent, by the firmness of a resolute will, or by the omnipotence of a master mind, to the expression of another phrase of feeling, still more touching, still more impassioned than the foregoing. The change of E major into E minor, brings over us that strange feeling of unconsciousness which unites while it distinguishes the different presentations of a dream, seemingly incongruous in themselves but, by this mysterious link of connection, satisfactorily, if not intelligibly, brought into relative succession. A burst of the full orchestra on the last inversion of the dominant seventh in the key of F, with a gloomy passage for the basses, suggests to us Florestan in his dungeon with the courage but without the means to resist the unknown power that oppresses him, with the will to shake off the despair that engrosses him, but without the alternative of one stay of hope on which to rest in its stead. Then we have that most beautiful, that most passionate phrase that occurs at the close of the introductory adagio of this overture, but which does not appear in the sketch, the phrase that we have supposed to portray our captive's transport at the recollection of the ardour, the devotion, the entirety of his Leonore's love. These two ideas are several times alternated, passing successively through the keys of F and D and B minor, and then they are relieved by the introduction of a new thought recalling the third bar of the chief subject, but so qualified by its present treatment as to assume a character quite different from any of those in which it has been already presented to us. As it appears in this place the passage is so completely fraught with the feeling of Mendelssohn, as to force upon us the supposition that it must have had some not inconsiderable influence in the colouring of the style of this mighty genius, whose marked originality of thought is surely not repudiated by our discovering a faint germ from which one of his most powerful characteristics has been developed, since the highest order of originality consists not in the thought, but in the fruit such thought is made to produce by the skilful cultivation of an accomplished artist under the genial warmth of an ardent imagination. A daring change into the key of C minor introduces another repetition of the two ideas, the alternation of which in different keys has as yet formed the whole working of the second part, with the exception of this Mendelssohnian phrase which is now made to form a third alternative. Then commences from this key of C minor, a sequence of modulations upon the opening phrase of the chief subject, answered in close imitation which returns at last to the same tonic of C minor. The long and important rest at this place in the original key of the movement, certainly with the variation of being minor instead of major, but still with the prevalence of the same harmonies of tonic and dominant, further accounts for the choice of the somewhat remote key of E major, instead of the more closely related fifth of the original tonic for the second subject; and here again we find the place of the movement accommodating itself to the expression, since, (to say nothing of the distinctive characters of keys, for as there be many who are insensitive to such distinction, any expression conveyed through such a medium must be to a certain extent esoteric,) the contrast of keys made by the transition from one to other cannot fail to produce upon naturally sensitive, still more upon educated hearers, the effect of a powerful variation of the character of the music with every marked change of tonality. Thus far in the second part we are presented with Florestan's impatience at his impotent captivity, relieved, if not consoled, by his glowing recollection of Leonore's passionate love, and intermixed with this is the real tenderness of the devoted wife which, unknown to him except by presentiment, is ministering to his comfort and softening his sufferings; then the powerful impulse that has stimulated all her endeavour excites in her a redoubled restlessness, a redoubled earnestness, and even a redoubled power,—such is the case with a sanguine spirit, the close approach of peril strengthens the capacity of resistance. This is broken off by a passage of wild impetuosity, that may be felt to denote the concentration of all the energies of our powerfully determined heroine upon the action of that awful moment, when, as it seems, the life or death of her husband, the sacrifice or the salvation, depends upon her strength of purpose and power of will, upon her capacity to assert the colossal force of her noble soul against the physical vehemence of the dastardly tyrant whom she opposes. This is again interrupted by a sudden change into B flat, with the trumpet call from behind the scenes, that no less startlingly interrupts the fearful action in the prison scene of the opera. The effect of this is not for language to tell,—who can appreciate it must hear it to judge it; who can not, will never accept its value from the description of others. Now we have that most heavenly beautiful phrase of melody from the quartet in the prison, where the characters lose all other consciousness in the devout thanksgiving for their apparently miraculous preservation from a danger that had passed their power of resistance,—which they utter in half-suppressed and panting whispers, while Pizarro, equally spellbound by an intervention for which he cannot account, mutters his execrations that else would choke him, his murderous hand being unnerved and paralysed by the something more than terror which, possesses him. The trumpet call is repeated just as in the quartet, this time louder than before. Then we have again the passage of hopeful devotional melody, that comes upon us like the long drawn respiration of one in whom the capability of breathing has been suspended, by that mingled sense of terror and wonder which constitutes the emotion of awe, and engrosses the entire mental and physical capacity of a sensitive system. The last section of this melody is gradually accelerated on its several repetitions, by which we are led through an enharmonic change into F sharp minor, and then a most natural though very striking progression to the chord of D as a dominant, into the key of G, where we have a very extended recurrence of the chief subject, which however assumes here a very different and a much lighter character from the new orchestral treatment with which it is introduced, consisting of a solo for the flute with some passages of imitation for the bassoon, and a very slight accompaniment for string instruments. The lightness with which this elsewhere most exciting subject is here invested amounts to playfulness, and can only be supposed to indicate our heroine smiling at the troubles she has passed, while she recounts them depreciatingly to him for whom they have been endured, and by whom the relation is heard with what would be incredulous wonder, but for the boundless confidence that prompts him to anticipate every event in her narration. The chord of G is now changed into a dominant, preparatory to the final return to the original key. But before we proceed with our analysis we must once more pause to remark upon the form in which the first part of this overture is constructed, namely, with all that portion of it which is usually given in the key of the dominant, being in the key of the major third of the scale, which illustrates so forcibly the powerful convulsions of feeling the overture must be intended to express, and give such ardent colouring to the impassioned ideas comprised in this division of the composition, and upon the justification of and necessity for this peculiarity of form that we find in the arrangement of the whole design of the movement. We have spoken of the long delay in the original key at the commencement of this allegro; we have spoken of the large portion of the second part that stands in the key of C minor; it is now to observe this important employment of the key of G, which would be tautologous and highly monotonous had the ordinary use been made of this key which precedent teaches us to expect; lastly, we have to consider the very extensive recapitulation of the first part in this original tonic and the remarkably long coda, in all of which, constituting nearly one half of the movement, there is none but the most transient modulation from the key of C major, and this alone is enough to satisfy us upon all principles of propriety, that with so very great a prevalence of our principal keynote, a movement of the gigantic proportions in which this is cast requires more extraneous modulations and more remote digressions than would be admissible or even tolerable in a composition of the ordinary limits of an orchestral movement. To return. The subject is worked at some length upon the dominant harmony, and then we have a most daring passage, the peculiarity of which consisting of the bass instruments following the treble with the retardation (we cannot apply to it the customary technical term "suspension," so wholly irregular is the progressions) of every note, this peculiarity, we say, is only justifiable by the prodigious effect it produces, and is accountable only as an exception from all the accepted laws of music. Rushing like a torrent that bears everything before it, inexorable, irresistible, omnipotent, this tornado of notes expresses most vividly the more than human powers of a mighty human will which Leonore exerts under the influence of her constant "innere trieb," which brings her now to the full accomplishment of her entire purpose,—difficulty after difficulty breaks from under her feet, and she attains the pinnacle of her heart's vital desire, far, far above the summit of her fondest hope, the liberation and the rapturous embrace of him she loves.

Original Correspondence.

NATIONAL ENGLISH OPERA.

(To the Editor of The Musical World.)

SIR,—Your leading article the week before last, upon the above subject, will appear to very many persons, and especially to the "profession," as calculated to annihilate the hopes of those whose sanguine temperaments had led them to indulge in presumptuous anticipations; yet so sure do I feel that you are as anxious as myself for the establishment of a National Opera, that I will not only take your comments in good part, but even rejoice in the opportunity thus afforded of placing the matter in a brighter light.

You ask, very pertinently, "Where is the money to come from?" and again say, "FIND but the money and BEGIN." All this is rational enough, and the want of an immediate and satisfactory answer would be held to end this discussion somewhat ignobly; but without being able to state positively that money SHALL be forthcoming at a moment's notice, I believe the "rationale" of the question is of easy attainment.

Your first question is a strictly commercial one, and must be so answered. Commercially speaking then, any individual who has a commodity to sell must first exhibit his goods before he can expect a purchaser, ergo, the musicians of England must exhibit a purchasable commodity, must show themselves an efficient and compact body capable of elevating their own art and worthy of enlightened patronage; they will then, and not till then, obtain preferment, either in the shape of a liberal "speculator," or, as I sincerely hope, in the shape of an "ENDOWED THEATRE," wherein the official appointments (such as are named in one of my previous letters) shall be made by the shareholders, upon the basis of merit only and thence descending, every chain of circumstance be made to correspond with its parent link.

"Find the money and begin" is your second suggestion, but so nearly allied to its predecessor that it may almost be said to merge into it entirely. I will, however, take it as I find it, and make answer by saying—who is the man that shall stand forth and say to the patrons of the lyric drama, "Give us £10,000 and we will find artists to earn it?" The question would be simply ridiculous. But let some 200 or 300 musicians, comprising directors, composers, vocalists, and instrumentalists, all efficient artists, and amicably bound together by such laws as will ensure perfect co-operation, stand forth and declare to the British public that they lack nothing but "patronage," and it will come, in the shape of a "theatre" and "subscriptions," even in the shape of "gifts" if they will; but it will never be given to an individual "jobber," or even to a community which shall not be above the suspicion of unfair practices.

In conclusion of this part of the subject I can only state that, to the best of my belief, Her Majesty, Prince Albert, and the leading nobility of this kingdom are most anxious to see a National Opera established, and that an amount of patronage would be awarded to such from motives even partly political, it having been sufficiently proved that musical entertainments, properly conducted, exert a beneficial influence upon society. And here it must also be observed that a wide distinction must be drawn between the lyric and representative dramas; for whilst the former has been, spite of all drawbacks, obviously progressing, the latter has been retrograding; beyond which, a strong religious prejudice exists to the detriment of even Shakspeare himself, with what justice is not for me to determine; sufficient is it for my present purpose, that Right Reverend Bishops, Very Reverend Deans, Archdeacons, and Deacons are to be found in the boxes of Her Majesty's Theatre (I am not even quite sure that they do not stay through the ballet), whilst the most lax disciplinarian of them all would hesitate, for fear of scandal, to visit any non-musical entertainment within the walls of a theatre.

In a word, let but an English Lyric Drama demonstrate itself, let it become, as the Times says, "a great fact," and it may be made like its Italian sister, "fashionable;" without which endorsement notes "musical" would fail to become current.

Of course it will take time to effect this, agitation must be carried on, arguments must be repeated, friends must be made, timid persons must be gently handled, enemies must be conciliated, and a fraternisation of interest effected before any great advance can be realised. In order to effect this, I seek to obtain the co-operation of half-a-dozen zealous, and if possible enthusiastic individuals, who will divide with me the labour of a somewhat extensive correspondence, and by an union of suggestions effect such a system of CENTRALIZATION as will draw into a focus the scattered talent which undoubtedly exists. By so doing I seek not to effect the interests of any man detrimentally, nor do I aim (as some have suspected) to damage the prospect of any future lessee of Drury Lane or Covent Garden; my object is general, not personal, and would readily seek friendship even to my own defeat, could it but serve a good purpose.

At present I can only state that with the best hopes of ultimate success, I do not calculate upon achieving anything by a "coup de main;" all must be the work of time and prudence; meanwhile let all who interest themselves in the matter come forward boldly, and let such as desire to take an active part in the matter favour me at once and confidentially with their assistance, by addressing a line to the Editor of this Journal.

I will conclude, Sir, by respectfully intimating, that if I have in any of my former letters at all hinted at making a National Opera the vehicle for producing unripe works, it was indeed a grave mistake, but without recurring to the actual words, it strikes me that the only allusion which was made to the works of untried composers was to this effect, namely, that managers were wrong in rejecting the works of untried men, simply BECAUSE they were untried, inasmuch as the first works of a musical author were usually fuller of melody than his second. Par example, a first Opera usually contains the melodies which have been treasured up for a series of years, and which become lavished, as it were, upon one fond "bantling of the brain," leaving a second proportionately bare of riches. Hitherto managers have treated for a musician's ideas, as hucksters have treated for apples, dealing only where they have dealt before, and frequently buying rotten goods. In a National Opera I would have nothing produced which should bring disgrace on the establishment, so far at least as judgment could foresee. But whilst I chose no Opera for its composer's name alone, I would reject nothing without a fair examination of its merits, even though written by "Thomas Noakes," or "John Styles."

With an abundance of choice I would select such Operas as contained the greatest amount of musical attractions, giving the palm to melody as somewhat ABOVE rather than BELOW musical declamation. Awaiting with anxiety the result of my appeal for co-operation.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your obedient Servant,
PHILO-MUSICA.

NATIONAL ENGLISH OPERA.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—Would it not be as well, before this scheme proceeds further, to call on the projectors to say what they mean by a "National English Opera?" I have hitherto understood the words to signify the performance of operas in the English language by national (native) composers, else the double adjective is mere tautology; and besides, if, as you say in a late number, the plan is to include foreign operas and foreign singers, cui bono? We have been inundated with English operas since the time of Weber's Freischütz. There is an English opera now at the Surrey Theatre, and a good one too, although on a limited scale; and at Christmas we are to have another at Drury Lane. Let these gentlemen, therefore, say distinctly and at once what they mean; although, for my own part, I have no opinion of the scheme in either sense of the word.

Yours,
ASTANAX.

THE WORCESTER MUSIC MEETING.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

Sir.—I have only this moment seen the account of the Worcester Music Meeting in your paper of the 29th ult., and your remarks on the absence from it of the Catholic families of the county; and I lose no time in putting you in possession of a few facts with which I think you must be unacquainted, and for which I hope you will find a place in your columns. Allow me, then, to say that the Catholics of Worcestershire have always been most anxious for the success of these meetings of charity, and have given convincing proofs of that anxiety by acting as stewards, before the number of the stewards was increased or any guarantee fund was in existence, and when the whole deficiency in the receipts (sometimes amounting to many hundred pounds) fell upon six persons. But, notwithstanding our exertions in the cause of the widows and orphans of Protestant clergymen, no sooner is it determined to place a window to the memory of Queen Adelaide in Worcester Cathedral, than an hon. and rev. gentleman, holding a living in the neighbourhood, immediately moves that no Roman Catholic (however superior his abilities as an artist) shall be employed; and this resolution is adopted by the majority of the subscribers.

I will not, Sir, trouble you with any remarks of mine upon the case, but leave it to your readers, with this statement before them, to say to which party the charge of illiberality or narrowmindedness attaches; and

I remain, Sir, your obedient servant,
A WORCESTERSHIRE CATHOLIC.

Reviews of Music.

"I'VE A HEART TO EXCHANGE"—BALLAD—Words by R. KITCHEN—Music by THOMAS BAKER. G. CASE.

Mr. Thomas Baker had a difficult task to accomplish, when he attempted to gather inspiration from the versicles of Mr. R. Kitchen, who is no poet. Words with less meaning, and so thoroughly devoid of art we seldom, or never perused. Nevertheless Mr. Thomas Baker, taking his tone from the intention—evident, it may be—of the un-poet, has supplied a lively and appropriate tune in D, with a neat and unpretending accompaniment. If we were hypercritically inclined we might take exception to the distribution of the notes for the voice in some places, but the song pleases us, and we are not in the mood to dwell on minor blemishes. Mr. Thomas Baker has been lately successful with several of his ballads. We should advise him next time, if he would desire to succeed, to choose a drawing-room, not a kitchen poet.

"WHEN FRIENDS LOOK COLDLY ON THEE"—BALLAD—THOMAS BAKER. Jullien and Co.

Mr. Baker is more at home in sad than in merry strains. His talent evidently leans to the lachrymose. The present ballad, in F, is a good specimen of the modern tender school, and apes the sentimental with success. The pathos is undeniable, and the rallentandos and agitatos, skilfully dispersed, declare a friendly disposition towards dramatic effect. The author of the words, with praiseworthy forbearance, has withheld his superscription.

Both Mr. Baker's songs are well suited to voices of mean compass.

"HARMONIA SACRA."—A selection of Anthems, Chants, Psalm and Hymn Tunes, as used in the respective churches of Cheltenham. C. Hale and Son, Cheltenham.

A useful selection of sacred pieces, as sung at the various churches in Cheltenham, of which three numbers are before us. The setting of Psalm 143, verse 2, which is anonymous, is a smooth, melodious, and well harmonised air in G, while the short compositions for four voices, of Mr. Uglov, in the chant form, are remarkable for their simplicity and harmonic finish, especially the Funeral Hymn, in A minor, which bears a faint resemblance to the opening andante of Mendelssohn's symphony in that key. The accompaniments are suited to either pianoforte or organ.

"THE GIPSY POLKA."

"LES LIONNES"—"POLKA ELEGANTE."

"STEEPLE CHASE POLKA."

"DER FRULINGS WALZER"—(THE SPRING WALTZ)—W. E. JARRETT.

"THE STAR POLKA"—J. T. SMITH.

"LES GRACES"—THREE POLKAS—EDWIN H. COBLEY. C. Hale and Son, Cheltenham.

We have to thank the Messrs. Hale for a goodly collection of new dances, in which particular department of musical publication, by the way, this great provincial firm would seem determined to dispute the palm with Jullien, Cramer, and Chappell, and other celebrated London houses.

We have already noticed favorably some compositions by Mr. W. E. Jarrett of a more ambitious nature, and we are glad to be enabled to speak in terms no less warm of these lighter contributions to the pianoforte. It is unnecessary to enter critically into pieces of so unpretending a character, and it is enough to state that the three polkas are all good of their kind, and well adapted to the purpose intended, but that our favourite is the Gipsy Polka, in C, which is not merely graceful and rhythmical, but new. The Frulings Walzer is more extended, and offers more opportunity to Mr. Jarrett for displaying his musical facility and acquirements. The opening theme in F is extremely elegant, and the cantabile, which may stand for principal trio, is judiciously opposed to it in character. The second appearance of this trio with a new accompaniment is remarkable for its happy and ingenious treatments. We can recommend both the polkas and the waltzes with equal confidence.

The "Star Polka" of Mr. Smith is pretty, sparkling, and well written. The opening subject, in E flat, is attractive without being hackneyed, and the trio in the subdominant is well contrasted and equally good in its way. This polka is appropriately dedicated to Mr. Jarrett.

We cannot afford quite such unqualified praise to the "Les Graces" of Mr. Cobley, which is somewhat square in style, but not deficient in spirit, especially the last of the three, Euphrosyne, which is bustling and animated.

"O JEHOVAH! OUR LORD"—Milton's Paraphrase on the 8th Psalm—W. E. JARRETT. C. Hale and Son, Cheltenham.

Mr. Jarrett's setting of Milton's paraphrase, has the fault of being fragmentary and disconnected. It has, however, some good points of harmony, and displays considerable appreciation of the words in the opening portion in A flat, which is devotional and pure, dating from which point, the absence of intelligible plan renders the composition uninteresting.

Miscellaneous.

SURREY ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.—Jullien's term of conducting expired last week. As it to make the most of the closing nights, the admirers of the popular chef d'orchestre flocked in crowds, and made gala each night of the week. Jullien has become more than ever the favourite with the many, and wherever he erects his standard, thither will congregate hundreds and thousands who follow him as the surest and most brilliant star of their amusements. Nor, with all they were led to anticipate this grand year of the Exhibition, when everything was expected to assume an herculean form, were the visitors to the Surrey Gardens in the least disappointed. Ever ready and ingenious, Jullien found new modes and new matters for their entertainment, and in no previous year has the music been more happily selected, or more successfully varied. The novelties produced by Jullien were numerous and excellent, and all greatly admired. The band was on the former scale of efficiency and completeness, and, in short, no possible fault could be found with that portion of the amusements entrusted to the great conductor. Jullien retires from the head of the musical department of the Surrey Zoological Gardens with new laurels added to his wreath of fame and popularity. In the absence of Jullien we know no one to whom the conductorship and general direction of the music could be so safely entrusted as Mr. Godfrey, who took his place in the orchestra on Monday, and was received in the most favourable manner by a large assembly of visitors. Mr. Godfrey is a zealous and talented musician, and an experienced head of a band of instrumentalists. We repeat, no better successor to Jullien could be found to direct the orchestra of the Surrey Zoological Gardens. The Gardens have been very full during the week, and the arrangements in the musical department appear to have afforded universal satisfaction. Among the notabilities we may mention Jullien's celebrated "Great Exhibition Quadrille," in which we were particularly struck with the flute playing of Mr. D. Godfrey, son of the conductor, in some of the introduced variations, especially in the French air, "Partant pour La Syrie," in which he was most vociferously applauded. The tone of Mr. D. Godfrey is round and sonorous, and his execution extremely neat and finished. We shall keep our eye on Mr. D. Godfrey. Miss Messent, Mr. Hill, Mr. Manvers, Mr. Young, and Mr. Leffler still remain enrolled among the vocal band.

AN UNRIVALLED PIANOFORTE PLAYER.—We find the following extraordinary statement in the National:—"Count Orloff has just presented to the Emperor of Russia an extraordinary musical phenomenon in the person of a young Wallachian, called Frederick Roltz. This man has been born with four hands, each having five fingers. He was brought up by a clergyman, who taught him to play on the organ, but the young man in the course of time made a pianoforte for himself of considerably greater power than that of ordinary instruments. He enjoys excellent health, and, with the exception of his hands, presents nothing strange in his person. It is only from the elbow that the malformation commences. The arm there divides into two limbs, each ending in a hand with a double supply of fingers. These additional arms are regularly made, and the only remarkable point observed by medical men is the immense development of the deltoid muscle at the summit of the shoulder. The clergyman who had brought up Roltz at his death left him his small property, and the young man immediately purchased diamond rings, with which he loaded his twenty fingers. It was with them so adorned that he performed before the Emperor of Russia, who expressed his surprise at the musical powers of the young man. Roltz, it is said, is shortly to visit Paris."

CATHERINE HAYES left Liverpool on Wednesday, for America, by the steamer Pacific, accompanied by her mother and sister, Mr. A. Braham, Herr Mengis, Mr. L. H. Lavenue, the conductor, and Dr. Joy. The latter gentleman (for 18 years stage manager of the Dublin theatre) goes out as the director of the business arrangements; and if tact, courtesy, and gentlemanly bearing can smooth the way in the Far West, we are quite sure it will be accomplished under his guidance.—Manchester Examiner.

TUNBRIDGE WELLS. (From a Correspondent).—Mr. Albert Smith paid us a second visit here on Monday, and attracted a brilliant audience to his "Overland Mail," which he gave in the ball room of the Victoria and Sussex Hotel, both in the morning and evening. The names on his stall-plan comprised the Countess of St. Germain and party, Lady Otway, Lady Anne Tufnell and party, Lady Caroline Stirling and family, Lady Antrobus and family, Lady Dese, Lady Harriett Dunlop, Rev. W. T. C. Brande and Professor Brande, Lady Halkett, Rev. W. L. Pope, Rev. M. Rawsden, Mrs. Tighé, Mrs. Hankey and family, &c., &c.

LIVERPOOL.—Miss P. Horton is performing at the Theatre Royal. She appeared on Saturday in the petite comedy of Sweethearts and Wives, and also in the burlesque of The Castle of Otranto. The latter piece followed her performance of Rosalind, in Shakespeare's As You Like It on Monday evening. Her impersonation of Rosalind is a pleasant, if not an elaborate, portrait. Agreeable as may be the acting of Miss Horton, we yet admire her musical qualities still more, and in some of her songs find little to be amended.

ON MUSIC AFTER THE DELUGE.—After the Deluge, the first settlement of the sons of Noah was made in the plains of Mesopotamia. From this place population, learning, and intelligence were diffused over the globe; and the first migration of the Patriarch's descendants is supposed to have taken place about 2281 years B.C. when several of the younger branches of the family of Ham, if not Ham himself, travelled westward and southward and settled in Phœnicia and Egypt; others, soon after, migrated to the east, and the empires of Assyria, of Babylon, of India, and China, with the kingdom of Elam, or Persia, were founded and flourished; and in them the arts and sciences were assiduously cultivated, and advanced to high perfection, when the rest of the world remained in a state of barbarism and ignorance.

That Egypt was one of the first countries on the globe which cultivated arts and sciences, is certain from the testimony of the most ancient and respectable historians. To the Egyptians the invention of many arts, amongst others, music is ascribed; and though it is probable that the practice of it was simultaneous in several countries, and its invention, therefore cannot, with propriety, be attributed to any one man, or to any particular nation, yet as there must have been a beginning somewhere, (and no country has higher claims to antiquity than Egypt) we may trace a few faint records of the progress of the science, although it is exceedingly difficult to form any decided opinion as to the correctness of the time when or who was the inventor of music. What the music of the ancients really was, is not now easy to determine, but of this we are certain that it was something with which mankind was extremely delighted; and the historians and philosophers of the best ages of Greece and Rome, are diffuse in its praises. And so great was the sensibility of the ancient Greeks, and so soft and refined their language, that they seem to have been in both respects to the rest of the world, what the modern Italians are at present. For of these last, the language itself is music, and their ears are so polished and accustomed to sweet sounds, that they are rendered fastidious judges of melody, both by habit and education. But as to the superior or inferior degree of excellence in the ancient music, compared with the modern, it is as impossible to determine, as it is to hear both sides.—From T. H. Tomlinson's Lectures on Ancient Music.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THOS. JALLIS TRIMNELL.—The signatures are equally correct, the double sharps being used for abbreviation; and our correspondent is at liberty to use either, provided he does not send us a composition written in that key.

Advertisements.

PIANOFORTES

By Broadwood, Erard, Collard, Kirkman, and other celebrated makers
Harps by Erard, Erat, &c. Finger and Barrel Organs.

MR. KELLY, Musical Auctioneer, will submit for SALE on WEDNESDAY, the 10th of SEPTEMBER, at 8 o'clock, at 21, OLD BOND STREET, upwards of 30 new and second hand Pianofortes, several Finger and Barrel Organs, Seraphims, and Patent Harmoniums, adapted for Churches or Chapels, a variety of Double and Single Action Harps, together with a number of Violins, Concertinas, Flutes, and other Musical Instruments; the whole of which may be viewed the day prior and morning of sale. Catalogues forwarded on receipt of two postage stamps by application to the Auctioneer, 8, High-street, Kensington.

ST. MARTIN'S HALL, LONG ACRE.

HERR HENNEN'S GRAND EVENING CONCERT will take place at the above Hall, on MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 8th, 1851. Vocal Performers.—Mrs. Alexander Newton, Miss Poole, Mr. Bridge Frosham, and Herr Fomes Instrumental Performers.—Grand Pianoforte, Herr Hennen, who will perform Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor; Violin, Herr F. Hennen; Flute, Mr. Richardson; and Violoncello, Signor Piatti.

The Band will be complete in every department, and selected from Her Majesty's Theatre and Royal Italian Opera. Conductor, M. TOLBECQUE.

Prices of Admission.—Stalls, 5s.; reserved Seats, 3s.; Hall, 2s. Doors open at half-past Seven, Concert commences at Eight o'clock precisely. Tickets to be had at the Hall, of Messrs. Cramer and Benle, Regent-street, and at all the Principal Music Warehouses.

COLLECTION OF ANCIENT CLASSICAL CHEF D'ŒUVRES IN SCORE,

OR,
BIBLIOTHEQUE CLASSIQUE, ou, COLLECTION
D'ANCIENS CHEF D'ŒUVRES EN PARTITION.

FIRST BOOK CONTAINS:—

CONCERTO per Cembalo con Violino et Flauto obligati e con ripieno, di Violini, Viola, Violoncello e Contrabasso; composta da GIOVANNI SEBASTIANO BACH.
In Score, price 6s.

SECOND BOOK CONTAINS:—

- I. Missa Papae Marcelli, triplici concentu disincta, videlicet:
I. Joannis Petri Aloysii Praenestini.
(Giovanni Pierluigi da Palestrina.)
Genuina
Sex Vocum.
II. Missa eadem ad Quatuor Voces reducula.
Autore,
JOHANNES FRANCISCO ANERIO.
III. Eademque Missa duplici Choro
Octo Vocibus concinnata.
Autore,
FRANCISCO SURIANO.

In Score, price 10s.
Vocal Parts, price 10s.

To be continued.

SCOTT AND CO., 89, ST. JAMES'S-STREET.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY, EXETER HALL.

CONDUCTOR, MR. COSTA.—FRIDAY NEXT, 12th SEP-TEMBER, Haydn's CREATION. Vocalists—Madame Clara Novello, Mr.
Sims Reeves, and Herr Forques. The Orchestra, the most extensive in Exeter Hall, will consist of (including 16 double basses) nearly 700 Performers. Tickets, 3s.;
Reserved, 5s.; Central Area, numbered seats, 10s. 6d. each; at the Society's Office, 6, in Exeter Hall, or of Mr. Bowley, 53, Charing Cross.

NEW VOCAL TRIOS, QUARTETTS, ETC.,

PUBLISHED BY WESSEL & CO.

TRIOS FOR THREE SOPRANOS.

Curschmann.	"This Salem from thy Lover,"	3s. 6d.
Cachner.	"Spring,"	2s. 6d.
	"Invitation,"	3s. 6d.
	"Song of Praise,"	2s. 6d.

QUARTETTS.

Baleman.	"The Angel of the Flowers,"	2s. 6d.
English Glee.	"Sally in our Alley,"	2s. 6d.
	Three Anthems by Charles J. Yates,	3s. 6d. to 4s. 6d.

All the Songs, Duets, Trios, Quartetts, Quintetts, and Choruses, &c., in Fidelio. are published by

Wessel & Co., 229, Regent-street.

IMPROVED BRASS MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

PATRONISED BY HER MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY THE QUEEN
AND THE BRITISH AND INDIAN ARMY.

J. KOHLER, 35, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, begs to direct the attention of Regimental Bands to his New Patent Lever Instruments with the latest improvements, which surpass all others for simplicity of arrangement and purity of tone. Combinations in harmony never before attempted by any Brass Instruments, may now be executed with perfect ease. Private and Regimental Bands supplied with all kinds of Musical Instruments direct from the Manufactory; and as all these Instruments are made under J. KOHLER's own superintendence, they are warranted to withstand the climate of all countries.
Efficient Band Masters supplied.

NEW DUETS FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

THALBERG	Beatrice di Tenda.
ROSELLI	Deux Melodies de Donizetti, 1 and 2.
ROSELLI	Val D'andore.
WOLFF	Valse Original.
WOLFF	Beatrice di Tenda.
SILAS	La Primavera, Bagatelle.
KALLIWODA	Invitation à la Danse.
OSBORNE	Pluie de Perles.
SCHULTZ	Duo L'espagnola.
BEYER	Krieger's Lust March.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent-street.

GREAT DISCOVERY IN HARMONY.

Now ready, price 5s.

THE PRINCIPLES OF NATURAL HARMONY, being a Perfect System founded upon the discovery of the True Semitonic Scale, by J.
J. Haite. London, Published by the Author, 76, Leadenhall-street. To be had of Messrs. Ewer and Co., Newgate-street, and Messrs. Cocks and Co., New Burlington-street.

THE ORGANIST'S COMPANION,

BY JOHN GOSS, Organist of St. Paul's Cathedral. A series of voluntaries, for the commencement, middle, and conclusion of divine service; also, a collection of interludes or short symphonies, to be played between the verses of the psalms or hymns, in numbers 2s. 6d. each, or 4 vols., 12 each.

PAROCHIAL PSALMODY.

A COLLECTION of Ancient and Modern tunes; also a variety of favourite responses to the Commandments, with directions for chanting, with an accompaniment for the Organ or Pianoforte, by John Goss, price 6s.

SACRED MELODIES.

SELECTED from eminent composers, and arranged for one or two voices with an accompaniment for Organ or Pianoforte, by J. Goss, Organist of St. Paul's Cathedral. Price 6s.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent-street, and 67, Conduit-street.

THE POPULAR SONG OF THE DAY.

"TALK OF HIM THAT'S FAR AWA," composed by THOMAS CHANTREY. A new edition of which is just issued, may be had at ADDISON & KOLLIER'S, 210, Regent-street, London. For simplicity, elegance, and originality of melody, it is unrivalled.
Also, by the same author, "Why wilt thou not love?" and "The dream is past."

JOULE'S DIRECTORIUM CHORI ANGLICANUM.

Second Edition, price 1s., in cloth 1s. 6d.

THE most complete Choral Service book that has yet appeared. Dedicated by permission to the Lord Bishop of Manchester. For highly favourable reviews see "Christian Remembrancer," "Theologian," "Parish Choir," &c. &c. London: J. A. Novello.
A few copies of the quarto edition, price 15s., still on hand.

CURES FOR THE UNCURED!

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.—Cure of a Red Leg of more than sixty years' standing.—Mr. Barker, of No. 5, Graham's Place, Drypool, near Hull, had ulcers on his leg from the age of 18 until upwards of 80, and although for many years he had sought the first advice in the country, nothing was found to cure them. He often suffered excruciating pain for long periods together, which incapacitated him from attending to his business. He had given up all hopes of getting a cure, when at last he was persuaded to try Hollow-way's Pills and Ointment, which he did, and however wonderful it may appear, the leg was thoroughly healed by their means, and by continuing to use the Pills alone after his leg was well, he has become in health so hale and hearty as now to be more active than most men of fifty. N.B.—The truth of this extraordinary statement can be vouched for by Mr. J. C. Reinhardt, 22, Market Place, Hull. Feb. 20th, 1860.
The Pills should be used conjointly with the Ointment in the following cases:—

Rad Legs	Coco Bay	Contracted and	Lumbago	Scurvy
Bad Breasts	Chiego-foot	Stiff Joints	Piles	Sore-heads
Burns	Chilblains	Ephraim's	Rheumatism	Tumours
Bunions	Chapped hands	Fistulas	Scalds	Ulcers
Bite of Mosche	Corns (Soft)	Gout	Sore Nipples	Wounds
toes and Sand-	Cancers	Glandular Swell-	Sore-throats	Yaws
Flies		ings	Skin-diseases

Sold by the Proprietor, 244, Strand, (near Temple Bar,) London; and by all respected Vendors of Patent Medicines throughout the Civilized World in Pots and Boxes, at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 6d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 22s., and 33s. each. There is a very considerable saving in taking the larger sizes.

N. B.—Directions for the guidance of Patients are affixed to each Pot or Box.

Printed and Published, for the Proprietors, by MICHAEL SAMUEL MYERS, of No. 3, Stridley Villas, Studley Road, Clapham Road, in the parish of Lambeth, at the office of MYERS and Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, in the parish of St.
Paul, where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed, post paid,
To be had of G. Purkess, Dean Street, S. ho; Allen, Warwick Lane; Vickers, Holywell Street, and at all Booksellers.—Saturday, September 6, 1861.

The Musical World.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s.; Half year, 8s.; Three Months, 4s.; (Stamped Copies 1s. per Quarter extra,) payable in advance, to be forwarded by Money Order, to the Publishers, Myers & Co., 22, Tavistock-st., Covent Garden.

No. 37.—VOL. XXIX.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 13, 1851.

Price Fourpence.
Stamped Fivepence.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

RESUME OF THE SEASON.

The most eventful season since Mr. Lumley first took the reins of government in hand at Her Majesty's Theatre has at length come to a termination, with a series of extra performances at "playhouse prices" (to use the adopted expression), which have brought a vast deal of money to the treasury. Before proceeding to offer any general remarks on the conduct and policy of the management during the year, let us chronicle the principal events in the order of their occurrence.

The theatre opened on Saturday, March 22nd, with Donizetti's Lucia di Lammermoor, introducing for the first time to an English audience a new and youthful aspirant for operatic honours, in the person of Mademoiselle Caroline Duprez, daughter of the celebrated French tenor of that name, who appeared as Lucia. The other parts in the opera were supported by Calzolari, Balanchi (his first appearance), Romagnoli (his first appearance), and Lorenzo. A more legitimate success was never achieved by a beginner than that of Mlle. Duprez on this occasion. Her youth and prepossessing personal appearance at once won the sympathies of the audience, while her voice,—“not large, strong, piercing and vigorous, as in sopranos robust, but small, tender, fluty, sympatica”—in short, a highly favourable specimen of the Gallic organ of song, partaking even largely of the sweeter quality of the Italian, pleased unanimously; and the quiet intelligence exhibited in her acting made up the sum of attractions and confirmed the favourable impression. The acquisition of a new prima donna, in a special line, to Her Majesty's Theatre was welcomed unanimously by the press as well as by the subscribers; and the verdict of the Parisian connoisseurs, awarded just previously to Mademoiselle Duprez at the Theatre des Italiens, where Mr. Lumley first introduced her to the public, in company and under the auspices of her celebrated father, was not, as is often the case, set aside by the Aristarchi of the British metropolis, but loudly echoed and established. Signor Balanchi, a new basso, in the character of Bide-the-bent, was voted a respectable artist, with a good voice; and Signor Romagnoli, the new tenor, in Arturo, as a tall artist with no voice, who transposed his solo in the finale to the second act. Signor Lorenzo, in the part of Enrico, if he did not prove himself a Tamburini or a Ronconi, showed, at least, a great deal of dramatic fire, and not a little style. We are mistaken if this gentleman, with study, although his voice is rather pleasing than strong, do not ultimately attain a position to be envied, by those who fail to attain it, and acknowledge it. Calzolari, “that excellent, and florid, and zealous, and always perfect,” and every thing but eager singer, the chosen tenore di bravura of M. Fétis and Mr. Lumley, was indisposed on this occasion—which was unfortunate, since it prevented him from doing justice to his indisputable powers. He, however, entirely regained his laurels in the progress of the season. The opening night was also distinguished by a new ballet, from the brain of the active M. Paul Taglioni, entitled L'Isle des Amours, in which the costumes and tableaux were after the manner of Watteau, the French painter, whose inventions have helped to colour the emails, and brooches, and ivories, and cameos, and other miniatures of his country, for nearly two centuries. So much was said at the time of this ballet—which gave a better augury of what was to happen in the choregraphic department at Her Majesty's Theatre, during the season, than what subsequently did happen—that we need say no more about it here than that its success was complete. It brought back to us, however, Amalia Ferraris, the agile, strong, and speedy, and pretty, and intelligent, and popular—more agile, strong, and speedy, and pretty, and intelligent, and popular than before, greatly improved, moreover, in ease of gesture, and meaning variety of pantomime. It brought us, also, Mademoiselles Petit Stephan, Ausandon, and Tedeschi (a new comer), as charming instalments of Mr. Lumley's whilome matchless corps de ballet. It brought us M. Gosselin, King of Terpsichorean professors, who teaches everybody, from Carlotta Grisi, to the tiniest coryphée, as an admirable actor of burlesque. It displayed M. Charles, the young and active, more young and active and bounding than ever; to say nothing of M. M. Venafrà, Gouriet, Ehrick, and Di Mattia, of whom to say anything must be to say something favourable. The music of M. Nadaud, in the absence of Signor Pugnì at St. Petersburg, sparkled with unborrowed light—that is, unborrowed from Signor Pugnì—and lost nothing by comparison. M. Nadaud conducted the ballet with his usual ability. One great feature in the evening's performance was the overture to Masaniello, played by the band, which followed the National Anthem, which followed the opera. By new engagements, such as Laub, Deichmann, (violins,) Vogel, (tenor,) Rowland, Pratten, and Muller, (contrabassi,) with the retention of Lavigne, Remusat, Tolbecque, Piatti, and others, too few to specify, Balfe, who exhibited his accustomed energy, quickness, and activity, had vastly improved the band—which also gave augury of brilliant results, not subsequently realised, for reasons to be stated in a future column. And thus much for the opening night.

The repetition of the Lucia, on the following Tuesday, confirmed the success of Mdle. Duprez, and gave us Calzolari in renewed health.

On Saturday, March 29th, Auber's magnificent opera, Gustave III., according to the promise of the prospectus, was produced, for the rentrée of Madame Fiorentini, who had made so favourable an impression in several performances at the end of the preceding season. The fine music which Auber has put into the mouth of the Countess Ankerstrom, was admirably suited to the rentrante, whose great and sonorous voice was perhaps never heard to more advantage. The Page was delightfully played by Mdle. Caroline Duprez; who, natheless, produced her greatest effect in the final rondo from Le Serment, another of Auber's operas, for the introduction of which, albeit she executed it quite as well as Madame Dorus Gras, the youthful songstress was rudely but not unjustly chid. The part of Gustave, the airs alone excepted, was unsuited to Signor Calzolari; who, however, appeared in a striking and appropriate wig. M. Poultier, of "sommeil" celebrity, a tenor from the Academie Royale de Musique, who was engaged to strengthen everything, materially strengthened the cast of Gustave, by assuming the small part of Ribbing; and with Signor Lorenzo, a picturesque and ponderous Ankerstrom, full of fire and intelligence, and M. Frederick Lablache, a correct and capital Dehorn, helped to make a legitimate effect in the grand lottery trio, where it devolves upon Ankerstrom to pistol his king and rival. The part of Arvedson introduced a handsome new mezzo-soprano—Mademoiselle Feller—who completely reversed the popular saying, "as ugly as a witch." Of the manner in which the last act of this fine opera—twin brother of Masaniello—was played at Her Majesty's Theatre we regret that we cannot speak in terms of commendation. Some of the most beautiful dances were omitted, and others of little or no merit obtruded in their place; so that the whole became a meaningless melange, instead of that thing of form and manner which proceeded from the brilliant fancy of Auber. The Pas des folies was newly musicked by Signor Pugni, who, fresh from St. Petersburg, took Auber's first theme and rolled it about in his icy grasp, like a shapeless and unsightly snow-ball. The general arrangement of the scene, however—thanks to the activity and ingenuity of Mr. Harris—in some degree redeemed, if it in no wise sanctified, the mangling of the music. More successful in making us forget even this merciless massacre of a beautiful work, was the first appearance for the season of the exquisite and unapproachable Carlotta Grisi. The absolute Queen of her domain, she lifted the sinning Signor Pugni (as she has often done before) on her airy pinions, bore him, ni'd he wil'd he, out of the swamp of his own mediocrity into the regions of ethereal perfection, where, streaming like a sunbeam, flying like an eagle in the golden clouds, flitting like a butterfly upon the wings of its desire, Carlotta riveted the eyes of all beholders—or rather, made them wander wittingly, since, in the busy allegro, she was never one second in one place—dragging after her Signor Pugni like the devilish old man in the tale, the half ghastly, half unseen shadow of the petrified Peter (Schlemil), his misdeeds forgotten, and his ghastliness gilded by the sunny smiles and twinkling movements of the fairest and most richly endowed of the sparkling daughters of Terpsichore. In a word, Carlotta's reappearance was a new triumph, in spite of the clouds of dissatisfaction that had gradually gathered before she came before the foot-lights, but dispersed no sooner than she was seen, as at the burning influence of the sun's eye, or the streaming radiance of the midnight moon. Carlotta triumphed, and Auber was forgotten; but Pugni was not unremembered. There were those present who took notes. On the whole, the production of Gustave at Her Majesty's Theatre was a great "fait," but might have been a more perfect "geste." There were blots upon the performance which render unqualified praise impossible. If the production at the Italian theatre of the great operas of the French Academy be in obedience to a growing change of taste in the musical and especially the operatic public, it would appear that the only way to meet that satisfactorily would be to bring them out in as complete and perfect a manner as the means at disposal may admit of. We cannot think the true ends of art are a bit better served by the unfinished execution of fine works than by the faultless representation of those of less pretension. And this objection, we regret to say, we shall have frequently to urge in the course of the present resumé.

In spite of this, however, Gustave became one of the decided attractions of the early season, was played four times in succession, and was immediately followed by the Masaniello of the same composer, which, unannounced in the prospectus, was, to the general surprise, brought out on Thursday, the 10th of April, in many respects more efficiently than at the rival house. The cast introduced three new tenors—Pardini, Scotti, and Mercuriali—the first of whom, although labouring under indisposition, made a good impression in the character of the Neapolitan fisherman; the second proved himself utterly inadequate to sing the music of Alphonso; while the third, in the little part of Lorenzo, showed at least that he had a tolerable voice. Signor Pardini has continued since to preserve a respectable position as a second-rate first tenor; Mercuriali has grown into favour with the public as a first-rate second tenor; and Scotti has been blown out by the winds of passing events. The occasion was also marked by the first appearance of the popular Massol (seceder from the Royal Italian Opera), in his well known part of Pietro, in which he proved himself as unapproachable as ever, and was enthusiastically welcomed. Madame Fiorentini was the Elvira, and again showed herself perfectly at home in Auber's music. But the great feature of the cast, and of the night, was the Fenella, personated by Mademoiselle Monti, who came to us as "the first mime of Italy," and proved herself not only that, but much more—

—one of the greatest actresses the stage has ever seen. The effect produced by this admirable artist was recorded in enthusiastic terms by the entire press, and the wonder was that Mr. Lumley, throughout the remainder of the season, made no further use of such special and extraordinary talents. A new ballet of action, for Monti and Carlotta Grisi, was counted upon as a certainty by the subscribers and the public; and music by Edward Loder, who was known to be engaged in the theatre, was talked of with no less confidence. This would indeed have been a great fact, which the lively little Perrot would have doubtless accomplished; but, as the sequel showed, M. Paul Taglioni had other fish to fry—and fried them. It is well known that a new ballet by the celebrated librettist, M. St. Georges, was in the theatre, expressly intended for Carlotta Grisi, and for which Edward Loder was pledged to compose the music. Why this was suppressed it behoves Mr. Lumley's talented maître de ballet to explain; and moreover, how it happens that this same ballet of M. St. Georges, which was not found good enough for Her Majesty's Theatre, should yet be considered good enough for the Italian Opera at Berlin? Hic jacet—a mystery! But to return to Masaniello. The dances—the Guaracha, the Bolero, and the Tarantella—were more admirably executed than even on the stage of the Grand Opera at Paris. The corps de ballet—now completed by the addition of that charming trio, Julien, Lamoureux, and Rosa, with Esper, the pretty Spaniard—was more unapproachable than ever. The costumes were appropriate, beautiful, and Hispānic; and the Tarantella was footed to perfection by Amalia Ferraris and M. Charles. Marshall, too, in his scenery, wielded a gigantic and poetical brush; in short, the opera of Masaniello was more successful than that of Gustave—and deservedly so, since the great composer's music was given, with some slight exceptions, in its "integrity," without clippings, changes, cuts, or other mutilations.

We should have mentioned that, on the previous Tuesday, Mademoiselle Caroline Duprez achieved a third and well deserved success, as Amina in Sonnambula—the popular barytone, Coletti, making his rentrée as Rodolpho, and experiencing a warm reception; Calzolari playing Elvino, one of his best parts; and Mdle. Feller making a very comely and acceptable Lisa: that, after the opera, Carlotta Grisi once more floated through the Truandaise (pursued by the elastic Charles).

"Like an unbodied joy whose race has just begun—" to the visible enchantment of the habitués; and that, after this, Coletti appeared in the last scene of the Due Foscari, with laboured beard and sonorous organ triumphantly appealing to the sympathies of the audience. (We should have stated in our review of Masaniello, that Lorenzo made a step forward in Borella, and Balanchi a step backward in Silva—and that it was neither of their faults.)

The repetition of La Muta di Portici (Masaniello) on the 12th was memorable for the indisposition of Pardini, who, after the third act, was compelled to "give up," the part, and his place was supplied by M. Poulter, who sang the "sleep-song" in F, without shoes (as usual) and nearly all in his false—nevertheless, producing a very favourable impression, and not upsetting his Gallic reputation. Under the circumstances we shall say no more.

Thus much for the Ante-Easter season, with the additional observation that two events of importance, not announced in the prospectus, came off, to the surprise and satisfaction of the subscribers—the appearance of Massol, and the production of Masaniello; whereby Mr. Lumley, in exceeding promise, by no means diminished enjoyment.

* * * * *

The after Easter season was inaugurated portentously by the arrival of the ponderous and popular Lablache, whose Dulcamara—though not Ronconi's, Lablache's—elicited, as it were, echoes of the antique roar, and bigly contrasted with the slender grace and dulcet delicacies of Caroline Duprez's fourth part, Adina—which, curtly coquettish, and capriciously quaint, raised her another step on the ladder of public estimation. To speak of Calzolari's Nemorino is to say that he sang sweetly, and acted somewhat over boisterously—an unusual thing with the accomplished florid tenor, who was, as it were, rudely rustic, uproariously suburban. As for Coletti in Belcore, he was not Tamburini, nor light, nor humorous, nor florid, but weighty, thoughtful, painstaking, and Coletti. The opera was followed by the re-appearance of Carlotta Grisi, after a short interregnum of influenza, in some fragments from Les Métamorphoses, M. Paul Taglioni's best ballet. On this occasion it was remarked, aptly and poetically, by ourselves, that "the influenza had not hurt her—how could it—it laid its hands upon her but to caress her." It sat upon her as it were an eager lover on the confiding lap of his mistress, gazing in her eyes and exclaiming, with blent bathos, "I am thine, thou art not mine!" So that, in sober prose, instead of Carlotta Grisi catching the influenza, influenza caught the Carlotta Grisi.

We should have said before, but this is the right place to say it, that at the next performance of La Muta di Portici, Pardini, having entirely recovered, resumed his part as the Vesuvian sprat-catcher; and the anxious M. Poulter was conveyed back to the dungeons of obscurity, from which but now he had deftly emerged, panting on tiptoe for distinction.

At this epoch the cry arose, "What will Mr. Lumley do with all his prime donne—nine, ten, eleven—Caroline Duprez, Alaymo, Fiorentini, Sontag, Barbieri Nini, Cruvelli, Ugalde Beauce, Stoltz, Giuliani, Parodi, Alboni—twelve, Nau—thirteen, Fisher—and fourteen, * * *—four of whom had already arrived, seven of whom, three whereof unannounced in the prospectus, came afterwards; two, both whereof announced in the prospectus, came not at all; and one who comes next season to play the * * *, of the celebrated * * *, "What will Mr. Lumley do with all his prime donne?—we asked the question ourselves in a well-written leader, which was loosely reduced into French by our capital confrère, P. A. Fiorentino, and our careful contemporary, Le Menistrel. To the query, thus doubly echoed, no answer came; the resolution was in the womb of time, which after fructified and bore it—a child with many heads and hands.

We now come to an event (we record the date—Saturday, April 26th), which, pompously announced, prognosticated prodigies. We do not, with the vile object of a pun, allude to the production of Il Prodigio, but to the first appearance of Mademoiselle Alai(y)mo, as the heroine in Donizetti's tragedy-opera, Lucrezia Borgia. Of the middle height, slight and graceful figure, expressive face, tinted teint, and broad forehead—a pupil, nay a friend, of the gifted author of Fridolin—the dark debutante achieved a decided success, which was duly chronicled, with the reservation that Mdle. Alai(y)mo wanted nothing but voice, physique, stamina, and experience, suited to the proportions of a vast amphitheatre, to move to the quick the thousands that assemble readily within the walls of Her-Majesty's Theatre—distributed horse-shoe-wise, with amber hangings—at the bidding of Mr. Lumley; but these wanted necessarily confined the effects within the means of the young and intelligent artist to arias of less bulk and circumference. The rentrée of the gentle Gardoni, as Gennaro the graceful, with "another volume added to his voice" by the Morning Chronicle, (Gardoni's voice is now in five volumes—when he first appeared in 1847, it had (a) volume, and up to the present year, 1851, the press has recognised another annually), added materially to the delights of the evening, while Mdlle. Ida Bertrand, who also re-entered as Orsini, was complimented by an encore in the "Brindisi." Of the Alfonso of Lablache we need say nothing.

About this time, on a long Thursday, when the Lablaches, père and fils, had voiced and footed twice through the presumed comic duet from the Matrimonio Segreto, the curtain re-rose, and behold the Crystal Palace in appropriate effigy. Il s'agissait of a mask, wherein the whole company, operatic, choregraphic and statistic, in costumes of every clime, started, as it were, by magic from a shapeless rainbow. What they had to do we could not well make out, until Balfe, waving his baton, a psalm for the whole vocal corps was struck up to some verses, by Barry Cornwall, commencing with this strikingly original line:—

"All hail."

The semichorus, with an organ behind the scenes, had an effect. The national anthem, solos by Fiorentini and Caroline Duprez, was introduced; and the whole wound up with a lively cabaletta, composed, as we understood, for the occasion, by Balfe, who, retiring from his place, left Nadaud to the baton to direct a series of dances of all nations, in which Carlotta, Ferraris, and the principals were all employed. It is enough to add that the new divertissement was a complete fiasco; any thing stupider of its kind we never witnessed. We wonder at M. Paul Taglionni. Balfe of course could not help it.

An event of the highest importance, which had been anxiously expected by the subscribers all the season, took place on Saturday, May the 3rd. Need we say we allude to the first appearance of Madame Sontag, who, as Maria in the Figlia del Reggimento, renewed her triumphs of the previous season, was enthusiastically received, and ably supported by Gardoni as Tonio, and Frederick Lablache as Sergeant Sulpizio.

After more than one postponement another fact of the season was consummated, in three acts, by the transplantation of Alary's opera buffa, called Le Tre Nozze, from the boards of the Italian Opera, at Paris, to those of Her Majesty's Theatre. Of the reception accorded to this work, and of the manner of its performance, of the polka sung by Madame Sontag and danced by Lablache (the feature of the opera), of the two encores—the trio, with the shake for Madame Sontag, and the polka final—of the debut of the barytone, Ferranti, in Cricca, of the rentrée of that useful and intelligent artiste, Madame Giuliani, as Vespina, of Gardoni's Chevalier, and certain incongruities in the costumes, of the battery in the Post, and the praises in the rest of the papers, enough has already been said to render anything more at this juncture superfluous. Suffice it, the Tre Nozze, if not a failure, was as not a success, and though repeated several times, it failed several times to impress the cognoscenti with a high idea of its merits, or to shake the dilettanti from their chronic lethargy.

And now to speak of an event, the mere allusion to which fills the pen with extemporaneous ink, and covers the paper with words of fire. Need we say we allude to the first performance of Don Giovanni, Mozart's chef d'œuvre, with Sontag, Fiorentini (vice Parodi), Giuliani, Coletti, Lablache, Calzolari (vice Gardoni), and Scapini, a new importation from Mr. Lumley's Parisian troupe, who successfully explained to the audience how the music of the Commendatore should not be sung. The remarkable points of this performance were the restoration of that part of the music in the last scene usually curtailed at this theatre, and the escape from the usual encore of the "Il mio tesoro," ingeniously managed by Signor Calzolari. Of the general performance of Don Giovanni we shall have much to say in our Coda! Meanwhile Fidelio is announced for Thursday.

(To be continued in our next.)

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

The cheap prices during the week were so successful that the performances have been continued this week for five more nights—positively the last. We have nothing further to do respecting these ultra-extra-entertainments than to record the particulars thereof, which were as follows:—

On Tuesday the Barbiere was given, with the two last acts of Fidelio, a divertissement for Caroline Rosati and the principal ballerinas, and an extract from Lucrezia Borgia. The novelty of the evening was the first appearance of Signor Paltoni, who played Bartolo in the absence of Lablache. To undertake the part of Bartolo after Lablache with any hope of success, would be volatile and unremunerative. Paltoni has merit as an artist, and shone with great respectability on the present occasion. His humour is decidedly Paltonian rather than Lablachian, and he did his best with Rossini's music.

On Wednesday the first act of Norma; the grand divertissement from Il Prodigio; selections from Der Freischütz; the last act of Otello (for Sontag and Pardini); the last act of Anna Bolena; and La Saltarella for Caroline Rosati and M. Silvain.

On Thursday La Sonnambula, with selections from Lucia di Lammermoor; the Pas de cinq (divertissement); an extract from Linda di Chamouni; and the ballet Les Cosmopolites.

Last evening was presented the Barbiere, compressed into one act; a selection from Lucrezia Borgia; the last act of Ernani; the last act of Otello; the Quadrille Français from Les Cosmopolites; and La Saltarella.

CORBARI.

Every lover of the Italian Opera will be enchanted to hear that Mr. Lumley has engaged this accomplished and charming singer, as principal comprimaria, at the Theatre des Italiens in Paris. Corbari is also, we believe, to have certain premiers rôles, adapted to her special talent. Corbari will, moreover, return next season to London, where her place has never yet been filled up—simply because, in her line, she is without an equal. To the attractions of a lovely person and a voice exquisitely beautiful and sympatica, Amalia Corbari adds a knowledge of music very unusual among singers, a fund of grace and feeling, and a rare dramatic intelligence. Such a combination of qualities raises Corbari into a higher atmosphere than that which comprimarie in ordinary are wont to breathe, and in good earnest constitute her a prima donna, in the fullest acceptation of the term. Mr. Lumley is happy in possessing such a treasure.

ALBONI.

The reappearance of this magnificent singer at the Grand Opera of Paris, in the part of Fides, has given a fresh impulse to public excitement, and the Prophete of Meyerbeer is again filling the treasury of the establishment. Alboni's impersonation of Fides, without a sign of exaggeration or superfluous intensity, charms by its depth and earnestness. If Meyerbeer had composed the music expressly for her he could not have fitted the peculiarities of her voice and means more thoroughly. As an example of pathetic singing it is impossible to surpass the expression Alboni gives to the air, "Ah, mon fils!" The heart is touched and the ear delighted with this exquisite display of feeling. In the great aria di bravura in A flat (act 5), Alboni unites unsurpassable finish of execution to a boldness and elevation of style, and a warmth and animation of delivery, that raise her hearers to the highest pitch of ecstasy. Here the applause is fairly divided between the orchestra and the audience, the rows of the real claque being completely lost in the genuine outbreak of public enthusiasm. Never was a more decided, never a more legitimate triumph achieved by a singer than that of Alboni as the heroine of Meyerbeer's last chef d'œuvre.

It is rumoured that the Barbiere of Rossini will be shortly produced for Alboni, but we cannot answer for the truth of the report.

A NEW COMIC OPERA.

The world of music will be astonished and delighted to know that the great Meyerbeer has finished a comic opera, the principal part in which is destined, on dit, for Mad. Sontag. We shall look forward with the utmost anxiety for this new child of the illustrious composer's fancy. "Meyerbeer comic!"—the reader will ejaculate, incredulous. Yes, Meyerbeer comic—really and legitimately comic—as the sequel will show. Lucky Mad. Sontag! Lucky Mr. —!

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

Mendelssohn's oratorio, Elijah was repeated on-Friday 5th, under the direction of Mr. Costa, to an audience that thronged Exeter Hall again to overflowing. The performance was one of the most perfect that even the Sacred Harmonic Society has ever given of this noble and difficult work, and it was duly appreciated. The principal vocalists were Madame C. Novello, Miss E. Birch, and Miss Dolby, of whose admirable rendering we could only repeat what we have said on former occasions and Madame Macfarren, who more than confirmed the excellent impression her singing in the Messiah created the previous week by her faultless singing this week, especially in the grand declamatory scene for Jezebel, with the chorus, which she gave with an energy and clearness of enunciation that could not be surpassed. We have long advocated the claims of this highly intelligent and promising singer, and are glad to find that the public are beginning to recognize and appreciate her great merits. Madame Macfarren has had too few opportunities of showing the talent she possesses to advantage. Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Walker, Mr. Whitehouse, Herr Formes, and Mr. Smythson, were the male vocal solists. The Creation was given last evening.

FIDELIO.

(Concluded from our last.)

Now we come to the recapitulation of the first part. The subject is resumed from the place where it is given with the full force of the orchestra, and assumes the tone of enthusiastic exultation. This is here contrived without the startling interruption of the chord of F sharp, which before brought about such a sudden and complete revulsion of feeling, and with a skilful condensation that is equally judicious in the plan and pertinent to the expression we are brought to a half close on G. This introduces the second subject in C major, with a transitory digression into D flat, corresponding with that into F natural, when the subject was given in E. So we proceed with the matter of the first part, given now in the original key of the movement, until where, after the passage of syncopated chords to which we have made especial allusion, we had some four conclusive bars of tonic and dominant upon a pedal bass, in place of which here the coda begins with a passage of great simplicity, but of most exquisite beauty for wind-instruments in octaves, in which there seems to be poured out a whole heartful of melting love, of ecstatic tenderness. The delay upon the acute A, the major ninth of the harmony, conveys to us that most exquisitely subtle and delicate feeling which is so completely at the utmost extreme of pleasure, that to exceed it would be to pass into the acutest, keenest pain,—or, perhaps better, it is that link between pleasure and pain which is so equally composed of both or of a third, a nameless feeling that is neither, as to be only ascribable to joy or anguish by reference to the circumstance of sorrow or delight that stimulates it. This passionate excitement subsides into the fond memory of early happiness, conveyed by the second subject, which is given for a third time, but, by a most ingenious stroke of mastery, we have it now without the digression into the minor second of the key, the same phrase occurring here without modulation, and then prolonged with that fond dalliance in which a composer sometimes shows himself unwilling to quit a favourite thought, and in this case makes his hearers no less eager to detain him. Here the original expression of the passage must surely be recovered; what poignant anguish we feel in the absence of a joy that has no longer being but in recollection, is equalled by the exquisite pleasure of recalling a past sorrow, and contrasting it with the happiness that has filled its place, and then indeed we linger with an equal delight over the memory to the grief in which we as unrestrainedly indulge when pain is the present and pleasure is the past; and this we find depicted in the music. Some phrases in unison of broken rhythm happily relieve the long continued regular swing of the movement, and prepare us for new excitement in the wonderfully worked up stretto, which is introduced by a very greatly prolonged passage of scales of most singular construction, that surpasses even the many points of preparation that give to this overture so peculiarly the character of excitement, and always lead to their climax with such powerful effect.

The purport of the stretto must be to embody the same feeling as the concluding movement of the last finale, namely, the most enthusiastic, joyous, and unbounded rapture: and we marvel to find this feeling, that most rarely of any meets with adequate expression, again in the same work most vividly brought before us, and through a medium entirely different from that by which it is elsewhere conveyed. The tumultuous passage that leads to this grand outburst of ecstatic exultation preeminently disposes the hearer for the appreciation of that which it introduces, and the stretto itself completely fulfils expectations that have been raised to the highest. It consists of a brief recurrence to the chief subject, sufficient only to connect it with the general plan and feeling of the movement, which at once breaks off into a very vigorous continuation, that now appears for the first time in the design, but so satisfactorily grows out of the subject, as to seem in this place to be a natural part of it, and to belong most consistently to the whole. This passage is an evident recollection, if not an intended appropriation of an idea that occurs in the same situation in the first overture, which is curious, if not important to remark. Then we have another idea, quite new to the plan, of a right brilliant and rejoicing character. Next comes the powerful passage of syncopated chords that concludes the first part, which is repeated with increased force of instrumentation, and prolonged with admirable effect. This prolongation brings us to a dominant pedal, on which a succession of sustained harmonies, ascending by semitones, indicates the approach to the final full close, but this is delayed by a transitory digression, which hints at a modulation into A minor, which modulation greatly enhances the effect of the tonic cadence when it is ultimately introduced. Then we have an alternation of tonic and dominant harmony upon the first two bars of the chief subject, and then a very long continuance of the chord of the key note, during which the third bar of the subject, that is turned to such wonderful account in the working of the second part, is the ground work of the passage; and so this great masterpiece, perhaps the most laboriously perfected of all the works of Beethoven, is brought to a grand, a noble, and worthy conclusion.

The second overture, the sketch for this glorious composition, has been departed from and improved upon in the finished work in the following particulars. The passage of syncopated chords at the end of the first part is in the original much longer, and also the conclusive alternation of tonic and dominant, to which this leads, is longer than in the after composition. We have a recurrence of considerable length to the chief subject, given in imitation, that in the accepted overture is judiciously omitted. The "Free Fantasia" of the second part is made up for a long time of the working of the first phrase of the second subject, that which recalls the aria of Florestan, in alternation with the third bar of the chief subject, which, in its treatment here, as in the finished work, forces upon us the thoughts of Mendelssohn, and of that peculiar feeling in music which belongs especially to this composer. Then we have a recurrence to the chief subject in the key of D; and out of this grows a very long and elaborate development of the first two bars of the subject, comprising, as a very small portion, the same sequence of modulation from, and back, to, the key of C minor, that occurs in the other overture with prominent effect. This "Free Fantasia" of the second part is very greatly more extensive as to length, and excursive as to modulation, than the corresponding portion of the finished work. It contains many admirable points, to relinquish which must have been matter of no little difficulty to the composer, but it is upon the whole so diffuse as to have a decided effect of lengthiness from which notable fault, the close kneading together of all the members, and the admirable compactness of the whole in the Great Overture, so eminently exempt this most carefully contrived composition. Then we have a passage of quavers in unison, very much longer than the corresponding passage in the finished work, which at last is broken off with the trumpet-call, illustrating the impressive interruption of the scene in the prison, but this is introduced here in the key of E flat, not as in the other overture; and in the quartet, from which it may be said to be quoted, in the key of B flat, and the passage for the trumpet is quite different. Instead of the most beautiful passage of melody, that in the other overture, and the quartet, immediately follows upon this strikingly dramatic interruption, we have here the working of the chief subject resumed for some eight bars, and then a repetition of the summons, for the trumpet. There are then a few bars of mysterious character, but not of very obvious signification, which by an enharmonic change, lead to a short episodic adagio in the key of C, corresponding with a similar interlude in the first overture, inasmuch as it is, like that, composed of the melody of Florestan's aria, but it is very much indeed shorter than the movement with which we compare it. This adagio is immediately followed by the stretto without any recapitulation of the first part, and the stretto is, with only such modifications as elsewhere distinguish these two overtures, the same as in the finished work. We must observe, however, that in the printed score of the second overture we are told of some pages of the MS. being lost, which are supplied in this edition from the corresponding portion of the finished overture by Mendelssohn, and the world had sufficient respect for the judgment of this great master to take him as a satisfactory authority for the insertion which, from the natural manner in which it fits with the context, has all the appearance of being a restoration of what Beethoven is likely to have first written. We will only specialise of the modifications to which we have alluded, the halving the time of the bars of the chief subject, with which the stretto commences, the effect of which Beethoven must have found to be trivial, if not ridiculous since he writes these bars in the finished overture in the same rhythm in which they appear in other portions of the composition. For all other distinctions of detail we refer our readers to the two scores, promising that the interest of the examination will very well indeed repay the pains.

The fourth and last overture, and that which from the time of its first performance has held its place as the accepted overture to the opera, comes next under notice. This differs entirely from all the other three, and it is to us less interesting than either of them; but it possesses the great merits of clearness and brilliancy, and these, no less than its comparative brevity, befit it especially for its intended purpose of a theatrical prelude.

The four bars of allegro with which it opens, although not identical with the opening symphony of the allegro in Leonore's aria, powerfully remind us of this, and must, we think, be intended to convey the same feeling. The identity of key, which is also the same as that of the second subject in the second and third overtures, helps, together with the similarity of phrase, to awaken a like idea in the hearer; and we are thus, we believe, justified in the supposition that the sentiment of this song:

"Ich folg dem innern Triebe,
Ich wanke nicht;
Mich starkt die Pflicht
Der treuen Gattin Liebe," is intended to be embodied in this which, under certain modifications, constitutes the chief subject of the overture.

The eight bars of adagio that interrupt this bold and spirited beginning, suggest the hesitation, not of fear, not of unsettled purpose, but of that apparently natural diffidence in woman which, whether it be intuitive or whether it be educational, is indeed one of the most beautiful, or at least one of the most graceful and attractive points in female character, and which we may well suppose would make a heart, with all the firmness of Leonore's, yet tempered with all her poetry and consequent delicacy of feeling, pause with that modesty which so greatly enhances the heroism of her actions, before entering upon an enterprise so fraught with perils as to call forth the exercise of the most masculine energy, and so full of embarrassing perplexities, as to tax the nicest feminine scruples.

With the resumption of the allegro we may suppose that the "innere Trieb" again stimulates her; and in the recurrence of the adagio we find Leonore turning once more from the noble course of action upon which she is about to enter, to the delicate stream of passion which bears her on to undertake it, from the deeds without to the feelings within, to the scrupulous, delicate, diffident love of a woman which, while it makes her hesitate, first prompted and still urges her to the deeds of a hero.

A change comes over the spirit of the picture. Whether the composer intended to follow the progress of Leonore's thoughts, or draw a cloud over them and present an entirely new scene to the hearer, imports little. The gradual and almost imperceptible modulation into C major, brings us surely into the prison where we may suppose our heroine to accompany us with her thoughts, and upon the idea of his attenuated form, his sufferings scarcely to be supported, to feed her determination to deliver her captive husband. The passage that here follows with its very extraordinary and striking arrangement for the orchestra, is the development of an idea in the duet for Pizarro and Rokko, where the latter describes the prisoner in his care as him "Who scarcely lives, but rather hovers like a shadow." The return to the key of E, with the half-close on B, suggests the impotent impatience of the captive; and then we have his gradually sinking into a state of dreamy unconsciousness, lost in visions of tenderness with which his true love illuminates the deep abyss of his despair.

Now we enter fully upon the allegro, the important movement of the overture, of which the two short fragments that have already appeared have been as a kind of foreboding, and to which the whole matter that has been given before this point, consisting of an alternation of allegro and adagio, forms an introduction. A definite, tuneful, and clearly rhythmical melody, assigned first to the horn and afterwards to the clarinet, with the accompaniment of reiterated notes in syncopated accents for the violins, suggests the idea of the heroine pursuing with cheerful firmness her arduous and hazardous task. The excitement of the feeling increases from where the violins ultimately take up the subject, until the entry of the full orchestra, with a new phrase of much brilliancy, which must be intended to convey (although very feebly in comparison to the noble manner in which we feel the same idea to be illustrated in the other overtures) the exultation of the heroine in the growing consciousness of her own strength of purpose and power of will.

This is suddenly broken off by a descent in unison upon an A sharp, which introduces, wholly without preparation, the second subject, representing the sudden check of Leonore's ardent anticipations of success, by the poignant sense of her present sorrows, which is cruelly augmented by the ungenial appearance of seeming gaiety she is compelled to assume. So we are disposed to translate the alternate pathetic syncopated phrases for wind instruments, and playful passages for violins, that constitute the dominant subject; and we hope that such a rendering will not be found irrelevant nor unworthy. We fancy in this, Fidelio, as he is known, or supposed to be, in the disguise of the jailor's assistant, making himself the esteemed, and so the indispensable, because the ever gay and willing, inmate of old Rokko's household, and to put disguise beyond suspicion, becoming the accepted lover of Marzelline, and the acknowledged rival of Jacquinio; but all this, however well-feigned pretension, cannot mask from herself the aching, anxious heart of Leonore. Her restless impatience in this fictitious position, is indicated in the continual change of key that characterizes this subject. The transition into E is very vigorous; and the codetta of the first part which this introduces, brings the heroine again before us in her truly noble character, stimulated by the difficulties that surround her to the most arduous exertions to surmount them. The responsive phrases for wind and string instruments upon a tonic pedal, is very Beethovenish and highly effective. Then we have a phrase that is not identical with the opening of the overture, but so closely in accordance with the feeling of it as to suggest it obviously, and we are sure intentionally, to the memory, and thus the first part closes.

Without any break in the continuity of the movement, the second part, which is very brief and concise, commences with a sudden change into the key of G, that imparts quite a new colour to the feeling of the chief subject, denoting, as it seems to us, that the same one constant thought, however modified by the circumstances of her position, or the feelings of the moment, is ever and for ever present in her heart. One phrase of this chief subject, and afterwards two phrases together, carried through several keys, and then upon a long dominant pedal, constitute the whole of the working of the "free Fantasia," the unusual shortness of which is to be accounted for by the great extension of the coda, that renders closeness in this portion of the movement a most necessary part of the design.

At the return to the subject in the original key, we are charmed with the effect of a counterpoint of quavers that is superadded upon it, which gives to it an entirely new interest, and shows the fancy of the composer to be most fertile when such is least expected. From henceforward we have a recapitulation of the first part. In this portion of the design there is one piece of very singular but certainly judicious arrangement; namely, in the giving now what was before the dominant subject in the key of A, instead of in the original key of the movement; this, like the brevity of the "free Fantasia," is accounted for by the great extent of the coda, which is all in the key of E, so that a short digression in this place forms a grateful relief, and prevents the monotony of key that would otherwise prevail. The departure from the usual custom is made with the same intention as, in the second and third overtures, the giving the second subject in the third, instead of in the fifth of the original key, it occurs at a different position in the movement, but it is equally well calculated for good effect, and admirably fulfils its purpose. The course of modulations through which the second subject proceeds being here somewhat extended, brings us into the key of C, in the place where, in the first part, we had the modulation to E, which has a remarkable effect of unexpected brightness; and then, by another change in the course of the modulation we are brought here to the same full close in this key of C that we had before in the key of B. The introduction of an augmented sixth introduces suddenly a half-close on B, and this brings in the opening phrase of the overture in the original key, and in the original form, in which it has not appeared since the opening, but with the addition of two trombones that have not been employed throughout the score until this point, and which must have been designed to give great additional force to the subject at its recurrence, but which, to our constant surprise, on repeated hearing of the performance with most careful attention, make no perceptible difference in the effect.

This dashing phrase is interrupted, as at the commencement of the overture, by the same adagio, with the addition of a passage of triplets distributed successively to the different instruments, which may perhaps be meant to figure the dawn of hope that dispels the hesitation, the sense of her own weakness, that was about to paralyze the efforts of our heroine when her energies were at the highest, and the occasion for their exercise paramount. Be this as it may, we affect not the passage; and this candid acknowledgment of our want of interest should excuse, if it need excuse, the insufficiency of our explanation of it.

Now begins the coda, or stretto, in an accelerated tempo, with an exciting passage of unison, formed on the accent of the principal subject, that works up to a tutti, in which we have the first phrase of this subject with an accompaniment of triplets in arpeggio, reminding us, it must be intentionally, of the figure in the last adagio. After some alternation of tonic and dominant, we come to a tonic pedal, finishing with a much prolonged dominant harmony, a combination that is perhaps more intensely exciting than any other in the whole range of harmony, because demanding more imperatively than any other to be resolved; and one in which Beethoven very frequently and always effectively indulges, never, we believe, more effectively than in the four bars introduced in the third of these overtures, immediately before the chief subject is first given with the forte of the full orchestra. Then we have a very bold passage, in which the violins and basses proceed by contrary motion against the iterated notes of the brass instruments; and then a repetition of the opening phrase upon different intervals of the common chord, and so the overture concludes, with exhilaration and brilliancy.

Here then, we close our remarks upon this great, this noble masterpiece; and we close them as we began, with the perfect conviction that Fidelio is, on the grounds we first adduced, on the grounds of its overgrowing interest from first to last, and of the manner above all praise in which the interest of the action is not only illustrated, but heightened by the music, on these grounds we are convinced that Fidelio is the most perfect work existing on the lyric stage. In our observations we have endeavoured to particularize every point of importance throughout the opera—to do justice to many of them would have been impossible—and we shall be truly gratified if this analysis of all that is expressed, and all that is suggested to us throughout the work, may in any respect assist some who are less familiar with Beethoven's only dramatic production than ourselves to the happy appreciation of its transcendent beauties. There exists, we understand from the preface to Mr. Mould's interesting edition of the opera, an aria with chorus for the character of Pizarro, of which we have in vain sought to obtain a copy, as we expected to find in it at least some very curious matter for remark. With the exception of this one piece which, although it may have been written for Fidelio, certainly belongs not to it, we have in these papers omitted to notice nothing; and we take leave of our patient readers, flattering ourselves that in having done our best with the subject, we have fulfilled our duty.

G. A. M.

GRISI AND MARIO.—The "incomparable pair" are reposing themselves at St. Leonards, after the fatigues of the season, previous to starting for St. Petersburg. They go by land, via Warsaw.

WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

We announced to our readers in April last the intention of the Dean and Chapter of Westminster to throw open the Abbey on the Sunday evenings throughout the months of May, June, July, and August, in order to afford additional church accommodation for the numerous strangers expected to visit London for the Great Exhibition. The crowded congregations on each Sunday evening have fully compensated the clergy attached to this ancient institution for the additional labours devolving on them, and there can be no doubt that much good has resulted from the earnestness with which they have prosecuted their praiseworthy object. In order, at the same time, that such Protestant foreigners who might attend the services should not go away impressed with a bad opinion of the musical portion of the ceremony, the Dean and Chapter increased their choir to nearly a hundred voices, calling into their aid the kind and gratuitous services of some of the members of the Sacred Harmonic Society and of the Purcell Club. Having attended on several occasions it gives us unfeigned pleasure to announce our unqualified satisfaction with the manner in which the musical service has been performed, and we may venture to hope that the great success which has attended the experiment may not be lost sight of on future occasions. The concluding evening service took place on Sunday evening last, when the Abbey was filled in every corner by a most attentive congregation. A very impressive sermon was preached by the Rev. Lord John Thynne, the sub-dean, in which he eloquently alluded to the success of their labours, and expressed his earnest hope that when the hundreds of thousands who had visited London on this remarkable occasion returned to their homes they would not fail to turn to good account the instructive lessons they had received, and give praises to God singing the final anthem, "Hallelujah! the Lord God omnipotent reigneth! Amen!" The choir immediately sang this grand chorus from the Messiah and, accustomed as we have been to hear it performed at the Sacred Harmonic Society's concerts with a full band and chorus of 700 performers, we were hardly prepared for so grand an effect. The impressive manner of the preacher, the deepening shadows of the aisles of the venerable edifice, the flickering lights from a few branches, and the breathless attention of the numerous congregation imparted to this sublime composition a solemnity such as we have never before experienced when listening to it.

As an acknowledgment of the voluntary labours of all parties concerned, the Dean and Chapter invited the clergy and those engaged in the musical portion of the service to an entertainment on Monday last in Westminster College Hall. The Rev. Lord John Thynne presided, supported on the right and left by Professor Taylor and Mr. Brewer, the Secretary of the Sacred Harmonic Society. There were also present, the Rev. Dr. Wordsworth, the Rev. Mr. Jennings, the Rev. Mr. Cureton, the Rev. Mr. Haden, the Rev. Mr. Lupton, the Rev. the Precentor, and the other clerical officers of the Abbey. A most elegant dinner was provided, and after the cloth was removed the usual loyal toasts were drunk, followed by some unaccompanied vocal music rendered in a style but rarely heard, and the company separated highly pleased with the kindness and urbanity of the dignitaries of the church with whom they had thus been brought in contact.

In thus announcing the conclusion of their labours we cordially congratulate the Dean and Chapter on the liberal views they have displayed throughout the whole proceedings, and their anxiety to keep pace with the times as developed in the eventful year 1851.

Original Correspondence.

NATIONAL ENGLISH OPERA.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR.—In reference to the letter signed "Astyanax," in your print of last week permit me to state that the term "national," as applied (in a sense which may appear to savour of tautology), is merely given to distinguish the contemplated undertaking from all others, by investing it with a character of universality in opposition to that of exclusiveness, which invariably attaches to a private lessee-ship. My own particular views would perhaps lead me to exclude adaptions from foreign works, as implying a misnomer, but others are of a different opinion, and mine should be made to bow to the majority. Be this as it may. A national opera may clearly embrace any authorship which should originally appear in an English dress, and welcome any artist who is capable of vocalising in the English language.

With reference to foreign operas, such as, for instance, have been performed, and respectably too, at the Surrey Theatre, there is no earthly reason why they should not continue to be performed, but let it be in such places only; for whilst "La Sonnambula" and "Les Huguenots" shall continue to be superbly produced at the two Italian Operas, I am of opinion that few real lovers of music would care to witness a less perfect representation, in our ideas at variance with the genius of the composer's thoughts.

With reference to the projected scheme, of which "Astyanax" does not approve, I have only to repeat my assurance that if the "profession" will but coalesce and show a bold front, there are great things to be done. If the "profession" will not—there is an end of the matter; my scheme has but one object, the obtaining of "fair play" for both composers and vocalists. Should the same end be attainable by any other means it will be welcomed by none more sincerely than by

Sir, your obedient servant,
PHILO-MUSICA.

THE CURATE OF ODDINGLEY versus THE WORCESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(To the Editor of The Musical World.)

DEAR SIR.—By one master-stroke, you last week conferred a decided favour upon the readers of the Musical World by introducing a curiosity to them. You honoured the pages of your valuable paper, and performed an act of charity, by rescuing from his obscurity, and introducing to town, the "faithful, sorrowful," and exemplary bit of piety, the Curate of a place called Oddingley, which up to this time, has been something like Coventry "out of this world and all others;" but which will now of course become notorious through the magnanimous "Lucius Arthur,"—its Curate! who raised his puny voice to the injury of Charity! and dared to call the great professionals assembled in the cathedral orchestra, by the gentlemanly title of "thieves." I am sure they would feel the compliment, and in their own minds, return it in full.

This week, however, the "bit of piety," sends forth another groan from his "sorrowful" heart, which I think ought not to be lost to the world. I subjoin it more especially for the benefit of the professional lady and gentleman "thieves," who took part in the musical festival. You will perceive he rather draws in his horns, snail-like, and, harmless though they were—I question very much if his own conscience has not informed him that "The opera and theatre performers"—whom he now compliments, by calling "thieves," spiritually speaking, have at least humane and charitable hearts! But now let the little man—the pattern "bit of piety," speak for himself.

To the Editor of the Worcester Herald.

Tibberton, near Droitwich, Sept. 4th, 1851.

SIR,—I have seen your remarks upon my letter about the Musical Festival. The question itself I have submitted to the Bishop, but I never charged the "professional persons" with being "thieves," in what seems to be your sense of the word, any more than our blessed Lord did those whom He found in the Temple. Apart from all considerations of their common honesty, what I am persuaded of is that those who attend such meetings do (however unintentionally) "rob God" of His honour, in His House of Prayer.

While all Christians, lay as well as clerical, are holy, yet as a Clergyman of the United Church of England and Ireland, I know that we have an authorized "form and manner of making, ordaining, and consecrating of Bishops, Priests, and Deacons."

I am, Sir, Your faithful Servant,

LUCIUS ARTHUR.

Curate of Oddingley.

[What does Mr. Arthur mean by talking about having "submitted the question to the Bishop," when he tells us in the same breath that he had already decided the said question in his own mind? Is this the way for a Clergyman to treat those set over him in the Church? Evidently, Mr. Arthur regarded his Diocesan as a convenience when he thus used him as the butt of a letter in which to discharge his morbid notions about Musical Festivals. "Submitted the question to the Bishop," indeed! Mr. Arthur knows that he submitted the question to public discussion by printing and publishing his letter consentaneously with his submitting it to his Lordship. We have said enough on such a matter, or we might notice his "making, ordaining, and consecrating" notions also.—ED. W. II.]

You will observe the Editor of the Worcester Herald handles the little gentleman rather roughly. I really should think it would be advisable for the "faithful, sorrowful" Lucius Arthur!! Curate of Oddingley!!! to retire again into his obscurity, and let his busy pen rest in peace.

Believe me, Dear Sir,

Yours right respectfully,

ANTI-CANT.

Dramatic Intelligence.

HAYMARKET.—Grandmother Grizzle is a product of Devonshire, and like some of its cider rather sour and calculated to produce anything but agreeable sensations in those that make her acquaintance. Grandmother Grizzle, in fact, is always finding fault with everything and everybody, and, like a Damascus blade, celebrated far and wide for her temper, which is a most atrocious one. But one day, Grandmother Grizzle takes a little more wine than she usually does. This sets her thoughts wandering back again to the days of her youth. Like a Roman Gentleman who lived some time ago—and with whom we enjoyed, when at school, a nodding acquaintance, for we regularly, horribile dictu, went to sleep over him—Grandmother Grizzle exclaims mentally—not in the precise words, but something to the same effect:—

"O, mihi præteritos referat si Jupiter annos!"

And with the exclamation, a whole train of recollections warm her heart as they once did that of Justice Shallow when he reflected on "the mad days" he had spent. The result of all this is that the old Lady suddenly becomes an altered being—kind, good-natured and affectionate—to the immense astonishment of everyone connected with her, but more especially to that of a servant, played inimitably by

Mr. Buckstone. Such is the subject on which a very lively and cleverly written farce has been written for this theatre, and which, thanks to the clever acting of Mrs. Fitzwilliam, will, when the pruning-knife has been judiciously applied to it, no doubt become a favourite with the public.

ADELPHI.—Où est mon carrosse ? said the Grand Monarch one day at Versailles, thereby making masculine, as if by magic, the word carrosse, which had been feminine ever since the French language had been invented. After the most mature deliberation and profound thought, we have come to the conclusion that this anecdote affords a satisfactory clue to the mystery of the Man with the Iron Mask, who has since formed the subject of so many plays and romances, and furnished a sign-board for a linen-draper's shop in the Rue Coq-héron. Louis XIV. was, as is well known, extremely susceptible of his dignity. Having said mon carrosse, he was far too great a man to own he had committed an error—in fact, we rather think he had not committed one at all, sharing, as we do the belief, prevalent at that period in France, and, luckily for order and freedom, still prevalent in Austria, that a crowned head can never be wrong. Now, at the period of the regal alteration of grammar we have mentioned, there happened to be at the Court of Versailles on a visit, a young English nobleman, of the old family of the De Boshes, with a most agreeable exterior, and that profound contempt for anything like study which characterised the scions of nobility of those days, as, we are proud to say, it does of our own. In consequence of the high state of mental culture, young Augustus de Bosh enjoyed, as a natural result of this he was not over accurate as regards the genders of French nouns, and happened, in the king's presence, to use the expression "Mon voiture." Without making any allowance for the advance of aristocratic education, which smiles with contempt on such things as concord or gender, the blood of Louis was raised; he thought it an insult offered to himself. Need the rest be told? The reader must see the end—but as he may not, we will inform him, that it was Augustus de Bosh, and no other, who was shortly after sent to the Château Pignerol in the greatest haste and an iron mask.

In support of our supposition, we may mention that the prisoner wore fine linen, that he played on the guitar, and that he carved his name on the silver plate on which his steak and onions were served up, and then threw the plate out of window. Is not this conclusive? we should say so; but, however this may be, we certainly think that we have as much chance of being wrong as any of the other writers, who have given the subject their consideration. Among these gentlemen we may mention the authors of the Queen's Secret, brought out at this house last Monday, who make the Man in the Iron Mask two personages instead of one.

The idea is certainly a bold one, with that strong dash of improbability which always imparts so high a flavour to dramatic works. We shall not attempt to enter into the plot, but shall merely observe that the piece was very successful. Indeed, it could not have been otherwise, considering the really striking situations in which it abounds, and the excellent manner in which it was played by Mr. Webster and Madame Celeste, supported by the Misses Woolgar and Fitzwilliam.

The Queen's Secret will certainly be held by all lovers of good acting and interesting plot, a secret worth knowing.

OLYMPIC.—Last Monday, a new farce, under the quaint title of I've eaten my Friend, was produced here with the greatest success. Mr. Compton, as the supposed Anthropophagus, made the audience roar with laughter. We have seldom seen him in a character which "fitted" him better

He was ably supported by Messrs. G. Cooke and Shalders, and Miss Isabel Adams.

The applause at the fall of the curtain was unanimous and long protracted.

MARYLEBONE.—An impenetrable cloud seems to hang over the destinies of this theatre. It is undeniable that every experiment that has hitherto been tried with it has failed. On Monday last it was opened for the first time for the performance of English opera, but with no change in the directorship. As steady well-wishers to the establishment we shall await with some interest the result of the experiment, but we are compelled to say that it must be made in a bolder and more liberal spirit than was evinced on Monday, if the hope of success held out by the state of the house is to be realised. The opera was "The Sonnambula," the principal performers being Mr. and Mrs. Donald King, Miss Lanza and Mr. Gregg—so far, well; but the orchestra and chorus were in a state of utter inefficiency. In a well known ballad opera like the "Sonnambula," time and practice may work effectual improvements; but Mr. Wild is quite conversant enough with matters musical as well as matters dramatic, to know that it will be vain to attempt such works as the "Huguenots" and the "Daughter of the Regiment," (both of which are already advertised), until the above deficiencies are removed. Nobody is ignorant of the heavy pecuniary risks incurred in attempts to improve theatrical property; but we speak with candour on this subject from a conviction that to meet the public demands liberally is the only way to ensure a chance of success to experiments of the kind. The principal singers exerted themselves with their wonted effect. Mrs. Donald King's qualifications both vocal and histrionic are well adapted to ballad opera, while her pretty and expressive features, nice figure, and luxuriant tresses, give her more than the ordinary share of personal attractions. On her entrée she was somewhat timid, and the usual effects of nervousness were for some time visible; but she rallied, and gave the first scene in the second act with so much truth and feeling as to elicit a call. She was equally successful to the end. Miss Lanza's vocal attributes are moderate, but she acted the little part of Lisa with more spirit and naïveté than we ever saw it performed on the English stage. The singing of Mr. Gregg, who, we believe, is new to the stage—seems to possess some latent excellencies, but we must decline saying more until he gets more justice from the orchestra. Mr. Donald King is too well known to the public to need remark. The house, although not crowded, was well filled.

(Omitted last Week.)

Reviews of Music.

"CONCERTO, POUR LE VIOLON—AVEC ACCOMPAGNEMENT D'ORCHESTRE, OU DE PIANO—DEDIE AU PRINCE LOUIS NAPOLEON—PROSPER SAINTON. Schott and Co.

Any new contribution from the pen of M. Sainton, who holds so worthily the two important posts of solo violinist to Her Majesty the Queen of England, and chief professor of the Royal Academy of Music, must be welcomed with avidity by the amateurs and professors of the instrument on which he is so distinguished a performer. The work under consideration is doubly valuable, as a labour of love and serious purport. M. Sainton has already proved his capabilities in the brilliant school by several popular and well-known fantasias; and it gives us pleasure to find him quite as much at home in a graver and more ambitious style.

M. Sainton's concerto is in A major, a favourite key with composers for the violin, from Viotti to Spohr and Molique. It should, however, be rather termed a concertino than a concerto, since it consists wholly of a single movement—a bold and energetic allegro moderato, so well varied and developed, nevertheless, as to lend it all the interest of a regular concerto. The opening tutti for the orchestra though short, is very effective. The two principal motives, afterwards elaborated and set forth in the solos, are presented in simple harmony, with strength and decision. The first solo, in the tonic, is majestic, and leads to a triplet passage of double and triple notes, a la bravura which demands that broad and well-accentuated execution for which M. Sainton's playing is remarkable. The second subject, after some natural and well-conducted progressions, is then introduced in the dominant key, ornamented in a tasteful manner. Another elegant trait de bravoure, in semiquavers, succeeds, still in the dominant key, which is extended to considerable length, and with striking effect leads up to a brisk tutti for the orchestra, coming to a half close in C sharp. The next solo (properly the second—since what we have described is simply the two sections of one grand solo) commences in F sharp minor, nel stylo passionato, and gives good occasion for the display of large phrasing and masterly bowing. The second principal theme is then presented in a modified form in the key of F sharp major; and here the player, be he ever so able, must look sharp after his intonation (he may take M. Sainton as a model) or he will be quite abroad in the bravura passage of semiquavers, in the same difficult key, and the daring trait d'octaves, which brings it to a climax with such force and energy, leaving the orchestral tutti to modulate back again to the original tone of A major. At this point the first theme is re-introduced, and after some more trying passages of double-stopping and arpeggios, cleverly developing the prominent idea, the concerto comes to a satisfactory and brilliant close.

Altogether we consider this concerto, or concertino, by far the most finished and musician-like composition which M. Sainton has given to the public. The pianoforte arrangement has been skilfully made, and a more agreeable (and at the same time, be it understood, more difficult) duet could hardly be desired. Of course, with the advantage of the orchestral accompaniments, the effect would be tripled. We observe that M. Sainton has dedicated this piece to the President of France. It is the enviable privilege of illustrious personages to be honoured by the flattering homage of eminent artists.

"ARRANGEMENTS FOR THE SCORES OF THE GREAT MASTERS FOR THE ORGAN."—W. T. BEST. J. Alfred Novello.

This valuable contribution to the library of the organist, issued by Mr. Novello at a reduced price, should be in the hands of every professor of the "king of the instruments." The name of Mr. W. T. Best, one of the most accomplished organists in Europe, and an admirable musician in the bargain, is quite enough to recommend it. We need scarcely say that the collection is as rich and well varied, as the arrangements are able and appropriate; or that Mr. Best's thorough familiarity with the treasures of art which the "great masters" have bequeathed us, is unquestionable. The introduction and fugue of Mozart in C minor—one of the grandest specimens extant of the severe school of writing—equal to anything of Bach or Mendelssohn; the sublime chorus in A minor, "Who is like unto Thee" (Israel in Egypt); the graceful andante in F, from Mozart's Sixth Quartet; the splendid fugal chorus in C minor, "He trusted in God" (Messiah); the andante in A flat from the C minor symphony of Beethoven; the andante in F from Mozart's Quartet in D minor; the fine chorus from Samson, "Round about the stary throne;" the deeply impressive and poetic chorus, "Wretched lovers," (Acis and Galatea); the melodious largetto in A, from Beethoven's second symphony; the famous chorus, "Let their celestial courts" (Samson); and the unrivalled choral climax to Israel, "I will sing unto the Lord," together with some curious specimens from Dr. Croft (fugue), Weinmann, Graun (fugue), Benedict Ducis (Descant on the Chorale, "Nun treut euch lieben"), Spohr (fugue), and F. Schneider (motet), the brief prelude to the third part of the Creation, and an elaborate and almost impossible grand study composed by Mr. Best himself expressly for this work, makes up one of the wealthiest and most interesting selections of pieces ever offered to the studious and aspiring organist. In short, the merits of the publication are self-evident, and need no advocacy.

"CHRISTMAS BELLS"—A Sacred Song—Dedicated to the Editor of the Family Tutor.

"WHAT IS DEATH?"—A Sacred Song—Dedicated, by permission, to the Editor of the Family Tutor. Written and Composed by SOPHIA ELIZABETH YOUNGE. Lewis and Co.

The first thing which strikes on a perusal of these very pleasing, but wholly unpretending songs, is the great superiority of the words to which they are allied over the general mass of ballads, sacred and secular, which we are in the habit of receiving. Had we space, we would quote both the poems of Mrs. Sophia Elizabeth Younge; but it is impossible for us to find room for more than one, and are constrained to give the shortest, "What is Death?" which is, nevertheless, a favourable specimen, and will serve quite well enough to show the correct ear and pure poetical feeling of the fair authoress.

"What is death? Oh, what is death?

'Tis the snapping of the chain,

'Tis the breaking of the bowl,

'Tis relief from ev'ry pain;

'Tis freedom to the soul!

'Tis the setting of the sun

To rise once more to-morrow;

A brighter course to run,

Not sink again in sorrow!

Such is death! Yes, such is death!

What is death? Oh, what is death?

'Tis the fading of the flower,

When summer children die,

To bloom in heaven's bow'r,

And blossom in the sky!

'Tis the breaking of the shell

Which holds the pearly gem,

Freed from its earthy cell,

To grace a diadem!

Such is death! Yes, such is death!

What is death? What is death?

'Tis slumber to the weary,

'Tis rest to the forlorn,

'Tis shelter to the dreary,

'Tis peace amid the storm!

'Tis the entrance to our home,

'Tis the passage to that God

Who bids his children come

When their weary course is trod!

Such is death! Yes, such is death!"

We need hardly insist, to the intelligent reader, that the above is real poetry; and when we add that the music expresses the sentiment of it in a simple and unaffected manner, besides being correct and well written for the voice, we have said enough to recommend it to amateurs and professional vocalists. The "Christmas Bells" is longer, and, though still endowed with a sweet melancholy, it is, on the whole of a more cheerful character than its companion. The introduction of the chimes in the symphonies is pretty and pleasing, and the melody, like that of the first song, is exceedingly homely and taking, and the second part, in the minor key, makes a very agreeable contrast. Altogether, in spite of their entire want of pretension, there is a charm about these little songs which proves that they are genuine offsprings of the heart, not make-offerings for the shop.

"THE LANCASHIRE WITCHES"—TWELFTH SET OF WALTZES.—A. FLECHE. Charles Jeffreys.

M. Flèche is not only one of the most prolific of our resident waltz composers, but one of the best, and the present twelfth set is a happy specimen of his invention and of his abilities in setting down his musical ideas. All the three figures are tuneful, catching, and essentially promotive of the dance, while the introduction is pretty, and the coda effective and brilliant. We recommend the waltzes of M. Flèche, without fear, to our lady readers. Moreover, the title page has a lithograph of three ravishing "Lancashire Witches," from the inexhaustible store of Brandard, and the favoured press of Hanhart.

"LA HAYES QUADRILLES," FOR THE PIANOFORTE—DEDICATED TO MISS CATHERINE HAYES.—THOMAS D. SULLIVAN. Wessel and Co.

Inspired with such a theme as the "Irish Nightingale" a less able musician than the author of these quadrilles could scarcely fail to accomplish something worthy. It will surprise no one, therefore, when we say that "La Hayes" has been worthily apostrophised in the present set of contre-dances, which have not merely the distinction of original tunes, for each separate figure, but are vigorous and striking. We may prophecy that, during the absence of the prima donna in America, Mr. Sullivan's quadrilles will be frequently used, in the towns and cities of Ireland, to enliven the winter hearth with dance and merriment.

HANDBOOK OF THE FOUR ELEMENTS OF VOCALIZATION.—LEOPOLDINE ZISKA. Ewer and Co.

Under the above title we have a compact and useful little musical treatise for the use of students, dedicated by the authoress, Mme. Leopoldine Ziska, to Lady Kerrison. The work is edited by Leopold Wray, and the combined talents of authoress and editor have been judiciously employed in producing a handbook, the merits of which deserve to be recognised by the musical world in general. The observations contained in the preface are characterised by plain truth, which, after all, is the best master for those desirous of useful knowledge, and the "Four Elements of Vocalization" themselves are arranged by the authoress with such clearness, combined with practical good sense, as to justify a hearty recommendation of the treatise to all students, whether amateur or professional, who seek to attain distinction in the vocal art. The examples attached to the work are selected from works of the best composers, and are calculated to afford amusement as well as instruction; a combination too frequently disregarded by those to whom the education of youth is confided.

THE LAW AS TO MUSIC AND DANCING LICENSES.

In consequence of the great public attention which the law affecting the music and dancing licenses, not merely in and about the metropolis, created some year or two since, especially among the magistrates themselves, with whom there was an unusual difference of opinion upon the subject, it will be recollected that a committee of 12 justices was appointed by the Court to take the matter into consideration, to obtain the opinion of eminent counsel, if necessary, and to report to the Court the conclusions at which they arrived. After extending their deliberations over a period of 16 months the committee have made their report, and the Court has adopted it, and passed resolutions in accordance with its recommendations. The report is as follows:—

"Your committee have to report that the powers possessed by the Court in the matter referred to are derived from the act of 25th George II., c. 36, the provisions of which are, however, to some extent restricted by subsequent enactments. The second section of the act provides that any house, room, garden, or other place kept for public dancing, music, or other public entertainment of the like kind, in the cities of London and Westminster, or within 20 miles thereof, without a license from the court of quarter sessions (who are thereby authorised and empowered to grant such licenses as they, in their discretion, shall think proper), shall be deemed a disorderly house or place, and renders the keeper thereof subject to a penalty of £100, or otherwise punishable as the law directs in the case of disorderly houses. The same section further empowers a constable or other person being thereto authorised by a warrant of a justice of the peace, to enter such houses and places, and to seize every person who may be found therein that they may be dealt with according to law. The fifth and several subsequent sections of the act contain provisions for encouraging and facilitating prosecutions against persons keeping disorderly houses; and the 12th section empowers two or more justices to deal in a summary way with the parties brought before them under the second section already mentioned. Upon considering the effect of the above provisions, your committee found that doubts were entertained by different members of the bench upon three points, viz.—

1st. Whether the Court is legally authorized, on the grant of a license under this act, to limit it to one particular entertainment, as to music only, or dancing only; or whether a license, if granted at all, must not extend to every kind of entertainment within the purview of the act. 2d. Whether, assuming that the words 'Other public entertainment of the like kind' includes scenic entertainments, the power of the Court to grant licenses for such purposes is not taken away by the act of the 6th and 7th Victoria, c. 68, for regulating theatres. 3d. Whether the power given to the justices by the act of George II., to grant warrants for the apprehension of persons found in unlicensed (i. e. disorderly) houses, is not repealed by the act of the 5th of George IV., c. 83, respecting the punishment of idle and disorderly persons. The great practical importance of the above questions, and the difficulty felt by many members of the bench in dealing with them, rendered it (your committee thought) desirable to take the opinion of counsel upon them. They therefore gave directions that a case should be drawn up and submitted to Sir Frederick Thesiger and Mr. Crompton, which was accordingly done, and the case with the opinion of those gentlemen upon it, is annexed, by way of appendix, to this report. It will be seen that the opinion is decidedly in favour of the power of the Court to grant partial licenses; that according to the same opinion, the Court of Quarter Sessions has no longer the power (if it really ever had) to grant licenses under the 25th George II., for the performance of scenic entertainments, and that the counsel think that the Justices retain the power of issuing warrants, for the apprehension of persons found in disorderly houses, although they appear to doubt whether that power can be exercised with much practical benefit. Upon the first of these points your committee have no hesitation in adopting the construction now put upon the statute, which they believe may be acted upon by the Court with perfect safety. If the Court concurs in this view, it has power at once, without any further legislative enactment, to carry into effect one of the recommendations made by the Assistant Judge in his printed letter of last year, by restricting within narrower bounds the granting of licenses for public dancing, and allowing a wider scope to entertainments confined to music, particularly when not held at taverns. Your committee think the suggestion to be entitled, at the least, to serious consideration. But, whatever may be done in this respect, your committee think that some alteration is requisite, both in the form of the notices for applications for licenses, and in the form of the licenses themselves, and in the endorsement thereon. Your committee think that every sort of entertainment for which the applicant wishes to obtain a license, or for which the Court intends to grant one, ought to be distinctly expressed on the face of the notice, or of the license, in order, on the one hand, that the Court may be able to judge of the legality, as well as propriety, of what the applicant wants; and, on the other hand, that the latter may be free from all doubt respecting the extent of the privilege conceded to him. The general expression, "other entertainments of the like kind," introduced into the act of the 25th George II., was intended, your committee believe, to enable the Court to judge whether any entertainment (other than music or dancing) for which a license may be applied for, was or was not within the scope of the act. By inserting the phrase in the license, the Court however, throws upon the license the task and responsibility of determining what it is that the act contemplates, instead of deciding the question itself. Upon the second and third points referred to counsel your committee see no reason to doubt the accuracy of the opinion given. They think, therefore, that all licenses granted under the 25th of George II., ought to be so expressed as to preclude any reasonable intendment of their authorising the exhibition of scenic entertainments. With respect to the subject generally your committee agree in the opinion expressed by the Assistant Judge in the printed letter already referred to, that additional regulations are wanted for the supervision and control of places of public entertainment, and for the summary punishment of misconduct on the part either of the managers or frequenters of such places. They further agree with the Assistant Judge, in thinking that some of the restrictions now imposed by law on those places are not well adapted to the existing condition of society. But these topics are so fully discussed in the letter of the Assistant Judge, as to enable the Court, without any further assistance from your committee, to determine upon the course which it may be proper to adopt. Your committee does not appear to be authorized, by the terms of the present reference, to take any steps towards obtaining an alteration of the law, either by an application to the government, or by a direct appeal to the legislature.

"In the case laid before counsel the provisions of the statutes, 25th George II., and 6th and 7th Victoria, c. 68, were set forth, and the following questions were submitted,—First, whether the Middlesex justices were at liberty to grant licenses, under the 25th George II., for any one sort of entertainment of the nature specified or referred to in that act, exclusive of all others, viz.,—for 'public dancing or music,' or for 'public music only;' or, whether the the justices' powers are confined to the granting of licenses for 'public dancing, music, or other public entertainment of the like kind,' collectively? Second, whether the statute 6th and 7th Victoria, c. 68, does or does not indirectly repeal the statute the 25th George II., c. 37, so far as relates to 'other public entertainments of the like kind,' and whether persons who, 'under colour of the licenses granted under the 25th of George II., suffer scenic representations to be performed in their houses are not liable to the penalty given by the 6th and 7th of Victoria. Thirdly, whether the enactment of the 5th of George IV. cap. 83, takes away the power given to justices of the peace by the 25th of George II. to issue their warrants to constables to enter the houses or places therein mentioned (and which by the last mentioned act are to be deemed disorderly houses or places), and to seize the persons found therein.

"OPINION.

"1. We are of opinion that the Middlesex justices are not compelled to grant licenses for 'public dancing, music, or other public entertainment of the like kind collectively, but that they may at their discretion grant the license for music only, or for dancing only, or for music and dancing; nor can we entertain any doubt on that point when we observe the words of the act to be in the disjunctive, which seems to leave no ground for any other construction.

"2. We should have thought, if the question had been open to us, that the 25th of George II. did not apply to scenic representations at all, but the words, 'other public entertainments of the like kind,' have been so long treated or acted upon as including scenic representations, that we are precluded from expressing our own independent opinion upon the point, and are compelled to accept the interpretation which has been put upon them, and from which it necessarily follows that the 6th and 7th Victoria, c. 68, does indirectly repeal this portion of the 25th George II., and that parties would be liable to the penalties of the latter act for suffering scenic representations to be performed in their houses.

"We are of opinion that the 5th George IV. does not repeal the 25th George II., as to the power given in the last-named statute for justices to issue their warrants to constables to enter disorderly houses. We find some difficulty in understanding what the act intended should be done with the persons not the keepers of the houses who may be seized 'in order that they may be dealt with according to law.' Provision is made for punishing the keepers of disorderly houses, but nothing is said as to what is to be done with the persons found in them.

"F. THESIGER.

"CHARLES CROMPTON"

Under the recommendations contained in this report an important alteration has been determined upon as to the forms of the licenses to be granted at the approaching Michaelmas session, not only to new applicants, but to applicants for renewals. The Court will not in future insert in the licenses to be granted under the act 25th George II. chap. 36, the words—"Or other public entertainment of the like kind," but will in all cases specify the particular entertainment which may be given. A notice to this effect will be forwarded to all persons at present licensed, and advertised for the information of those who intend to apply for licenses at the Michaelmas session. At the next meeting of Middlesex magistrates a proposition will be made to alter the standing orders in accordance with these new regulations, and that in future, applicants give fourteen days' notice, instead of seven as heretofore, to the clerk of the peace, and to the clerks of petty sessions, of their intention to apply.

Poetry.

SONG.

Why so tearful?
Pray be cheerful,
Charitable, good, and kind:
Grief disowning,
Cease that moaning,
Leaving sorrow all behind.

Melancholy
Is but folly,
Gentle Fortune will not smile,
If to grieving,
Pleasure leaving,
Thou wilt give thyself awhile.

Never languish
Filled with anguish
For anticipated woes;
Pleasure's fire
Will expire
Soon as fear her features shows.

Wilt thou flourish?
Ever nourish
Honor, truth, and temperance,
Wilt thou perish?
Only cherish
Sin's intoxicating trance.

HERMANN LANG.

LINES FOR MUSIC (COPYRIGHT).

Dear girl, what on earth have I now to desire?
I love and am cherished by thee in return;
And the feelings thy charms in my bosom inspire,
Are equalled by those which in thy bosom burn.
But still I'm unhappy—my bliss may soon pale,
It may not endure; it is this that I dread,
For the rose that with fragrance to-day scents the gale
May lie, ere to-morrow, all scattered and dead.
There is but one thought that could ever console,
Could aid me so great a misfortune to bear:
It is that when Gladness has fled from my soul,
I still should remember that once she dwelt there.
Ah! this recollection would mantle with green
The ruins of Hope; it would never decay,
Like the moss which on some shattered column is seen
Growing only more strong as this crumbles away.

Any application for these verses to the Editor, M. W.

Miscellaneous.

THE ANTIQUITY OF VOCAL MUSIC. AND WOMEN BEING ALLOWED TO TAKE PART IN THE PERFORMANCE OF RELIGIOUS RITES. — After Noah left the ark we find he built an altar and returned thanks to God, after the manner of the children of Seth, and in the 31st chap. Genesis, 27th verse, where we find that Laban having overtaken the fugitive Jacob on the mountains of Gilead, says to him, "Wherefore didst thou flee away secretly, and steal away from me, and didst not tell me, that I might have sent thee away with mirth and with songs, with tabret and with harp." This proves that the discoveries of Jubal were preserved by the descendants of Noah, and also that instruments of wind, strings, and percussion were then in use.

After the miraculous escape of Moses through the Red Sea, the Hebrews break out in a song of praise and thanksgiving to the Lord—which song was accompanied by Miriam the sister of Aaron, together with all the women, and Miriam, the prophetess, the sister of Aaron, took a timbrel in her hand, and all the women went out with her, with timbrels and with dances, and Miriam answered them, saying, "Sing ye to the Lord, &c." and is an early instance of women being permitted to bear a part in the performance of religious rites, as well as of vocal music being accompanied by instrumental, and by dancing.

The instruments with which these songs were accompanied are decided by all the ancient authorities, to have been the ancient cymbal, made exactly like our modern tambourine, but the name timbrel was applied to all kinds of instruments of percussion. Now as Miriam was an Egyptian, and just escaped from the country where she had been educated, it is natural to suppose that the dance used now, and established afterwards by the Hebrews, in the celebration of religious rites, was but the continuation of an Egyptian custom.

St. Stephen tells us, in the 7th chap. Acts, 21, 22 ver., that Moses, having been educated by Pharaoh's daughter, "as her own son, was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians." And Clemens Alexandrinus particularises his acquirements, by affirming that he was instructed in his maturer age by the Egyptians in all liberal sciences, as arithmetic, geometry, rhythm, harmony, but above all medicine and music.—From J. H. Tomlinson's Lectures on Ancient Music.

SAINT MARTIN'S HALL.—An evening concert was given here on Monday, the proceeds of which, had there been any, were to have been presented to the Society of British Musicians. The concert was given by Herr Hennen, the pianist; but what connection the Herr has to the Society, or under what obligations he laboured which induced him to transfer the profits resulting from his benefit to the Society, we do not know. Unfortunately, Herr Hennen's most praiseworthy and munificent intention was completely knocked on the head by the fact that there was no profit at all; in short, Herr Hennen's profit was a loss, there not being more than from eighty to one hundred persons present. Now, to our thinking, and to make use of a homely expression, the public, in searching for a pleasing entertainment, might have gone farther and fared worse. The concert was in reality a very good one, and comprised some names of high ability. Among the singers were Mrs. Alexander Newton, Miss Poole, Mr. Bridge Frodsham, and Herr Formes; while the instruments included the names of Herr Hennen (pianist), Herr F. Hennen (violin), Richardson (flute), and Piatti (violoncello). There was also an excellent orchestra, with recruits from Her Majesty's Theatre and the Royal Italian Opera. Mr. Tolbecque was the conductor, and—in consequence of the numerous extra nights which were given at Her Majesty's Theatre during the season, whereby his conducting powers were called into unusual play during the non-Balfé nights—was in great force, and conducted like a conductor of weight and substance. Where were the public, we ask, and why did they not turn Long Acre-wards, and partake of the excellent fare set down before them? Perhaps Herr Hennen did not advertise widely; the widest way to advertise, by the bye, would be to have your posters on the enormous vans which cheat the stamp office daily in the thoroughfares. But touching the entainment. The concert commenced with the overture to Masaniello, played with unction and animation, not to say fire and brilliancy, which have already been frequently said, by the band. Mrs. Alexander Newton gave the "Casta Diva" with real brilliancy and undoubted fire. The execution of the passages in the cabaletta was admirable. The eighty or one hundred persons were all delighted with Mrs. Alexander Newton's charming voice and dashing style. Herr Hennen played Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor for the pianoforte, and proved himself a player of ready finger and flexible knuckles. The Concerto, however, appeared to us to be a trifle removed from the powers of the Herr. Nevertheless, the Herr found his admirers, who stoutly battled in his cause, and proclaimed him a "something." Formes was encored in the grand air from the Zauberflöte. Formes has a tremendous voice, and is a tremendous singer, and always produces a tremendous effect. Herr F. Hennen came out in Vieux temps andantino and rondo from his E concerto. It was a trial for Herr F., an ordeal—but he played well, nay, very well, and came off with flying colours, and was encored in the rondo by the eighty or a hundred. After the popular duo, "Da quel di," from the Lucia di Lammermoor, or, Linda di Chamouni—without affectation, we forget to which opera the duet belongs—which sopranos and tenors have torn to shreds and patches, very nicely sung by Mrs. Alexander Newton and Mr. Bridge Frodsham, Piatti enchanted the eighty or a hundred with one of his most admirable performances; after which Mrs. Alexander Newton gave the "Lo! here the gentle lark," of Shakspeare and Bishop, in brilliant style, and was encored; Mr. Richardson played a flute obligato; Herr Formes sang Schubert's "Der Wanderer," tremendously of course; and the first part terminated with Mendelssohn's Wedding March, from A Midsummer Night's Dream, played in a style of admirable inefficiency by the band. There was an interval of ten minutes between the first and second part. In the course of about half an hour the second part opened with Herold's overture to Zampa, and then Herr Hennen performed Hennen's (self's) 8me. Etude de Concert on the grand pianoforte. Herr Hennen's pianoforte compositions are not to be despised, if we are to judge from the above specimen. Miss Poole was vastly admired in Alexander Lee's ballad, "The Spirit of good," and her vast admirers encored her simultaneously. Contrary to the usual way Miss Poole did not substitute another song—a practice, we think, highly deprecatory, being not at all complimentary to the wishes of the audience. Now-a-days if the auditors wish to hear a song repeated they must not encore it. The other day we were present at a concert—a semi-private one—where a gentlemanly barytone treated his hearers to Rossini's buffa song, "Largo al factotum." He was encored boisterously, whereupon he came forward and, much to the surprise of the audience, commenced "Sally in our Alley." Well, we suppose singers only obey the fashion in singing what they are not requested to sing. Mr. Richardson was also encored in a solo with variations on the flute; and Mr. Bridge Frodsham followed with Mr. Clement White's charming and expressive ballad, "Ah! why did'st thou tell me of love?" which he sang with great taste and simplicity. Another fantasia on the violin for Herr F. Hennen; another song for Formes—the drinking song from Der Freischütz—given tremendously, of course; another solo for Piatti, on the violoncello, inimitably played; another ballad for Miss Poole—"The young Lady's No;" and the concert was brought to an end with a grand pianoforte "Scherzo Finale," with full orchestra, composed by Herr Hennen, which played ourselves and every body else out in a most satisfactory manner. The eighty or a hundred retired, all agreeing that the concert was an entertaining one, and that it was very thinly attended.

DEPARTURE OF MISS CATHERINE HAYES FOR AMERICA.—The departure of Miss Catherine Hayes for New York, in the Pacific steamer, Captain Nye, this afternoon (Wednesday, the 3rd), has caused very general excitement. Many persons came expressly from Ireland and from London to witness her embarkation. On Monday night, at the Theatre Royal, was the farewell concert. The house was crowded to overflow, and the orchestra was turned into stalls, the band being placed on the stage. The sensation produced by Miss Hayes's singing was prodigious, and certainly never have I heard her sing as she has done here and at Manchester. It was on the second time of giving the "Ah! non giunge" that the house was so electrified. She seemed inspired and resolved to leave a lasting impression behind her, for she revelled in almost unparalleled difficulties, concluding with a prolonged shake of surpassing beauty and brilliancy. Her "Why do I weep for thee," by Wallace, "Kathleen Mavourneen," and the "Harp that once in Tara's hall," on the encore, and the "Ah! mon fils," provoked similar displays of rapture. The ovation, when she was called upon the stage, was, I am assured by those who witnessed the Lind furor here, quite equal in vehemence and duration; the cheering, waving of hats and handkerchiefs lasted several minutes, and one lady threw a costly cadeau on the stage. Yesterday evening a farewell banquet was given to Miss Catherine Hayes at the Adelphi Hotel, and at noon, this day, the floating-pier was crowded with spectators to witness her departure in the tug steamer to join the Pacific, off the Rock Ferry. A large number of persons went in the tug and loudly cheered her when on board. Captain Nye escorted Miss Hayes to the paddle-box, from which her handkerchief was long seen waving a final adieu, as the ocean palace glided down the Mersey and rounded the Rock Lighthouse. There are upwards of 200 passengers on board, including several persons of distinction in the United States. Miss Laura Addison has gone out by this steamer; Mrs. Warner, Madame Thillon, and Mr. Hudson left by a previous boat. The weather was magnificent.—iverpool Paper.

DOCTOR BACHEZ, the philosopher and operative agent, is in town on very important business.

ALBONI made her rentrée as Fides in the Prophète on Wednesday, at the Grand Opera, Paris.

HIRING PIANOFORTES.—MARLBOROUGH STREET.—Elizabeth Sammon, No. 6, Foley-place, was brought up the week before last for examination, charged with having been concerned in fraudulently obtaining two pianofortes from Messrs. Rust and Stahl, No. 320, Regent-street. It appeared that a person of gentlemanly appearance called, in July, at Messrs. Rust and Stahl's shop and hired a pianoforte for a lodger, at so much per month. The pianoforte was sent to No. 6, Foley-place, where the person lived who made the bargain, and who gave the name of Sammon. In a day or two afterwards the same person called again, and said he wanted to hire another pianoforte for another lodger. A second pianoforte was sent, the value of each being 30 guineas. From information which Mr. Rust subsequently obtained, he went in person to No. 6, Foley-place, and saw the prisoner, from whom he demanded the return of the pianofortes. The prisoner said they were locked up in one of the rooms, and dared him to take them away in Mr. Sammon's absence. Mr. Rust applied to the police, and succeeded in gaining information that the pianofortes were in the hands of a pawnbroker named Clarke, in Long-acre. The prisoner was taken into custody, the person who came to the shop on both occasions and hired the pianos not being to be met with.—Robert Tilling, carman, proved the delivery of two pianos from Messrs. Rust and Stahl, at No. 6, Foley-place. On the first occasion witness saw Mr. Sammon, as well as the female prisoner. On the second occasion the female prisoner only was present.—William Barnes, painter, had been employed to do work at No. 6, Foley-place. The person who employed and paid him went by the name of Bowsley. The prisoner then represented herself as the housekeeper of Bowsley.—Edward Perryman, assistant to Mr. Barnes, helped to remove one of the pianofortes from No. 6, Foley-place. The piano was taken away in a coal van, but witness did not know where.—Mr. Clarke, pawnbroker, 55, Long-acre, had known the prisoner for about 12 months, and had taken articles in pawn from her. There might have been a piano among them.—The case was remanded at this stage of the proceedings for a week for the production of the pianos. On Tuesday Mr. Clarke was in attendance with his books, but not with the pianos.—Mr. Bingham inquired why the pianos were not produced?—Mr. Clarke understood his books only were to be brought into court.—Mr. Bingham said the pianofortes must be produced, and remanded the case again for that purpose.—Times.

LEOPOLD DE MEYER, the great Lion Pianist, is expected in London for a short visit.

JETTY TARRZ intends to pass the autumn in Paris.

"THE LAST NIGHTS OF JULLIEN" (from Punch).—Horror-struck were we all last week to see the walls of London placarded with the above terrible announcement. We could not imagine what fearful crime Jullien had committed, that his nights should be numbered like those of a common criminal. Knowing that he was a leader of the greatest execution, our first impulse was to send off to Newgate to make inquiries what sort of nights the ill-fated Maestro had lately passed. We were most anxious to know whether, in the phraseology of the penny-a-liner, "his appetite had remained good to the last," and whether, "as the termination of his career approached," his usual firmness had in the least deserted him? These inquiries, however, were never made at Newgate, or Horsemonger Lane Gaol, or anywhere else; for, in the meantime, our forebodings had been quieted by the agreeable discovery that the "Last Nights" which had so much alarmed us had reference merely to an engagement at the Surrey Zoological Gardens, where Jullien has lately been flourishing his baton. His ambrosial curls and monstachios and spotless white waistcoat have not been sacrificed, we rejoice to say, to the severe requirements of any prison regulations. Our Jullien, thank heaven! is still preserved to us; but really managers should be careful not to shatter our nerves by such startling announcements.

SIR WILLIAM DON.—When the last accounts left America, Sir William Don, the theatrical baronet, was at Montreal. A New York paper states that his success in America had been so great that he had been enabled to send home two thousand pounds to pay some debts.

FIDES IN THE PROPHECY.—The part of Fides is the most plastic of parts and yields to all capacities and styles. Grisi, who already knows the music by heart, will make her rentree in it at St. Petersburg.

FORMES.—The German basso has not yet concluded terms with St. Petersburg.

MR. FRASER, the well-known English tenor, has undertaken the management of the Marylebone Theatre. Opera will be the staple attraction. The theatre will re-open on Monday.

DRURY LANE THEATRE.—Nothing positive has yet been arranged about Mr. Bunn's winter campaign. There seems to be a difficulty about the company.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.—Mr. Webster, we are informed, intends shortly to close this theatre, and to re-open it at the end of next month, with Macfarren's Charles II. and an improved band and chorus. The reinforcement in these departments is essential to future success.

GLOUCESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—Through the great zeal and activity of Mr. Brown, honorary secretary, all the stewards are already secured for the Gloucester meeting of 1853.

HARROGATE.—(CHELTENHAM PUMP ROOMS).—Our talented and popular pianist, Julian Adams, gave his Annual Concert, last evening (Tuesday), when a crowded and fashionable audience testified their appreciation of his abilities by their presence. Mr. Adams was assisted by Miss M. B. Marsh, Madame Bouran, and Mr. Lawler (of London concerts), who gave Atwoods terzetto, "The Curfew Bell," effectively. Mr. Lawler sang "Largo al Factotum," and "The Wolf," &c., with his usual talent. Miss M. B. Marsh gave the Cavatina, "Qui la voce," in such a manner as to command the warm applause of the audience. Mme. Bouran took part with Mr. Lawler in Barnett's "Singing Lesson." Mr. Adams' execution on the piano and concertina are too well known to require comment. On this occasion he gave selections from Thalberg, Adams, &c. The band, judiciously selected, performed the overtures to Semiramide, Le Cheval de Bronze, &c. The concert appeared to give general satisfaction—a result well due to the talented artists by whom Mr. Adams was assisted.

PENSION TO CHRISTOPHER NORTH.—Lord John Russell, while in attendance on the Queen at Holyrood, intimated by letter to Professor Wilson, Her Majesty's intention to bestow a pension of £300 a-year upon him, in consideration of his eminent literary services.

MADAME VIARDOT has left London for Paris. The great artist has thrown up her engagement, for the present, with the Grand Opera, finding repose necessary. She will be succeeded by the new German star, Mdle. Wagner, for whom Meyerbeer has destined the chief part in his Africaine.

LABLACHE.—The great basso reached his residence, near Naples, directly after the earthquake. Although on the verge of the damage produced by the earthquake, his house and property were untouched. The shocks were distinctly felt, but no loss was sustained. Lablache is now in excellent health and spirits, sunning and breezing himself on the banks of the finest bay in the world, taking in instalments of renovation for his winter campaign at Paris.

MADAME GIULIANI has left London for Brussels.

TAMBERLIK.—The great and unapproachable tenore di forza left London on Wednesday evening for Paris, en route for St. Petersburg. He goes by sea, via Stettin.

CARLOTTA GRISI has returned to London from a pleasure trip in the highlands of Scotland. The Queen of the Dance will start for St. Petersburg, via Stettin. The Emperor of the Russias is robbing us of all our treasures! Envious purloiner! Never mind—we shall have them back again next year.

MDLE. BERTRANDI, the new comprimaria of the Royal Italian Opera, left London last night for Milan.

AMALIA FERRARIS, of the "feet of brass," left last week for Naples, where the accomplished danseuse has an engagement to fulfil.

VIVIER, the humourist, and cornist, and artist, and soap-bubble-ist, and chargeist, par excellence, is at Canteres, in the Pyrenees, washing away his sorrows and fatigues.

RONCONI and TAMBURINI have both fled—fled—fled—"like the arrow in the noon"—where, oh where! We do not know.

BRASS INSTRUMENTS IN THE GREAT EXHIBITION.—In the English department (Class 10), the display of brass wind instruments is not very extensive; but in one or two instances it makes up in quality what it lacks in quantity. M. Kohler (540), well known in England and India as being one of our largest and first manufacturers of these instruments, contributes specimens of his patent valved wind instruments. They are distinguished by the highest character of workmanship, correctness of model, and elegance of form. The patent valves are an improvement on the old sort of valves, as, by diminishing the number of acute angles, less obstruction is offered to the passage of the wind, consequently producing a richer, clearer, and more even tone, and giving greater certainty and regularity to the notes, as well as offering considerable facilities for execution, by lessening the difficulty and exertion in producing them. M. Kohler has also introduced a spiral spring, in place of the watch spring, which was so very liable to break and get out of order.—Illustrated London News.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A. D.—The quartet does not properly belong to the Opera. It was introduced from the Torvaldo e Dorlisha, an early opera of the composer.

THOS.—Donzelli made his first appearance in London, in Roderico Dhu in La Donna del Lago; and Tamburini, some few years after, in the Cenerentola as Dandini. We do not remember in what character Lablache made his first appearance on the London stage, but fancy it was Figaro in the Barbiere, a favourite part of his for many years. Pasta's first part was Deademona; Pisaroni's, Malcolm Græme; Sontag's Rosina; Grisi's Ninetta; and Alboni's Arsace. All the above, our correspondent will perceive, chose Rossini's operas for their debut. Jenny Lind not only did not choose one of Rossini's, but never appeared in any one of his in this country. Here, at all events, she was decidedly original.

VIATOR.—It was Coletti, not Fornasari—in the year 1840.

L. S.—Correspondent must consult Vol. 27. of Musical World.

VERAX.—Sontag, certainly. The question, however, is a delicate one.

J. M. S.—Jullien will resume his concerts as usual at Drury Lane in November. We have heard nothing about the "Grand National Concerts" at Her Majesty's Theatre during the winter months, and presume they received their quietus last season.

INQUIRER.—Bourcicault is the author of London Assurance, although, we believe, he was assisted in its concoction by Mr. Brougham, the Irish comedian, now in America.

Advertisements.

Price 2s.

"I LOVE THE SPRING."

A NEW Ballad, composed by Mrs. MEREST (late Miss Maria B. Hawes), is just published at 7, Adelphi Terrace, Strand; where may be had all the popular ballads by the same composer, and all the music formerly published at 355, Strand. The above may also be had of Messrs. Cramer, Beale, and Co., Regent-street; Addison and Co., Regent-street; Prowse and Co., Cheapside, and of all Music-sellers.

COLLECTION OF

ANCIENT CLASSICAL CHEF D'ŒUVRES IN SCORE,

OR,

BIBLIOTHEQUE CLASSIQUE, ou, COLLECTION
D'ANCIENS CHEF D'ŒUVRES EN PARTITION.

FIRST BOOK CONTAINS:—

CONCERTO per Cembalo con Violino et Flauto obligati e con ripieno, di Violini, Viola, Violoncello e Contrabasso; composta da GIOVANNI SEBASTIANO BACH.
In Score, price 6s.

SECOND BOOK CONTAINS:—

- Missa Papae Marcelli, triplici concentu distincta, videlicet:
I. Joannis Petri Aloysii Praenestini.
(Giovanni Pierluigi da Palestrina.)
Genuina
Sex Vocum.
II. Missa eadem ad Quatuor Voces reducta.
Autore
JOHANNES FRANCISCO AVERIO.
III. Eademque Missa duplici Choro
Octo Vocibus conclusa.
Autore
FRANCISCO SURIANO.

In Score, price 10s.,
Vocal Parts, price 10s.

To be continued.

SCOTT AND CO., 89, ST. JAMES'S-STREET.

NEW VOCAL TRIOS, QUARTETS, ETC.,

PUBLISHED BY WESSEL & Co.

TRIOS FOR THREE SOPRANOS.

Curckmann.	"This Salem from thy Lover,"	3s. 0d.
Lachner.	"Spring,"	2s. 6d.
	"Invitation,"	3s. 0d.
	"Song of Praise,"	2s. 6d.

QUARTETS.

Baleman.	"The Angel of the Flowers,"	2s. 0d.
English Glee.	"Sally in our Alley,"	2s. 6d.
	Three Anthems by Charles J. Yates,	3s. 6d. to 4s. 0d.

All the Songs, Duets, Trios, Quartets, Quintets, and Choruses, &c., in Fidelio, are published by Wessel & Co., 229, Regent-street.

IMPROVED BRASS MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

PATRONISED BY HER MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY THE QUEEN
AND THE BRITISH AND INDIAN ARMY.

J. KOHLER, 35, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN,
begs to direct the attention of Regimental Bands to his New Patent Lever Instruments with the latest improvements, which surpass all others for simplicity of arrangement and purity of tone. Combinations in harmony never before attempted by any Brass Instruments, may now be executed with perfect ease. Private and Regimental Bands supplied with all kinds of Musical Instruments direct from the Manufactory; and as all these Instruments are made under J. KOHLER's own superintendence, they are warranted to withstand the climate of all countries. Efficient Band Masters supplied.

NEW DUETS FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

THALBERG	Beatrice di Tenda.
ROSELLEN	Deux Melodies de Donizetti, 1 and 2.
ROSELLEN	Val D'andore.
WOLFF	Valse Original.
WOLFF	Beatrice di Tenda.
SILAS	La Primavera, Bagatelle.
KALLIWODA	Invitation à la Danse.
OSBORNE	Pluie de Perles.
SCHULTZ	Duo L'espagnola.
SEYER	Krieger's Last March.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent-street.

GREAT DISCOVERY IN HARMONY.

Now ready, price 3s.

THE PRINCIPLES OF NATURAL HARMONY, being a Perfect System founded upon the discovery of the True Semitonic Scale, by J. J. Halle. London, Published by the Author, 76, Leadenhall-street. To be had of Messrs. Ewer and Co., Newgate-street, and Messrs. Cooks and Co., New Burlington-street.

THE ORGANIST'S COMPANION,

BY JOHN GOSS, Organist of St. Paul's Cathedral. A series of voluntaries, for the commencement, middle, and conclusion of divine service; also, a collection of interludes or short symphonies, to be played between the verses of the psalms or hymns, in numbers 2s. 6d. each, or 4 vols., 12 each.

PAROCHIAL PSALMODY.

A COLLECTION of Ancient and Modern tunes; also a variety of favourite responses to the Commandments, with directions for chanting, with an accompaniment for the Organ or Pianoforte, by John Goss, price 6s.

SACRED MELODIES.

SELECTED from eminent composers, and arranged for one or two voices, with an accompaniment for Organ or Pianoforte, by J. Goss, Organist of St. Paul's Cathedral. Price 6s.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent-street, and 67, Conduit-street.

THE POPULAR SONG OF THE DAY.

"TALK OF HIM THAT'S FAR AWAY," composed by THOMAS CHARTREY. A new edition of which is just issued, may be had at ADDISON & HOLLIER'S, 210, Regent-street, London. For simplicity, elegance, and originality of melody, it is unrivalled.

Also, by the same author, "Why wilt thou not love!" and "The dream is past."

JOULE'S DIRECTORIUM CHORI ANGLICANUM.

Second Edition, price 1s., in cloth 1s. 6d.

THE most complete Choral Service book that has yet appeared." Dedicated by permission to the Lord Bishop of Manchester. For highly favourable reviews see "Christian Remembrancer," "Theologian," "Parish Choir," &c. &c. London: J. A. Novello.
A few copies of the quarto edition, price 15s., still on hand.

HEALTH WHERE 'TIS SOUGHT!

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—Cure of a disordered Liver and Stomach, when in a most hopeless state.—Extract of a letter from Mr. Matthew Harvey, of Chapel Hall, Airdrie, Scotland, dated the 16th of January, 1850.—To Professor HOLLOWAY, Sir,—Your valuable Pills have been the means, with God's blessing, of restoring me to perfect health, at a time when I thought I was on the brink of the grave. I had consulted several eminent Doctors, who, after doing what they could for me, considered my case hopeless. I had been suffering from a Liver and Stomach complaint of long standing, which during the last two years got so much worse, that every one considered my condition as hopeless. I, as a last resource, got a Box of your Pills, which soon gave relief, and by persevering in their use for some weeks, together with rubbing night and morning your Ointment over my chest and stomach, and right side, I have by their means alone got completely cured, and to the astonishment of myself and everybody who knows me.

(Signed)

MATTHEW HARVEY.

These celebrated Pills are wonderfully efficacious in the following complaints:—
Ague Consumption of Fever of all Liver complaints Tumours
Asthma the Bowels kinds Lumbago Ulcers
Bilious Com- Consumption Fits Gout Rheumatism kinds plaints Debility Head-ache Scrofula or King's Weakness, from Blotches on the Dysentery Indigestion what ever cause Skin Bowel complaints Erysipelas Inflammation Sore Throats &c., &c.
Colic Jaundice Tic-Douloureux

Printed and Published, for the Proprietors, by MICHAEL SAMUEL MYERS, of No. 3, Stridley Villas, Studley Road, Clapham Road, in the parish of Lambeth, at the office of MYERS and Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, in the parish of St. Paul, where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed, post paid, To be had of G. Furkess, Dean Street, 84; Allen, Warwick Lane; Vickens, Holywell Street, and at all Booksellers.—Saturday, September 13, 1851.

The Musical World.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s.; Half year, 8s.; Three Months, 4s.; (Stamped Copies 1s. per Quarter extra,) payable in advance, to be forwarded by Money Order, to the Publishers, Myers & Co., 22, Tavistock-st., Covent Garden.

No. 38.—VOL. XXIX.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 20, 1851.

Price Fourpence.
Stamped Fivepence.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

RESUME OF THE SEASON.

(Continued from our last.)

Tuesday, May 20th, was the most memorable night of this memorable season. It was doubly memorable—memorable for the production of Fidelio on the Italian stage, and memorable for the first appearance of Sophie Cruvelli, after an absence from London of two years. The triumph achieved by Beethoven's dramatic masterpiece, and the brilliant success of the young singer, as Leonora, the most arduous and difficult part in the lyric repertoire, have been recorded so often, and at such length in these pages, that a simple reference to them is enough. In bringing out Fidelio, Mr. Lumley not merely elevated the taste of his subscribers and the public, but added another Don Giovanni, another solid and continuous attraction, to his catalogue of operas, which the frequency of its performance, and the money it brought to the treasury, effectively proved. On the other hand Sophie Cruvelli, by her conception and execution, musical and histrionic, of the character of Leonora, although only twenty-two years of age, placed herself at one step in the foremost rank of living dramatic singers. We have seen all the Fidelios, from Schröder Devrient and Malibran down to those of the present day, including the justly celebrated Mdlle. Wagner (who is now playing it at Berlin), and we assert, without the slightest hesitation, that not one of them has approached so near to the lofty ideal of Beethoven as Sophie Cruvelli. With such a conviction we are justified in reserving criticism for hereafter, in prophesying for this already great, though very youthful artist, a more splendid and glorious career than has been achieved by any other whomsoever, since Malibran, by the power of genius, established her superiority over all her rivals. Sophie Cruvelli is no less incontestably a genius than Malibran; and no less richly endowed with the natural qualifications of voice, strength, endurance, and personal attributes, to make her ultimately the equal of that most gifted and lamented lady, who, cut off in the prime of her womanhood, threw a shadow over the prospects of the operatic drama, which can only be dispersed by a star of equal brightness. Four months have elapsed since Sophie Cruvelli appeared in Fidelio. We have watched her career with unceasing interest. We have seen her successively, and more than once, as Norma, Florinda, Cherubino, Elvira (Ernani), Linda, and Rosina; and every occasion has served to strengthen our conviction that Sophie Cruvelli is now the most promising, and will eventually be the first dramatic singer of her day. We have more than once expressed this opinion in the course of the present season; and now, at the end of it, we reiterate it with increased assurance of its justice.

The general performance of Fidelio at Her Majesty's Theatre, although there was a great deal to praise, left much to be desired. Mr. Sims Reeves was admirable in every respect as Florestan, his performance being distinguished by the highest intelligence, and the finest musical appreciation. Mme. Giuliani, in Marcellina, was, as she always is, correct, artistic, and pains-taking; and Mercuriali rose a step in the good graces of the connoisseurs by his impersonation of Jacquino. Coletti was out of his element in Pizarro; and the Rocco of Balanchi, although a careful artist, was by no means what it might have been. Casanova, too, who undertook the part of the Minister, forgot to learn the music, and Balfe for the first representations was compelled to sing it for him. The necessities of the Italian stage compelled the introduction of recitatives into Fidelio. We quite agree with our collaborateur, Mr. Macfarren, in his condemnation of this liberty being taken with Beethoven's score; but, we, nevertheless, are bound to acknowledge the talent and discretion with which Mr. Balfe performed a task that could not have been welcome to him as a musician. The orchestra worked zealously in the two overtures and accompaniments; but the chorus, coarse and imperfect in both the finales, entirely spoiled the impressive scene where the prisoners, at Leonora's intercession, are allowed to breathe the air of heaven. On the first two or three nights some of the principals assisted in the prisoners' chorus; but as they evidently (F. Lablache excepted) knew nothing about the music, Mr. Ganz, the chorus-master, subsequently dispensed with their assistance, and the general execution of the choral parts, if much was not gained, left nothing to be deplored. In spite of these, and many other drawbacks, the success of Fidelio and of Sophie Cruvelli was immense; the audience, the most crowded of the season, was enthusiastic, and the papers, the next morning, teemed with apostrophes to the beauties of Beethoven's music, and the gifts and talent of its young interpreter—in whom, to use the words of the Daily News, were concentrated "every quality of a great artist—voice, taste, style, expression combined—to charm and move her hearers"—a truer sentence than which was never uttered, not even by the Post, when it pronounced Cruvelli's singing of the adagio, in the grand air, "a joy for ever to all who were fortunate enough to hear it," and the allegro of the same "a magnificent performance from first to last," adding that the audience by this time felt that "one of the brightest ornaments of the modern stage was before them;" nor by the Herald, when it declared that her "success in one of the most arduous parts which either actress or singer dare grapple with was affirmed by the universal verdict of the house;" nor by the Chronicle, when it felicitated the management on having achieved, with Mdlle. Cruvelli, the new debutante, "at once the most legitimate and extraordinary success;" nor by the Times, when, at the end of a long and elaborate notice, it declared that "the Italian stage had thus gained another great dramatic singer, in the person of a foreigner, and if we be not mistaken, a genius;" nor by the Athenæum, when it eulogised Cruvelli's, "magnificent natural endowments;" nor by the Illustrated News and the Britannia, when they extolled her "magnificent voice," &c., a truer sentence, we repeat, was never uttered, nor one more correctly to the purpose, nor one, by the way, more impossible to reverse—since the course of time has already stamped it, and continues to stamp it, and will continue to stamp it more and more indelibly—for Sophie Cruvelli is a genius; and the march of genius is ever onward, onward, heedless of toil, despising obstacles, sure of its object, the goal being ever in sight.

The following Thursday, which was as long as it was extra, was remarkable for fragments. There were fragments of everything, except the Barbiere, the whole of which was given to a delighted auditory. The novel point in the cast, and not the most delightful, was Signor Ferranti, the new barytone, who showed himself wanting in most of the requisites which constitute an unctuous and vivacious Figaro. His Figaro was neither unctuous nor vivacious. Of Casanova in Basilio, we would say—"why not Coletti?" Madame Sontag's Rosina we should have liked better had the accomplished artist been less lavish of ornaments and changes, or more studious to render them appropriate to the text of Rossini, which, to our superficial judgment, is sufficiently brilliant and sufficiently florid to command the respect of the most brilliant and florid of vocalists, who do not always, like Goldsmith, "adorn what they touch." We were induced to this reflection by the remembrance of Alboni, who managed to make "Una voce poco fa," and "Dunque io son," as effective as the composer could have wished without altering a note of either. Calzolari's Almaviva, as far as vocalisation goes, is one of the most correct and finished that the stage can boast; and Lablache's Bartolo, to quote our own words, "is prodigious." But why does the burly basso omit the great air—we forget in which key, but we remember in the first act? By the way, Madame Grimaldi played the part of Marcellina, and sang the aria.

At this juncture the Corypheic department of the ballet was materially strengthened by the engagement—at the suggestion of the irresistible Carlotta—of Mademoiselle James, an Englishwoman, although a Mademoiselle, who danced the Anglaise in the divertissement—of which, in our last number, we forgot the name, but which we are now in a condition to denominate Les Cosmopolites—with grace, agility, and character,

Meanwhile Fidelio, several times repeated, drew crowded houses, and the success of Mademoiselle Sophie Cruvelli went on augmenting, and received an additional impulse from the comparative failure of the Leonora at the rival house.

At this epoch the Soirees Extraordinaires began on a Wednesday (May 28th), and complaints were made in several musical quarters of the introduction of a strange instrument into the score of Fidelio. The excuse, however, was valid—since, neither the instrument itself nor an executant thereon, for which Beethoven wrote a particular part in a special scene, being extant in this country, Mr. Lumley found it impossible to find one; and the chef d'orchestre was compelled, à rebrousse poils, to substitute another in its place. The instrument intended by Beethoven was the contra-fagotto, or counter-bassoon, the same for which he wrote a part in the C minor symphony.

On Saturday, May the 31st, Cruvelli appeared in her second part—Norma. Her brilliant triumph in Fidelio had raised anticipation to the highest pitch. Anticipation, however, was not disappointed. It preserved its position and did not tumble. Cruvelli's Norma was found equal to her Fidelio, to say more than which would be to say too much. Her success was decided, and the Druid priestess remained throughout the season one of her acknowledged great parts. It is sufficient to mention that Pardini was Pollio, Giuliani Adalgisa, and that Lablache, on the first night, was Oroveso, and subsequently, at various intervals, as suited his health, convenience, and humour. Meanwhile the Soirees Extraordinaires, which began, modestly, once a week, threatened to become more busy and numerous; and Don Pasquale was revived on a Thursday, for Madame Sontag, whose Norma is one of her most charming impersonations; while Lablache, as the fat and amorous bachelor, was fat and amorous and Lablache. Ferranti appeared to more advantage in Doctor Malatesta than in any previous performance; and Calzolari was as excellent as ever in the lover, Enrico.

Wednesday, June 11th, although memorable for a superb performance of Norma by Sophie Cruvelli, which threw D. R. into ecstasies, and brought to his recollection Malibran, who was snatched away from us "with the sunshine in her eyes," was darkened by an event, which cast the subscribers into spiritual mourning, and snuffed out the ballet—the farewell representation of Carlotta Grisi, who, as if to make her loss the keener felt, danced her very best, which is as much as to say, better than any body else ever danced, or is ever likely to dance. Cruvelli's singing was the rising sun, to which Carlotta Grisi's dancing was the setting; the one as gorgeous as the other, only differing in quality, position, and intensity of colour. Light delighted itself in showing its glory in the two most opposite manners—morning and evening. Noon will come next year, when both return—Sophie and Carlotta—to charm the ears and eyes, and move the hearts of the habitués of Mr. Lumley's fairy palace in Pall Mall. Carlotta's departure, without having performed in a new ballet, gave rise to a multitude of reflections which we propose to revive and discuss in the tail of this résumé.

On Thursday, June the 12th, the last masterpiece of the greatest of French composers, the Enfant Prodigue of Auber, was produced under the Italian title of Il Prodigio, with a completeness and splendour, which in some respects rivalled, and in other respects surpassed, the performances at the Theatre de la Nation at Paris. We need not, at this juncture, enter into any review of the merits of this great work, destined, we are sure, to be one of the most lasting of its author, sufficient having been adduced, on various occasions, to make known our favourable opinion to the readers of the Musical World. Without, therefore, touching on Scribe's libretto, or Auber's music, it is enough to recal some incidents which rendered the first representation memorable, independent of both poet and musician. The cast included Madame Sontag, as Jefelete; Madame Ugalde (her first appearance in London) as Nefte; Carolina Rosati—the crow-haired, sun-eyed, Greek-nosed, swan-necked, lily-armed, bird-bodied, leopard-legged, and mouse-footed—as Lia (her first appearance this season); Gardoni, the graceful, as Azael; Coletti, the careful, as Bocchoris; Mercuriali, the manly, as Amenophis; Massol in, his original part of Reuben; and Scotti, Scapini, and Casanova as the satellites to this army of planets, moving round the sun of Auber's genius. Madame Ugalde was found worthy of her great Gallic reputation, but less precisely fitted for the stage of the Grand Opera than for that of the Opera Comique, of which she is, at present, the most brilliant ornament. All that had been said of Massol was confirmed by his impressive performance of Reuben, which, although somewhat shackled by a less familiar tongue, he managed to invest with the highest dramatic sentiment and passion. The part of Jefelete was better suited to Madame Sontag than had been anticipated by those familiar with the talent of the accomplished songstress, and were aware how almost exclusively it leaned to the florid and ornamental style. There is nothing florid or ornamental in the music which Auber has allotted to Jefelete; nevertheless, Mme. Sontag sang the airs with such exquisite purity and feeling as to disclose a new "side," as our cotemporary, the Times quaintly expresses it, in her talent, which henceforth we shall be happy to recognise as approaching the universal. Of the other characters those who would learn further particulars are referred to No. 24 of the Musical World, for the current year, wherein they will find everything discussed at full length; not forgetting Marshall, who dipped his brush in the sunbeams, and his head in the folios that treat of Egyptian antiquities, and the modern treatises of Nineveh marbles, with their actual entities, at the British Museum. To Carolina Rosati, the winged, and prism-smiled, the enchanting troupe of Coryphées, the "step of daggers," the ballet in general, and the dance music in particular, the memory fondly clings, as to a pleasant dream, faintly receding at the approach of morn, when the sun foretells his coming by prophetic rays, which, with busy banging, assail the eyelids, chasing night and sleep, that, like two scared crows "fly away afeard," (Brendallah). Whether it was to Auber's particular method of scoring for the orchestra, or that Balfe, inwardly impelled by a new and unknown impulse, was urged to extra eagerness, we know not; but it was generally felt and acknowledged that the band had not been heard to such advantage previously during the season. It was as a powerful cohort, anxious, united, and strong. As for Mr. Harris he was more than usually active and zealous, and the value of his talent was triumphantly demonstrated in the great scene of the temple and yet other gorgeous and splendid panoplies. Although the performance did not conclude till half-past one, the opera was completely successful, and remained one of the greatest favourites of the season.

On Saturday the 21st, Marie Taglioni made her rentrée in a fragment of the old and popular ballet, La Sylphide, originally made famous by her celebrated aunt, and was received with special favour. On the Thursday following a miscellaneous night, after the ninth performance of Fidelio, the scene from Gnecco's opera, La Prova d'un Opera Seria, was produced for Madame Ugalde and Lablache. Of this it is enough to say that Lablache was as humorous as ever, and that Madame Ugalde made a decided advance in public esteem.

The second grand concert took place on the Monday following. Signor Sivori repeated one of the unpublished compositions of Paganini (the "Witches' Dance"), and introduced another, Il Movimento perpetuo, playing as finely as on the previous occasion, and leaving the critics as indifferent as before to the beauties of the manuscripts in question. The rest of the concert was of the usual miscellaneous character, all the principal artists appearing, with the exception of the Mademoiselles Cruvelli, who were preparing for the forthcoming Florinda.

On Thursday, July the 3rd, one of the most important pledges of the prospectus was fulfilled, by the production of a new Grand Opera in three acts, from the pen of the celebrated pianist, Sigismond Thalberg. The performance of Florinda, and the general impression it created, must be fresh in the memory of our readers. It went to establish the fact, that it is one thing to write pianoforte fantasias, addressed to supple fingers and light tastes, and another thing to compose an Opera Seria, in which the essential elements of melody, dramatic truth, effective combinations, and masterly orchestral scoring, shall be involved. If this truth were ever doubted, it was here established by Mr. Thalberg, a gentleman deserving and possessed of the highest amount of respect in that particular department of art which he has adorned in a style of his own invention, for so many years, and in which he has had so many imitators, more or less successful or unsuccessful. Mr. Thalberg had every advantage to render success probable, but the result proved that success had been improbable. Sofie Cruvelli, in whom was concentrated the additional interest derived from Florinda being her first original part in London, did everything in the power of a human prima donna to make music effective which was not written for effect. Lablache, whose labour would be dishonoured by a comparison with any of the twelve of Hercules, exerted himself with such super-human zeal and good will, that the least Mr. Thalberg could do in return, had he a voice with the disposers of demigodships and astral honours, would be to secure him an apotheosis, and a corner in the constellation of the Great Bear. Sims Reeves, in a very uninteresting part, also did wonders. The other performers were Calzolari, Coletti, and Mademoiselle Marie Cruvelli, who, in the character of a Page, had little more to do than hold her tongue and look pretty, which she accomplished to perfection. Balfe took more pains with the opera than he probably would have done had it been his own composition. The orchestra and chorus were completely up to the mark, and the utmost expense and exertions were lavished on the ballet, costumes, and general mise en scene. Nevertheless, although the performance was received with the greatest indulgence, every point where applause could possibly be forced in being eagerly seized on, and encores demanded which unfavourably augmented the length of the opera, while to conclude, Her Majesty the Queen, who was present, commanded it for the following Saturday, on the occasion of the state visit. Florinda cannot be cited as a successful opera.

Wanting in those ad captandum qualities which appeal to the masses, it does not make up for their absence by any of those profound and more solid characteristics to which really great works owe their lasting reputation. It has been performed several times during the season; but we much doubt whether a future season will witness its revival. Mademoiselle Cruvelli was not lucky in having such a character as Florinda for her first original creation; and we entirely agree with a cotemporary, who in the course of an elaborate article declares that this young lady had "in all probability a more difficult and oppressive task to perform than was ever before imposed on a dramatic singer," and that "Mr. Thalberg was more fortunate in having such an artist as Mademoiselle Cruvelli to represent his heroine than Mademoiselle Cruvelli in having such a part as Florinda to create." "In short," to use the closing words of the Times notice—"Mademoiselle Cruvelli may be said to have been the good genius of Mr. Thalberg's opera, since without her it might have fared more ill even than its deserts."

We need say no more about Her Majesty's state visit, when Florinda was performed for the second time, than that it took place on Saturday, July 5th, under circumstances of the usual pomp and ceremony—that Her Majesty blazed in diamonds, and Prince Albert was dressed in Field Marshal's uniform, that in the national anthem, at the end of the opera, Mr. Sims Reeves and Mademoiselle Cruvelli sang the principal verses, and that the last was encored, which detained Her Majesty longer on her feet than was either loyal or polite on the part of her liege and loving subjects.

At this period "the celebrated Twenty Eight Spanish Dancers," headed by Dona Petra Camara, who previously had created so great a sensation at the Gymnase in Paris, were brought forward by Mr. Lumley, with the hope that they would make the same impression here. Their dances, however, although pleasing were found to be too much of one character, and not sufficiently striking and interesting to constitute the frais of an evening's performance. They were afterwards used for a few nights to vary the divertissements before and after the operas. The spirit, however, exhibited by Mr. Lumley, in such a variety of ways, throughout the season, cannot be sufficiently commended in adding these attractions to his already powerful and brilliant ballet troupe.

The next event of note was the appearance of the wonderful little violinist, Paul Jullien, on an extra Wednesday night, when his performance of a brilliant solo was heard with astonishment and applauded with fervour.

Signor Puzzi's usual annual benefit, on Thursday, July 10th, was remarkable for the revival of Mozart's Nozze di Figaro, with Sontag, Fiorentini, Sophie Cruvelli, Coletti, Ferranti, Mercuriali and Lablache in the principal parts. The only novelty in this, however, was the appearance of Sophie Cruvelli in the Page, whose singing of the "Voi che sapete" on this occasion, though greatly admired for its finish and expression, was broadly criticised for the liberties taken with the text of Mozart. The evening was further remarkable for the reproduction of the divertissement called Les Graces, in which Carolina Rosati, Amalia Ferraris and Marie Taglioni vied with each other in good looks and sparkling steps; and for the reappearance (for this night only) of Carlotta Grisi, in one of her most popular and fascinating pas.

(To be Concluded in our next.)

CRUVELLI.

Our enlightened confrere, E. Viel, redacteur of the Menistrel, in a letter from London, to that journal, on music in England, renders full justice to the talents and accomplishments of this popular singer.

"Sophie Cruvelli," says our cotemporary, "maintains the high reputation in London of which Paris had previously awarded her the patent, although Paris had neither time nor occasion to appreciate all the largeness, suppleness, and variety of her talents. As charming in the cornette of Linda, or in the short cloak of Cherubino, as she is dramatic under the disguise of Leonora, or in the tunic of Norma, Cruvelli is able to bear all the weight of the most extensive and complex repertoire; the graceful and the terrible, the soprano or contralto, all is within her reach, I may say, all equally easy to her. No words can describe the effect she produces in the overwhelming finale of the third act of Fidelio, when the vibrations of her incomparable organ, pierce through the clamour of an orchestra and chorus of the most formidable dimensions."

CLEMENTI.

MUZIO CLEMENTI, the celebrated pianist and composer, was born at Rome in 1752. His father, a goldsmith, was very fond of music, and delighted to find in young Muzio a remarkable taste for that art. He spared no pains to enable him to study successfully, and his first care was to place him under the direction of his relative, Buroni, who was chapel-master in one of the churches of Rome. At six years of age, Clementi commenced singing the gamut, and at seven, was placed with an organist named Cordicelli, who taught him to play upon the harpsichord, and instructed him in the principles of accompaniment. At nine years of age, Clementi presented himself to an association for a situation as organist, and obtained it, after having complied in a satisfactory manner with the conditions, which consisted in accompanying a figured bass, selected from the works of Corelli, and transposing it into different keys. He was then placed under the direction of Sartanelli, an excellent singing-master, and two years afterwards entered the school of Carpini, one of the best contrapuntists at Rome. Clementi pursued his studies until he was fourteen years old. At this time an Englishman, named Beckford, travelling in Italy, heard him, and was so astonished at his talent for the harpsichord, that he urged the father of the young artist to permit him to take him to England, promising to watch over his fortunes. The proposal of Mr. Beckford having been accepted, Clementi was conducted to the residence of that gentleman, in Dorsetshire. There, with the aid of a good library, and the family intercourse, he soon acquired a knowledge of the English language, and pursued many other studies, without neglecting the harpsichord, which he cultivated assiduously. The works of Handel, Bach, Scarlatti and Paradisi became the objects of his meditations, and perfected his taste at the same time with his fingering. At eighteen years of age, Clementi not only surpassed all his contemporaries in the art of playing on the piano, but had composed his second work, which became a model of the sonata for that instrument. This was not published until three years after it was written. All artists spoke of it with admiration, and among others, Charles Emanuel Bach, a competent judge. The fame which this acquired for Clementi obliged him to leave his retreat in Dorsetshire, and reside in London. He there immediately received an engagement to preside at the piano at the opera, which contributed to perfecting his taste by the frequent opportunities of hearing the best Italian singers. His style was elevated, his execution acquired more finish, and his work soon spread his fame through the continent. About the year 1780, he resolved to visit Paris, agreeably to the advice of Pacchiarotti. He was there listened to with enthusiasm, and the queen, before whom he had the honour of playing, afforded him strong testimony of her satisfaction. Struck with the contrast between the impetuous admiration of the French and the cold approbation of the English, Clementi frequently said, that from that time he did not think himself to be the same man. During his stay at Paris, he composed his 5th and 6th "operas," and published a new edition of his 1st, to which he added a fugue.

At the beginning of the year 1781, he departed for Vienna by the way of Strasburg, where he was presented to the Prince of Deux-Ponts (late King of Bavaria), who treated him with the highest distinction. He stopped also at Munich, where he was equally well received by the Elector. Having arrived at Vienna, he became intimate with Haydn, Mozart, and all the distinguished musicians of that capital.

The Emperor, Joseph II., who was very fond of music, frequently took pleasure in listening to him for several hours, and sometimes passed whole evenings with Mozart and Clementi, who succeeded each other at the piano. Clementi wrote at Vienna his op. 4 (three sonatas), published by Artaria, op. 8 published at Lyons, and six sonatas (op. 9 and 10), published by Artaria. On his return to England, he published his famous Toccata with a sonata (op. 11), which had been published at France, without his knowledge, from a copy filled with errors. In the autumn of 1783, John Baptist Cramer, then fifteen years old, became a pupil of Clementi, after having received lessons from Schoröeter and F. Abel. In the following year Clementi took another journey to France, whence he returned at the beginning of the year 1785. From that time to 1802 he did not leave England, and devoted himself to teaching. Although he had fixed the price of his lessons at a guinea, his pupils were so numerous that it was difficult for him to find any time for composing. It was at this period that he wrote all his works from op. 15 to op. 40, and his Introduction to the art of playing the piano. About the year 1800, the bankruptcy of the house of Longman and Broderip caused him to lose a considerable sum; many merchants of the first rank engaged to unite in business to repair this loss; he took this advice and formed an association for the manufacture of pianos and the sale of music. The desire which he felt of giving to every instrument he made all desirable perfection, induced him to give up teaching in order to devote himself to mechanical studies and an active superintendence. His enterprise was crowned with success, and his house became one of the first in London.

Of the distinguished pupils Clementi formed, we may mention John Field, one of the most skilful pianists of his time. It was with this favourite scholar that in the autumn of 1802 he went to Paris for the third time. He was received there with the highest admiration, and Field excited astonishment by the manner in which he played the fugues of Bach. The two artistes in 1803 took the route to Vienna, and Clementi had intended to entrust Field to the care of Albrechtsberger, to be instructed in counterpoint. Field at first consented, but at the moment his master prepared to depart for Russia, he supplicated him with tears in his eyes to be permitted to accompany him. Clementi could not resist his entreaties, and they both started for St. Petersburg. There a young pianist named Zeuner, attached himself to Clementi, and followed him to Berlin, and afterwards to Dresden. In this city a young man of the greatest promise was presented to him, named Klengel, whom he received as a pupil, and with whom he returned to Vienna in 1804. Klengel became from that time one of the first organists of Germany. Kalkbrenner also applied to Clementi, and received such advice as carried his talent to the highest degree of perfection. In the following year Clementi and his pupil Klengel made a tour to Switzerland. Clementi afterwards returned to Berlin, where he married his first wife. He went with her to Italy in the autumn of the same year, and stayed at Rome and Naples. On his return to Berlin Clementi had the misfortune to lose his wife. The grief he felt in consequence caused him to leave abruptly for Petersburg; but not finding solace excepting in the distractions inseparable from travelling, he remained but a short time in that city, and returned to Vienna. Having heard, a short time afterwards, of the death of his brother, he repaired to Rome on private business. The war which then desolated Europe obliged him to remain a while at Milan, and several other cities of Italy; but finding a favourable opportunity, he returned to England, where he arrived in the summer of 1810, after an absence of eight years. The following year Clementi married again, and an amiable companion consoled him for the loss of his first wife. Clementi composed but one sonata (Op. 41) during the eight years of his travels, having been absorbed in the composition of his symphonies, and the preparation of a choice collection of pieces for the organ and harpsichord, selected from the works of the greatest composers. The Philharmonic Society having been instituted, Clementi brought out two symphonies, which were performed several times and highly praised. In the month of March, 1824, he gave some new pieces to the Philharmonic Society and the King's Theatre.

The works of Clementi consist of a hundred and six sonatas, divided into thirty-four ops., of which there are forty-six, with an accompaniment for the violin or flute and violoncello; a duo for two pianos; four duos for four hands; a chase; a toccata; a set of characteristic pieces, in the style of several great masters; three capriccios; a fantasia upon the air, "By the light of the moon"; twenty-four waltzes; twelve mont-ferrines; an introduction to the art of playing the piano (Gradus ad Parnassum), divided into twelve parts, a work which passed through twelve editions in England, and was reprinted several times in Germany and France, besides symphonies and overtures for a full orchestra. Clementi was also the editor of a fine collection of choice pieces of the great masters, published at London, in three volumes, folio. The style of Clementi's compositions is light, brilliant, and full of elegance, and his sonatas will remain classic a long time; but it cannot be denied that there is a barrenness in his themes, and that he is wanting in passion. Except some slight mistakes his works are generally well written. As a pianist, the eulogiums that have been lavished upon him are without bounds, and the greatest artists agree in pronouncing him chief of the best school of mechanism and of fingering. It is he who fixed the principles of the fingering and mechanism of execution. Many complete editions of his works have been published at Leipsic and at Bonn.

Clementi enjoyed the highest consideration in England, and the most distinguished artists testified their respect for him. Possessed of considerable wealth, he gave up, during the latter part of his life, the direction of his establishment for the sale of music, and the manufacture of pianos to the care of his partner, Mr. Collard; and having retired to an estate in the country, he lived in repose, and seldom went to London. On one of his visits to that city, Cramer, Moscheles, and many other celebrated artists gave a dinner to the patriarch of the piano; and towards the end of the evening, they prevailed upon him to play. He extemporised—and the freshness of his ideas, and the perfection of his playing, excited surprise and admiration. Clementi died soon after this, on the 10th of March, 1832, at eighty years of age.

Dramatic Intelligence.

SADLER'S WELLS.—The production of Timon of Athens here on Monday excited the usual interest of a Shakspearian revival at Sadler's Wells, the house being early filled in every part. It is generally allowed, that the last two acts of this play are among the greatest inspirations of the poet, and Timon may possibly be added to those characters, of which, (as has been said of Hamlet, Lear, and others), the stage has hitherto found but few adequate representatives. In spite of the grand ideal of the principal character, and the contrast and relief afforded by the other parts, the play wants that which alone can give it permanent popularity at the theatre—an action of interest and continuity. Indeed so well has Mr. Phelps been aware of the necessity of helping out the piece by scenic aid, that a moving Diorama of the March of Alcibiades and his army from the walls of Athens to Timon's retreat in the woods, has been introduced. The pruning knife also has been pretty freely used. The little part of the clown has been omitted, together with the scene in the last act, between Timon and the Poet and Painter, which latter it would have been better to retain. One of the most subtle and striking points of this play is the contrast between the cynicism of Timon and Apemantus. With Timon, as has been well said, "It is all up-hill work;" but Apemantus is the true sceptic of nature, who "abhors himself," and delivers his gibes with all the cold-blooded ferocity of baffled pride and will.

Timon.—"Thou art proud Apemantus!"

Timon does not possess much interest with the audience, until his burst of fury at his creditors.

"What! are my doors opposed against my passage? Have I been ever free, and must my house be my retentive enemy, my gaol? The place in which I've feasted, does it now, like all mankind, show me an iron heart?"

* * * "Cut my heart in sums!" * * * tell out my blood!
* * * Take me, tear me, and the gods fall on you," &c., &c.

This, and the mock grace at the pretended banquet which follows, were among Mr. Phelps's happiest points. His soliloquy outside the walls,

"Let me look back upon thee, oh thou wall,
That girdlest in those wolves," &c.

was given with the vehement power in which he excels, and his address to the gold which he digs up, told with equal force upon the audience.

"Why this—

We'll lug your priests and servants from your sides,
Pluck stout men's pillows from below their heads.

This yellow slave

Will knit and break religions."

* * * "Come damned earth,

Thou common whore of mankind that put'st odds

Among the rout of nations,

I will make thee do thy right nature."

Can Greek tragedy show such lines?

Mr. Phelps's delineation of this wonderful and strange creation of Shakspeare's mind, possibly came as near to the stern power of the poet's ideal as we can reasonably hope to see on the modern stage. The Apemantus of Mr. George Bennett, although hardly savage enough, was pungent and well conceived. The scenery and appointments of the dramas of past times have become objects of increasing curiosity, from the strict attention to records which now distinguishes them. The banquetting-hall of Timon and the view of a part of the city from the walls, are of great interest as well as beauty, and Timon's retreat in the woods is admirably designed and painted. We regret that we cannot speak in praise of the music introduced. The noise of the drums and cymbals that accompanied the March of Alcibiades, was anything but harmonious. The play was listened to with great attention, and received at the close with loud and unanimous applause.

HAYMARKET.—We have paid another visit to Grandmother Grizzle, who seems likely to enjoy a green old age here for some time, thanks to the exertions of Mrs. Fitzwilliam, the inimitable humour of Mr. Buckstone, and the prettiness of Mrs. Buckingham.

THE MUSICAL WORLD

SURREY.—Thanks to the musical taste over the water, and the enterprising management of this theatre, Mozart is becoming as welcome here as any of his less gifted compeers, and the production of Don Giovanni has been as successful as any novelty of Mr. Shepherd's operatic season. After having been accustomed to hear the work at our two great lyrical establishments, we, of course, went to the Surrey with moderated expectations; but taking everything into consideration, these were amply fulfilled. Mr. Borrani as the Don, Mr. Travers the Octavio, and Mr. F. Romer the Leporello, all acquitted themselves to the best of their abilities. Miss Annie Romer plays Donna Anna, and Miss Poole, one of the most accomplished of our native lyrical vocalists—is the Zerlina. The rest of the parts are creditably filled. The vocal qualifications of Miss Jane Coveney who plays Elvira, are slender; but she is handsome and well formed, and is a graceful and pains-taking actress. The laurels were divided between Mr. Travers, who was encored in "Il mio Tesoro" (we don't remember the English words), and Miss Poole who obtained the like honour in "Vedrai Carino" (of which we also forget the vernacular transmutation). There was now and then a little unsteadiness in the orchestra, but not more than a few repetitions of the opera will probably remove. Let us hope that Mr. Shepherd will follow up his spirited and successful experiment by the production of Figaro.

Owing to the indisposition of Miss Romer, in the early part of the week, Miss Annie Romer, rather than see the public disappointed, undertook Miss Romer's part in Der Freischutz at two hours' notice and went through her arduous task with the most triumphant success. This fact deserves to be noticed, as it not only shows Miss Annie Romer's great proficiency as a vocalist—so great that it enabled her to study, in an incredibly short period, a part with which she was previously totally unacquainted—but it proves how ready she is to oblige the management, a circumstance which, we are sure, the management will not forget.

PUNCH'S PLAYHOUSE, AND NEW STRAND THEATRE.—Mr. W. R. Copeland, the lessee of this theatre, is evidently of the opinion of our transatlantic brethren, that there is nothing like going ahead, and, consequently, the worthy manager, not content with producing one new piece at a time, favoured the public, last Monday, with two first nights, like George Colman's "two single gentlemen"—rolled into one. The entertainments commenced with a comediotta, by Maddison Morton, Esq., entitled A Hopeless Passion. The action passes at Madrid, in the time of Philip V. whose accession to the throne of Spain gave rise to Louis XIV.'s celebrated expression, "Il n'y a plus de Pyrénées."

At the rising of the curtain, we find that the particular period of Philip's reign chosen for the play is that when the Archduke Charles of Austria was using very forcible arguments—in the shape of cannon balls and bayonets,—the latter then a novel invention, to assert his claim to the throne. A certain Don Terribio de Portobello (Mr. Tilbury) in high favour with Philip, has been intriguing with the Archduke's party, and, in every sense, genteel and vulgar, "selling" his master. But great as may be Don Terribio's title to the name of a profound diplomatist, and it is certainly very great, as like most others of the same class, he is made a perfect fool of in the end, he is outmanœuvred by his ward Donna Beatrice de Sandoval (Mrs. W. R. Copeland), a perfect Talleyrand in petticoats, who discovers his machinations to the King, after having, by the most ingenious system of mystification, first made him give his consent to her union with Gaston de Courville (Mr. Morton), a young French nobleman. Such is a slight and meagre outline of one of the best contrived and most elaborate plots with which we are acquainted. Surprise follows surprise, and every incident is as necessary to the success, as the first proposition of Euclid is to the two that are based upon it. Mr. Tilbury's impersonation of Don Terribio was a very excellent piece of acting, but why, in the name of all that is anachronic, will Mr. Tilbury wear a coat of the reign of George the Second, or the youth of George the Third, at the court of Philip V.? He might almost as well have played the character in a Joinville tie, and a Nicoll's Paletot, "registered according to Act of Parliament, and warranted, etc., etc." Mrs. W. R. Copland gave Donna Beatrice with great spirit, and with that distinct and clear enunciation which the gentlemen who "do" the opening and pro rogation of Parliament are always accustomed to attribute to her Majesty, and which we could desire to find a little more prevalent among some actresses of the present day. At the conclusion of the piece, the curtain fell amid general applause. The second novelty of the evening was a pièce de circonstance founded upon the assumption of the principal part of male attire by the American ladies, and was, like most pieces of the kind, not remarkable for any particular plot. The grand feature was the appearance of Miss Marshall in the "Bloomer" costume, and a most lovely "Bloomer" she made. If ever the dress does become general in England, it will be because everyone who has seen Miss Marshall in it, with her natty jacket, her umbrageous straw hat, her flowing trousers—lemot est lâche—and her captivating blue boots, will insist that his mother, sisters, wife, aunts, and cousins shall adopt it forthwith. Miss Marshall is decidedly a great acquisition to the establishment. Mr. Rogers, as Nobby Nick, a travelling showman, was funny but rather too boisterous. This is a fault he must guard against, as it is one which appears to be growing on him every day; exaggeration is not nature. The title of the farce, by the way, is "A Figure of Fun." After the "tag," spoken by Miss Marshall, who promised to appear again as a Bloomer—we hope she will do so a great many times—the curtain once more fell, and another success was achieved by the management.

Original Correspondence.

FIDELIO.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

DEAR SIR,—The thanks of the whole musical world are due to Mr. G. A. Macfarren for his most able and interesting analysis of Beethoven's mighty and inspired production, Fidelio. No doubt, all your readers have felt equal interest with me in perusing each portion of it, as it appeared in the pages of your valuable World. If the talented author would allow me to suggest the publication of the "Analysis" entire, in the shape of a pamphlet, or, hereafter, in conjunction with other papers of the same kind, which I hope will emanate from his pen, I think he would confer a boon upon many, who from various causes, have not the advantage of reading the Musical World, though they ought to do so, of course.

Believe me, Dear Sir,

Yours right faithfully,

J. A. BAKER.

Birmingham, Sept. 16th, 1851.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

1A, Wigmore Street, Cavendish Square, Sept. 17th.

SIR,—I understand it has been reported that I sailed for America with Miss Hayes. Now as it is not true, I shall be very much obliged if you will be kind enough to contradict the report in the Musical World.

Yours very truly,

M. WILLIAMS.

MUSICAL MODESTY IN INDIA.

(To the Editor of The Musical World.)

SIR,—Allow me to hand you underneath an original advertisement for a concert, extracted from a recent East Indian Newspaper. The modesty of the musical professor shows itself in every line.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

COLOPHANE.

Sept. 14, 1851.

"The humble servant to the public, Peter Damian Ribeiro, having been a resident in this beautiful and wealthy Presidency for the period of more than 20 years, and during this time there having appeared many performers in Bombay periodically, who have cut their respective figures according to each one's musical talents, and left this entirely satisfied with what they had amassed, with applause and thanks of the community at large, although in their performances they have not exhibited any new and scientific composition, but all borrowed pieces, which renders it impossible for any musical performer to convey to his hearers those feelings which nothing but an original composition alone can stimulate, as for instance, Aristotle or Demosthenes whose feelings none can or will be able to express. The undersigned, professor in music, begs to make patent to the world, particularly to the gentry of Bombay, his musical abilities, and proposes to give a concert, of which a programme will be forthwith published. It will be dedicated to the Hon. Sir Erskine Perry, Knight, the worthy Chief Justice of Bombay and its dependencies, as a token of the gratitude which he owes to His Lordship for the kindness and frequent favours he has received, and hopes always to receive at his hands.

"Dated at Colaba, near the Bombay Times Office, this first day of April, in the year of our Lord and Saviour, 1851.

"PETER DAMIAN RIBEIRO.

"Professor of Music."

MR. BRIDGE FRODSHAM.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

MR. EDITOR,—SIR,—In one of your numbers of August there is a critique on the concert of Miss LUTITIA PITT, and in conjunction with others during the evening you kindly noticed my being encored in Clement White's ballad, "Ah why didst thou tell me;" but in that notice you used the word "BISSED." Now I have some FEW FRIENDS WHO ARE LIBERAL ENOUGH to say it is a mistake of the printer, as it should have been HISSED. As such was not the case, and to decide the question for a provincial MUSICAL FRIEND (a subscriber of yours) who defended me to some country amateurs, I have thus intruded on your time and space, and rely on your polite attention and kind consideration for a young vocalist, and am yours very respectfully, BRIDGE FRODSHAM.

[Mr. Bridge Frodsham is quite correct—we said "bissed."—Ed.]

THE PIANOFORTE CONTROVERSY.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—In musical matters I detest doubts, for I have witnessed the sad state of incredulity, the utter disbelief in any maker or instrument, to which the Boehm controversy has reduced flute players; and I have heartily prayed that our convictions may not be similarly disturbed with regard to Pianofortes. It was then, with great satisfaction that I read an article, published in the Morning Post of the 15th ult., in which the writer demonstrates, with great force of assertion, the entire superiority of Erard's Pianos over all others. Sir, I was delighted. I said "Here we have a professional opinion, nay, a decision, emanating from the person of all others best qualified to appreciate the merits of the question," for the author is avowedly Mons. Erard himself. This, Sir, was my happy state of mind. I thought at length to have attained to conviction. Alas, reflection has since suggested doubts whether I may not, after all, have built upon a foundation of sand. For whereas Mons. Erard refers to the universal (?) preference of musicians, as furnishing the most conclusive evidence in his favour, yet he complains that by them the introduction and progress of his instrument has been the most strongly opposed. Again, in relating the story of the judgment of King George, pronounced at once, as he tells us, in favour of Erard's instrument. In this case, I say, not to mention that I have heard a very different version, I cannot get over the fact, that while the decision of amateur royalty is triumphantly cited, that of Mr. Cramer, present on the occasion, and more competent, one would think, in such matters, is never once alluded to. Now, my version of the story represents him as favourable to instruments "of the old construction."

My doubts became stronger still when I read a letter from Messrs. Stodart, and another from Messrs. Broadwood, wherein both houses refute the claims put forward by Mons. Erard with regard to certain inventions.

I thus again find myself launched upon the ocean of uncertainty. Your kind pilotage, Mr. Editor, may perhaps conduct me into some safe and peaceful harbour. Pray do not withhold it from your sincere admirer,

AN AMATEUR.

Provincial.

BIRMINGHAM.—(From a Correspondent.) The annual benefit Concert of our talented and highly esteemed townswoman, Miss Amelia Hill, took place on Tuesday evening the 11th instant. The Hall was crowded to excess, which we could attribute to the fact of Concerts having been for a long time past "a dead letter" with us, were we not convinced that the announcement of Sims Reeves, whose magic name has figured on our walls in all shapes and sizes for some days past, had a good deal to do with it, and, moreover the numerous friend of the fair beneficiaire were all exerting themselves to the utmost for their townswoman. The artistes from London were Sims Reeves, Frank Bodda, Miss Eyles and Miss Kate Loder. Sims Reeves was received with reiterated storms of applause. All his songs were vociferously re-demanded. We never heard him sing the divine air, "In Native Worth" more chastely.

Miss Eyles, who made her first appearance in Birmingham was very favourably received, and encored in both her songs. We hope ere long to welcome this lady again to our town. Frank Bodda, we thought not in good voice. His Aria Buffa "Largo al factotum," was very spiritedly given and redemanded. A similar compliment was paid to his Irish Ballad "Thady O'Toole," a fool of a thing, by the way, but for which he only bowed his acknowledgments. We had another debutante, Miss Marianne Hill, sister of the beneficiaire, who although very nervous acquitted herself very creditably in a couple of duets with her sister. Miss Amelia Hill pleased us better than usual. She seemed to have lost a great deal of her nervous timidity, and consequently, her voice which is very pure in quality, appeared to much greater advantage. She sang Rodes air with variations, a difficult task for her, quite to our critical satisfaction, although Louisa Pyne's delicious singing of the same air was still ringing in our ears. En passant, we may remark we thought Miss Hill undertook too much by one half, singing no less than nine times, beside encores. We think she would do well to avoid this fault in future. There were two or three concerted pieces, which, excepting Barnett's "Magic Wove Scarf" were only common place.

The Pianoforte playing of Kate Loder was the gem of the evening. She was encored in Schulhoff's Carnival, for which she substituted Stephen Heller's pleasing bagatelle "Chant de Chasseur." She also appeared as a composer, accompanying Miss Hill in a charming serenade, with which we hope soon to be better acquainted. Thalberg's brilliant duet for two pianofortes was admirably played by Kate Loder and our talented young townswoman Miss Stevens, who well sustained her reputation as an accomplished pianiste. Mr. Simms ably discharged the duties of Conductor. The encores were, as usual in Birmingham very numerous, there being no less than eleven, which prolonged the concert far too much, though most of the audience remained to the last, and we trust enjoyed their respective journeys home by the light of the "Full Moon" which Miss Hill kindly announced in her programmes, would take place that evening. Altogether the concert gave satisfaction, but—as your Manchester Correspondent says, “Oh! these butts”—there was no band, no orchestra! No doubt it answered Miss Hill’s purpose better to have the orchestra filled, as it was, by listeners and payers! rather than by performers and receivers! But we trust ere long no concert will be given in England to without an efficient orchestra. We are glad to notice that in this town, at least, there is now some hope of accomplishing this great and desirable end, as will be perceived from the subjoined extract from our Birmingham Journal.

“ESTABLISHMENT OF AN ORCHESTRAL SOCIETY.—The condition of musical bankruptcy in which Birmingham has been placed for some years past has been owing in a great measure to the want of a good resident orchestra, and that want is in no inconsiderable degree the result of personal misunderstandings. With a festival unrivalled in England, Birmingham occupies a very low position in musical taste, so low that the few concerts we have are shorn of half their interest by the absence of an orchestra. It is with no ordinary pleasure we learn that a numerous meeting of the instrumentalists of the town took place on Monday last, at the Assembly Room, Dee’s Royal Hotel, which was kindly placed by the proprietor at the disposal of the artists brought together on the occasion. The result of the meeting was an unanimous resolution to establish a society, under the direction of Mr. J. A. Baker, for the study and performance of orchestral music in all its branches; and a provisional committee was formed to make arrangements for carrying out the intention of the meeting with vigour. The society has chosen for its title ‘The Birmingham Orchestral Musical Union,’ and we sincerely trust that under their auspices the musical reputation of the town will be elevated from its present miserable condition of prostration.”

HARROGATE.—MR. JULIAN ADAMS’ CONCERT.—This concert took place in the Cheltenham Room on Tuesday evening last, and was crowded to excess by every visitor of rank and fashion in the vicinity—the best proof that this pianist is justly appreciated by all who admire native talent. To speak of his pianoforte playing would be superfluous, having so long taken his position; but we are bound to express our surprise at his conducting the orchestra through long and difficult pieces entirely from memory, which was displayed in the overture to Semiramide, and the divertissement of Carl Buller; as also the selection of Scotch airs, which was admirably performed. Mr. Lawler was encored in the beautiful song of Rooke—“My Boyhood’s Home,” which was given with the greatest possible expression. This gentleman possesses a deep bass voice, and is one of our best vocalists. We were highly pleased with the comic duet—“The singing Lesson,” in which Madame Bouran was exceedingly humorous. Miss M. B. Marsh appeared to labour under disadvantage, and we were disappointed with the singing of “Qui la voce,” one of the most favourite pieces of Bellini. The orchestra was full, the performers all determined to exert themselves to the satisfaction of their director, Mr. Julian Adams, and the result was one of the best concerts we remember in Harrogate.—Harrogate Advertiser.

MANCHESTER.—GLOVER’S “EMANUEL.”—We are glad to find this oratorio is to be brought out in the Free Trade Hall, in the course of the present month. We have heard portions of the work given at the rehearsals, and have reason to expect its public performance will raise the talented composer in the estimation of his townsmen. Mr. Glover has the assistance of a number of gentlemen who are earnestly working to bring out this, his second work, in a manner every way worthy of the town. Already upwards of fifty pounds have been subscribed towards the expenses of the performance; and considering the very liberal offer of Mr. Glover and his friends to hand over the surplus proceeds to the Sunday-school fund for Her Majesty’s visit, we may reasonably expect to see the room well-filled on the occasion.—Manchester Examiner.

MADAME CLARA NOVELLO.—The distinguished vocalist, Madame Clara Novello, is about to appear at the Free Trade Hall, on the 30th instant, after an absence of seven years. The remembrance of her great triumph on the occasion of her last singing there, will no doubt cause much desire again to hear her. Along with her, besides the fine tenor, Mr. Sims Reeves, the able bass, Mr. Delavanti, and the renowned violinist, Signor Sivori, we are to hear for the first time in England Mdle. Caroline Beer, from the opera of Hamburg, whose reputation will be familiar to many of the German population of this locality. She possesses a voice of immense compass, particularly fine in the lower range, and sings with great passion and feeling. This is the opinion we have heard expressed of her powers by individuals on whose judgment we can rely.—Manchester Examiner.

CORSHAM.—A Concert took place at the British school-room on the 29th ult., when the room was not so full as we could have wished, but the company were highly respectable. The vocalists were Mr. and Mrs. Pyne, of Bath, assisted by two amateurs, who kindly gave their services. The band was led by Mr. Pitman, of Bath, and Mr. W. B. Sainsbury acted as conductor. W. Weaver, Esq., kindly assisted in the instrumental pieces. Mr. Vincent’s performances on the flute were greatly admired, as were also Mrs. Pyne’s, who was encored in “Within a mile.” The duet, “Born in yon Blaze,” was also encored. Mrs. Pyne’s sweet style of singing cannot fail to be appreciated. Altogether, the concert went off, like most concerts do, capitally. Some say an amateur concert would answer better; but the appearance of eminent professors gives a musical character to the thing.

CHELTEHAM.—The Cheltenham Floral Association held its last show of the season this afternoon, at the Pittville Spa. The weather was remarkably fine, and the attendance consequently numerous. We have not, indeed, for many years witnessed so gay and brilliant an assemblage of the rank, beauty, and fashion of Cheltenham and the surrounding neighbourhood, as was gathered together upon this occasion; and to render the scene still more gay and exhilarating, the band of the Coldstream Guards was in attendance, and performed on the terrace in front of the Pump Room during the whole of the afternoon, the selection of music being quite first-rate, as the following programme of the compositions performed will sufficiently evince:—

PART I.

GRAND MARCH—“Athalia”	Mendelssohn
OVERTURE—“Fest”	Lindpaintner
WALTZ—“Herbst Blumen” (Autumn Flowers)	Labitzky
GRAND FANTASIA—“Robert le Diable,” selected	Meyerbeer and arranged by C. Godfrey
POLKA—“The Crystal fountain”	Jullien
DUO CONCERTANTE—“Cornet a Piston and Trombone”	Bender
SELECTION—“Ne touchez pas a la reine”	Boisselot
QUADRILLE—“The Great Exhibition”	Jullien

PART II.

GRAND SELECTION—“Le Prophete,” selected and	Meyerbeer arranged by C. Godfrey
WALTZ—“Donna Sabine”	Henrion
FANTASIA—On airs from “Lucrezia Borgia”	Donizetti
POLKA—“The Eclipse”	Koenig
POT POURRI—“The Marble Maiden”	A. Adam
INTRODUCTION—“Child of the Air”	Mountain
HELDAL SONG—“See here we bring”	Sylph
POLKA—“The Matagorda”	W. E. Jarrett
GALOP—“The Amazon and Tiger”	Karl Buller

The musical department was under the direction of Mr. Godfrey.—Cheltenham Chronicle.

MANCHESTER.—On Wednesday evening week a Grand Dress Concert took place in the Concert Hall. The following was the programme:—

FIRST PART:

OVERTURE—“Clemenza di Tito”	Mozart
ARIA—Signor Tagliafico—“Liete voci” (Zaira)	Mercadante
SWISS AIRS—Madame Sontag	Eckert
CONCERTO—Violin—M. Sainton—(No. 9)	Spohr
CAVATINA—Mademoiselle Fischer—“Robert, toi que j’aime” (Robert le Diable)	Meyerbeer
DUO—Mademoiselle Fischer and Signor Tagliafico—“Se la vita” (Semiramide)	Rossini
ARIA—Madame Sontag—“O luce di quest’ anima” (Linda di Chaumonix)	Donizetti

SECOND PART.

OVERTURE—"Otello"	Rossini
SONG—Madame Sontag—"The soldier tired"	Dr. Arne
SONG—Signor Tagliafico—"Madamina, il catalogo" (Don Giovanni)	Mozart
DUETT—Madame Sontag and Mademoiselle Fischer—"Sullaria"—(Nozze di Figaro)	Mozart
DUETT—Pianoforte and violin—Mr. Charles Hallé and M. Sainton	Beethoven
AIR—Mademoiselle Fischer—"Ernani, involami" (Ernani)	Verdi
POLKA SONG—Madame Sontag (composed for her)	Alary
"THE WEDDING MARCH"	Mendelssohn
CONDUCTOR	Mr. Charles Hallé.
LEADER	Mr. Seymour.

The overture to Clemenza di Tito formed a spirited introduction to the evening's performances. The first vocal solo fell to the share of Signor Tagliafico, a gentleman whom we are always glad to hear, who did full justice to it. The Signor, indeed, sang very well in all the pieces committed to his care, and received, as he could not fail to do, many expressions of approbation, though we think he deserved an encore, for the style in which he gave the air from Don Giovanni, a chaste and finished performance.

The celebrated Sontag was, of course, the grand attraction. Her qualifications are too well known to require any comment from us. Nothing could surpass the delicacy and accuracy of the ornaments so lavishly introduced in the air from Donizetti, which was vociferously encored, the fair singer returning only to bow her acknowledgments. However, she yielded to the importunate demands of the audience at the conclusion of the Swiss air, with its astonishing echo passages, and gave "Home, sweet home," in the most charming manner imaginable, raising the enthusiasm of the audience to the highest pitch. She did not create such a sensation in "The soldier tired," in which, by-the-bye Mr. Ellwood's trumpet was very effective, and the polka song we thought scarcely worthy of her choice, though "composed for her," but her splendid execution would make anything more than passable.

Mademoiselle Fischer appeared very nervous; she gives evidence of having been in a good school, and will doubtless, ere long, obtain a due proportion of public estimation. Her most successful effort was perhaps in the duet with Madame Sontag, in which the voices of the ladies blended very nicely; and this duet, we should add, was one of the encores. When we heard the first vocal piece, Tagliafico's solo, we hoped to have been able to compliment the band for a more discriminating volume of tone in the accompaniments. "Liete voci" certainly was the best accompanied song we have heard for a long time in the Concert Hall, and the same improvement was kept up to within the last few bars of Madame Sontag's first solo, when the instrumentalists again forgot themselves, and completely drowned the singer: this was repeatedly the case during the subsequent pieces; still, on the whole, we consider there was a considerable improvement upon previous concerts. In the metropolis no musician is held in greater estimation for classical violin playing than M. Sainton. The concerto of Spohr was not a composition calculated for general comprehension, and no doubt would be felt tedious by those who cannot appreciate a style of music which had none of the clap-trap so much in vogue in music for violin. There were no displays of apparent impossibilities, no violent changes, all was quiet—some would say tame; but at the same time the performance of M. Sainton, was unimpeachable in point of refinement and correctness. The duet for pianoforte and violin by Beethoven, was very fairly divided between the executants. Sainton was heard to greater advantage than before, and Hallé as usual distinguished himself by his faultless execution. The hall was unusually crowded, and the temperature of the evening being remarkably close and sultry, the heat in the room was very oppressive: it seemed to cause a great fatality among the fiddle-strings, which were continually breaking, those of M. Sainton's instrument not being exempted from the list of casualties—his last performance being interrupted for a few moments in consequence. The concert concluded with Mendelssohn's spirited Wedding March, from A Midsummer Night's Dream, which seems to have a greater power in retaining the audience to the close than any other piece in the orchestral repertoire.—Manchester Courier.

Foreign.

BERLIN.—The operatic public here have the benefit of the antagonistic exertions of three rival prime donne, of almost equal pretensions, Mademoiselle Wagner, Madame Tucsek, and Madame Kæster. Mademoiselle Wagner has recently made her rentrée in Fidelio with such success, that she snuffed out all her predecessors. Madame Tucsek, in the part of Rezia, in Oberon, next appeared, and with such success that she snuffed out Mademoiselle Wagner. Lastly, Madame Kæster came forward as Valentine in the Huguenots, with such success, that she snuffed out Madame Tucsek. Mademoiselle Wagner then reappeared as Fidelio with such success, that she snuffed out both her rivals, and Fidelio was victorious. The genius of Beethoven towered above that of Weber and Meyerbeer. The rest of the company is but an "awkward squad;" nevertheless, Spontini's Olympia is to be represented on the 15th of October, with Madame Kæster as Olympia, Mlle. Wagner as Statira, and is not likely to snuff out Fidelio. Mr. Gye, director of the Royal Italian Opera, London, has been here, and Doctor Bacher from Vienna is expected. Either, it is bruited, has one eye upon Mlle. Wagner, and the other eye upon Madame Kæster. Another impresario is expected in a cloak, who, it is bruited, will have either eye upon both. Meanwhile Mr. Bunn, who, I am told, is in want of a prima donna, would do well to call a cab and drive to the London station, and there taking information of the route to Berlin, avail himself of that information, and proceed via Ostend to Berlin, and there inquire touching the future intentions of Madame Tucsek—VIVAT REGINA.—From our own Correspondent.

WEIMAR.—Liszt is getting up the opera, Benvenuto Cellini, of his friend Berlioz, at the Court Theatre.

VIENNA.—M. Thalberg's Florinda is in rehearsal at the Karntnerthor, and will be shortly produced.

LEIPZIG.—The directors of the concerts of the Gewandhaus, have just published their manifesto.

JEUX D'ESPRIT.

Now that the flat season has commenced, after the termination of the sharp operatic contest between the rival establishments of Her Majesty's Theatre and the Royal Italian Opera, we present our readers with a few stray crotchets; and if perchance, any of our jokes be considered thorough, base, we trust they will not prevent any dissentient peruser from pursuing the "even tenor of his way."

ALBERT SMITH, on dit, recently ascended Mont Blanc in order to make himself acquainted with the "sliding scale," as popular amongst the Swiss, but not with the free-traders of Britain. Doubtless the facetious writer was well provided with slips whilst taking notes of his ascent.

MARIO the "Titan" of tenors, was instrumental in cutting short the operatic season at Covent Garden, having refused to sing at reduced prices. Mr. Gye deems the primo tenore a "tight 'un" to deal with.

JENNY LIND—whose advent has already been trumpeted—has been dubbed by the Manchester Cotton Lords a "spinning Jenny" in consequence of her having spun a rapid fortune in America. Speculation is afloat as to what will turn up when the fair Suede arrives in London.

CATHERINE HAYES the gentle, appropriately left for America, in the Pacific. How the Swan of Erin will please the Yankees after the Swedish Nightingale remains to be seen. Query? How can the pretty Catherine return from the United State(s) single?

MESSRS RUST AND STAHL have caught a Mrs. Sammon in the act of purloining some of their pianofortes. We congratulate them on hooking their fish, and trust that in all similar cases they will deal forte with the delinquents instead of piano.

ALEXANDRE BILLET's classical playing has so enchanted a certain "bas bleu" in the Metropolitan literary world, that the fair admirer has dubbed the "great Alexandre" a veritable "Billet doux."

BUNN's forthcoming campaign at Drury Lane remains for the present a mystery. Bunn it is well known, is no cake in theatrical matters; but whether he will realize a plum by his speculation is a question.

A NATIONAL ENGLISH OPERA seems as far from being realized as ever. Overtures made to (not by) the profession generally would probably be rejected, and would thus prevent them acting in concert, and as harmony is requisite in matters musical, an operatic company would with difficulty be found to support with one accord, a national English opera.

JULLIEN'S DRURY LANE CONCERTS, and the November fogs will come simultaneously—the former's merry strains to neutralize the "vapours" inseparable from the latter. Apropos would it not be appropriate for the master of the baton, in consideration of his ample white waistcoat to open the campaign with the overture to the Vest-al(e)?

CARLOTTA GRISI will, it appears, trip it to St. Peterburg, via Stettin. Let us hope the fair dansseuse will not (to use a Latin term) "stet in" the ice en route!

LABLACHE'S COSTUMIER complains of the recently great sameness in the dress of the great basso, inasmuch as that the "gros de Naples" naturally requires a mixture of broad cloth.

Reviews of Music.

"THE PRINCIPLES OF NATURAL HARMONY."—Being a perfect System founded upon Discovery of the true Semitonic Scale—J. J. HAITE. Ewer and Co.—Cocks and Co.

This is an ingenious treatise, but so brief and so concise that the new discovery by which the author professes to separate his theory from that of all others, and to present for the first time a system of harmony "complete and incontrovertible," is scarcely made out with sufficient clearness. Mr. Haite assumes that the Diatonic scale has been ably treated by theorists, but that the Semitonic scale has never been understood. The first part of his work, not professing to differ from his predecessors, we need not examine. The last and shorter portion, treating of the semitonic scale, demands a few observations.

Everybody, who is at all versed in the theories of harmony which have been published to the world, is aware that the great stumbling-block in the way of musical philosophers and acousticians has been the minor scale. Even the harmonic systems have failed to arrive at any satisfactory conclusion on this point. The minor third, in short, has been pronounced an artifice in which nature has had no hand, and with this bungling explanation has been dismissed. Mr. Haite gives as a reason of the minor scale having been a riddle to all theorists—that the theorists have not understood the principles of any scale. He allows to Schneider and Godfreid Weber the merit of having discovered that a sharp fourth, counting from the "scalic root," existed in the minor scale. This one step on the great ladder of natural truth he declares has conferred a vast benefit upon musical art; and we may presume has helped Mr. Haite to find out the remaining steps. Mr. Haite's scalic principle is, that there is a leading note to each interval of the common chord upon the first degree of the scale, major and minor. His "semitonic major scale" is therefore, C—D—D sharp—E—F—F sharp—G—A—B—C. His semitonic minor scale is A—B—C—D sharp—E—F—G sharp—A. In the major scale the leading notes are, of course, the D sharp, F sharp, and B:—in the minor B—D sharp and G sharp. "From this hitherto unsuspected fact," Mr. Haite adduces that the major scale, which left the devices of semitonic combinations altogether to the minor, "is now capable of inexhaustible variety," that a vast field is opened for new effects, and the brushwood that perplexed the feet of the elder theorists in their race to the house of knowledge, compelling them to explain what they knew not by such terms as "inventions" and "licences," for ever cleared away.

Having assumed all this, Mr. Haite develops his system with great ingenuity; and, admitting his premises, it would be difficult to controvert his deductions. But, as the logician says, "we deny his major," and denying his major, can hardly be enabled to admit his minor. Everything that can be derived from what Mr. Haite terms his "semitonic scales," and a great deal else in the bargain, may be deduced from the chromatic scale, from which Mr. Haite, to constitute his pet scale, takes two notes, D sharp, F sharp, in the major, and two notes, D sharp G sharp, in the minor (of the scales of C and A, quoted above), and popping them upon the ordinary diatonic scale, dubs it with a new name of his invention. But those who are entire believers in the theory of harmony and notation discovered by the late Doctor Alfred Day, and expounded in his "Treatise on Harmony," where it is shown that all the notes of the scale, diatonic and chromatic, are derived from the harmonics of three primal roots, the tonic, the supertonic and the dominant—those who have examined and admitted the truth of this discovery cannot by any means allow that a D sharp can belong to the key of C. Mr. Haite's principle of roots, in fact, appears to us quite as obscure, unbased, and inexplicable, as that of the Abbé Vogler, which consists of neither more nor less than a series of unfounded assumptions. We are surprised to find a modern theorist using his pen and bothering his brains to explain the vague nomenclatures of Doctor Crotch, and to tell us the derivation of what that more elaborate than perspicuous theorist denominates the "Italian sixth," the "German sixth," and the "French sixth." As part of a system of deriving, however, it may be cited for its singularity. For example: the "Italian sixth," F—A—D sharp—(counting from the bass) he derives from D sharp—F and A; the "German sixth," F—A—C—D sharp, he derives from D sharp—F—A—C; the "French sixth," F—A—B—D sharp, he derives from B—D sharp—F—A; appending to which curious examples of deduction, he assumes that enough has been said to place the full range of his system "under the control of the thorough musician." Perhaps, however, our musicianship is not sufficiently "thorough" to comprehend the arcana of Mr. Haite's Temple of Harmony; which, to our humane comprehension, we humbly avow to be a myth.

In the development of his system, Mr. Haite has recourse to sundry strokes, and other innovated signs, for which he makes a sort of apology, wholly unnecessary, since they are remarkably simple and easy to be retained in the memory. In short, while professing our inability to penetrate into the secrets of that part of his theory (from page 13 to the end) which treats of the "semitonic scale," we acknowledge to have read Mr. Haite's little book with a vast deal of interest, and no less respect for the talent and ingenuity with which, in so few pages, he has endeavoured to unfold and explain his peculiar views. It is worth the pains of examining, by all who concern themselves in speculations concerning the theory of harmony, upon which the whole art and science of music depend.

"NEW AND COMPLETE EDITION OF ALL MOZART'S FAVOURITE SONGS, DUETS, AND TRIOS." With the original Italian and German Words, and an entirely new English version by W. H. BELLAMY—Arranged from the scores of Mozart by SAMUEL SEBASTIAN WESLEY. T. Chappell.

We have received eight numbers out of twelve of the above very valuable collection of songs, containing some of the most beautiful specimens of lyrical composition which the art can boast, and take the opportunity of communicating to our readers the fact of their publication. The editorship of Mr. Wesley, our great organist, and a musician worthy of his father's name, is sufficient to recommend them equally to professors and amateurs, and guarantees the excellence of the arrangements.

As specimens of the manner in which Mr. Wesley has performed his task, we may adduce the two exquisite songs of Cherubino from Figaro, "Non so piu cosa" and "Voi che sapete," in which the accompaniments have been adapted in such a manner as not only to suit the genius of the piano, but to convey powerfully the varied effects of Mozart's instrumentation. We have rarely seen any thing more finished, rich, and effective in the shape of piano-forte arrangements from an orchestral score. The numbers before us comprise the two songs from Figaro just mentioned, (Nos. 2 and 8); the Italian airs "L'Addio" and "Quando Miro" (Nos. 3 and 4); "Non piu Andrai," "Dove Sono," and the duet "Crudel perche" from Figaro (Nos. 9, 10, 12); and "I Moderni Cavalieri" (No. 5). We shall be glad to receive numbers 1, 6, 7, and 11, at Mr. Chappell's earliest convenience.

Although we have cited the two songs of Cherubino as examples, it is but just to say that every one of Mr. Wesley's arrangements shows the hand of a master, a musician of refined taste, and a devoted worshipper of Mozart.

Mr. Bellamy's English version is for the most part elegant and tasteful. The only objection we have to urge is against the translation of the "Voi che sapete," the sentiment of which is altered and entirely spoiled. Perhaps Mr. Bellamy wrote to order, and was told to eschew the aspirations and love breathings of the ardent and impetuous Page. In all the other songs Mr. Bellamy has paid fitting reverence to the text.

"REUBEN RAYNE."—Written by GEORGE JAMES COOKE—Composed by GEORGE BARKER. Robert Cocks and Co.

For a black melody Mr. George Barker's present offering to the muse must be pronounced decidedly successful. The song has a Columbian flavour, which might, as it were, have been apprehended on the banks of the Ohio, or in the country of the bones and banjo. We have a leaning for Yankee tunes, in certain humours; and at times would prefer the native wood-notes wild of "My ole masser tole me so," or "Poor Nigger Joe," to a melody of whiter or less alien origin. Mr. George Barker's tune is a tune—there is no mistaking its simplicity and straightforwardness—it is a purely primitive ballad, and nothing else, and must be accepted as such, and no more. If you want a refined ballad, or a metaphysical ballad, or a ballad with profound harmonies, or a ballad suggestive of high-wrought fancies and originalities, you must avoid Mr. George Barker's new American contribution to the music table, and seek for what you want somewhere else; but if you are pleased with a mild, genial, unsophisticated tune, too pure to admit of modulations, too homely to receive subtle harmonies, take "Reuben Rayne," you will be fitted to a T. As such we can recommend Mr. George Barker's ballad honestly.

Of Mr. George James Cook, the poet, we must plead utter ignorance. We have never read any of his works; but, of a verity, from the specimen before us we desire greatly to become acquainted with them. The poetry of "Reuben Rayne" is so original in more sense than one that we consider it would be unfair to our readers to deprive them of so great a treat as must be experienced in its perusal. And so for

REUBEN RAYNE.

When I was stolen from my home,
And made a captive slave;
They bound me with an iron chain,
I did his mercy crave.
All day I wept, at night I cried,
Oh! take me back again,
Unto my own dear peaceful home,
To my poor Reuben Rayne.

CHORUS.

Oh! pity my poor Reuben Rayne,
No friendly voice to cheer him now,
Oh! pity my poor Reuben Rayne,
He'll never smile again!

They sold me to a Christian man,
I did his pity gain,
He loos'd me from the cruel yoke,
And set me free again.
But oh! I could not Reuben find,
My own dear Reuben Rayne,
They told me he was dead and gone,
And sleeping on the plain!

CHORUS.

Then pity my poor Reuben Rayne,
Deep sorrow broke his aching heart,
Then pity my poor Reuben Rayne,
We'll never meet again!

All night I sat upon his grave,
And sorely I did cry,
Awake, awake, my love, awake,
Or let me with thee die,
For in this wretched world of woe,
I ne'er shall rest again,
Until I'm sleeping by thy side,
My own dear Reuben Rayne!

CHORUS.

O! pity, then, poor Reuben Rayne;
Deep sorrow broke his aching heart
Then pity my poor Reuben Rayne,
We'll never meet again.

The originality, beauty, pathos and fancy of the above lyric cannot be readily surpassed. We should like to have more Reuben Raynes from the same graphic pen.

Miscellaneous.

ON THE SISTRUM, &c.—After the death of Saul there appears to be little doubt but the Lyre was greatly improved and many strings added to it, for we find it used with six, eight, ten, but not exceeding twelve or fifteen in number, and mention is made that David returning from the conquest of Goliath, met the women of the Hebrew city singing and dancing with Timbrels and Sistrums, which latter instrument belonged to the Egyptians, and consisted of a bar of metal, formed into an oval, and terminating in a handle, this handle was on a line with some small pieces of iron, bent a little at both ends, and extending from one side of the oval to the other, and these being struck with a small metal stick, produced various sounds, but they were of different forms according to the taste of the manufacturer; some had four bars across, others only three. Bruce says,—In Abyssinia it is used in the quick measure, or in allegros, in singing psalms of thanksgiving, each priest has a sistrum, which he shakes in a threatening manner at his neighbour, dancing, leaping, and turning round, with such indecent violence, that he resembles rather a priest of paganism, from whence this instrument was derived, than a Christian. The Abyssinians have a tradition, that the sistrum, lyre, and tambourine were brought from Egypt into Ethiopia, by Thot, in the very first ages of the world.

After David became king of Israel music was held in the highest estimation, and his own genius for, and his attachment to the study and practice of it, as well as the great number of musicians appointed by him to officiate in the performance of religious rites and ceremonies proves that it had made rapid progress and advanced greatly toward a state of perfection, for it is mentioned i 1st Chron. 15 Chap. 8 verse, that David and all the house of Israel played before the Lord, with all their might, with singing, on harps, and on psalteries, and on timbrels, and on cornets, and on cymbals, and on trumpets. And it appears that there were places established for the study and practice of music, by the approbation and under the sanction and patronage of the King of Israel.—From T. H. Tomlinson's Lectures on Ancient Music.

JENNY LIND ALL OVER.—We had yesterday the pleasure of being shaved with a Jenny Lind razor, by a Jenny Lind barber, scented with Jenny Lind Cologne, combed with a Jenny Lind comb, brushed with a Jenny Lind brush, washed in a Jenny Lind bowl, and wiped with a Jenny Lind towel. After which we put on our Jenny Lind hat, walked into a Jenny Lind restaurant, and partook of Jenny Lind sausages. Then we took up a Jenny Lind paper, read a Jenny Lind editorial, smoked a Jenny Lind cigar, and throwing ourselves back in a Jenny Lind chair, fell into a profound Jenny Lind reverie.—New Orleans Courier.

MAD. SONTAG.—The medical gentleman who attended Madame Sontag, on Friday night, when she was accidentally wounded in the arm by Signor Pardini in the last scene of Otello, was Dr. Glück, physician to the Western Dispensary, well known as a skilful and eminent practitioner.

THE ORGANS IN THE EXHIBITION.—A deputation from the Law Courts Committee of Liverpool paid an early visit to the Exhibition on Monday morning, in order to hear the powers of the various English organs erected in the building. We understand that the object of this visit was to decide upon a builder for the great organ intended to be erected in St. George's-hall, Liverpool. The deputation was attended by Dr. S. S. Wesley, Dr. Walmisley, and Mr. W. T. Best, eminent members of the musical profession, whose services were called into requisition upon this occasion.

MISS STEELE has entirely recovered from her late accident, and has resumed her professional avocations.

MR. KEELEY.—We regret to state that this talented actor met with an accident when stepping into his carriage the other day, which has prevented his performing these last few nights. We are happy to hear, however, that he is fast recovering.

SIGNOR PALTONI, who made his debut at Her Majesty's Theatre this week, is engaged at the Theatre Royal, Manchester, to sing with Madame Clara Novello and Mr. Sims Reeves.

MISS LOUISA PYNE and her sister will sing at Mr. Schloss' concert in Greenwich next week.

FALL OF THE THEATRE AT SIMLA.—The following is a letter from Simla, of the 25th of July:—"A fearful accident occurred here on the morning of the 24th; but the accounts regarding it were so varied that I did not mention it to you yesterday, preferring to wait until I could give you the facts as correctly as possible. Mr. George Chisholm, of Calcutta, who is up here this season, invited his friends of the Uncovenanted Service to a fancy ball at the Simla theatre on the night of the 23rd. From 7 to 8 o'clock, p.m. rain fell in such torrents that one might fancy a river was coming down from the heavens. The weather having cleared, however, after 8, guests to the number of about 80 of both sexes arrived, and the amusements of the evening commenced and went on gaily until about 1 a.m., when it was interrupted in a fearful manner. A sumptuous supper was laid out on the stage, whither nearly all the guests had repaired at this time. All were engaged; some in busily discussing the tempting things before them, others in attending to the softer sex, and others in promenading and talking lightly and gaily, quite inapprehensive of the danger that was at hand,—while a troop of happy little boys, dressed as khidmutgars ran to and fro with trays of sweetmeat and fruit and bottles of wine, fulfilling the duties of the characters they had assumed.

In the midst of this gaiety and thoughtlessness, this enjoyment of the present, one of the drop scenes was observed to fall half way down and vibrate, all eyes turned towards it, but it was generally believed to have been done by some wag, in order to startle the party. Apprehensions were thus quieted, and those were laughed at whose fears appeared to be awakened to the actual cause; matters went on as before, when one of the side slips shook as if something had fallen upon it; this was explained away by the supposition of one of the guests who had taken more wine than he could bear having staggered against it. Shortly after a second curtain dropped half way; parties ran about in search of the supposed wag, when down came a third curtain, the walls were observed to totter and the roof to shake. Now commenced a scene of appalling confusion and tumult, a struggle for precedence in the rush made towards the dancing-room or body of the theatre, a recklessness of the life of others though dear, and an exemplification of the priority of that law of nature 'self-preservation.' By the interposition of a Divine Providence the stage was cleared of all, men, women, and children, of the latter of whom several were sleeping in the green-room, before the roof tumbled in, when all were brought to a stand by the crash, but in another moment there was another scene like that just described, one door only was open, and of that one panel was jammed so that it could not be pushed back. The danger, however, was past, as the remaining portion of the roof and walls were staunch; but who could at such a time coolly examine the building? or who would believe the seeming madman who would pronounce the danger passed and recommend a quiet departure? It was a scene of, 'every man for himself'—a husband would rush out of the house, but not until he felt assured of his safety would he cry out 'My wife! my wife!' Then would he make a desperate attempt to break through the wall of human beings before him to effect a re-entrance into the house in search of his distracted wife, who, perhaps, was similarly endeavouring to return, shrieking the while 'My husband! my child!' I can scarcely believe I am writing the truth when I say that, with the exception of one khidmutgar, who was crushed to death under the stage while in the act of pouring out hot coffee, no accidents occurred. The band had, most fortunately, left the orchestra to take some refreshment a little before the accident occurred, or not a man of them would have been saved—their instruments are, however, all gone. The roof over the proscenium, the orchestra, and part of the second box have fallen in. I will make no remarks about the Providence which saved so many lives—such will suggest themselves to every one who reads this feeble description of the awful accident. Some say that the roof was weakened by the removal of some posts, for the purpose of enlarging the scene; others, who know the building, say that some of the beams were bent almost to breaking last season. But it is clear that the catastrophe is to be traced to the sinking of a well on the valley-side of the building; when that sunk and shook the whole stage fell in. The building was altogether badly built and frail. It was built for sale, not for durability. The chowkedar in charge of the building says that he observed in the evening that the wall had sunk, and gave notice of the occurrence to the wife of the person in charge of the building, but that no examination of it was made. I cannot, however, believe the story, for the person alluded to was at the ball with his wife, where they would never have been unless insane, after being apprised of the danger; for no man in his senses would enter a house at Simla, a wall of which he had been informed sunk, particularly in the rainy season. I almost forgot to say, that Sir Henry Elliott, Major Ramsay, Military Secretary, and Captain Bowie, Aid-de-Camp to the Governor-General, were at the ball, and that the former had a very narrow escape, as he was among those who were on the stage."—Eastern Star, Aug. 2.

EXTRAORDINARY MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.—Certain musical instruments, which have been exhibited for some time in London, have been brought to our Free Trade Hall, where they nightly excite as much attention as they did in the metropolis. They are the invention of an artist from Dresden, Herr Kaufmann, now a venerable old man, and his son, who both, with Fraulein Kaufmann, attend to display the wonders and perfection of the mechanism. The orchestron, an elegant looking piece of work as it is put on the stage, comprehends the wind instruments for an orchestra—flutes, flageolets, clarionets, bugles, trumpets and bassoons, together with the roll of drums and clash of cymbals, and when playing by itself, might be taken for a perfect specimen of one of those street barrel organs which have so much aroused the ire of Col. Sibthorp. But in the one case a man is the motive power, in the other clock work; and in the nice adaptation of this clock work consists the novelty of this individual instrument. Complicated and difficult pieces, requiring fine variations of light and shade for their proper performance, —the grand coronation march from the Prophete, and the wedding march from The Midsummer Night's Dream, for instance—are performed with the utmost accuracy, and with a delicacy in the softer passages which is scarcely equalled by the forte passages, wherein the trumpet, horns, and trombones mainly create the harmony. Next are the chordaulodion, and the symphonion, similar instruments, the first imitating a piano and flute, the other a piano, flute, piccolos, clarionets, cymbal and drum. The next is the automaton trumpeter, a figure dressed in the costume of the middle ages, which executes pieces from his difficult instrument with vigour, clearness, and precision. All these are self-acting, playing as many tunes as barrels are provided for them. There is another instrument, not self-acting, on which Herr Kaufmann and his daughter perform; this is the harmonicon, an instrument which has a very narrow finger-board, and a back like an inverted grand piano. It is of the orgue expressif kind of instruments, but greatly superior to them. The great feature of all the instruments is less the beauty of tones produced by the pipes used than of the perfection of the mechanism employed. Touch the releasing springs of the orchestrion, the chordaulodion, and the symphonion at the same time, for a concerted piece, and that which is to begin instantly commences, though not a sound is heard from the other two, but precisely as the last note introductory to the others, reaches the ear, it is followed with amazing precision by them, making it clear that all the cylinders have been constructed with mathematical exactitude, for the instruments, it must be distinctly understood, have not any connection with one another. They alternately play and are silent, now one taking up a solo, and then another with it leading to full orchestral effects, in a manner which the intelligence and training of living performers often fails to attain. In the symphonion there is a very clever production of the wonders of double tonguing on the flute, which our best artistes have not excelled. The automaton trumpeter takes his share with the utmost promptitude, giving the calls and accompaniments clearly, and at the exact point in the composition. He produced double notes from the same instrument, and has, in this respect, been likened to Vivier, but though we are willing to acknowledge that there are enormous acoustical difficulties overcome in the automaton, we cannot go quite so far in our admiration and praise. The harmonichord is the only one of these instruments which is likely to be of use to the public, the others are merely astonishing instances of that success which so frequently attends upon philosophical acquirements, mechanical skill, and patient industry, for Herr Kaufmann and his son, had to bring all those to bear in their work. The tones of the harmonichord are produced by friction of a cylinder worked by the feet of the performer, and one peculiarity is that every shade of piano and forte can be produced by corresponding degrees of pressure upon the keys. Not equal in power to an organ it still has a sufficient volume of tone to make it available for small churches, or for chamber music, especially that in slow time, and requiring phrases to be emphatic. There is a slight metallic burr heard when the bass notes are played on, but with that exception the instrument seems to be perfect throughout, and the dulcet character of its upper notes strikingly rich. The effects of forte and piano are produced with ease, and in the latter there is a softness of note which sinks into the almost inaudible whisperings of the Æolian harp. Very large audiences have visited the Free Trade Hall every night, and more will be bound to attend.—Manchester Courier.

TUNING OF PIANOS.—All who have paid any attention to the phenomena of strained steel wires know that there is a tendency in a wire which has long been strained to a certain pitch to remain at that pitch, and even to return to it, or towards it, if suddenly altered. Thus if you tune a wire sharper than it should be—say a quarter of a note, by way of experiment, and keep up to that pitch for a fortnight, and then let it suddenly down the quarter of a note, it will again grow sharper in the course of twenty-four hours, as though striving to regain its lost note. Now here is a hint for the treatment of pianos, and one which may be followed with advantage. It appears plain enough, from the principle here suggested, that if a piano were well and regularly tuned for the first year or two—say every month, or oftener, for the first year and a half—it would require a tendency to remain in tune, and behave better in that respect ever afterwards than if no such care were taken. Of course this treatment would not prevent an instrument from being affected by sudden variations of temperature, though it would in a considerable degree modify the effects of such variations. Among professional tuners of pianofortes, the man who gets through his work correctly in the shortest time, is generally to be preferred. An instrument which is long under the operation of tuning is not the likeliest to remain long in tune. The best tuners tune “hard,” as it is technically called—that is, with a smart stroke upon every key, and drawing the wire at once up to the required pitch, making little alteration afterwards. It would be well if Lord Stanhope’s principle of tuning were generally followed, by which the “wolf” is equally distributed throughout the scale. The result is extremely agreeable and pleasant to the ear, though the effect of some music is very much altered by it—the distinguishing characteristics of the several sharp and flat keys being thereby in a great measure done away.—Manchester Courier.

SCENE IN A THEATRE.—A most ludicrous scene took place at the Adelphi Theatre on Thursday night. The play was “Venice Preserved,” and in the touching scene between Jaffier and Pierre, in which the former implores the latter to ask his life, a very respectable Irishman, on one of the front seats of the pit, hearing Pierre say he “must die,” rushed over the back seats, shouting out, “I’ll go fetch a priest, I’ll go fetch a priest—wait while I get a priest.” We need not add that the house was in convulsions, and the play stopped for a time.—Liverpool Mail.

AN UNFORTUNATE DEBUT.—Balfé’s voice had formed into a barytone. Being much encouraged by his friends, he was induced to apply himself to its cultivation, and studied very attentively for a year, at the expiration of which (1825) he gave up his position in the orchestra of Drury-lane, with the intention of going on the stage. The manager of the Norwich theatre, a Mr. Crooke, having come up to town to make engagements, heard him sing, and was so pleased that he at once offered him a debut in the part of Caspar in “Der Freischütz.” The eventful night arrived, but got such an attack of “stage fright” that the manager deemed it expedient to send for a bottle of champagne to get “the steam up;” and having given the debutant a couple of glasses of wine at the wing, he forced him on the stage. The first scene was got through tolerably well; but by the time the “incantation” scene was set, previous to which Balfé had been supplied with a little more champagne, he began to feel certain queer symptoms about the head, which were quickly communicated to his feet, so much so that in walking down the stage he overturned the iron pot which contained the combustibles for red and blue fire. In a moment the whole place was in a blaze. The horrible smell overpowering poor Caspar, he fainted; the ladies in the boxes screamed with terror; the alarm of fire was given, and Balfé lay insensible in the midst of sulphurous smoke and magic bullets. The curtain dropped, and he was taken off to the green-room more dead than alive. Crooke rushing out into the street, made a most pathetic appeal to the audience, who were leaving the house, and succeeded to get a few people to come back, on the assurance that the fire was completely extinguished, and that he would read the part. The next morning’s papers announced that a young gentleman, named Balfé, had made a most brilliant debut in the part of Caspar; and having commented very severely on the performance, prophesied that he would never do any good either as an actor or singer. How far the prophecy has been fulfilled will be found in the fact of his having visited Norwich some years afterwards with a lucrative engagement for the festivals; and more recently in the same city as conductor of her Majesty’s Theatre, when he accompanied Jenny Lind on a provincial tour. After this “blaze of triumph,” as Bunn would call it, Balfé returned to London, mortified and disappointed.—Dublin University Magazine.

MADAME CATALANI.—No musical performer ever had a higher idea of her talents than Madame Catalani, and she was apt to express it with amusing naïveté. When she visited Hamburg for the first time, M. Schevenke, the chief musician of that city, criticised her vocal performances with great severity. Madame, on being told of his dissent from the general opinion, broke out into a great passion, calling him among other things, an impious man. "Sir," added she, "when God has given to a mortal so extraordinary a talent as I possess, people ought to applaud and honour it as a miracle, and it is profane to depreciate the gifts of heaven."

ANECDOTES OF BALFÉ'S EARLY LIFE.—The facility which he possessed, even at this early period of his career, of scoring musical ideas with rapidity, became well known to those with whom his professional duties brought him in contact. This talent was taken advantage of by a foreigner, who had just at that time arrived in London, and was beginning to acquire a sort of reputation for the possession of a tolerable voice and good ear, upon which stock in trade, coupled with unlimited assurance, he set up as a composer. Being, however, very ignorant of the theory of music, it became necessary, in order to carry out his views practically, to get some hard-working drudge to do what he used to call the mere mechanical part of the profession; accordingly, Balfé, of whose acquirements he had heard so much, was singled out for the purpose, his acquaintance cultivated, and in him he found just the person he wanted. Invitation followed invitation to sundry breakfasts, dinners, and suppers, which were no more liberally bestowed than heartily partaken of, and in return for this munificent hospitality, melodies and accompaniments for songs were written, which this distinguished foreigner sold, of course, in his own, and thereby acquired considerable reputation. But the crowning part of the imposture has yet to be told. The management of one of the theatres sent for him and requested his services to score an old opera from the pianoforte arrangement, stipulating, however, that the work should be done in one week. Here was a bold undertaking; but he was not a man to shrink from a difficulty, and so off he went to Balfé. "Now, you young rascal," said he, "if you can manage to score this opera, work night and day, and finish it in one week, you shall have ten pounds." "Ten pounds! a fortune! Make your mind easy, it shall be done." And so it was, for within six days he handed the score to his conscientious employer, who paid him the promised remuneration. "Hurrah, then, for a lark!" said Balfé; and calling on a chum of his, "My dear fellow," cried he, "I have earned a lot of money last week, so you must come along with me; and I'll frank you to Gravesend and back." The invitation was gladly accepted, and the next morning found them both in a steamer on their way down the river. Arrived at Gravesend, they did not much fancy the look of the place, so having made some enquiries about Rochester, they hired a pair of Rosinantes, and had a delightful ride to that town, where they put up at the best hotel. "What would you like for dinner, gentlemen?" "Everything you can give us," said the happy pair, who sat down to a splendid spread, attended by three or four servants. Balfé dubbed his friend Sir George, who called him Lord William in return; and the waiters, taking the hint, *Sir George and Lord William*ed them to their hearts' content. At last the two noblemen, what with sherry, champagne, and claret, became so very drunk, that it was deemed desirable to remove them to their respective chambers, a measure which was very carefully undertaken by the servants, under the immediate superintendence of "mine host." Balfé was the first to wake next morning, and, sitting up in his bed, began to rub his eyes, and "cudgel his brains" to find out exactly where he was, when the waiter entered the room with a message from Sir George to his lordship, to know when he would be pleased to take breakfast, and when he intended to start for London? These questions brought him at once to sober recollection, and keeping up the joke about the nobility, Lord William and Sir George breakfasted like princes, and shortly afterwards started on the road back to Gravesend, with the blessings of the landlord and his obsequious servants. A financial investigation took place shortly after their arrival in London, when it was very clearly ascertained, that of the ten pounds there remained but one, which soon followed in the same path as the other nine.—Dublin University Magazine.

ROSSINI.—When Rossini visited this country, I was introduced to him by Spagnoletti. He was a fine, portly, good-looking fellow, a voluptuary that revelled in the delights of the table as much as in the luxury of sweet sounds. He had just composed a dirge on the death of Lord Byron, the score of which he exhibited to me, obviously penned with great rapidity. I heard part of it performed, and thought it worthy of that great genius. I am not aware that this work has been printed. He sang the principal airs himself in a graceful manner and with a rich liquidity of tone; the easy movement of his voice delighted me; his throat seemed lacquered with Florence oil, so ripe and luscious were the tones he threw out. He was a perfect master of the pianoforte, and his mode of touching that instrument was beautifully neat and expressive. Garcia had brought his daughter, Malibran, then only fourteen, for the maestro to hear her sing; he accompanied her in a cavatina. When he sat down he had his walking-stick in his hand, for he was a great beau; and he contrived to hold it while he was playing; but his wife, seeing the incumbrance, drew it away. He was the most joyous, good-natured, well-fell fellow I ever saw; and I have no doubt, when at Carlton House, he broke through all ceremony, and was as much at ease with his majesty as represented. In his operatic pieces his style is as gay as himself; light and cheering, glowing with the brightest colours—a path so flowery that it gives birth to a new set of feelings in the musical science. Having none of the dark shades of Beethoven, we are lured among the gayest flowers of fancy. His compositions, though highly ornamented, possess a simplicity of thought intelligible to the most untutored ears. His style is full of voluptuous ease, and brings with it a relief from the cares of the world.—Music and Friends, by Mr. Gardiner.

THE BATEMAN CHILDREN.—The St. James's Theatre is crowded every night, the attractions being the performances of Miss Kate and Miss Ellen Bateman. These young children are real prodigies in the strictest sense of the word. The youngest, Ellen, is, perhaps, the wonder of the age, and we are certain no one will differ from us who has once seen her. Her talent is quite inconceivable. We are glad to find that the children have ceased playing in Shakespeare's plays, which made their talent appear in a false light, and threw their efforts into disrepute. Their performances during the past week have been confined to comedy and burlesque. A visit to the St. James's Theatre will not disappoint the highest expectation raised of Miss Ellen and Miss Kate Bateman.

MEYERBEER.—We are happy to inform our readers that the illustrious composer of the Huguenots, the Prophete, Robert le Diable, L'Africain, the Camp of Silesia, Il Crociato in Egitto, The Two Caliphs, Marguerite d'Anjou, Emma di Resburgo, an oratorio which Weber admired, the new comic opera for Madame Sontag, and others chefs-d'œuvre, has entirely recovered from his recent indisposition, and will shortly leave Boulogne for Spa in Belgium. Meyerbeer has been recently nominated member of the senate of the Academy of Berlin, which senate is the directing committee of the studies of the pupils.

DRURY LANE THEATRE.—We have heard nothing with regard to the arrangement of Mr. Bunn's ensuing expected campaign at Drury Lane Theatre, except the fact that Mr. Frederick Osborne Williams is engaged by the spirited impresario as chorus master. The theatre, it is supposed, will open in January with a pantomime. Signor Schira is named on good authority as the wielder of the baton.

ROGER, the animated French tenor has been singing with great success at Hamburg, the Free Town, and Hombourg, the German spa.

FIDELIO.—Not only at Cologne, but half-a-dozen other towns in Germany, this masterpiece has been revived with invariable success. Fidelio had been laid aside because no one could be found to play Fidelio, but now that Mr. Lumley, represented by Sophie Crivelli, has shown the way, Fidelios have been springing up like mushrooms.

HERB STIGELLI, the talented tenor of the Royal Italian Opera, has been engaged for a month at Manchester.

BENEDICT has left London for Naples, to join the family of Mrs. Benedict, with whom he remains for a short time.

Advertisements.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

PLAY-HOUSE PRICE NIGHTS

IN consequence of the increased demand FIVE MORE NIGHTS will be given, viz., on TUESDAY, SEPT. 23, 1851.

WEDNESDAY, SEPT. 24.
THURSDAY, SEPT. 25.
FRIDAY, SEPT. 26. And
SATURDAY, SEPT. 27.

Full particulars will be duly announced.

Prices—Pit, 5s.; Gallery, 2s. 6d.; Pit Stalls, 10s. 6d.; Gallery Stalls, 5s.; Boxes Two Pair 21s.; One Pair and Pit Tier, £1 11s. 6d.; Grand Tier, £2 2s.; Box Seats 5s. 6d. and 7s.

Applications for Boxes, Stalls, and Tickets, to be made at the Box Office of the Theatre. The Opera to commence at Eight o'clock.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY, EXETER HALL.

CONDUCTOR, MR. COSTA.—FRIDAY NEXT, 26th SEPTEMBER, ELIJAH. Vocalists—Madame Clara Novello, Miss Dolby, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Herr Formes. The Orchestra, the most extensive in Exeter Hall, will consist of (including 16 double basses) nearly 700 Performers. Tickets, 8s.; Reserved, 5s.; Central Area, numbered seats, 10s. 6d. each; at the Society's Office, 6, in Exeter Hall, or of Mr. Bowley, 53, Charing Cross.

SCHOTT AND CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

VIOLIN SOLOS WITH ACCOMPANIMENT FOR PIANO OR ORCHESTRA.

Alard, Delphin.	Op. 21, Souvenirs de Mozart.
Beriot de, Ch.	Op. 70, 6me. Concerto.
	Op. 76, 7me.
His. Fr.	Op. 2, Schnaucht nach der Schweiz. Variations.
Leonard, H.	Op. 14, 2nd Concerto.
	Op. 15, Grande Fantaisie Militaire.
Sainton, Prosper.	Lucresia Borgia. Fantaisie.
	Fille du Regiment.
	1st Concerto.

Schott and Co., 89, St. James's-street.

ERNST PAUER'S NEW PIANO SOLOS.

Op. 30, Caprice en forme de Tarantelle	2s. 0d.
Op. 31, Berceuse. Mélodie	2s. 0d.

Schott and Co., 89, St. James's-street.

TEDESCO'S PIANOFORTE WORKS.

PUBLISHED BY WESSÉL & Co.

Premier Nocturne	2s. 6d.
"The Cottage,"	Three German	2s. 6d.
"True Love,"	Melodies,	2s. 6d.
"L'eleve,"	3s. 0d.
"Les Etoiles,"	Three Etudes	2s. 6d.
"La Tournee,"	de Concert.	2s. 6d.
"The Curfew,"	2s. 0d.
"Passe," second Nocturne...	2s. 0d.
"Scène Russe," Caprice brillant	4s. 0d.
"Farwell,"	Three German	2s. 0d.
"Faithfulness,"	Melodies,	2s. 0d.
"Adieu,"	2s. 6d.

The above are Copyright.

Wessél & Co., 229, Regent-street, Lond.n.

EUTERPEON BY AN APPROVED MAKER,

PERFORMING several operatic Overtures and Airs, Marches, Fantasias, numerous sets of Waltzes by Lanner and Strauss, &c., was bought a bargain lately for 340 guineas, will be SOLD BY AUCTION, without reserve, on the premises, Woodbine Lodge, Haverfordwest, Pembrokeshire, South Wales, together with the select Household Furniture, Plate, Choice Wines, Library, Horses, Carriages, &c., the genuine property of H. Trelawney Freeman, Esq., who is leaving Wales. JOHN REES, Auctioneer, Haverfordwest. Sale on the 25th and 26th inst., each day at 11, a.m. Credit subject to conditions of Sale.

NEW DUETS FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

THALBERG	Beatrice di Tenda.
ROSELLEN	Deux Melodies de Donizetti, 1 and 2.
ROSELLEN	Val D'andore.
WOLFF	Valse Original.
WOLFF	Beatrice di Tenda.
SILAS	La Primavera, Bagatelle.
KALLIWODA	Invitation à la Danse.
OSBORNE	Pluie de Perles.
SCHULTZ	Duo L'espagnolo.
BEYER	Krieger's Lust March.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent-street.

THE ORGANIST'S COMPANION,

BY JOHN GOSS, Organist of St. Paul's Cathedral. A series of voluntaries, for the commencement, middle, and conclusion of divine service; also, a collection of interludes or short symphonies, to be played between the verses of the psalms or hymns, in numbers 2s. 6d. each, or 4 vols., 12 each.

PAROCHIAL PSALMODY.

A COLLECTION of Ancient and Modern tunes; also a variety of favourite responses to the Commandments, with directions for chanting, with an accompaniment for the Organ or Pianoforte, by John Goss, price 6s.

SACRED MELODIES.

SELECTED from eminent composers, and arranged for one or two voices, with an accompaniment for Organ or Pianoforte, by J. Goss, Organist of St. Paul's Cathedral. Price 6s.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent-street, and 67, Conduit-street.

THE POPULAR SONG OF THE DAY.

"TALK OF HIM THAT'S FAR AWA," composed by THOMAS CHANTREY. A new edition of which is just issued, may be had at ADDISON & COLLIERS, 210, Regent-street, London. For simplicity, elegance, and originality of melody, it is unrivalled.

Also, by the same author, "Why wilt thou not love?" and "The dream is past."

JOULE'S DIRECTORIUM CHORI ANGLICANUM.

Second Edition, price 1s., in cloth 1s. 6d.

THE most complete Choral Service book that has yet appeared. Dedicated by permission to the Lord Bishop of Manchester. For highly-favourable reviews see "Christian Remembrancer," "Theologian," "Parish Choir," &c. &c. London: J. A. Novello. A few copies of the quarto edition, price 15s., still on hand.

CURES FOR THE UNCURED!

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.—Cure of a Red Leg of more than sixty years' standing.—Mr. Barker, of No. 5, Graham's Place, Drypool, near Hull, had ulcers on his leg from the age of 18 until upwards of 80, and although for many years he had sought the first advice in the country, nothing was found to cure them. He often suffered excruciating pain for long periods together, which incapacitated him from attending to his business. He had given up all hopes of getting a cure, when at last he was persuaded to try Holloway's Pills and Ointment, which he did, and however wonderful it may appear, the leg was thoroughly healed by their means, and by continuing to use the Pills alone after his leg was well, he has become in health so hale and hearty as now to be more active than most men of fifty. N.B.—The truth of this extraordinary statement can be vouched for by Mr. J. C. Reinhardt, 22, Market Place, Hull. Feb. 20th, 1850.

The Pills should be used conjointly with the Ointment in the following cases:—
Bad Legs Coco Bay Contracted and Lumbago Scurvy
Bad Breasts Chiego-foot Stiff Joints Piles Sore-heads
Burns Chilblains E'phanitasis Rheumatism Tumours
Bunions Chapped hands Fistulas Scalds Ulcers
Bite of Moscho- Corns (Soft) Gout Sore Nipples Wounds
toes and Sand- Cancers Glandular Swell- Sore-throats Yaws
Flies Ings Skin-diseases

Sold by the Proprietor, 244, Strand, (near Temple Bar,) London; and by all respectable Vendors of Patent Medicines throughout the Civilized World in Pots and boxes, at 1s. 1d., 2s. 5d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 22s., and 35s. each. There is a very considerable saving in taking the larger sizes.

N. B.—Directions for the guidance of Patients are affixed to each Pot or Box.

Printed and Published, for the Proprietors, by MICHAEL SAMUEL MYERS, of No. 3, Studley Villas, Studley Road (Clapham Road, in the parish of Lambeth, at the office of MYERS and Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, in the parish of St. Paul, where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed, post paid, To be had of G. Furkes, Dean Street 8 no; Allen, Warwick Lane; Vickers, Holywell Street, and at all Booksellers.—Saturday, September 20, 1851.

The Musical World.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s.; Half year, 8s.; Three Months, 4s.; (Stamped Copies 1s. per Quarter extra.) payable in advance, to be forwarded by Money Order, to the Publishers, Meyers & Co., 22, Tavistock-st., Covent Garden.

No. 39.—VOL. XXIX.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 1851.

Price Fourpence.
Stamped Fivepence.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

RESUME OF THE SEASON.

(Continued from our Last.)

[ABOUT the period at which we have arrived occurred the grand fete champetre at the "Chancellor's," Hammersmith, where the aristocratic and wealthy patrons of Her Majesty's Theatre, the literary and artistic celebrities who accept private boxes and stalls, the members of the independent press, who support the establishment, by holding a candle to its weaknesses, and the flower of the troupe, operatic and choregraphic, were summoned by the gallant impresario to meet in friendly confection. The visitors began to assemble about 3 o'clock A.M., and long before midnight, it was "joliment mèle"—a fairy rout in the grounds, and plenty to eat and to drink par-lout. When dancing began, all danced except those unaffected to the sport, who preferred rambling about the swards, penetrating into the thickets, or feasting ad libitum in the well-stored salons-à-manger—of either and every of which inclinations there were many partisans. If it is expected of us to record who were at the fete, that expectation will not be fulfilled. We can, however, "make short tale" by saying that every personage of any note, not urged to absence by more pressing and important duties, was present, and circulated freely at Mr. Lumley's fete—the second of the kind which has been held at the "Chancellor's," and equal in splendour to the first, which it will be remembered was given in honour of Messrs. Scribe and Halevy, in the memorable season of 1850, when the strains of La Tempesta first ravished the ears of the élite of the Operatic dilettanti, and wooed the most brilliant pens to eager and poetical apostrophe. To the curious foreigner and anxious stranger, the most interesting themes for observation were not the guests illustrious by rank, or wealth, or station, who had congregated at Mr. Lumley's hospitable bidding, but the literary "lions" and artistic "stars" that roared and twinkled in all directions, out-roaring the thunder of the military bands, and out-twinkling the light of the prostrated lamps, which, multi-coloured, glittered in the flower-beds, and on the grass, and in the tree branches—as it were glow-worms, fire-flies, and jack-o'-lanterns in multitudinous and eccentric regiments at your feet, above your head, and, so to speak, floating unsustained in the middle atmosphere. Thus, to see Rachel Felix flitting through the trees, darker than night—or Carlotta Grisi, whose tiny feet scarce made a pressure on the herbage—or Sophie Cruvelli flashing by, a meteor speeding to its unknown home—or the three together—Rachel, Carlotta, Sophie—like the fates, the graces, or the attendant spirits that wait upon the Queen of Night; three shades more bright and beautiful than suns; a trinity in whose union is contained the world and mystery of mimic art, was far more an object of desire than to behold a dozen Dukes, or gaze on twenty Marquises, and twenty-five "attaches," à no matter what ambassades. To catch Thackeray in a corner, silently swallowing a goblet of champagne, with moody eye and melancholy elbow, meditating a new chapter against life, was more appetissant than to dodge the steps of General Narvaez, or follow the vagaries of ever so much of a Dowager. These inter alia; the rest may be imagined without our aid; and now, indeed, we recollect that the fete at Hammersmith, regatta and feu d'artifices to boot, having nothing precisely to do with Her Majesty's Theatre, must be looked upon as an episode, cut short accordingly—long episode being always a bore—and shut up in brackets, as parenthesis.]

* * * * *

ALBONI came out on Saturday, the 12th of July, in her favourite part of Cenerentola. The triumph achieved by this magnificent singer, who has carried the vocal art to the extremest point, can never be forgotten by those who were present on the occasion. That glorious voice retained all its richness, mellow tone, flexibility, roundness, equality, extended range, and voluptuous sweetness. That astonishing brilliancy—that never swerving certainty—that largeness and grandeur of phrasing which imparted to the largo more than its inherent dignity, and to the cantabile the full tide of its flow and measure—that pliancy of voice and complete control of the singer which raise the "Non piu mesta" to a miracle of florid execution, as delightful from its variety of colour and exquisite balance as from the ease with which the prodigious tours de force are realised, were still, as ever, incomparable. In short, Alboni was Alboni—Mariette Alboni, of the laughing eyes and silver tones—to be more than whom would be to be beyond the limits of perfectability—and so to escape the sympathies of human nature, which can only appreciate the finite. The youngest daughter of Italian song, upon whose shoulders had descended the mantles of so many Queens of adagio and cabaletta, was welcomed again with an enthusiasm that must ever rekindle at the first sound of a voice whose vibrations are to the air as the mysterious emotions of love to the soul—with an enthusiasm which belongs to her as a birthright. From the quaint romance, "Una volta c'era un Re," to the rondo finale, "Non piu mesta," it was one unbroken chain of triumphs for Alboni, who never more completely vindicated her prerogative to be entitled the "last of the Romans"—the dernier rejeton of a hoar and mighty oak, which, old and weak at the root, in giving birth to this latest and most favoured child, had unsapped itself to the core, and become barren to the end of time. In rendering ample justice to the transcendent merits of Alboni, the critics justly complained of the inefficiency of those who surrounded her. Lablache and Calzolari excepted, the disposition of the characters was feeble and unsatisfactory. Ferranti was found quite out of his element in Dandini, and the ladies who personated the two sisters of Cenerentola were by no means what they would have been had they been more tolerable.

The Nozze di Figaro was repeated on the following Wednesday—an extra night—which gave Sophie Cruvelli an opportunity of vindicating her fame as a singer of classical music. Her "Voi che sapete" this time was purity itself—perfection, indeed—and the result was an encore even more unanimous and hearty than that accorded to the ornamented version, which had been previously represented. Nothing could surpass the "Voi che sapete" but the "Non so piu cosa," an exhibition of rare and impetuous feeling, which, in its turn, was only surpassed by the "Voi che sapete." In short, Sophie Cruvelli was Sophie Cruvelli, and ministered to Mozart as a chosen priest swinging incense at his shrine, and laying a sacrifice upon his altar. And yet, after this genuine triumph, the capricious charmer, in repeating the song, reintroduced the old ornaments and floriture, once more turning her back upon the temple. "Sophie," said D. R., in a censorious mood, "Sophie, you are incorrigible! Nevertheless, look to it—listen to the words of honest counsel, and let not the hollowness of vain palms, eating against each other, noisy emblems of a void, deter you from your better impulses. Sing Mozart for those who love Mozart—Verdi for those who love Verdi—Bellini for those who love Bellini." And Sophie did listen, and from that time forward, as has been duly noted down, never misused a melody of the divine master, whose genius could scarcely have a more kindred and inspired interpreter than the gifted young artist, who had persuaded Beethoven from his hiding-place, and restored his Fidelio to the world's love and the world's sympathies.

On Saturday, the 19th, Ernani was produced. Sophie Cruvelli was the Elvira. It is not a little to say of this young singer that, after performing in Verdi's operas for four years in various parts of Europe, she has preserved all the freshness and beauty of a voice unsurpassed in either quality, while, on the other hand, its strength, volume, and range have been materially augmented. Such a physique as Cruvelli's, however, is almost unprecedented, and as her case is only an exception, it may be brought forward to fortify the rule, that Verdi's music is inimical to the human voice, and tends to impair the human lungs (like Halévy's). We are sorry for it; but it is not our fault, and as we are paid for speaking the truth, we are compelled to tell it. We are the more disposed to admit Cruvelli in the character of Elvira, from the fact of its having been her first essay in 1848, when she came before a London audience in the bloom of nineteen summers, and at once subdued them by her fire and genial impulse. It was also as Elvira, last spring, at the fall to Mr. Lumley's season in Paris, that Cruvelli laid the habitués of the "Bouffes," lions and all, scented and unscented, vernis and non vernis, at her feet. This makes us tolerate Elvira—and more than this, that Ernani is Verdi's best opera, and still more that Cruvelli's singing in the cavatina, "Ernani involami," is one of the most energetic and powerful vocal displays of these times, and that her entire performance in the last scene, with Ernani and the old gentleman of the horn, is a master-piece of passion and intensity, which we should really be sorry not to witness now and then.

Cruvelli's success in Ernani has been as great this season as before, and although Mr. Shirley Brookes maintained in glib prose, and with much eloquence, that it was not a good part for her, the public thought otherwise, and the Chronicle was at a discount. Much that Mr. Brookes adduced, however, was good and honest, and we remember, in a spirited article, ourselves to have advised Mdlle. Cruvelli to get the following words of the critic written in letters of gold, framed and glazed, and hung up in her study, as a daily memento and admonisher. "We have often recorded our unfeigned admiration of Mdlle. Cruvelli's high talents and genius, and feel that those who counselled her not to make her debut this season in her opening part of 1848, counselled well. Had she reappeared as Elvira instead of Fidelio she would scarcely have attained so soon the eminent position she has honourably won and which she will, we are sure, permanently retain." (We quote from memory). The counsellors who counselled Fidelio as the opening part for Sophie Cruvelli, were ourselves, in the Musical World. (See ante, May 17, No. 20). The result proved our wisdom and justified the praises bestowed upon us by the Chronicle, whose sentences we republish, with a reiteration of the advice to "frame, glaze, and hang up, in study." To conclude, Elvira added another to Cruvelli's successes, and the general performance of the opera was greatly strengthened by our admirable English tenor, Sims Reeves, whose Ernani, both vocally and histrionically, is an effort of first-rate ability. On the other hand, Scapini was but a sorry Silva; while, again, on the other (sic) other hand, Coletti sang the music of Carlo V. delightfully, and helped to secure the encore of the quintet in the catacomb finale of the third act, upon which Rossini made a funny parody, that, not remembering, we refrain from quoting.

The long expected opera of Auber, La Corbeille d'Oranges, composed expressly for Alboni, was adapted for the Italian stage and produced on Tuesday the 22nd of July. Alboni saved this joint composition of Scribe and Auber from the entire indifference of the public, by the most consummate singing—consummate even for Alboni, whose singing is prima facie, the consummation of the art vocal. Nevertheless, although Alboni was Zerlina, Zerlina was not Alboni, and after two representations Zerlina was "thrown into the basket," and the whole, including the oranges, deposited in the lumber-room of oblivion, who, applying his special attribute in proprid personâ, forgot himself, and went to sleep, dreaming that Zerlina was Florinda. Oblivion should have heard Sappho—Sappho—Sappho—he would never have forgotten that. Sappho sticks in the memory like a chronic pain in the side, or an obstinate lumbago, or a zealous sciatica, that will make you ache in defiance of opium, vapour baths, or brandy and water. The performance of Zerlina was further remarkable for the first appearance at Her Majesty's Theatre of Mdlle. Nau, the French soprano, who in the part of Jemma (Alboni's daughter), sang a very elaborate air-de-bravoure, with great neatness and brilliancy. The other parts, if remembrance does not deceive us, were sustained by Calzolari, and Scapini or Casanova—we are always confounding the two. This was the third new work brought out by the enterprising director, and alas! the third failure. Such spirit and ill-adventure have seldom followed each other so persistently.

The next event of consequence was the revival of Linda di Chamouni for Cruvelli, on Tuesday the 29th July. Cruvelli had the disadvantage of coming into immediate comparison with Madame Sontag, who, after an absence of twenty years, reappeared before the English public in this very part, and had retained it since as her own property. As a dramatic performance, we may at once say that the Linda of Cruvelli was by far the most intellectual we have seen; whole in its vocal essentials, differing from preceding models, it equalled any of them, and, in some respects, was superior to them all. Still, on the whole, we agree with those critics who pronounced the part to be unworthy of her enthusiastic temperament. The feature which most impressed us in Cruvelli's performance was the last scene, in which the gradual return to reason of the heroine, bereaved of her senses by her misfortunes, was a master-stroke of art, worthy of any actress that ever trod the boards. The oftener we see Cruvelli the more we are convinced that had she not been one of the most admirable singers, she would still have been one of the greatest tragedians of the day. Carlo was the first part in which Sims Reeves came out at Her Majesty's Theatre. No one plays it better and no one sings it better than our superb tenore, who sustains the honor of English talent so triumphantly on the Italian stage. Coletti's Antonio, though differing materially from Tamburini's and immaterially from Ronconi's impersonation of the heavy indignant father, stands in need of no apostrophe at our pen. A more perfectly correct, intelligent, and bustling representative of the Marquis than Frederick Lablache could not have been desired. An event of special interest, however, was the first appearance of Mademoiselle Marie Cruvelli, elder sister of the gifted prima donna assoluta, in the part of Pierotto, the Savoyard.*

* Our collaborateur is in error. This was not Marie Cruvelli's first appearance; the charming contralto had already sung with great success at the concert of Signor Puzi, and the first grand morning concert at Her Majesty's Theatre, the grand duet from Semiramide, with her sister Sophie.—Ed. M. W.

In addition to a voice of great flexibility and beautiful quality, Mdlle. Marie Cruvelli displayed a command of vocalisation, which proved her a thorough artist. Her acting was intelligent, though quiet and unassuming to a remarkable degree, while her highly prepossessing personal appearance lent an agreeable illusion to the part. It has been much regretted that this young lady should have appeared so seldom in the course of this triple season.

The revival of La Gazza Ladra brought forward the glorious Alboni in one of her most recently chosen parts, since she abandoned the absolute contralto for the universal line—the soprano, mezzo, alto, and everything. Of Alboni's Ninetta we need say nothing here, except—but we must pause for a line to admire the scrupulous manner in which the supreme vocalist adheres to the text of Rossini. In this particular MARIETTA ALBONI is an example for all the world—a model that Sontag, Sophie Cruvelli, and any of them might follow with advantage. Calzolari is always good in Rossini's music; his flexible voice and graceful manner of phrasing (essentially Italian, and of the best), being just suited to the fluent strains of the gorgeous "Swan of Pesaro." His Gianetto was as good as ever. As for Coletti's Fernando it must always be admired, while Lablache's Podesta can never enough be laughed at. Mdlle. Ida Bertrand was a highly finished and by no means bashful Pippo.

Meanwhile the ballet all this time was confined to fragments from this, fragments from that, fragments from the other—Les Trois Graces—L'Île des Amours, La Sylphide (Marie Taglioni), Le Diable à Quatre (Marie Taglioni), Il Prodigio, Masaniello, &c., &c.—but not the ghost of a new pas, much less a new divertissement or ballet. Carlotta had flown to the sea side in Scotland, and Rosati, Amalia Ferraris, and Marie Taglioni constituted the strength and brightness of the coregraphic constellation. M. Paul Taglioni calmly rested on his oars, and allowed the new ballet of St. George's to float quietly down the stream of the channel, until it reached Ostend, and was emballé for Berlin, with music, not by Loder, but by Pugni—a rushlight to the moon! And now for Barbieri Nini.

(To be concluded in our next.)

JENNY LIND.

(From Mary Howitt's translation of Hans Anderson's Life.)

At this period of my life, I made an acquaintance which was of great moral and intellectual importance to me. I have already spoken of several persons and public characters who have had influence upon me as the poet; but none of these have had more, nor in a nobler sense of the word, than the lady to whom I here turn myself; she through whom I, at the same time, was enabled to forget my own individual self, to feed that which is holy in art, and to become acquainted with the command which God has given to genius.

The conversation was soon turned to her appearance in Copenhagen, and of this Jenny Lind declared that she stood in fear.

"I have never made my appearance," said she, "out of Sweden; everybody in my native land is so affectionate and kind to me, and if I made my appearance in Copenhagen and should be hissed!—I dare not venture on it!"

I said that I, it was true, could not pass judgment on her singing, because I had never heard it, neither did I know how she acted, but, nevertheless, I was convinced that such was the disposal at this moment in Copenhagen, that only a moderate voice, and some knowledge of acting would be successful; I believed that she might safely venture.

Bournonville's persuasion obtained for the Copenhageners the greatest enjoyment they ever had.

At one concert Jenny Lind sang her Swedish songs; there was something so peculiar in this, so bewitching people thought nothing about the concert room; the popular melodies uttered by a being so purely feminine, and bearing the universal stamp of genius, exercised their omnipotent sway—the whole of Copenhagen was in raptures. Jenny Lind was the first singer to whom the Danish students gave a serenade—the serenade was given; she expressed her thanks by again singing some Swedish songs, and I then saw her hasten into the darkest corner and weep for emotion.

"Yes, yes," said she, "I will exert myself; I will endeavour, I will be better qualified than I am, when I again come to Copenhagen."

The Daughter of the Regiment and the Sonnambula are certainly Jenny Lind's most unsurpassable parts; no second can take their places in these beside her. People laugh—they cry; they become better for it. People feel that God is in art; and where God stands before us face to face, there is a holy church.

There is not anything which can lessen the impression which Jenny Lind's appearance on the stage makes, except her own personal appearance at home. An intelligent and child-like disposition exercises here its astonishing power; she is happy; belonging as it were, no longer to the world, a peaceful, quiet home, is the object of her thoughts—yes she loves art with her whole soul and feels her vocation in it. A noble, pious disposition like hers cannot be spoiled by homage. On one occasion only did I hear her express her joy in her talent and her self-consciousness. It was during her last residence in Copenhagen. Almost every evening she appeared either in the opera or concerts; every hour was in requisition. She heard of a society, the object of which was to assist unfortunate children, and to take them out of the hands of their parents by whom they were misused, and compelled to beg or steal, and to place them in other and better circumstances. Benevolent people subscribed annually a small sum each for their support, nevertheless the means for this excellent purpose were small.

"But have I not still a disengaged evening?" said she, "let me give a night's performance for the benefit of these poor children; but we will have double prices!"

Such a performance was given, and returned large proceeds; when she was informed of this, and that by this means a number of poor children would be benefited for several years, her countenance beamed, and the tears filled her eyes.

"It is, however, beautiful," said she, "that I can sing so!" Through Jenny Lind I first became sensible of the holiness there is in art; through her I learned that one must forget oneself in the service of the Supreme. No books, no men have had a better or more ennobling influence on me, as the poet, than Jenny Lind, and I therefore have spoken of her so long and so warmly here.

A ROYAL MANAGER.—The privilege of the Teatro d'Oriente at Madrid having been offered for several weeks to public competition, without any acceptable offer being made for its purchase, her majesty has taken it on her own account, and named M. Temistocle Solera the director.—Galignani.

MEMOIR OF BENEDETTO MARCELLO.

BENEDETTO MARCELLO, a noble Venetian, whose family is mentioned by all the historians of Venice, was born in July 1686. His father, Agostino Marcello, was a senator; his mother, Paolina, was of the honourable family of Capello, the daughter of Girolamo Capello, and aunt of Pietro Andrea Capello, ambassador from the States of Venice to the courts of Spain, Vienna, and Rome, and also in England in that capacity about the year 1743. Marcello's elder brother, Alessandro, had attained a great knowledge in natural philosophy and mathematics; and Benedetto after having been instructed in classical literature, and gone through a regular course of education under proper masters, was committed to his tuition. Alessandro lived at Venice, and had in his house a weekly musical meeting, in which his own compositions were frequently performed. Being a man of genius and rank, his house was the resort of most of the strangers that came to visit the city. The Princes of Brunswick, when at Venice, were invited to one of the musical performances; and Benedetto, at the time very young, being present, they took particular notice of him. In the hearing of Alessandro, they asked him, among other questions, what were the studies that most engaged his attention; "Oh," said his brother, "he is a very useful little fellow to me, he fetches my books and papers, and this is fittest employment for him." The boy was nettled at an answer which reflected as much upon his supposed want of genius as his youth. He therefore resolved to apply himself to some particular study, and soon fixed upon that of music. His principal instructors were Gasparini and Antonio Lotti. In the year 1716, the birth of the first son of the Emperor Charles the Sixth was celebrated at Vienna with great magnificence; and on this occasion a serenata composed by Benedetto Marcello was performed there with great applause. Marcello's compositions are very numerous. Two of his cantatas, Il Timeo and La Cassandra, have been much admired. He wrote also a mass which is celebrated. This was performed for the first time in the church of Santa Maria della Celestia, on the daughter of his brother taking the veil in that monastery. He likewise set to music the Lamentations of Jeremiah, the Miserere, and the Salve. These, with many other sacred compositions, he gave to the Church of Santa Sophia, and was himself at the pains of instructing the singers in the manner in which they were to be performed. In the year 1724, appeared the first four parts of a Paraphrase of the Psalms, in Italian, by Giustiniani, set to music for one, two, and three voices, by Marcello; and in the course of the two following years four parts, including in the whole the first fifty psalms, were published. In the prefatory address of the poet and composer, the nature of the work is explained. Of the paraphrase they state, that the original text is as closely followed as possible, and that the verse is of various metres and without rhyme. Of the music it is observed, that as the subject required the words and sentiments to be clearly and properly expressed, it is for the most part adapted to two voices only. The writer says, however that it may and ought to be sung by a great number of voices, agreeably to the practice mentioned in the sacred writings, of psalms and hymns being sung by many companies and choruses. There are introduced into the work several of the most ancient and best known intonations of the Hebrews, which are still sung by Jews, and are a species of music peculiar to that people. These (which, for want of a better word, we must call chants), he says he has sometimes accompanied according to the artificial practice of the moderns; as he has also done by certain cantilenas of the ancient Greeks. The latter, he informs us, he has interpreted with the utmost diligence, and by the help of Alypius and Gaudentius, reduced them to modern practice. To those mysterious and emphatic sentences, in which the royal prophet has denounced the terrors of divine justice, Marcello has adapted a peculiar kind of music, a modulation, as he calls it, in the madrigalese style, with a commixture of the diatonic and chromatic genera. In doing this, he compares his labours to those of a pilot, who, in a wide and tempesttuous ocean, avails himself of every wind that may conduct him to his port, yet, in a long and dangerous voyage, is constrained to vary his course. A few brief directions for the performance of the several compositions, and a modest apology for the defects of the work, conclude this preface; which though written under the influence of strong prejudices, contains an ingenious and learned dissertation on the subject of poetry and music. For a character of the work we must refer to the numerous letters and testimonies of eminent musicians and others, which accompany it. In these it is stated, that some of the music had been adapted to German words, and performed with great applause, in the Cathedral Church of Hamburg; that the Russians had translated the paraphrase into their language, adapting it to the original music of Marcello; that, at Rome, the compositions were held in the highest estimation by all who professed to understand or love music; and that at the palace of Cardinal Ottoboni, there was a musical assembly once a week, in which some of the works of Corelli and one of the psalms of Marcello made constantly a part of the entertainment.

When the news of Marcello's death arrived at Rome, the Pope, as a public testimony of respect for his memory, ordered a solemn musical service to be performed on a day appointed for the usual assembly. The room was hung with black, and the performers and all other persons present were in mourning.

Charles Avison, organist of Newcastle, celebrated the above work of Marcello in his Essay on Musical Expression; and issued proposals for publishing, by subscription, an edition revised by himself. The execution of this design devolved, however, upon Mr. John Garth, of Durham, who adapted suitable words from our own prose translation of the psalms to the music; and, by the assistance of a numerous subscription, the work was completed and published in eight folio volumes. Several specimens of Marcello's psalms are to be found in Steven's Sacred Music; and parts of his fourth and seventh psalms, arranged for keyed instruments, are inserted in Dr. Crotch's selections. From the extent of his studies, it might be supposed that Marcello devoted himself wholly to a life of ease and retirement. This, however, was not the case. He held several honourable posts in the state, and, as a zealous and active magistrate, was ever ready to contribute his share of attention and labour towards the support of the government under which he lived. He was, for many years, a judge in one of the Councils of Forty; but from thence he was removed to the charge of proveditor of Pola, and afterwards was appointed to the office of chamberlain or treasurer of the city of Brescia. He died at this place in the year 1739, and was buried in the Church of the Minor Observants of St. Joseph's of Brescia.

Marcello left behind him, in manuscript, a Treatise on Proportions, another on the Musical System, and a third on the Harmonical Concords, with a great number of poetical compositions. His printed works inserted in the Dutch catalogues were "VI. Sonate à Violoncello solo e Basso continuo, Opera Prima; XII. Sonate à flauta solo e Basso continuo, Opera Seconda; and VI. Sonate à tre, due Violoncello, o due Viole da Gamba, e Violoncello Basso continuo" called "Opera Seconda." Mr. Avison has asserted that the psalms of Marcello contain the most perfect assemblage of the grand, the beautiful, and the pathetic in music, that had ever been known; yet there have not been wanting men of sound judgment and great skill, who assert that their general levity renders them more adapted to private entertainment than the service of the church. That they abound in evidences of a fertile imagination, improved to a high degree by study, all persons must allow; but whoever will contemplate that style of music which in the purest ages, has been thought best adapted to excite devout affections, and understands what is meant in music by the epithets sublime and pathetic, will be apt to entertain a doubt whether these can, with greater propriety, be applied to them than to many less celebrated compositions.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

The play-house prices having continued to fill the theatre during the past week, another series of five performances were given during the present week, and have proved as attractive as the former. The only novelties of the late performance have been the appearance of Cruvelli in two new characters, Rosina in the Barbiere, and Amina in Sonnambula—the last named, her first performance in London.

In 1848, Cruvelli's Rosina was considered one of her best impersonations, and it is not to be supposed but that Cruvelli's Rosina in 1851, with her powers matured, her experience quadrupled, her judgment confirmed, and her taste refined, would have been an improvement on her first essay. Admiration as Cruvelli's Rosina was when we first criticised it, it may be pronounced now as a first rate performance, brilliant in vocalisation, and replete with vivacity and naïveté in the acting. The value of Cruvelli's splendid voice was manifested in a high degree in Rossini's music, which being written for a mezzo soprano, requires fullness and power to give it due effect. The only fault we have to find with Cruvelli's singing in Rosina is the too lavish use of ornaments, and those not always consonant to the character of the music. The "Una voce," for instance, though a dashing and energetic vocal display, did not altogether satisfy us. We should have liked less embellishment and more certainty. In other respects the Rosina was entirely worthy of the fair singer. In the duet "Dunque io son," the trio "Ah! qual colpo;" and more especially the quintet "Freddo ed immobile"—in which we heard for the first time at this theatre, since Alboni sang it, the music of Rossini rightly given—the text was rigidly preserved, and the ensemble benefited in consequence. In short, bating the liberties taken with the "Una voce," which we must confess verged as much on the extravagant as those of Malibran in old times, and of Persiani and Sontag later, the new Rosina may be welcomed as one of the best on the present stage. With regard to the freedoms taken with "Una voce" it seems to have been the opinion with some of the greatest singers—among others the greatest of all, Malibran—that Rossini's melody was an excellent frame work on which to hang their embroideries; and as such merely they have used it. But with deference to all these embroiderers of Rossini—these gilders of refined gold—we prefer the melody with all its native adornments (and they are not stinted), more particularly ever since we heard Alboni, who without altering a note produced a far greater effect in the "Una voce" than any singer we ever heard—not excepting Malibran or Persiani, who thought more of their own ingenious fancies and devices than the text of the composer. Their only excuse was that the "Una voce" was hackneyed to death, and that with anything so used up it was necessary to introduce ornaments and cadences to profusion. Our answer is, such a melody as "Una voce" cannot be hackneyed. "A thing of beauty is a joy for ever."

Another novelty in the cast of the Barbieri was the Figaro of Lorenzo, who, always obliging and ready, undertook, without being ready, the part of the intriguing barber, in the absence of Signor Ferranti. Had Signor Lorenzo had time to study the music, we have little doubt, from the zeal and vivacity he displayed, both in his acting and singing, but that his Figaro, spite of the serious drawback of his voice not being sufficiently high, nor sufficiently flexible, would have been an adequate and recognisable performance. Signor Lorenzo deserves the greatest credit for the promptitude and boldness with which he accepts any character which may be allotted to him in the repertoire. He is undoubtedly one of the most useful members of Mr. Lumley's troupe.

Signor Balanchi, as might have been expected, took a different view of Doctor Bartolo from Lablache. His performance, indeed, was a very serious one. Perhaps, when he gets a little more used to the part, he may be induced to project into it the smallest amount of comedy.

On Saturday, the Sonnambula was given for the first time with Cruvelli, and was repeated on Tuesday. The great success achieved by Cruvelli led to this. A more thorough and legitimate success we have seldom, if ever, witnessed. Had the performance taken place in the heart of the season, we are inclined to think, the Sonnambula, with Cruvelli as Amina, would have proved the great feature of the year. As it is, it is much to be lamented, for the sake of the manager, for the sake of the public, doubly for the sake of the artist.

Cruvelli's Amina is altogether an original conception. She takes a view of the character different from that of all her predecessors, from Malibran, through the whole range of minorities, down to Grisi, Persiani, Lind, and Sontag. In the first act this contradistinction is especially observable. We need hardly say that Malibran's version of Amina is that which has been imitated by all subsequent impersonators of the somnambulist; but the overwhelming joyousness and superabundance of animal spirits which, in her acting and singing, appeared to illuminate the whole stage during the first act, was either unattempted or unattained. Cruvelli, on the other hand, seems overpowered by the near approach of her felicity. She enters the scene, smiling certainly, but her smile is dashed, not with a cloud on the brow, but with some inward emotion, which seems to have looked up all gladness in her heart, and refuses to let it wander into light. This feeling is scrupulously preserved throughout the entire scene, more especially when Elvira is present. Even at the very moment she signs the contract, when her happiness may be supposed at its height, there is no display of exhilaration: the artist draws a strong line of demarcation between hilarity and joy. She gives her hand passively to her lover, and the tremulous tones of the voice, and the half-drooping head, convey, beyond all words, the depth of her emotions. Physiologically speaking, Cruvelli's conception is correct. We learn from the highest medical authorities that the temperament of somnambulists invariably inclines to the melancholic. The slight shadow projected over the joy of Amina in the earlier scenes of Sonnambula is, therefore, referable to the highest standard of criticism, nature. But more than this, poetically speaking, Cruvelli's idea is, to our thinking, the right one. Tears, oftener than smiles, are the indications of a heart suffused with joy; and we are inclined to allow little real sentiment to that person who, in the hour of his dearest happiness, inflates his cheek with laughter, and varies his action with gambols. This may be good schoolboy hilarity at the renewal of the holidays, but it could scarcely, with poetical justice, be ascribed to one whose cup of earthly happiness was overflowing. At the same time it must be conceded that Malibran's conception was the most striking and effective. With the eye of a great artist she perceived how necessary contrasts were to dramatic effects, and she purposely heightened the mirthfulness of the first scenes to bring out the tragic ones with more force. We shall not pause to consider whether, for the sake of aiming at the principal ends of stage performance, an artist is justified in overstepping the limits, if not the modesty, of nature. We shall leave that to more cunning casuists than we are. Such certainly has been done by most of the greatest actors and singers the stage has seen.

In the second act what is principally required is the power of representing strong passions, and in this we consider all the modern Aminas to have signally failed. In fact, up to the present moment, dating from Malibran, no singer, who has undertaken the part of Amina, has had sufficient tragic powers to realise the idea of the poet and the musician. It must be remembered that Sonnambula was written expressly for Pasta, when that great tragedian was in the zenith of her fame; and that it was acknowledged to have been Malibran's most wonderful effort. Malibran was equally as great a tragic actress as Pasta, but, in addition, she was a far greater comic actress, and thus her Amina was incomparably the best of the two. It seems somewhat strange that after passing through the hands of the two loftiest tragic artists of the operatic stage, Amina should have descended, apparently as a matter of right, to second rate tragic artists, or to artists without any tragic pretensions whatsoever. Jenny Lind's Amina, as a piece of acting, was passionless, and therefore, to us, was always, to a certain extent, deficient. However exquisitely beautiful and finished her singing might have been, there was no illusion, no abstraction in her acting; the mere art was ever too apparent. The same, in a still greater degree, may be affirmed of Persiani and Sontag, and other Aminas too numerous to mention.

As it appears to us, after having witnessed two performances, Cruvelli in Amina, as in Fidelio, is the only legitimate successor of Malibran. Despite the difference above noted, the resemblance between the two assumptions is striking in the main. The same tragic view of the character taken, and the same energetic means employed; the same passion and the same power displayed; and the whole conception on a larger and a grander scale than what we have been accustomed to witness, lead to this conclusion. If we add to this, that Cruvelli's voice, in its extent, volume, and quality, bears a great similarity to that of Malibran, we think we may close the parallel without violence.

In the recitative, "Care Compagne," and the first movement of the grand scena, "Come per me sereno," we were hardly prepared for what was to follow. Cruvelli was anxious—if not nervous—and tried, perhaps, to accomplish too much. Occasionally we should have desired more finish in a cadenza, and less contrast of tone. The cabaletta, however, was sufficient to make amends for a thousand such minor deficiencies. It was magnificently and brilliantly sung, and treated with admirable skill. One only attempted effect we should have wished away; viz., the dwelling too long on a low note towards the end; which certainly did not attune with such superb singing as was manifested throughout the movement. This practice of showing off the low notes should be carefully eschewed. They would tell much better if they were given less pointedly.

Of the second act of Sonnambula we can speak in terms of unqualified praise, and pronounce it Sophie Cruvelli's masterpiece. From the first moment of starting from her sleep in the Count's bed, to the despair of the finale, her singing and acting were equally powerful, truthful, and intense. Indeed there were many passages which we are quite certain Malibran herself never surpassed. Of these we may cite the lines,

"Oh! Crudo istante!
Deh!—m' 'udite — io rea non sono."

which were given with prodigious power, and in heart-rending tones. The effect of this scene upon a cold and unused audience was unmistakable. At the fall of the curtain Cruvelli was called for three times, and received with deafening cheers.

The chief points in the third act were the "Ah! non credea smarti," and the rondo finale. The prayer, may be said to lie open to the same objection as the recitative and first movement of the opening cavatina. An occasional want of finish was observable. We never heard the "Ah! non credea" more exquisitely or more perfectly given—neither by Malibran, nor by Jenny Lind. The intonation was so faultless throughout, the quality of the mezza voce voice so delicious, the expression so pure and so touching, that the singing, without the least exaggeration, might have been pronounced divine. Sophie Cruvelli made her way instantaneously—that is, if she had not made it before—to the heart of every hearer by this eloquent and most pathetic appeal. The famous "Ah non giunge" was an overwhelming burst of joyousness, vocalised with exceeding brilliancy, and rendered with a warmth of colouring which can only be attempted by a voice of the calibre and quality of Cruvelli. Here every part of the voice was used with admirable effect, the highest and lowest notes being introduced without the least effort, and an encore was the inevitable consequence. The curtain again went down amid reiterated cheers and waving of handkerchiefs from all parts of the house, and Cruvelli was again summoned three times to receive the enthusiastic demonstrations of the audience. To conclude, Cruvelli's Amina must be placed beside her Fidelio and her Norma, and in the estimation of some, will rank before either.

"Gran dio!
Non mirar il mio pianto."

Of Calzolari's Elvino we have spoken so frequently that it is unnecessary to say more here, than that it displayed his usual perfection of singing, and indifference of acting. We can hardly forgive the admirable tenor for displaying so little fire in such a part, and with such an Amina.

Signor Lorenzo's Count Rudolpho is commendable for its gentlemanlike deportment, and the careful manner in which the popular air, "As I view these scenes so charming," was rendered.

Mademoiselle Feller makes the prettiest and most Count-captivating of Lisas, and, moreover, sings the music well.

The band and chorus, under the strenuous exertions of Balfé, are to be commended mightily. They are perfectly at home in Bellini's music.

Dramatic Intelligence.

ADELPHI.—On Monday last, long before the curtain rose, this theatre was not only crowded to the ceiling—as the phrase goes—but packed even to the very lobbies with the friends and admirers of a lady who has won the applause of the public by her talent and energy in the direction of the most popular theatre in London, and secured the esteem and admiration of all who are fortunate enough to know her in private life, by her uniform affability and kindness. In a word, the crowd that was gathered within the walls of the Adelphi on the evening mentioned, had come to bid a heart-felt adieu to MADAME CELESTE, previous to her departure for the United States of America, where she purposes giving a series of farewell performances. The pieces selected for Monday evening were The Queen's Secret, Flying Colours, and one act of the celebrated Green Bushes. Any attempt to criticise Madame Celeste's rendering of the heroines of these three productions would be a piece of mere superfluity on our part—they are all as familiar in the minds of the public as household words—suffice it to say, that the fair beneficiaire played as she—and only she can play this style of character, and more than earned the thunders of applause which greeted her exertions throughout the evening, and the showers of bouquets lavished on her at the fall of the curtain.

The following was the address delivered by the fair lessee, before parting from her friends.

Ladies and Gentlemen, my kind, good, indulgent patrons, it is with feelings of gratitude beyond my power of expression that I appear before you, to bid you for a time adieu.

To this country, so generous in its sympathies to the stranger, wherever born, I owe my present proud position, for you gave a value by your golden opinions to that little talent my warm-hearted American friends discovered and encouraged. My direction of this theatre, through the liberality of the Manager and the affectionate zeal of the company, has been a labour of love and if you appear as the nightly evidence, I feel I am repaid beyond my deserts.

No occasion ought I to omit—especially such a one as this, with their flattering eulogiums so newly locked in my memory—to thank the press collectively and individually. Without them the actor's calling would cease to be an art.

Nothing, Ladies and Gentlemen, could take me from you but a duty of gratitude I owe to those in the New World, who first took me by the hand; and I should not think I had done that duty, if I did not visit them again and with respect and love take a long, a lasting leave.

Ladies and Gentlemen, my heart is too full to say more than with all my heart I thank you, and with all my heart I bid you adieu.

After the conclusion of the performance, the members of the company assembled in the green-room, and Mr. Paul Bedford, in the name of his comrades, presented Madame Celeste with a most elegant bracelet as a small token of the respect and admiration, with which she has inspired everyone who has any relation with her in her capacity as a manageress. Madame Celeste returned thanks in appropriate terms, and thus ended an evening which will long be remembered in the Adelphi annals.

Mr. J. Silsbee, an American delineator of "Yankee eccentricities," who made his first appearance on Tuesday night, is probably the best actor of his class ever seen by a London public. Mr. Hill, whose line of character he adopts, was smart and lively, but small in his style, whereas Mr. Silsbee's humour is large, unctuous, and broad. He is grave without being dry, and the solemnity of his countenance, as abundant Yankeeisms roll from his tongue, is one of his most amusing peculiarities. Nature has done much in qualifying him for a low comedian. His face is large, and capable in itself of exciting the risible muscles, and his thick-set figure is susceptible of the most ludicrous make up. His dialect is the broadest that has yet been heard, and his articulation is so rapid that, though he has a sonorous voice, great attention is required to catch the whole of his words. His effect on the audience was immense. A roar greeted his entrance, and a roar accompanied him throughout his performance. This is of itself an evidence of rare merit, for Yankee peculiarities have almost been done to death, and with an inferior actor would be all but intolerable.

In Mr. Silsbee's manner there is, however, such evident originality that he imparts freshness to a school of drollery which was fast becoming ineffective. The piece in which he plays, and which is entitled The Forest Rose and the Yankee Ploughboy, is not ill-written, as far as regards the part assumed by Mr. Silsbee, a 'cute rustic in the vicinity of New York, who knows everything, particularly the art of love-making, and keeps a shop at which everything is sold. He tells droll stories, he has an overwhelming stock of the class of metaphor called Johnathanisms, he coaxes the unwary out of small sums, and he dances furiously in the Cape Cod Reel, a wild Terpsichorean exhibition, which was enthusiastically encored. But the portion of the piece in which this one character is not set forth is meager in the extreme, an imitation apparently of the half-sentimental farce, of which we have a specimen in the venerable Turnpike Gale. If the work were so trimmed as to make it approach as near to a monologue as possible, the improvement would be very great. At the conclusion, Mr. Silsbee, in answer to an universal call, made his appearance, and delivered a short speech, in which he still retained his Yankee manner. He expressed his gratitude for the warm reception he had met, apologized for a cold, hoping to be "stronger and slicker" another time, and wound up with a general benediction amid renewed shouts of applause.

PRINCESS'S THEATRE.—Mr. Harley's benefit, which took place on Wednesday night, was made the occasion for reviving Mr. Morton's Town and Country, a play which belongs to the class of "acting dramas," but which is not very familiar to modern playgoers.

Town and Country is by no means a bad specimen of the sort of drama that was considered a legitimate comedy some forty years ago. The broad principle is laid down that fashion and vice are synonymous terms; the country is made the seat of innocence, and a gentleman who takes a rural trip from the Western Metropolis is necessarily a mischievous fiend, issuing from certain pandemonia called "clubs." Virtue is not content to act, but loves to talk, and the honest personages of the drama put vice out of countenance in good set speeches, which no situation of passion or perplexity can deprive of an ample proportion of metaphor. A plain-dressed gentleman knocks at your door, and while you are pondering who he is, he edifies you with an abstract dissertation on the advantages of an honest heart or the importance of the social duties. Every word he utters is carefully picked; he never opens his mouth but out flies a trope; nevertheless, you clasp him to your heart as a personation of rectitude. They certainly revered virtue, did the dramatists fifty years ago. They beautified her, they dressed her out, they set her up as a conventional idol, with which they attacked conventional vices, likewise creatures of their own brain. Even in the "funny" parts of the play virtue was still triumphant, and the public was taught to laugh triumphantly when the sophisticated townsman was beaten in a passage of wit by the less sophisticated rustic. Polished sarcasm belonged to the wicked town, "cuteness" was the intelligent side of provincial virtue.

We do not treat things in this way now. We do not divide society into two categories, of simple virtue and accomplished rascality, and conceive we are teaching a grand moral lesson. Hence, a piece like Town and Country will appear strange to many who are not familiar with the conventions of their fathers. The abduction of Rosalie Somers, and the consequent distress of her lover Reuben Glenroy, would now be matter for two acts; a few more visible effects would make a domestic melodrama of what was once called a comedy, and the studied oration on the beauty of virtue would be condensed into a few pungent lines. All would be treated differently from beginning to end.

Nevertheless, the piece has a technical merit, which can still give it vitality, when it is taken in hand by a company of varied talent. It employs a great number of actors in distinct parts, and the qualities of these may be leisurely observed, while they work out a simple but not uninteresting plot. The dialogue was not meant to be read, but to be heard; the piece was written for the stage, not the closet, and the author always had the performers filling up in his mind. Hence the great success of Town and Country last night. Written to afford opportunities of histrionic talent, it was sustained by a company who completely met the exigencies of the occasion. Not a part was weakly played. Reuben's set speeches sounded antiquated, but his temporary madness, and his burst of brotherly love in the midst of anger, were finely rendered by Mr. Charles Kean. Rosalie has not much to say or do, but by her air of touching simplicity Mrs. Charles Kean could endow her with interest. Cossey, the warm citizen, the best written part in the piece, who detests alike the country and the west end, and who is so well stocked and withal so liberal with ready cash, that one marvels he does not discharge the national debt in a patriotic freak of benevolence, is acted with such glowing heartiness by Mr. Addison that the audience feel a personal friendship for him before the play is done. And so on with the minor characters, including a very trivial manufacturer, named Trot, whom Mr. Harley, notwithstanding it was his benefit, modestly selected for himself. Rarely, indeed, do we see a piece better acted than this Town and Country at the Princess's Theatre; and when the audience called heartily for Mr. Harley and Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean, it was a spontaneous acknowledgment of two hours' enjoyment.

The abridged version of the Honeymoon followed, in which Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean played with their wonted spirit, while Mr. Harley represented the Mock Duke with infinite humour.

The house was completely crowded in every part.

SURREY.—It is, we understand, Mr. Shepherd's intention to continue the Opera Season here until Christmas, and the temperature of public feeling, as manifested by the uniform state of the house, seems amply to justify his purpose. The production of Linda di Chamouni has been as successful as any novelty of the season. The music of this opera is, like most of the author's works, of a mixed character. Without an approach to the imaginative or creative powers, it contains a good deal of what is pretty and graceful, mingled however with quite the usual portion of common place. One of the most pleasing things in the opera is Linda's first song—the well known "O luce di quest'anima," and the work possesses a large share of popularity, and being far less difficult and elaborate than Mozart's operas the execution was all the more satisfactory. The part of Linda requires great physical power in the artiste. Miss Romer's voice is not quite what it used to be, but enough of its qualities remains to enable her to get through her task with efficiency. The Surrey audiences are enthusiastic—Miss Romer was encored both in the duet with Carlo and in that with Pierotto. The latter part, which was given to Miss Poole, is hardly worthy of her; but she sang with her usual taste and delicacy, and acted with the truth and simplicity which are natural to her. Mr. Travers, as Carlo, sung with his usual energy and discrimination. Borroni was the Antonio. Mr. D. Corri, the Marquis, and Herr Kuzler, the Curé. This last named gentleman has a barytone voice of good quality and considerable power, and sings with the confidence and self-possession of a good musician. Shall we have Figaro, Mr. Shepherd?

MARY-LE-BONE.—The performance of Guy Mannering drew together a tolerably large audience here on Monday. We cannot, as yet, announce any of those improvements in the orchestra and chorus at the necessity of which we have already hinted, and which are so very needful to ensure certain and permanent success. Mrs. Donald King, however, sings as nicely and looks as pretty and lady-like as in fact she cannot help doing, and the piece being, histrionically, very fairly played, may repay a visit to the theatre.

A PLEA FOR OPERATIC BASSES.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR, The construction of one opera is so like another in the present day, that I presume we may as well consider the model to be firmly established, and any attempt to improve it almost hopeless. Nevertheless, as it is the duty of every person interested in the progress of the art, freely to deliver his opinions upon all matters connected with it, I have little doubt that when I state my object to be the fostering of a spirit of good feeling, my observations will not only be read with the greatest degree of interest, but I shall be presented with the unanimous thanks both of the musical profession and the public at large. I have observed lately with much regret, that the principal tenor of an opera is almost invariably the successful lover; he it is who basks in the sunny smiles of the prima donna; whilst the bass is too often made painfully to feel his situation as the rejected lover, and compelled to groan out his hopeless passion in rocky passes or dreary caverns. During the whole progress of the opera, the happy tenor has little to do but to make love and enjoy himself. Sometimes he is rowing in a gondola, and sometimes serenading in a garden; sometimes transported by unknown hands to a fairy palace, and sometimes banqueting in a moonlit grove. In every situation he is the favoured individual; and, whilst many of the characters are buffeted about by fortune, he generally contrives between singing, flirting, and feasting on the good things of this life, to spend a very pleasant time of it.

Meanwhile, however, the poor bass leads the life of any dog. If he be a lover, he is generally rejected in the first scene; and to add insult to injury, the tenor, in the pride of his superiority, is very apt to hasten his departure by some such phrase as "Tyrant begone!" which being very high, and delivered with the chest voice, is extremely likely to get a round of applause. There is a limit to all human endurance, and if moral men with bass voices do turn out villains after the first scene, I can't wonder at it. Having once vowed vengeance against the tenor, by touching the hilt of his sword, the poor bass must now give up the last claim to sentiment. He is usually to be seen surrounded by a number of suspicious looking gentlemen, who are extremely partial to drink, and who, in a grand chorus, declare their determination to stick to him to the last. He now generally appears enveloped in a cloak; and—although he has forfeited all hope of the friendship of respectable people—for the sake of his voice in the concerted music, he is allowed to sneak in at the back, where he often creates much effect by imaginary stabs at the tenor, after the manner of the warriors at the fairs, who never thrust at each other save upon the accented portions of the bar.

I have thought much upon this subject, and cannot be made to see that gentleman with dark whiskers and bass voices should be thus discouraged in their amours. It is true that the stage is but a mimic representation of life, but, if such things are allowed to be continually placed before a public audience, who knows but they may prove extremely prejudicial to the rising generation? The notion may eventually so take possession of the people, that the claims of suitors shall be estimated by the compass of their voices, and a good tenor ut de poitrine be equivalent to a round sum at the banker's. Happy tenors may marry and rear up families, whilst despised basses may go to their graves unpitied and forlorn. Many persons may say that a bass voice is necessary in an opera, and that those who happen to possess one are sure of receiving a good salary in an establishment devoted to music. This is true; but it is my wish that all principal singers should be placed on an equality; and, in consideration of the degradation to which basses are continually subjected, I would suggest that the scale of salary should be regulated by the pitch of the voice, and that tenors should consequently be contented to receive less money, on account of their enviable situation amongst other vocalists. It is true that this might sometimes occasion absurd attempts to alter the pitch of voices; for whilst a sentimental bass would endeavour to force his voice upwards, in order to make love successfully, a grovelling, money-grubbing tenor might try to pass for a bass, for the sake of the superior salary.

These, however, are mere minor objections; and where a great principle is to be carried out, such infinitesimal matters should not be allowed to influence us. My object is to create good feeling among vocalists! and I have no hesitation in declaring that whilst tenors are allowed, by the mere force of a certain quality of voice, to secure to themselves the smiles of every pretty prima donna they may meet with, it is not to be expected operatic companies should ever exhibit that sociability which alone can secure a perfect tout ensemble. Good-looking young men will disguise a bass voice as carefully as they would disguise a gray hair, and we shall at length be compelled to circulate hand-bills for "a number of dashing young men to complete an operatic corps," as we now do for the purpose of completing some indefinite military corps, and I verily believe with about as much success. As it sometimes defeats the object intended to be too minute in a remedy which may be suggested for an existing evil, I merely throw out a few hints which perhaps may prove useful to others; and I need scarcely say that it will give me great pleasure to read any letter which the foregoing observations may call forth from my musical readers.

SABONI.

Foreign.

BERGAMO.—The new opera of Verdi, Il Rigoletto, has not been well received by the public of this town, although executed by artists of eminence. As the first act was found barren in melody, and the second more than usually sparing in the overpowering unison effects, for which the grand maestro is renowned, the public would not listen to the third act of Rigoletto, but demanded Luisa Müller with one voice in its place. The prima donna, who was hissed in Rigoletto, and overwhelmed by so unkind a reception, was raised to the skies in the substituted opera, and so delighted were the public, that they persisted in fêting her after the performance outside the theatre, and accompanied her all the way home to her residence.

MARSEILLES.—Madame Charton, well known as the popular prima donna of Mr. Mitchell's Opera Comique, has been giving representations at the grand theatre here with the utmost success. She made her first appearance on the 3rd of September, in Halévy's opera, Mousquetaires de la Reine. After the first few bars the audience applauded so loudly, and with such unanimity, that Madame Charton was compelled for some minutes to desist from singing. During the whole of the opening air, the applause was continued, and at the end Madame Charton was compelled to reappear. On the repetition of the same opera her success was still greater—she was twice recalled—and the administration of bouquets plentiful. Her third appearance was in Thomas's opera buffon, Le Caid, in which she accomplished a complete triumph. Owing to inefficient performance, this opera had made a fiasco two years ago at Marseilles, and the director had abandoned it as not likely to please the public.

The enthusiasm of the audience, however, after Madame Charton's performance, has completely restored the Caid, which is now likely to remain a stock opera at the theatre. Among the bouquets which were thrown to Madame Charton at the end of the performance, was one so large that she could scarcely carry it. Her next operas were the Lucia and the Domino Noir, in both of which she was equally successful. In short, Madame Charton has created a complete furor in Marseilles.

BOULOGNE.—The celebrated Lola Montes appeared on three successive nights at the theatre, and attracted immense audiences. Her performances and talents have been criticised in a variety of ways. Certainly, her long absence from the stage has not improved her dancing; nor has time added to her charms. "According to announcement in our last number," says the Boulogne Gazette, "a lady, who has played a part more or less justly celebrated in the political and choregraphical world, Madame Lola Montes, has made her appearance on the humble boards of the Boulogne Theatre. Yes; Lola, now Countess of Lansfeld; Lola, the King's mistress; Lola, the cause of a revolution; Lola, the authoress; Lola, once possessed of endless wealth, now humbled; she it is whom we see bound into the midst of a party of villagers and peasants tastefully grouped upon the stage. But, alas! where are those fascinating charms that have captivated so many? The woman who has obtained notoriety at such fearful cost, stands before us divested of them now—her beauty faded, her limbs devoid of elasticity—the humblest ballet dancer would display more grace, more elegance in her profession. No, Lola, deceive not thyself! No rich costume, no silk or satin, no art or science will ever screen the ravages which a life like thine has made on thy person; nor think again thou hast only to command to bring vassals to thy feet. Thou art going to the New World. Go—thou leavest not a regret.... Strange.... All condemned; yet all rushed to behold—what?... It is not fame as a dancer that the countess had to depend on—of this she must be aware—it is, we blush to say it, the unenviable reputation she has acquired in the beau monde that was the attraction."—The above I think much exaggerated. Lola Montes was never acknowledged a dancer of any pretensions; but, nevertheless, there was a novelty about her pas which recommended them, and which appears to me to be still sufficiently attractive to rescue it from entire condemnation. I think the critic might have spared his blushes, and not be the worse critic after all. However, toleration cannot be expected from one who exhibits so much ignorance in writing.

The Société Philharmonique gave a very brilliant concert at the theatre lately. Madame Sabatier (one of the most popular of Parisian drawing-room singers), Mademoiselle Graumann, and the inimitable boy-violinist, Paul Jullien, were among the executants. Madame Sabatier pleased amazingly, and was encoored in both her airs. Paul Jullien astonished everybody. There were a number of amateurs and connoisseurs present, who expressed in unqualified terms their admiration and surprise at such powers in one so very young.

The illustrious composer of the Prophete is still here, and has quite recovered from his late indisposition. He will shortly leave us for Spa, in Belgium, where he goes to take the Baths.

DRESDEN.—Herr Reichart is engaged at the Opera here as principal tenor. He is a great favourite with the public. The local journals speak in the highest terms of his voice and of his singing, extolling no less warmly his talent as an actor.

NAPLES.—Pacini, the well known composer is here, preparing a new opera for the San Carlo. During the Carnival, Adelaide Cortesi is to be the prima donna assoluta at the San Carlo, and Liverani the primo tenore. The lady will, it is supposed, come out either as Norma, or as Medea, in Pacini's opera of that name; the gentleman will debut as Edgardo (Lucia), with Bendazzi, as "protagonista." At the Fondo, Borghi, Agresti, De Bassini, and Lusio are engaged for the Carnival. Borghi, who is a contralto, will make her entry in Cenerentola. A new ballet Il matrimonio per lotteria, has been brought out with considerable success; a pas de trois for the two Merantes (husband and wife) and the Danish dancer, Izzo, is much admired, especially a saltarello, the music of which is by Giaquinto, a "maestro" unknown to fame.

VIENNA.—It is confidently stated that the celebrated singer of Musica Tedesca, Mdlle. Wagner, has been engaged by the most determined and enterprising of impresarij for the next London season. Mademoiselle Wagner will be doubly welcome, since she will come to us laden with the partition of Meyerbeer's long and fiercely anticipated opera grandia, entitled L'Africain, which, we understand, that distinguished diplomatist and grandissimo amico degli artisti, il dottore B * * * (Aus Wien), with consummate ingenuity (con immensa astutizia), among other less important, and other (if possible) more important (per hercle!) matters, has effected for the fashionable temple of the muses, bounded on the north by Charles-street, on the south by Pall-mall, on the east by the Haymarket, and on the west by Regent-street. This season the cry has been at (Wien) "Mr. * * * has eleven prime donne and only one "ultima donna." Fischhof joined the cry—Fischhof, recently appointed principal of our conservatoire—Fischhof, the same who played Bach's Fugues, and got up a Bach Society—Fischhof, he with whom Vincent Wallace confarreated when he came to Vienna to bring out his Marijana—Fischhof, whose aspirations are addressed to the "Columns," and the tendency of whose esprit is not merely Bachio (non lege, Bacchic), but panto-classic—Fischhof, who, despatched to London to represent the interests of Vienna at the Crystal Palace, pricked down his views thereof in goodly Teutonic on papyrus, and published them, incontinent, in his native city—Fischhof, whom not to know is not to know Fischhof, whom everybody knows (at Wien)—Fischhof joined in the cry—"Mr. * * * has eleven prime donne and only one ultima donna!" Now, however, that Doctor B * * *, the infinitely circulating, has put his foot in the pie, it is the general conviction at Wien that the cry will be next season, "Mr. * * * has twenty-two prime donne, and but two ultime donne"—and Fischhof will join in the cry—Fischhof, who Vincent Wallace, &c., &c., &c. For it is known here, that Doctor * * * 's system is to engage everybody at first hearing, from Gazzaniga, who could not save Verdi's opera of Rigoletto at Bergamo, to Schwartz, who has lost her voice. The twenty-two prime donne may conveniently be placed in a row, like twenty-two candles placed in a row, and snuffed out alternately. VIVAT REGINA!—(From our own Correspondent.)

ENGLISH GLEES.—By our advertisement sheet we perceive that the English Glee and Madrigal Union, which met with such deserved success this season at Willis' Rooms, are about to undertake a tour in the Southern and Midland Counties, under the direction of Mr. Edward Laud. Their first concert will take place on Tuesday evening, at Brighton.

Reviews of Music.

"CAN A BOSSOM SO GENTLE REMAIN?" A Glee for Five Voices. Words by SHENSTONE. Music by Miss LAURA W. BARKER. J. Alfred Novello.

Whatever comes from the pen of Miss Barker must be received with welcome, and considered with respect. The present glee, in E flat for five voices, whereof two sopranos, is, as is customary with Miss Barker, quite independent of any preceding model, and consequently entirely her own. The opening subject, moderato, is bold, and the independent treatment of dissonance in the last bar, at the bottom of the page, is new, although, perhaps, it surprises more than pleases. The second part, in G minor, is quaint and effective, and leads back naturally to a cadence in the first key. The episode, page 5, which begins in B flat and modulates into E flat minor with excellent effect, is written with great care and very elaborately for the voices. After this, the first part is resumed ad libitum.

We admire this glee: first, for its originality; secondly, for the musical knowledge it displays—rare in an amateur, and still rarer in a lady amateur, and recommend it to all Glee Fellowships in general, as something at once good and new.

"AS I SAW FAIR FLORA"—GLEE FOR FOUR VOICES—HENRY TOLHURST. C. Jefferys.

Mr. Tolhurst, evidently a well-trained harmonist, and not without a good ear for rhythm, and a certain vein of tune, has in the present glee successfully imitated the style of the elder madrigalian writers. In one or two places, moreover, he has carried his love for them so far, that he has, so to speak, embraced their ideas. He also stoutly adheres to a peculiarity of those writers, which a modern ear does not tolerate so indulgently as the ear Elizabethan, indecision of key, chiefly declared in a certain quaint and independent march of the harmonic parts, which gives occasionally a sort of abrupt twist to the cadences. This, however, is in strict consonance with the school, and will pass with many as a beauty instead of a blemish. The present madrigal is in the key of A major, for alto, two tenors, and bass. There is great merit in the whole of it, but what pleases us most is the episode, pp. 4, 5, which begins in the key of F sharp minor, but has the same indecision of tonality of which we have complained above, and which, as we have already hinted, by certain enthusiastic admirers of the madrigalian school will be looked upon as beauties, not faults. To conclude, Mr. Tolhurst's glee may be regarded as a really fine example of the school to which it belongs.

"SEVEN PIECES FOR THE PIANOFORTE"—ROBERT SCHUMANN. Ewer and Co.

Those who are advocates of the school of music, which this celebrated composer is presumed to have founded, will accept these seven little pieces for the pianoforte, as seven bonnes bouches for the musical appetite. They possess one very great recommendation, inasmuch as, while most of Herr Schumann's pianoforte music is exceedingly intricate and difficult, setting ordinary talents quite at defiance, they are comparatively easy of execution, and offer excellent means to the aspiring student of making acquaintance with the style of a very eminent master almost unknown in this country. Our own opinion of Herr Schumann's music is so entirely opposed to that of his partisans and admirers, who place him on a level, and, in many instances, above Mendelssohn, that we would rather be spared the task of criticism on the present occasion, since so small an instalment from one of the most prolific and plentiful writers of the day scarcely entitles us to form therefrom anything like a just estimate of his genius and acquirements. En attendant, therefore, something more important from the pen of Herr Schumann (with which we understand we shall shortly be favoured by the spirited firm who have issued the publication before us), we shall be satisfied to recommend these seven pieces for the pianoforte solis (op. 82), to all who may feel inclined to form a slight acquaintance with the author in anticipation of something later being received into the more hidden recesses of his temple.

"NEW AND COMPLETE EDITION OF MOZART'S FAVORITE SONGS, DUETS AND TRIOS," with the original Italian or German words, and an entirely new English version by W. H. Bellamy. Arranged and adapted from the scores of Mozart, by SAMUEL SEBASTIAN WESLEY. T. Chappell.

We have found two of the missing numbers of this edition, which we fancied were not sent us, Nos. 6 and 7, which therefore Mr. Chappell need not trouble himself about. These are "Porgi Amor," from the Nazze di Figaro, and "Un moto di gioia mi sento," to Mr. Wesley's arrangements of which we have the same praise to accord as to the others. We await, however, with as much alacrity as is convenient, the two missing numbers to complete our set.

"THE BEDFORDSHIRE WALTZES. Jullien and Co.

A lively set of Waltzes; the introduction and No. 1 in E flat, and all the rest, including the coda, in A flat. Variety is certainly not their sin, but they are not without a certain degree of effect.

1. "MAZURKA ELEGANTE,"—POUR LE PIANOFORTE—DEBINE A MAD. SCHWAB—Ferdinand Praeger.
2. "MELINA—Valse GRACIEUSE—Ferdinand Praeger. Cramer, Beale and Co.

No. 1 is a very elegant mazurka in C, with an episode in A minor. No. 2 is a very graceful waltz in F, with episodes in B flat and C. Both are brilliant though easy to play, and both show a tasteful thinker and a musician of acquirement. Such music of this light kind is much too rare, and the more Mr. Praeger writes the better.

"EUTERPEAN POLKA"—J. F. T. Hime (Liverpool), Addison (London), Hime, Neale and Co. (Manchester). This is a very Euterpean polka in A flat, by a lady.

"MADOLINE"—Ballad—Sung by Mr. Sims Reeves—Written by EDWARD J. GILL—Composed by S. NELSON. A. Moss. An andante cantabile, not without elegance, and the words not without a certain degree of feeling, and if sung, as indicated in the title page, by the most popular of English tenors, cannot fail to obtain all the success it merits.

"'TIS I THAT LOVE THEE BEST"—Words by F. C. HALL—Music by M. W. BALFE. Campbell Ransford and Co. A kind of Serenade, with a serenade melody, and a serenade accompaniment, very pretty, very Balfé, and consequently very likely to be popular.

"THE HEART'S BRIGHT HOME"—Ballad—The Poetry by T. BREAKELL, Esq.—Composed by J. C. VAN MAANEN. Wessel and Co.

The epithet of novelty cannot strictly be awarded either to the poetry of Mr. Breakell, or the music of Mr. Van Maanen; nevertheless, both are well written, and the style of the accompaniment in the music betrays a laudable desire to avoid the common track. The melody, moreover, is both graceful and vocal, and possessing both these qualities, the absence of striking originality may be overlooked. There are many worse songs with more pretensions.

CRUVELLI'S SONNAMBULA.

(From the Times.)

The most crowded of the "extra nights" was that of Saturday, when not a vacant corner could be perceived in the house. The performance was of sufficient interest to demand notice. The opera was La Sonnambula, and Mdle. Sophie Cruvelli for the first time essayed the character of Amina. Her success was as complete as it was well deserved, and not even her début as Leonora, in Fidelio, last May, excited greater attention or more unanimous applause. Mdle. Cruvelli's Amina may stand the test of comparison with that of the most favoured artists who have attempted the part. All the greatest singers, Pasta alone excepted, for whom, nevertheless, the opera was originally composed, have delighted to display their vocal and dramatic talents in the Somnambula, which, if not the finest, is perhaps the most genuine, and certainly the most popular, of Bellini's works. The time can hardly have been forgotten when Malibran and Grisi divided the palm of supremacy—the one at Drury-lane and the other at Her Majesty's Theatre—and simultaneously extorted the homage of their admirers in the same character. Their performances of Amina, though widely different in conception, were equally balanced as examples of powerful execution. When Malibran was gone and Grisi had abandoned the part, Persiani stepped in. The Amina of that accomplished artist will be chiefly remembered for the wonders of florid vocalisation which she lavished on the cavatina and the rondo finale. The somnambulist of Jenny must be fresh in the memory of every one. The modest retiredness of her acting throughout charmed the audience beyond measure, while her tenderness and consummate singing in the last scene placed Amina among the most perfect and absorbing impersonations of the idolised Swede. Madame Sontag, who has so recently left us, followed with a version essentially her own, remarkable above all for sweetness and grace of expression and faultless accuracy in the vocal ornaments. Alboni's Amina, ranked by her admirers among her most attractive performances, has yet to be heard in London. After such a brilliant galaxy of talent it was no easy task for a young singer to come forward, upon the stage of so many triumphs, in the character which each of these great singers, by some peculiar excellences, may be said to have made her own. That Mdle. Cruvelli succeeded entirely is another proof of the genius which was recognised from the first, and which she incontestably possesses. Although, since the commencement of the extra representations, she has been playing every night, and not seldom in two operas on the same evening, her voice retains its freshness and her acting its fire. It is the prerogative of youth to endure fatigue; but it would be advisable for the management in the present instance, not to stretch the point too far. Mdle. Cruvelli's lungs are not of brass, nor her frame of oak, and she has yet to acquire that invaluable art which enables a thoroughly experienced singer to husband her resources, and only lavish them on the most important occasions. Had she this unfailing command of her powers, there would be little more for her to acquire, since it is to the want of it alone that certain errors and imperfections, which occasionally expose her to criticism, are to be traced.

In her conception of Amina, Mdle. Cruvelli wholly differs from her cotemporaries and immediate predecessors, reminding us more forcibly of Malibran than any other performer we remember in the part. As she is too young to have seen that unrivalled artist we can only account for this by something kindred in her nature. Mdle. Cruvelli's acting in the first scene was both natural and attractive. Her cavatina, "Come per me sereno," as it ought to be, a flow of exuberant spirits and a brilliant piece of vocalization in the bargain, at once won the audience to a warm appreciation of its merits. While signing the wedding contract there was a nervousness in Mdle. Cruvelli's manner indicating that Amina's happiness was almost too great for her to endure, and that she feared each succeeding moment might snatch it away. Nothing could have been more pointedly or charmingly conveyed. In the following duet with Elvino, when the cup of joy is overflowing in the bosom of the young maiden, Mdle. Cruvelli showed a full intelligence of the situation, and developed it with genuine truth. Not less effective was the pretty scene of jealousy on the arrival of Count Rudolpho, and the duet, when the lovers are reconciled and take leave of each other, on the eve of their approaching union, upon which the curtain falls. At this point a new and first-rate Amina was unanimously recognised; but the real enthusiasm of the audience was awakened in the second act, when Amina is discovered in the Count's bedroom. The passion and abandon which Mdle. Cruvelli threw into this situation we have rarely seen surpassed; the despair of Amina, unjustly suspected and cast off by her lover in spite of her tears and agonised intreaties, was powerfully expressed, though without a vestige of exaggeration. The fall of the curtain was the signal for a flattering ovation on the part of the audience, who recalled Mdle. Cruvelli, and rewarded her with continuous applause. The third act set the seal upon the singer's success. That earnestness of expression which confers a certain stamp of originality upon Mdle. Cruvelli's physiognomy gave peculiar intensity to the exhibition of somnambulism, which was singularly forcible and impressive throughout. The little passages of byplay, with the faded flowers and the missing ring, were rendered with touching simplicity; and the adagio "Ah! non credea mirarti," was delivered with exquisite pathos and a certain tremulousness in the upper tones that rather added to than impaired the beauty of the voice. The "Ah! non giunge" was of course a brilliant display, and at the point, "Ah! m'abbraccia, e sempre insieme," afforded Mdle. Cruvelli the occasion for giving way to one of those impulsive outbreaks of feeling which, when well placed, are irresistible. The curtain fell amid the loudest applause from all parts of the house, a double recall, with the customary honours, being the appropriate final tribute to a very admirable performance.

Signor Calzolari, who played Elvino, has rarely sung with more elegance and finish. The Rodolpho of Signor Lorenzo was impaired by a severe cold, which obstinately resisted his otherwise commendable efforts. Mdle. Feller made a pretty and animated Lisa, and Mr. Balfe, in the orchestra, did all that could possibly be effected to aid the exertions of the singer and insure a successful result.

REVIEW OF BOOKS.

THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE. By BROTHER JONATHAN. W. S. Johnson.

This periodical, the first number of which has just been issued is a very neat and elegant work. The letter-press and paper are of the best kind, and much care seems to have been expended in the general arrangement. The cover is emblematic of the American flag, and is well designed and printed in colours. Two illustrations are given: one, in line engraving, an excellent view of the principal front of the Capitol, Washington; the other, a woodcut, a picture of the yacht "America."

The contributions include many of the best American writers. We cannot, however, say how many original articles the new magazine contains, since a contribution from the pen of Mrs. Sigourney, who has been dead some months, appears in this number. Most of the articles are admirable. The poem of "the Raven," by Edgar Poe, would alone repay the purchase of the magazine.

It appears, however, as if the Magazine had been got up in haste. Between the frontispiece—the engraving of the Capitol at Washington—and the first page of the text, there is no title-page. This appears bare, and should be amended in the next edition. The contents, too, we think, would look better in a fly-leaf between the frontispiece and first page. If this periodical be as well conducted in the ensuing numbers, as it is in the present, it cannot fail to command a large patronage.

Original Correspondence.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

MY DEAR SIR.—In my report last week of Miss Hill's Concert, I noticed an Irish ballad sung by Mr. Frank Bodda, entitled "Thady O' Toole," which I designated a "tool" of a thing. Now I suppose your compositor thought that was a vile attempt at a pun, and agreeing with Dr. Johnson, that "a man who would make a pun would pick a pocket," struck the word "tool" out, and made a "fool" of it.

As I imagine neither singer or composer would esteem the latter term a compliment, the favour of your inserting this in next Saturday's "World" will oblige and relieve the mind of, my dear Sir,

Yours ever sincerely,

YOUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Birmingham, Sep. 24th, 1851.

Miscellaneous.

GLOVER'S "EMMANUEL."—As the time approaches for the performance of this work, public interest increases, and there is now scarcely any doubt of there being a full room on the occasion. By a glance at the list of performers, it will be seen the orchestra will include the very best talent the neighbourhood affords. We may therefore expect the work in this its first performance will have adequate justice done to it by those engaged in its interpretation. We heard several of the pieces given the other evening, and were much pleased with their character—the chorus of "Wise Men" in the first part, and the chorale of the "Disciples," unaccompanied in the second part, we consider worthy of the highest praise. Several of the choruses possess considerable dramatic force; and the melodies throughout have an evenness and sweetness which strongly commend them to our approbation. We understand the committee have generously invited the master and pupils of the Blind Asylum, also several other charities of the town, to be present. We may just note, that it is now nearly two years since an oratorio performance, with orchestral accompaniments, was given in the Free-trade Hall; and we hope the musical amateurs of the neighbourhood will now seize the opportunity of aiding a fellow-townsmen in bringing a work such as this properly before the public. Mr. Glover, since his residence amongst us, has proved himself an artist of great excellence and promise, and he has our best wishes for his success. We subjoin a short analysis of the oratorio for the benefit of our readers. This oratorio embraces the principal events in the life of the Messiah. Part 1 contains, The Annunciation; the Worship of Wise Men; the Murder of the Innocents; the Preaching of John the Baptist; the Baptism of Jesus, by John (during which the angels exclaim, "Touch not the Lord's Anointed," &c.); the continued Preaching of John, and the joyful conclusion by the disciples, "Who is he that shall harm us, the Redeemer is with us." Part 2 contains, The "Beginning of Miracles," and the wonder and joy of the people; the bold faith of Peter expressed in the words, "It is God that girdeth me with strength of War;" the Hymn on the Mount of Olives; the Crucifixion; the "Appearance" to the eleven; the fear and subsequent rejoicing of the disciples; the Ascension (where the angels foretell the Second Advent, and the "gazing" multitude re-echo the strain); the Last Judgment—and the exultation of Emmanuel "above every name."—Manchester Examiner.

CHEAP LITERATURE IN PARIS.—This is verily the age of cheapness. George Sand has consented to allow all her novels to be reprinted for the small charge of four sous, a shade less than twopence, per part, which will make, it appears, about £1 for the whole collection. This popular edition is to be profusely illustrated by eminent artists, and is to be printed and got up in good style. During the last year or two an immense deal of business has been done by three or four publishing houses, in the production of esteemed works at four sous the sheet, of close yet legible type, excellent paper, and spirited illustrations. By this plan, the humblest working man and the poorest grisette have been able to form a very respectable library. Naturally, the works so brought out have been chiefly of the class of light literature, but not a few are of graver character. Amongst the authors whose complete works have been published are, Le Sage, Chateaubriand, Anquetil (the historian), Balzac, Sue, Paul de Kock; amongst those partially published, Rousseau, Lamennais, Voltaire, Diderot, Fenelon, Bernardin de Saint Pierre. Translations of foreign works have also been produced; in the batch are, complete or partial, Goldsmith, Sterne, Anne Radcliffe, Mrs. Inchbald, Walter Scott, Fenimore Cooper, Bulwer, Dickens, Marryat, Goethe, Schiller, Silvio Pellico, and Boccaccio.—Correspondent of Literary Gazette.

MR. J. B. JEWSON, the pianist, has arrived in London for the season.

SURREY ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.—These gardens, which will close next week, will continue to be attractive as long as the weather and the lessee permit. Mr. Godfrey has given us selections from Mendelssohn's Elijah, and Benedict's Crusaders. Miss Mesient, who is still the vocal loadstar of the gardens, has been challenging the nightingales in Sir Henry Bishop's popular song, "The Mocking Bird," nicely accompanied on the flute by Mr. Tyler. A new song by Mr. Owen, gracefully delivered by the syren, is, we understand, the offspring of a very young muse, and as such may be considered to give promise of a fair maturity to the writer. A walk in these gardens, after dark, with their music, quaintly lighted walks, and fiery displays on the water, is as good as a visit to Fairy Land—almost.

MISS GODDARD, of Sadler's Wells has been starring at Chester during the run of "Timon of Athens." She appeared for six nights. The houses have been very fashionably attended.

NORTHAMPTON.—A new Society designated "The Northampton Instrumental Musical Society," has recently been established here, which promises to create and foster a taste for music which has not existed hitherto in this ancient borough. A series of six Concerts is announced for the winter, commencing on Thursday next, Oct. 2nd, for which the following artistes are engaged as principals. Miss Pyne, and Miss Louisa Pyne, as Vocalists; and Mr. H. Nicholson (Solo Flute). All the available Instrumental talent in the town will attend, assisted also by the principal members of the Duke of Rutland's Band from Leicester.

ON THE TITLES PREFIXED TO THE PSALMS, &c.—In the Book of Psalms frequent mention is made of the musical instruments then used, and it is also supposed that the titles prefixed to the Psalms was a key to the true sense and intention of the poem, and should therefore be retained and studied with the greatest care and veneration. But there are so many different opinions respecting them that it is exceedingly difficult to determine which of these titles are genuine as to explain their true meaning. Don Calmet, and Flamininus, frankly declare, that they are utterly unable to expound or interpret the titles of some of these Psalms, and the Rabbins suspect that most of the terms involved in so much darkness were the names of the instruments or the melodies which the Levites sung to them. The learned Father Martini appears to think there is no reason to doubt that the Psalms of David were accompanied by instruments, and also that there was a certain species of rhythm and metre both in the poetry and music of these compositions. For although the Hebrews were ignorant of counterpoint, they had certain known melodies, to which could be adapted at pleasure their extemporaneous poetry; and as a proof of there having existed some regularity in the arrangement of their music, the word Selah occurs frequently, which is equivalent to the Greek word Diapsalma, which may be translated a pause in singing, and the most general opinion is, that it was a sign for the cessation of the voices, and the introduction of the instruments; nothing more conclusive can be adduced, that the Psalms were sometimes accompanied by many instruments, and sometimes by one alone appears very probable; but what were the particular instruments used, the immense distance of the period renders it impossible to discover. During the long reign of Solomon, the Hebrews were in the greatest prosperity, which not only enabled them to cultivate the arts and sciences amongst themselves, but stimulated foreigners to visit and assist them, for the immense wealth, the great renown, and the enormous sums paid the musicians, could not fail to attract the greatest talents from all parts of the neighbouring kingdoms. It is the opinion of many expounders and commentators of the sacred writings, that Solomon was the author of some of the Psalms that are attributed to David; it is certain that he was no less fond of poetry than his father, for, in the 4th Chap. of the 1st Book of Kings, and the 25th ver., we are told that "he spake three thousand proverbs, and his songs were a thousand and five." But whether he was a practical musician does not appear in the records of his reign."

—From T. H. Tomlinson's Lectures on Ancient Music.

CARLOTTA GRISI.—The "Reine de la Danse" left London on Wednesday evening, en route for St. Petersburg.

M. FETIS.—This eminent musician, and highly celebrated critic, has been for some weeks in London, and has composed three interesting letters on the musical department of the Great Exhibition, which have appeared in the Revue et Gazette Musicale. M. Fetis returned to Brussels on Tuesday, to resume his duties as Principal of the Conservatoire.

Mr. ELLA, Director of the Musical Union, is in Paris. He has been visiting Signor Tamburini, at his chateau, near Sevres.

Mr. HARRIS has already gone to Paris, to make preparations for Mr. Lumley's forthcoming season at the Theatre Italien.

DEATH OF ONE OF BURNS'S HEROINES.—A Glasgow contemporary records the death of one of the six "Mauchline belles," on whom Burns confers the fame of his verse. Mrs. Findlay, relict of Mr. Robert Findlay, of the excise, Greenock, was one of the very few persons, surviving to our own times, who intimately knew the peasant bard in the first flush of his genius and manhood, and by whom her name and charms have been wedded to immortal verse. When we consider that sixty-five years have elapsed since Burns wrote the lines in which this lady is noticed, and that the six Mauchline belles were then in the pride of opening womanhood, it is surprising that two of them, who have often listened to the living accents of the inspired peasant, still survive: The fate in life of the six belles was as follows: Miss Ellen Miller, the first named, became the wife of Burns's friend, Dr. Mackenzie, a medical gentleman in Mauchline, latterly in Irvine; Miss Markland we have already spoken of; Miss Jean Smith was married to Mr. Candlish, a successful teacher in Edinburgh, and became the mother of the eminent divine; Miss Betsy (Miller) became the wife of Mr. Templeton, in Mauchline; and Miss Morton married Mr. Patterson, cloth merchant, in the same village. Of the fate and history of "Bonnie Jean" (Armour) we need not speak. The survivors are Mrs. Patterson and Mrs. Candlish.

RICHARD JONES, THE COMEDIAN.—On the 30th ultimo died, in his 73rd year, Mr. Richard Jones, for many years an actor of some great repute at Covent Garden Theatre. He commenced his career in the histrionic profession, as other comedians have done before him, by enacting tragedy at different provincial theatres, until the accidental illness of a brother performer led to his impersonation of Gossamer, in Laugh when you can. From this (that) time his attention was directed to comedy, and he made his first appearance on the London stage at Covent Garden in 1807, as Goldfinch, in The Road to Ruin. He will, however, be chiefly remembered by his gentlemanly and lively performance of Puff, in The Critic. Mr. Jones, always careful of his purse and person, was long known among his professional brethren by the soubriquet of "Gentleman Jones." He was the author of two amusing pieces, The Green Man, and Too Late for a Dinner, and, since his retirement from the stage, has frequently employed himself in giving lessons in elocution.—Literary Gazette.

COMMERCIAL HALL, KING'S ROAD CHELSEA.—A vocal and instrumental concert was given at the above rooms, on Tuesday evening. A select audience, though not a numerous one, attended. The singers were Mrs. Alexander Newton, Miss Louisa Nevett, Miss Eliza Ward, Mr. Bridge Frodsham, and Mr. H. Barnby: the instrumentalists, Mr. F. Wustemann (flute), Miss Eliza Ward (piano), and Master J. Ward (concertina). The encores were numerous, and comprised Mrs. Alexander Newton's "Hush ye pretty warbling choir," "Robin Adair," and "Casta Diva;" Mr. H. Barnby's "Revenge, Timotheus cries," Mr. Bridge Frodsham's "Death of Nelson," and Miss Louisa Nevett in "Vedrai Carino." Master J. Ward, also, was encored in his concertina solo. Miss Louisa Nevett made her debut in public on this occasion, and her success was unequivocal. She is a pupil of Mrs. Alexander Newton, has a very nice voice, and is extremely lady-like in appearance. Auguring from a first appearance, we have every reason to suppose Miss Louisa Nevett will be an acquisition, and no mean one, to the concert room.

MONTELLI.—In our account of the Barbiere, the name of Signor Paltoni was inadvertently printed instead of Signor Montelli, when that artist, at a brief notice, undertook the arduous part of Doctor Bartolo at Her Majesty's Theatre, on the retirement of Signor Lablache, and acquitted himself so much to the satisfaction of Mr. Lumley.

MARIE ESCUDIER, the redacteur of La France Musicale, has returned to Paris from Havre.

CAROLINA ROSATI has left London for Paris.

MADAME SONTAG is at Boulogne.

MADemoiselle ANGRI has gone to Paris. The accomplished contralto is in treaty with Mr. Lumley for next season, and an engagement is pending with her for the ensuing winter campaign at the Teatro del Re, Madrid.

MADemoiselle IDA BRERTRAND and her sister have left London for Paris.

PROFESSOR FISCHOFF, the well known musician and profound critic, who was one of the envoyes from Vienna to the Great Exhibition, has been appointed Director of the Conservatoire at Vienna.

MADemoiselle CORBARI has come back to Paris. The delicious comprimaria and prima donna (juncta in una) is preparing for the forthcoming season at the Bouffes.

MRS. ALEXANDER NEWTON AND MR. BRIDGE FRODSHAM have left London for Dublin, where they have an engagement with Mr. Levy for a week.

THE BATEMAN CHILDREN. (From the American Magazine). We are really gratified in recording the triumphant success of these wonderful specimens of "Young America" at the St. James's theatre. We say, a triumphant success; for we are aware that there has long existed in England an apathy to talent, as exhibited in children, which the genius of these children has, for a time at least, overcome. We have had the pleasure of seeing them perform in both England and the United States, and in all the principal cities of the latter they were favourites of the strongest character. Well do we remember their debut in Philadelphia, and the delight they occasioned; and also of their immense success in New York, under the management of the world-wide Barnum. As yet they have appeared here in the plays of Macbeth, Richard the Third, The Merchant of Venice, The Young Couple, The Swiss Cottage, The Spoiled Child, and Bombastes Furioso, the personation of the leading characters in which have been received both by the press and the public with the most unequivocal marks of favour. We cannot point out an instance where we have been more agreeably entertained by a dramatic performance than we were with their representation of those saucy, mischievous little chits, in the translation of Scribe's sparkling vaudeville, Le Mariage Enfantin. Kate's flow of vivacity, so elegantly expressed, was second only to the delightful ease of Mrs. Nisbett; while little Ellen's joyous, merry unaffectedness, called up a thrill of pleasure in every bosom. Well and truly did they deserve the shower of bouquets that fell around them when called upon the stage at the conclusion of the play. The great charm of the acting of these wonderful children is the comprehensive naturalness which marks their efforts in every part they perform. We can perceive no evidence of training, for, like true artists, they conceive the art, although it is difficult to believe that children so tender in years can comprehend the interests and meaning of the language of Shakspeare; yet we are constrained to say that they deliver it as if they do, which argues either a precocity of intellect almost unparalleled, or the perfection of art in acting rarely achieved on the English stage. We saw it stated some time ago that neither of the children could read, and this was a delicious straw for the critics to catch at. "If they cannot read, they cannot comprehend nature, and so they must be purroted." This is a shallow argument, for we know many singers who cannot read the character of a piece of music, yet, when it is expressed to them, they soon acquire and interpret it with more feeling and appreciative understanding than the mere reader. We have reason to believe that these children conceive as well as execute; and, as to the genius of their execution, the public of England and America can now fully attest.

We learn that, at the close of the present season at the St. James's, which must necessarily be limited, the father of these "dear little people," as Daniel Webster, our great statesmen called them, intends taking them into the provinces. Our out of London friends may anticipate something glorious in the way of dramatic novelty. There never lived but one family of "Batemans," and it will be a long time ere we "look upon their like again."

GREENWICH. (From our own Reporter).—An evening concert was given on Thursday last at the Lecture Hall, on which occasion the room was crowded in every available part. The concert took place under the direction of Mr. Albert Schloss, and the following popular artists assisted:—Vocalists, Miss Bassano, Miss Messent, Miss Binckes, the Misses Alexander (pupils of Signor Felice Ronconi), Madame Garcia, Miss S. Pyne, Miss Louisa Pyne, Herr Stigelli (from the Royal Italian Opera), and Mr. Whitworth. Instrumentalists:—Herr Jansa, Professor at the Conservatorium at Vienna (violin), M. Rousselot (violin), and Herr Kuhe (pianoforte). The programme commenced with Mayseeder's Trio for violin, violoncello and pianoforte, remarkably well executed by Herr Jansa, M. Rousselot and Herr Kuhe. Jansa sustained his reputation fully as one of the first violinists in Vienna. His style is extremely pure, and his tone large, full, and round. His bowing is free and easy, and his execution at once brilliant and finished. Herr Jansa has had great experience as a classical violinist. It was he who inaugurated the Beethoven Quartet Society at Vienna, and conducted it from the commencement to the present time. Some such difference with the authorities in power as caused the expulsion of Mademoiselle Zerr from the Court Opera and Concerts in the Capital of Austria, having relation to supporting the Hungarian Refugees, has led to Herr Jansa's departure from Vienna and arrival in London. He has, we understand, come to reside in this country. Certainly his talents cannot fail to be appreciated amongst us. But to our subject, leaving Herr Jansa for a more favorable opportunity to discuss his merits at greater length, Miss Bassano was encored in Angelina's pretty and unpretending ballad, "Solitude." Miss Bassano sang the ballad charmingly and deserved the warm encore she obtained. The Misses Pyne gave Donizetti's duo, "Ah! figlia incanta," with pleasing, but not overpowering effect. Herr Kuhe was encored in a solo on the pianoforte, to which his capital playing well entitled him. Mr. Whitworth sang Vogel's aria, "L'Ange dechie," and Miss Binckes, Miss M. B. Hawes's oft-sung ballad, "I'll speak of thee." Miss Binckes was encored. Herr Jansa executed a Fantasia of his own composition on the violin with admirable effect. Herr Jansa was loudly applauded from all parts of the rooms. Herr Jansa is no less celebrated as a composer than a player on the violin. The present work has sterling merit, and is at the same time a brilliant and showy contribution to the instrument. The "Sonno song" from Masaniello was very sweetly rendered by Herr Stigelli, who managed the mezzo voce voice with excellent effect, and skilfully. Miss Bassano's fine deep voice was heard advantageously in the grand air, "Ah! quel Giorno," from Semiramide, and Miss Louisa Pyne was rapturously bisssed in "Cease your funning" with variations, for which worthy accomplishment Miss Louisa Pyne deserves to be dubbed the English Sontag. The first part concluded with Glover's duet, "From our merry Swiss home," given very nicely, and encored. The second part commenced with the rondo finale "Ah! non giunge," from Sonnambula, which Miss Binckes found, on the incompetent side of her talent. The "Tell me, my heart," of Miss Messent was better, because more compassable by the singer. Young singers should not attempt too much. The juvenile crow that attempted to fly out of his nest, his mother unwilling, before he had his wings fledged, was devoured by a gled-hawk. A solo on the violoncello displayed a thorough musician and a practised hand in M. Scipion Rousselot, whom we seldom miss from a concert of any note, in or out of season in London. The very charming romance, "So mild, so good," from Frank Mori's cantata, Fridolin, was neatly and prettily warbled by Miss Louisa Pyne. Wallace's "There is a flower that bloometh" was well delivered by Herr Stigelli, who showed no less aptitude for English consonants than for English notes. Herr Kuhe again treated his admirers to a pianoforte solo, and Mr. Whitworth was encored in Edward Loder's ubiquitous ballad "The Brave old Oak," whereof, why "brave?" Ask the Athenæum. The "Oak" was succeeded by a Scotch ballad, written by one Burns, and called "There's nae luck aboot the hoose." Miss Bassano sang it like a Highland Saint Cecilia. Rode's air and variations was attempted by Madame Garcia. Who is Madame Garcia? "Where the Bee Sucks" was sung twice by Miss Binckes, and a Scotch song by Miss Messent, was also called for twice, and repeated. The eternal Prayer from the Mosé in Egitto concluded the concert—Herr Kuhe, Herr Carl Schmit, and Mr. Frank Mori officiated in turn as Conductors.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—The another week at playhouse prices. Will they stretch out to the crack of doom? Four more nights are announced—vide advertisement—as "positively the last." But these terms have now ceased to have any force. However, we have good reason to suspect that next week will in reality put an end to Mr. Lumley's long-lived and most extraordinary season. We hear, by the way, that the indefatigable director is already making engagements of importance for next year, and rumour hints at vast improvements in several departments in the establishment being projected. If Mr. Lumley next season exceed the energy he has displayed in his present campaign he will accomplish a miracle:

JULLIEN.—The indefatigable chef d'orchestre is rustivating at Southend, and is hard at work on his new opera, which he expects to complete before he commences his provincial tour in January. Jullien returns to London next week to make preparations for his winter campaign at Drury-lane. What novelties Jullien intends producing this season are yet in the womb of time. The public, however, may depend on it, that Jullien's brain never lies fallow. The mental plough is always at work, and the seeds of thought always being sown.

RETIREMENT OF BALFE FROM HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—A friend writes from Cologne that it is there said that Herr Ferdinand Hiller has been just engaged by Mr. Lumley as the musical director of Her Majesty's Theatre in London, and of the Italian Opera in Paris, and that he will, in consequence, resign his appointments in the city of the three Kings. This, of course, implies the retirement of Mr. Balfé; and the gain also to London of a sound musician and amiable man, which universal report declares Herr Hiller to be. What his capacities as musical conductor of a theatre so differently constructed from those of the Continent, as ours may prove, no one can yet divine; but of his standing among European musicians there can be no question. His appointment, therefore, if the Celognese echoes tell true, must not pass without a word of welcome. It is said that if Herr Hiller do leave Germany, there is some chance of M. Liszt being tempted away from his court allegiance at Weimer, to be placed at the head of the Conservatoire in Cologne, instead of Herr Hiller.

Advertisements.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

PLAY-HOUSE PRICE NIGHTS

IT is respectfully announced that FOUR MORE NIGHTS will be given, viz., on TUESDAY, SEPT. 30, 1851.

THURSDAY, OCT. 2.
FRIDAY, OCT. 3. And
SATURDAY, OCT. 4.

The particulars of which will be announced forthwith.

Prices—Pit, 5s.; Gallery, 2s. 6d.; Pit Stalls, 10s. 6d.; Gallery Stalls, 5s.; Boxes, Two Pair, 11s.; One Pair and Pit Tier, £1 11s. 6d.; Grand Tier, £2 2s.; Box Seats, 5s. 6d. and 7s.

Applications for Boxes, Stalls, and Tickets, to be made at the Box Office of the Theatre. The Opera to commence at Eight o'clock.

THE ENGLISH GLEE AND MADRIGAL UNION,

(UNDER THE PATRONAGE OF HER MOST GRACIOUS MAJESTY),

CONSISTING of Mrs. Endersohn, Miss M. Williams, Mr. Lockey, Mr. Francis, Mr. Laud, and Mr. H. Phillips, will sing at BRIGHTON: on TUESDAY EVENING, September 30th, and WEDNESDAY MORNING, October 1st; Hastings, 2nd; and Mr. Goodham's Annual Concert, Tonbridge Wells, 3rd. The Tour in the Midland counties will commence at Northampton, October 6th. E. Laud, Hon. Sec., 5, Foley Place, London.

SCHOTT AND CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

VIOLIN SOLOS WITH ACCOMPANIMENT FOR PIANO OR ORCHESTRA.

Auld, Delphin.	Op. 21, Souvenirs de Mozart.
Beriot de, Ch.	Op. 70, 6mo. Concerto.
	Op. 72, 7mo.
Br, Fr.	Op. 2, Sonnaucht nach der Schweiz. Variations.
Legard, H.	Op. 24, 2nd Concerto.
	Op. 18, Grande Fantaisie Militaire.
Sainton, Prosper.	Lucresia Borgia. Fantaisie.
	Fille du Regiment. " "
" "	1st Concerto. " "

Schott and Co., 89, St. James's-street.

EROST BOWER'S NEW PIANO SOLOS.

Op. 30, Caprice en forme de Tarantelle	3s. 6d.
Op. 31, Esquise. Mélodie	2s. 6d.

Schott and Co., 89, St. James's-street.

TEUBNER'S PIANOFORTE WORKS.

PUBLISHED BY WESSEL & Co.

Fantaisie Nocturne	2s. 6d.
"The Cottage,"	2s. 6d.
"True Love,"	2s. 6d.
"Loreley,"	2s. 6d.
"Les Etolles,"	2s. 6d.
"Le Torrent,"	2s. 6d.
"The Curfew,"	2s. 6d.
"Passe," second Nocturne	2s. 6d.
"Scène Russe," Caprice brillant	4s. 6d.
"Farewell,"	2s. 6d.
"Fathfulness,"	2s. 6d.
"Adieu,"	2s. 6d.
"L'Adieu de Mozart,"	3s. 6d.

The above are Copyright.

Wessel & Co., 229, Regent-street, London.

NEW DUETS FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

THALBERG	Beatrice di Tenda.
ROSELLEN	Deux Melodies de Donizetti, 1 and 2.
ROSELLEN	Val D'andore.
WOLFF	Value Original.
WOLFF	Beatrice di Tenda.
SILAS	La Primavera, Bagatelle.
KALLIWODA	Invitation à la Danse.
OSBORNE	Pluie de Perles.
SCHULTZ	Duo L'espagnola.
BEYER	Krieger's Lust March.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent-street.

THE ORGANIST'S COMPANION,

BY JOHN GOSS, Organist of St. Paul's Cathedral. A series of voluntaries, for the commencement, middle, and conclusion of divine service; also, a collection of interludes or short symphonies, to be played between the verses of the psalms or hymns, in numbers 2s. 6d. each, or 4 vols., 12 each.

PAROCHIAL PSALMODY.

A COLLECTION of Ancient and Modern tunes; also a variety of favourite responses to the Commandments, with directions for chanting, with an accompaniment for the Organ or Pianoforte, by John Goss, price 6s.

SACRED MELODIES.

SELECTED from eminent composers, and arranged for one or two voices, with an accompaniment for Organ or Pianoforte, by J. Goss, Organist of St. Paul's Cathedral. Price 6s.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent-street, and 67, Conduit-street.

THE POPULAR SONG OF THE DAY.

"TALK OF HIM THAT'S FAR AWA," composed by THOMAS CHANTREY. A new edition of which is just issued, may be had at AMBISON & HOLLIER'S, 210, Regent-street, London. For simplicity, elegance, and originality of melody, it is unrivalled.

Also, by the same author, "Why wilt thou not love?" and "The dream is past."

JOULE'S DIRECTORIUM CHORI ANGLICANUM.

Second Edition, price 1s., in cloth 1s. 6d.

THE most complete Choral Service book that has yet appeared. Dedicated by permission to the Lord Bishop of Manchester. For highly favourable reviews see "Christian Remembrancer," "Theologian," "Parish Choir," &c &c. London: J. A. Novello. A few copies of the quarto edition, price 15s., still on hand.

HEALTH WHERE TIS SOUGHT!

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—Cure of a disordered Liver and Stomach, when in a most hopeless state.—Extract of a letter from Mr. Matthew Harvey, of Chapel Hall, Airdrie, Scotland, dated the 15th of January, 1850.—To Professor HOLLOWAY, Sir,—Your valuable Pills have been the means, with God's blessing, of restoring me to perfect health, at a time when I thought I was on the brink of the grave. I had consulted several eminent Doctors, who, after doing what they could for me, considered my case hopeless. I had been suffering from a Liver and Stomach complaint of long standing, which during the last two years got so much worse, that every one considered my condition as hopeless. I, as a last resource, got a Box of your Pills, which soon gave relief, and by persevering in their use for some weeks, together with rubbing night and morning your Ointment over my chest and stomach, and right side, I have by their means alone got completely cured, and to the astonishment of myself and everybody who knows me.

(Signed) MATTHEW HARVEY.

These celebrated Pills are wonderfully efficacious in the following complaints:—Ague, Constipation of the Bowels, Liver complaints, Tumours, Bilious Com- the Bowels kinds Lumbago Ulcers, plints Debility Gout Piles Worms of all kinds Rheumatism kinds Blotches on the Droopy Head-ache Scrofula or King's Weakness, from Skin Dysentery Indigestion Evil whatever cause Bowel complaints Erysipelas Inflammation Sore Throats &c., &c. Colics Jaundice Tie-Douloureux

Printed and Published, for the Proprietors, by MICHAEL SAMUEL MYERS, of No. 3, Studley Villas, Studley Road, Clapham Road, in the parish of Lambeth, at the office of MYERS and Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, in the parish of St. Paul, where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed, post paid. To be had of G. Purkes, Dean Street, Soho; Allen, Warwick Lane; Vickers, Holywell Street, and at all Booksellers.—Saturday, September 27, 1851.

The Musical World.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s.; Half year, 8s.; Three Months, 4s.; (Stamped Copies 1s. per Quarter extra,) payable in advance, to be forwarded by Money Order, to the Publishers, Myers & Co., 22, Tavistock-st., Covent Garden.

No. 40.—VOL. XXIX.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 4, 1851.

Price Fourpence.
Stamped Fivepence.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

RESUME OF THE SEASON.

(Continued from our Last.)

THE debut of the famous Italian cantatrice, Mad. Barbieri Nini, whose name was one of the great attractions of the prospectus, took place after long and anxious anticipation, Tuesday, the 5th of August. The opera was Lucrezia Borgia. Mad. Barbieri Nini was of course the heroine, and the great Alboni, to strengthen the cast, condescended (we say condescended, since Alboni has for some time abandoned the exclusively contralto range of characters), to resume her old and favourite part of Maffeo Orsini, and sing the "In segreto" in her own incomparable manner. It is unnecessary to enlarge upon the fact of Mad. Barbieri Nini's appearance, to recapitulate our opinions of her talent, or to refer at any length to the impression she produced upon the public. These matters must be fresh in the memory of our readers. Suffice it that Mad. Barbieri Nini's success was complete and legitimate. The audience, one of the most crowded of the season, received her with enthusiasm. The opinions of the press were at strange variance with each other. Some would have it that Mad. Barbieri was another Pasta; others went further still; while the rest found much to criticise, as well as much to praise in her talent. We were among the latter, and a more intimate acquaintance, derived from repeated hearings, has only tended to confirm our first conclusion. Mad. Barbieri Nini is undoubtedly a great vocalist of the purely declamatory school. You hear every syllable she utters with extreme distinctness; but you hear too much, since the habit of declaiming everything à l'outrance often leads Mad. Barbieri to make mountains out of mole-hills; or, in other words, to give undue importance to insignificant passages, which is obtrusive, and derogates from the effect of passages really and properly emphatic, when they arrive. In the adagio Mad. Barbieri often phrases magnificently, and in the allegro, especially in the traits de bravoure, her execution is surprisingly forcible, and invariably pure; but in the first she frequently produces a monotonous effect by a species of measurement, whereby every bar, and section of a bar, has such exact relative proportions, that the balance is unchangingly even, and no part outweighs another, whereby one grand secret of vocal expression is altogether ignored; while in the latter, such quality as remains in a voice originally strong and full, but sadly worn by years and Verdi, evaporates in the point and rapidity of her articulation. Examples of their beauties and their defects may always be traced in her performance of the "M'odi, in'odi," and the interpolated final bravura in her Lucrezia Borgia. To resume, however, and to conclude, Mad. Barbieri Nini is a vocalist of distinguished attainments, who, in spite of her defects, offers very many points of mechanism and expression, which young and ambitious singers would do well to study, and profit by. As an actress Mad. Barbieri Nini is at the most intelligent, correct, and full of a sort of artificial energy; but she is exaggerated, bombastic even at times, and her gestures, frequently reminding us of the gymnastics of natation, set grace, taste, and natural ease at defiance. For much of this, a face, and person by no means favourable for stage illusion, must be called to account; and on these grounds we are disposed to be the more charitable in criticising Mad. Barbieri Nini's dramatic, or rather, melo-dramatic capabilities.

The next event of consequence was Alboni's first appearance as Maria in the Figlia del Reggimento, a part to which she owed much of her success during her recent engagement at Madrid. Alboni's Vivandiere differs entirely from the view of that personage adopted by Jenny Lind and Madame Sontag. She was more lively and full of a kind of buxom bonhomie than the first, and less boisterous and termagantish than the last. What Jenny Lind underdid, Sontag overdid, while Alboni steered the middle course—"In medio tutissimus ibis." On the whole we confess to have a preference for Jenny Lind's Maria over that of Madame Sontag, as possessing more charm while betraying less effort. Both, however, for such as they were, must be lauded as very equal performances, a distinction which cannot be awarded to the Vivandiere of Alboni. Nevertheless, we greatly prefer Alboni's first act to that of either of her rivals. Her singing of the popular "Ciascun lo dice" was admirable, while her beating of the drum was unique and irresistible, not more Vivandierish than Alboniish—Märiettish. She first obtained an encore in London for this lively melody. In the tender passages she was exquisite, and her singing of the beautiful minor cantabile, where Maria takes leave of the regiment, was divine, at least equal to Jenny Lind, and, be it understood, this was one of Jenny Lind's best points. In the lesson scene Alboni did not make the effect anticipated and achieved by both her predecessors, which may be laid to the account of the cadenza. With Alboni's voice and means something quite hors ligne and original was naturally expected; instead of which she sang precisely the same cadenza as Jenny Lind and Sontag, which being wholly unmuted to her caused the whole to fall flatly. In the last scene, however, Alboni entirely redeemed her laurels. Alboni was again Alboni, and her vocalization in Balfe's brilliant and popular rondo finale to the Maid of Artois was an effort neither more nor less than Malibranesque—we can find no other term to express what we mean, or to account for the surprise and delight it created. This brought the curtain down amid thunders of applause, and made Alboni's one hundred triumphs one hundred and one. Of Gardoni's Tonjo, and Frederick Lablache's Sulpizio, we need say no more than they were worthy of themselves, and fit subordinate figures in the tableau of which Alboni was the sun.

Sontag having unexpectedly retired from the theatre, at the next performance of Don Giovanni Alboni was her substitute in the part of Zerlina. Of this it is enough to reiterate what we have said more than once, that Mozart's adorable peasant maiden never before had such an adorable representative; and that the heavenly melodies which Mozart has made flow from the lips of Zerlina, like fresh water mixed with joannisberg (real), from a celestial fountain (the sherbet of the orientals, the nectar of the Greeks was nothing to it, with Houris, Hebes, and Ganymedes to boot), were never warbled with such luscious sweetness, were never uttered with such sacred veneration for the text of the mighty genius, who scattered his inspirations to the winds like leaves from a boundless forest when the autumn breeze blows freshly from the West. In short, Alboni's Zerlina, in its way, is matchless—and note, that she sings the airs in the proper keys, for which, by the by, we are ourselves in some sort accountable, and of which Lablache approved with big benevolence and gigantic glee, shaking his venerated sides with sleekness of satisfaction and fulness of faith in Mozart and the charming priestess, who, with sunny smile and velvet voice, chanted canticles in honour of the immortal, though departed composer, and with arms fair, fat, and rosy-fingered, swang incense before the altar as she sang.

And now we come to Balfe's benefit, memorable for three reasons; memorable as Balfe's benefit, the first he ever took at Her Majesty's Theatre; memorable for the first presentation of Balfe's opera, Les Quatre Fils Aymon, in an Italian guise on the Italian stage, and under the Italian title of I Quattro Fratelli; and memorable for the first appearance of Sophie Cruvelli in an original comic part. It were bootless to re-enter, having once entered, into the plot of this opera, which is equally comic and intrigué, ingenious, original, and interesting, of M. M. Leuven and Brunswick; or to apostrophise the music of Balfe, having already apostrophised it as among the most sparkling, tuneful, racy and animated of that most sparkling, tuneful, racy and animated composer; or to re-chronicle its reception by the audience, having already chronicled it as a triumphant success. Nor is it necessary to repeat what we have previously said in homage to the merit of Massol's stolid, carved, oakish, ancestral and burly conception of the part of the Baron Beaumanoir (Baron Finchouse); nor to record more than we have elsewhere recorded of the merits of Madame Giuliani, Madlle. Feller, Miss Lanza, Coletti, Gardoni, Pardini, Balanchi, &c., in their respective "rôles;" nor to relavish praises, hitherto lavished, on the orchestra, chorus and subordinates; for their conjunct seal in behalf of the opera of their trusty and well-beloved director; nor to repeat what we have spoken of the several times that Balfe, Michael Balfe, Michael William Balfe, was called by the audience and applauded to the echo—all this will be needless and superfluous; but we must pause awhile to recollect and re-record our impressions of the performance of Sophie Cruvelli, who had studied and learnt the part in ten days. The brilliant Erminia was never so brilliant before; the dashing Erminia never so dashing; the beautiful Erminia never so beautiful. Balfe's conception was idealised by Sophie Cruvelli, who, in this part alone, hastily acquired, improvised, so to speak, raised herself to the position, in the estimate of connoisseurs, of a first-rate comedian, genial, humorous, and irresistible. In short, we thought, and we may have said (we have not time to look back—the "devil" a its for copy) at the time, and we think and are about to say at present, that if Cruvelli's Norma is a fine piece of tragedy, Cruvelli's Fidelio is a fine piece of melodrama, Cruvelli's Erminia is the finest piece of comedy. Of Cruvelli's singing we need say no more than that it was worthy of Cruvelli. We must add, however, that Balfe had written two bravuras airs for his new and charming Erminia, bristling with vocal difficulties, and making nothing of a compass of three octaves. With these Cruvelli played as a child with the toy just presented to it by its mamma, especially with the last, "Or chi verra," which created a furor, and was encored with acclamations. Bref, Sophie Cruvelli accomplished a new triumph, and shared it with Balfe. At the end of a long article we remember to have said ourselves, "after which it was unnecessary to say more than that next to Fidelio and Norma, Erminia was the greatest and most legitimate triumph of Sophie Cruvelli." Sonnambula was to come.

A word may chronicle the revival of the last scene of the Due Foscari, remarkable for the impressive performance of Coletti.

After some weeks' absence, Sontag came back; and on Saturday, the 16th of August, once more appeared as Rosina in the Barbiere, and sang "Rhode's air" to admiration; and on the following Wednesday, as Susanna in the Nozze di Figaro, when, as if to crown her triumph in Erminia with fresh bays, Sophie Cruvelli played Cherubino, sang "Voi che sapete" without changing a note, or interpolating an ornament—sang it divinely, was encored, sang it again without changing a note or interpolating an ornament—again divinely. The lips of censure were sealed. His tongue wagged no more. There was nothing for him to say. Sophia Cruvelli had conquered—herself and censure.

About this time, on a Tuesday, Florinda was repeated unexpectedly. We did not expect it, and dined at Richmond on some trout obtained hard by from a fish-keeper, and arrived during the performance of the last act, just in time to hear Cruvelli sing C at the full force of her poumons, and to see Sims Reeves expire languishingly on a couch pight wingwards.

On the Friday of the same week a more welcome performance in Beethoven's Fidelio brought back once more Cruvelli's transcendent Leonora to the willing eyes and willing ears—to the eager eyes and eager ears—to the ravished eyes and ravished ears of a crowded audience, which preferred Fidelio to Florinda—brandy to water. This was announced as the last representation of Fidelio, which has since been repeated some third of a score of times. (Mr. Lumley, we regret to avow it, has emulated Mr. Gys by presenting Fidelio in a mutilated form, combined with other loppings from meaner trunks, to draw the money from the waistcoat pockets of provincial Yankee, and multi-bearded continentals.)

About this time happened the Musical Festival at Worcester, and the star of the opera during the period of a week illumined the distant hills of Malvern. Sophie Cruvelli absent, it was darkness. The dim light of the ex-queen, Anna Bolena, subsequently unheaded by her furious mate, shone but as a rushlight that does duty for the moon, when stupid clouds persist to hide that lovely luminary behind their impenetrable coat of blackness, the skirts whereof are silvered by who thus repays envy by benevolence; and as a tail to the simile and a translation of the figure into prose, the name of Cruvelli announced at the foot of the bills to play Norma on the Saturday was the one twinkling point that shed a faint blush of light over the tenebrous heavens. Nathless, the Anna Bolena of Madame Barbieri Nini on Tuesday, August the 26th, being the second part in which the great declamatory vocalist had appeared in London, left an impression which must not stand unrecorded. We therefore record it. The Anna Bolena of Madame Barbieri Nini left this impression—that possessed she (Madame Barbieri Nini) the ars celare artem (D. R. ante No. 35 Musical World) she would know to conceal her art; and leave nature the freer to cut its own caper, turn its own somersault, and poise its own toe. This was the impression left by Madame Barbieri Nini's impersonation of Anna Bolena, the ex-queen subsequently unheaded by her furious mate. Lablache, as Henry the Eighth, to employ the quaint simile of the Times, looked "like a page torn from the history of England,"—Albert Smith would have added (as D. R. added) "folio edition." As for Madame Giuliani, Calzolari, and Ida Bertrand, they played Catherine Seymour, Percy, and Smeaton.

"That orb'd maiden
With white fire laden."

But where was Cerrito—the bounding Cerrito—the "brillante et bouillante" (as Jules Lecomte said of Cruvelli, in the Independence Belge). Fanny—Fanny Cerrito? Where was

Fanny Cerrito? Did she not "se lancer" on the stage, like a menad, with uplifted front and vein-swollen neck—

"Shaking wide her yellow hair"?—

Did she not stream from the side wings to the foot-lights, like a comet, rushing to her public, the sun of her adoring, to be unknown, unrecognised? (the palms and the eyes of the audience had been beaten, shut per force of applauding and gazing at the zinc-footed Amalia—Amalia Ferraris)—did not Fanny this, and more than this?—take an eclatante revenge?—did she not, after her first pas, when her feet, endowed with unseen wings, laughed at the ground ("Thou Scornor of the ground"—Shelley), did she not force their obstinate hands, maugre resisting elbows, to loud and long-continued clappings, and moisten their dried eyelids to pleasurable perspiration, till fountains of delight, half laughter, half tears, dropped from the eyes?—did she not triumph, as Cerrito has triumphed a thousand times before?—as Fanny has triumphed, the only possible substitute for "Carlotta; the unapproachable," who, though not Carlotta, the nearest to Carlotta, while a long way off? She did. Cerrito danced for the first time on Saturday, the 23rd of August, after the opera of the Figlia del Reggimento (in which Madame Sontag was once more the Maria), Cerrito danced, and outdid her own shadow on the ice.

Meanwhile Sophie Cruvelli, heavily laden with the bays she won at Worcester, came back train-haste, and once more walked the stage as Norma, the sublime druidess (in one act), bringing the week to a climax gloriously.

We should have mentioned that the 26th of August, when Anna Bolena was produced, closed the subscription; and that the performances with "play-house prices," at first announced "for a few nights only," but since indefinitely extended, began on the Wednesday, with a miscellaneous selection. As these performances had no connection with the regular season, it is unnecessary for us to include any account of them in our present notice. Suffice it the principal artists left, one by one until, at last, the weight of the opera rested entirely upon the shoulders of Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli, who luckily for the theatre, was well able to bear the burden of responsibility. Any singer with less magnificent physical gifts, less stamina, and less indomitable energy, would have sunk under the infliction of such hard and continuous labour; but Sophie, backed by youth, ambition, and enthusiasm, has womanfully resisted all temptation to succumb. Loved by the public, applauded equally by those who knew her talent, and by strangers, from all parts of the world, who only made her acquaintance at the "play-house prices," Mr. Lumley's latest and most favoured prima donna has gone through her arduous duties with unswerving courage, playing one night Norma, the next Fidelio, the next Rosina, the next Amina, and sometimes even in two operas on the same evening, without flinching or protest. Never once has she been absent from her post, never once has she relaxed her zeal in service of the management. Nor has Sophie Cruvelli been unrewarded. The features of the after-season have been her Rosina, in the Barbiere, which revived one of her old successes of 1848, and her Amina in the Son-nambula, in which she has "snuffed out" all her predecessors since Malibran,—we make no exceptions. The director of Her Majesty's Theatre has every reason to be satisfied in the possession of such an artist, and the subscribers and the public have no less reason to be satisfied with the director, who, besides keeping most of the promises of a rich and varied prospectus, presented them with something unannounced and unanticipated in the person of SOPHIE CRUVELLI, a genius in the fullest acceptation of the term, the youngest and most promising dramatic singer of the times, and who, if we be not greatly in error, will prove to be the brightest jewel in Mr. Lumley's managerial diadem. We have yet some further observations to make on opera, ballet, orchestra, chorus, Mr. Balfe, and the general policy of the season, which however, we must defer.

(To be concluded in our next.)

GYMNASTICS FOR VOCALISTS.*

Our reason for noticing this able and original treatise from the pen of a very eminent medical philosopher, mentioned in our foot note, will be presently apparent to the most unapprehensive of our readers. A point of vast importance is too often overlooked by those who practice and those who profess to teach the art vocal; and, though it be not the province of a musical journal to touch upon maladies of the skin, affections of the joints, or vexings of any particular member or members of the frame human, whatever bears directly or indirectly upon that magnificent and various, though ill-used and worse understood instrument, the voice, comes within the limits of our special jurisprudence. Thus much for explanation or apology for the discussion of a book medical in our reviewing columns.

The point of vast importance to which we have alluded in preamble is the influence of exercise upon the quality, strength, usability, and durability of the vocal organ. Exercise means movement, since it is plain to the meanest intelligence, that without motion, active or passive (non lege emotion) there can be no exercise. You may take lignum aloes in gross shavings, steep them in sack or alacant, changed twice half an hour at a time till the bitterness exude; you may take the shavings forth, dry them in the shade, and beat them to an exquisite powder; of that powder wetted with the syrup of citrons you may make an excellent pill, which you may take before supper. If, previous to the use of this prescription, your voice has been in healthy order, it is possible that after the use of it, it may be deranged. But if, previous to the use of this prescription, your voice have been in an unhealthy order, it is possible, nay, probable, that after the use of it, the symptoms may be aggravated. The query may therefore be instituted, why the prescription? to which echo may respond without offence to logic, "why, O wherefore!" supposing echo to dwell among the hills and passes of Killarney. For our own parts we have heard of many nostrums for the voice issued by many mediciners and quacks to whom we would apply the reproach of Paracelsus, who was not a quack, but an empiric, to the real quacks—"Ite maledicti in Gehennam," &c. &c. &c. (Labyrinthus Medicorum, cap. 9, p. 287.) Bref, to parody the lines of Leigh Hunt, an empiric in another field of human inquiry,

"Away with all nostrums wherever we come,
We forbid them, ye gentlemen, all in sum—" in some quatrains anent water, which John Barnett set to music with a great deal of spirit (no pun). We except, however, from our expurgatory index, STOLBERG'S VOICE LOZENGE, which is less a nostrum than a panacea, to the virtues whereof most of the celebrated singers of the age have borne willing testimony, having derived in propria persona from those popular pills, or rather, to speak by the card, those luscious lozenges, great and enduring vantage.

Nevertheless, exercise is the thing, and exercise is movement, and movement should be various, so as to affect every member, inner and outer, of the human trunk, which the learned and judicious Doctor Roth has set forth lucidly, expounded eloquently, and proved incontestably in the present libellus, the contents whereof we have perused straight on, from the preface to the end, with unfeigned pleasure and inward exaltation. For have we not all voices; and who knows if, by the gesticulatory gymnastics, polyhedric postures, and multifarious movements recommended by Doctor Roth, and included in his system of training, one of our sons may not turn out a robust tenor, one of our daughters a first lady. The sole object of Doctor Roth in compiling the pages which lie stretched before us, was to regulate the physical, and control the mental condition of the human microcosm; and in our humble, though avowedly indoct opinion, he has accomplished his purpose in a clear and masterly manner. Dr. Roth has laid open the ground wherein the over-sensitive, and often over-wrought and terribly fagged spirit of the musical composer may walk leisurely, run lightly, and breathe freely, in the form of a series of regular exercises, which, by augmenting the elasticity of the frame corporal, does away with the injurious effects of sedentary habits, and lifts the mind upon a jocund poise of tip-toe. Dr. Roth has also shown in simple and unaffected language, that the vocal student—nature and organization being favourable—may arrive with certainty at the possession of a strong and healthy voice; and that one not liberally gifted from his birth may so improve the physical gifts with which he may be endowed, as to attain at least as much again as by any other means. Dr. Roth professes not to teach sol-fa; but this is his profession of faith—a moving profession:—

"The law of movement is founded upon nature; no chemical action can be effected in the organism, without the participation or assistance of the mechanical acts, which are expressed by involuntary movements. As, for instance, oxydation of the blood (a chemical action) cannot take place without the motion of the respiratory muscles, which is a mechanical one; digestion, assimilation, &c. (chemical acts), cannot be performed without mechanical movements of the stomach, intestines, and some other muscular organs. The blood cannot be thrown to every part of the organism, here to be oxydated, there to nourish, or perform other chemical functions, without the contracting and dilating movements of the heart. In fact, throughout the entire organism movement is engendered by movement."

It is not, however, our intention to discuss with Dr. Roth the medical treatment of diseases, but merely to explain to all interested in the development of the human voice, how much may be learned from the result of the learned gentleman's experience, set forth in the treatise before us, and made the bases of his system of exercises. Movements that act upon the thorax, chest, and abdomen, are those more immediately connected with the matter in hand; and how these have been neglected and overlooked, not only by vocal professors but by vocal philosophizers, we need scarcely stop to urge. The maladies arising from this neglect, and all of which Dr. Roth proposes to avert, or remedy, or modify, or radically cure, are chronic inflammation of the larynx and windpipe; irregular action of the vocal chords; relaxation of the uvula, &c. How important any method to frustrate or wholly get rid of these plagues to the poor singer's existence! That this may be effected, easily and speedily, by rich and poor, illustrious and humble, without danger and with small pains, Dr. Roth has clearly proved upon principles of anatomy and pathology too well established to admit of controversion. To the vocal student, anxious for improvement, and sufficiently wise to follow the road laid down by science for his progress, instead of throwing himself at the mercy of the blind pilot, Chance, or giving himself up to the crooked guidance of the one-eyed steersman, Sloth, Dr. Roth's treatise is invaluable. The ardent composer, who passes nights of sleepless inspiration, days of laborious travail, straining the functions of the body, and concentrating the attention of the mind to a single point, continual exercising one solitary and heavily taxed organ—THE BRAIN—will derive equal advantage from its careful perusal and consideration, provided he be induced to act at once upon the suggestions it contains. If the functions of the body and spirit be not in harmony, the general health must suffer, and disease, at first fitful, then obstinate, and finally chronic, supervene. If the whole nervous energy be directed to one object—or rather one particular part of the nervous organism be continually exerted, undue irritation must accrue, and apathetic immobility allow the seeds of malady to be sown in the other parts of the organism not specially excited. To conclude—the movements proposed by Dr. Roth (for which we strongly recommend the reader to consult his book) will be found admirable substitutes for the more expensive exercises of dancing, fencing, swimming, horse-riding, driving, carriageing, &c., &c., &c. Dr. Roth has already begun to put his system into active illustration, and is rapidly making converts, and relieving the afflicted.—Verbum Sat.

* The prevention and cure of many chronic Diseases by Movements. An Exposition of the Principles and Practice by these Movements for the Correction of the Tendencies of Disease in Infancy, Childhood, and Youth, and for the cure of many Morbid Affections of Adults.—By M. ROTH, M.D. JOHN CHURCHILL, PRINCES STREET.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE longest and most prosperous season since the first institution of the Sacred Harmonic Society at Exeter Hall came to a conclusion on Friday the 26th ult., with a very fine performance of Mendelssohn's oratorio of Elijah. The principal singers were Madame Clara Novello, Misses Eliza Birch, Dolby, and Williams; Messrs. Sims Reeves, Whitehouse, and Herr Formes. The hall was crammed to suffocation, and after the oratorio, three cheers were raised for Mr. Costa, who retired from the orchestra amid enthusiastic plaudits.

The season has comprised 36 performances—11 on subscription nights. The opening after the recess, when the alterations in the hall, which met with such unanimous approval were effected, took place on Friday, November 29, 1850. Handel's Messiah was executed, and subsequently repeated twice in succession. Elijah came next (December 23), and was also given three times. The first performance of this great oratorio was criticised as inefficient; but, on the two following occasions, the society redeemed its laurels, and rendered justice to the memory of Mendelssohn. Handel's choral masterpiece, Israel in Egypt, was produced on January 30, 1851, and performed twice. The improvements in the hall were triumphantly demonstrated in the double choruses of this majestic composition, which had never before been heard to such advantage at Exeter-hall, or, perhaps, anywhere else. Saul was given February 26, but not repeated. The success attending the revival of Samson, which, although brought forward six times since the foundation of the society, had never been popular, must be traced to the influence of Mr. Costa, not merely as a conductor, but as a musician. The accompaniments which that gentleman added to the score were judicious and effective—neither too full nor too thin, and never interfering with the original ideas of the composer. Samson was first performed March 11, and repeated twice. From this period up to the present time, the performances (31 in all), have alternated chiefly between the Messiah and Elijah, varied by the Creation (four times) and St. Paul (once).

The principal singers during the season have been Madame Clara Novello, Madame Macfarren, Misses Catharine Hayes, Birch, Dolby, Williams, Louisa Pyne, Eliza Birch, Messrs. Sims Reeves, Lockey, Whitworth, Stockhausen, Whitehouse, and Herr Formes. The rapid improvement of the German basso has been the theme of constant observation, and has acted most beneficially upon the general effect of the oratorios. The return of Madame Clara Novello brought another accomplished singer of sacred music into the market. The liberties which this lady took with the text of Handel and Haydn were severely commented upon by the press, but her chaste and correct performances in Elijah and St. Paul were universally extolled. Madame Novello, it is to be hoped, will take counsel, and reflect that what is admissible in Italian opera may be nothing less than impertinent in music which attempts to illustrate the divine admonitions of scripture. Miss Louisa Pyne's first and only appearance (in the Messiah) was very successful; and Miss Catharine Hayes, in Elijah, justified her fame as one of the first concert singers of the day. Madame Macfarren, who supplied the places of Miss Dolby and Miss Williams, during their absence at the Worcester festival, made a highly favourable impression, in the contralto songs of the Messiah and the recitatives of Jezebel, in Elijah. Of the other singers it is only necessary to say that they have maintained their reputations, a word of acknowledgment, however, being due to the steady improvement of Miss Eliza Birch.

Of the various oratorios the most attractive have been the Messiah and Elijah. The latter great work was first executed in its present perfected state, with the alterations of the composer, at Exeter-hall, April 16, (1847), under the direction of Mendelssohn himself. It has now been played 26 times, and its popularity has gradually increased up to the present moment, when it actually divides the palm of supremacy with the Messiah. It may not be irrelevant to refer to the accounts in The Musical World of the first performance of Elijah at the Birmingham Festival of 1846 (for which event it was expressly composed), when the elevated place that oratorio now holds in the esteem of the musical world was confidently predicted. The most attractive work, after the Messiah and Elijah, has been the Creation of Haydn—an oratorio of lighter character, appealing to a numerous, though, perhaps, less cultivated class. We shall be disappointed, however, if before long Israel in Egypt and St. Paul do not step in advance of the Creation, and occupy the place in public esteem nearest to the Messiah and Elijah. That hitherto Israel in Egypt and St. Paul have not been entirely appreciated, must be laid to the fact that they are compositions of a more abstruse and complex nature, with which the uneducated ear less readily becomes familiar. Their time, however, is at hand; the more music progresses, the better they will be understood. Of course a great part of the success of the present exceptional season has been due to the influx of foreigners and strangers to London during the progress of the Great Exhibition. Of this the committee wisely took advantage early in April, by distributing prospectuses in various languages, not only throughout London and the provinces, but in many of the principal cities of the continent. Vast numbers of foreigners have swelled the audiences of the Sacred Harmonic Society, whose testimony to the merits of the institution has been warm and general, their surprise at the magnitude and excellence of the performances being not a little heightened on learning that the society was composed of amateurs, with whom a love of art was the sole inducement to meet and co-operate in the execution of music of the most serious and exalted character. As the concerts during the last two months have been almost exclusively undertaken with a view to the accommodation of strangers, the adherence principally to the three most popular oratorios (the Messiah, Elijah, and the Creation), as best adapted to afford an idea of the means of execution possessed by the society, is explained and excused. Their continuance up to the present time is a guarantee of their success; and it is calculated that the receipts will nearly double the property which it has taken the Sacred Harmonic Society fifteen years to accumulate, and as a natural consequence, help to strengthen its influence and firmly establish its position.

The Sacred Harmonic Society held its first concert in the large room of Exeter-hall, June 28, 1836, when the Messiah was the oratorio. Up to the present time 258 concerts have been given, which have been attended by nearly 490,000 persons, while vocal and instrumental artistes have been paid out of the funds no less than £35,000. The chief portion of the expenses (8-11ths it is stated) is incurred by professional engagements; printing, advertising, rent, and all subordinate items being provided for by the rest. The last subscription was larger than on any previous occasion, and we believe that of the present year already promises to be better still. Now that the Sacred Harmonic Society has attained to such influence and prosperity, it behoves all connected with the direction of its affairs to use increased energy. It is no longer a close borough, but an institution depending on the public for support, and therefore open to the strictures of the press, which represents and defends the interests of the public, in its amusements no less than in its political and constitutional rights. The election of the committee is a point of the utmost importance, and the members must see clearly the necessity on all occasions of only choosing those who are capable and anxious to work in the machinery of legislation. Hitherto the officers, holding honorary appointments, who have superintended the business departments of the society, have, in most instances, deserved praise for industry, economy, and general good management; but there have, nevertheless, been cases which have given the members just cause of complaint. The motto of the society should be "Go ahead," and the practicability of its active illustration depends mainly on the executive committee. The society, for its own pleasure and amusement, has done much; but having become an object of public attention, it is now its duty to effect more. It will be advisable next season to introduce some works hitherto unattempted. The list is ample, if the committee, with Mr. Costa's assistance, will please to refer to it. There are the Seasons of Haydn, according to German critics a greater work than the Creation—the Requiem of Mozart—the second Mass of Beethoven—the Passions of Bach—some of the great Psalms of Mendelssohn—besides Belshazzar, Deborah, and other oratorios of Handel, rarely performed, and Calvary, the reputed masterpiece of Spohr, of which the Norwich amateurs are so proud and the London amateurs so ignorant. To this catalogue might reasonably be added David (Mr. Horsley's, not the Chevalier Neukomm's), an oratorio upon which a careful execution would not be lost, since it has already succeeded, no thanks to the society, and would succeed still better with the society's assistance. David found hearers and warm appreciators in Liverpool, when produced by the spirited Philharmonic Society of that town, in their new and magnificent concert hall; and if at Liverpool why not in London, where the lovers of music are tenfold? The engagement of Mr. Costa was an important step, the wisdom of which has been established by the experience of three years. That gentleman has improved the orchestra, and has done all in his power to improve the chorus. Since Mr. Costa has been director the performances have been quite a different matter from what they were of old, and to his continued exertions the subscribers and the public must look for further improvements. Among the most essential steps to be enforced is a punctual attendance at rehearsals. Those who, from long service, pressing occupations elsewhere, or any other cause, may be unable or unwilling to co-operate, should be allowed to retire and repose on their laurels. Without good rehearsals, as we have already said a dozen times, good performances are impossible. The attempted abolition of applause and encores has been more successful than was anticipated, and eminently useful in fixing the attention of the audience, and helping them better to understand and appreciate the music. This admirable precaution should be maintained as strictly as practicable. Even at profane concerts and operas the encore system is a nuisance; how much more out of place, and, indeed, indecorous, during the performance of sacred oratorios! With regard to the hall itself, the great width of which is an advantage to musical effect that probably no other room in Europe can boast, it is doubtful whether further alterations would insure further improvement. An opinion is prevalent, however, that the organ is placed too high to be of material assistance to the chorus, and that the disposition of the orchestra itself approaches too near the perpendicular. Both questions merit consideration between this and next season.

The following is a complete and correct list of the concerts as they have taken place in the season 1850-51.—1850, 29th Nov. Messiah.* 6th Dec. do. 13th Dec. do. 23rd Dec. Elijah.* 1851, 20th Jan. do. 30th Jan. Israel in Egypt.* 12th Feb. do. 26th Feb. Saul.* 11th March, Samson.* 26th March, do. 9th April, do.* 16th April, Messiah.* 2nd May, Elijah.* 16th May, do. 23rd May, Messiah.* 30th May, do. 6th June, Elijah. 13th June, Creation.* 20th June, do. 27th June, Elijah. 4th July, do. 11th July, Creation. 18th July, Messiah. 25th July, Elijah. 1st Aug. Creation. 8th Aug. do. 15th Aug. St. Paul.* 29th Aug. Messiah. 5th Sept. Elijah. 12th Sept. Creation. 19th Sept. Messiah. 26th Sept. Elijah.

* Subscription Nights.

MUSIC AT MANCHESTER.

(From our own Correspondent.)

MR. GLOVER'S ORATORIO—Emmanuel.—We owe an apology to Mr. Glover; he sent us the usual dual admission to his Oratorio on Friday last, but from our other avocations we were not in time for the overture, and could not remain to hear the second part. It is consequently impossible to give our impressions even of a first hearing. It certainly does seem a daring attempt to write an oratorio on the very subject which the colossal Handel has rendered immortal by his Messiah. Who is there of modern times since Beethoven, except the ever to be lamented Mendelssohn, fit to approach such a subject? Yet neither Mendelssohn or Beethoven attempted it; they tried and succeeded on other sacred themes, but the Messiah was left to their great predecessor. There is but one step from the sublime to the ridiculous, and if Mr. Glover in soaring so high, has not yet reached the sublime, he has undoubtedly escaped the ridiculous. We heard nothing to laugh at; on the contrary the first part contains some well written pieces, with an original flow of melody, that betokens talent of no common order. The oratorio was well got up, and had evidently been well rehearsed. The principal solo parts were allotted to our local singers—Mrs. Wood, Mrs. Brook, Messrs. G. Cooper, Walton, Mellor, and Brook; the chorus being some of our best, the band small but select, and all went very smoothly under the baton of the composer. Had we the power of analysis of Macfarren himself we should be sorry to exercise it on the present occasion. We leave it to other hands to pick—where this was like Mendelssohn, that an imitation of Handel, &c., &c.

In writing on such a subject perhaps no composer can avoid thinking of his great predecessors—and we would rather state the impression that was made upon us generally—that, in what we heard, there was much more beauty and originality, as well as adaptation to the words than we anticipated. In particular we would mention the air "Into thy hands," (nicely sung by Mrs. Brook); the chorus of Wise men, "Where is he" &c. (which was encored); duet Mr. Wood and Mr. G. Cooper, "The day spring from on high;" tenor air "Oh, taste and see," by Mr. G. Cooper, the melody nice and flowing, and the accompaniment à la Mendelssohn. The parts we liked least were the unaccompanied quartet and the finale chorus with its fugue—and Handelian manner:—the first wanted clearness, the latter weight and grandeur.

From what we did hear we should be glad to hear the entire work on some future occasion. Mr. Glover must be pleased with its warm reception on a first hearing by a very crowded audience, and by the success of its first public performance. If we owed an apology to Mr. Glover, we are under still greater necessity to make one to Mr. H. B. Peacock, who sent us the complimentary duet to his two grand concerts this week, Sept. 30th, and Oct. 1st, at the Free Trade Hall, Madame Clara Novello, Mdle. Caroline Beer, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Delavanti being the vocalists, and the great little Savori—solo violin. We got the invitations too late for the first evening, having pre-engaged ourselves, and the second—an envious storm of rain set in—just as we should have set out, and, as usual on a sudden emergency, not a cab or a conveyance to be had. Two miles in the pouring rain was too much to encounter even to hear Madame Clara Novello—whose fine voice and charming style we so well remember some eight years ago as Mdme. Clara Novello—we were curious to hear if she had lost as little in her eight years' retirement as Sontag did in her twenty; but the fates were against us, and we must wait until we can see and hear her on the stage, as we see she is announced as prima donna for a short Italian opera season at our Theatre Royal, commencing on Saturday the 4th, with Somnambula. Mr. Sims Reeves, Sig. Stigelli, Mr. Whitworth and Miss Isaacs, are all the other names that appear at present. You will perhaps be able to give an extract or an abstract of the report on the concert this week, from the Guardian or the Examiner, both of which papers give glowing accounts, in Wednesday's number, of the first of them on Tuesday night. Madame Novello gets high praise. Hallé has announced his winter campaign of "Classical Chamber Concerts," to begin on the 23rd inst. They are to be held this season in the Town Hall, King Street.

Reviews of Music.

"STYRIENNE BRILLIANTE."—Pour le Pianoforte—Composée par FERDINAND PRÆGER. Cramer, Beale, and Co.

We have said last week, "the more Mr. Ferdinand Præger wrote the better," and now, as though in echo of our words, we have before us, an offering to Monsieur Louis Hoffermans of the Hague, a Brilliant Styrienne, in every way worthy of association with the elegant mazurka and graceful valtz, which we had the pleasure of recommending to our readers in our last. Mr. Præger has the art of flattering the amour propre of learners by giving them means of display without unduly taxing either their fingers or their brains. Ready masters with no great powers of execution should eagerly seize on the light compositions of Mr. Præger, in anticipation of being asked to play something showy by the mammas, or other protectors of their scholars. Thus by example may they teach the young idea how to shoot.

"ORIGINAL WALTZ for the Pianoforte—C. M. VON WEBER" (Posthumous work.) Ewer and Co.

As a remnant of Weber this trifle will be welcomed by every amateur and professor with uncovered key-board and outstretched fingers. It is very short—only three pages—very unaffected, and very merry for poor Weber. The first subject, in D, is bold and spirited, ardito con brio. The trio in G is simple and graceful, grazioso e legato. There is not much which can be called new in this waltz, nor much that is striking, but it is wholly without pretence, and, as a passing thought of so illustrious a thinker, put down upon paper and made immortal by the attachment of his name, to whom can it prove unwelcome? Not to us assuredly, nor, if we be not mistaken, to any who profess and feel a love for music.

"THE MOUNTAIN ECHO"—Song of the Alpine Hunter Words by FREDERICK MORTON—Music by ROBERT GUYLOTT. Webb's Music Saloon.

The style of this song is bucolic. The title-page is bucolic, being covered with a green esquise of all manner of hunt, and beasts and birds and fishes of hunt, men of hunt, and instruments of hunt, prettily devised, and cunningly spread over the face of the paper. Who sketched this tableau may be called "limner" without question. The words, by Mr. Frederick Morton, are tasteful and dainty, setting forth how the sun walked in the skies, and made the morning blush; how zephyr sighed and woke the rose, which blushed the morning into countenances; how the chamois bounded wildly; how the lark was on his wing; and how the hunter, by a blast on his horn, invited the coming of his friends, and induced the chamois and the lark to bolt. What was sport to the hunter and his friends was no joke to the chamois and the lark, who, with pierced hide, or crushed wing, would have made but sorry figures in the sunny, zephyry, and rosy landscape, described by the poet, "all nature sweetly smiling." It is an error of poets to exclude beasts and birds of hunt from the general category of nature's objects, or to mistake groans for smiles, smashed legs and severed necks and banded beaks for sleek faces, active limbs, and eager shoulders; confounding the joy of the zealous chaseman with the dole of the smitten snipe. Mr. Guylott, the musician, has set all this, or much of it, to an andantino spiritoso, in G, bucolic, as we have hinted, but distinguished for liveliness of tune and blotless candour of accompaniment. We recommend the song in particular to hunters after a jovial day's sport.

"WHEN THE SWALLOWS FLY TOWARDS HOME" (Agatha)—English version of the words by ERNEST BRUCE—FRANZ ABT. Wessel and Co.

One of the prettiest of a series of twelve German songs, selected from the album of Mademoiselle Nancy Wessel, and also a favourable specimen of a modern German sentimental ballad, at which Herr Abt is evidently apt. It is in D flat—the sentimental key par excellence, not only with Bellini, and the Italians and Donizetti, but with Balfe and the British and Wallace, who have all pight the strongest manifestations of their peculiar sentiment in this particular key. But Herr Abt's ballad has other merits besides being in the key of D flat. It is melodious, and vocal, if not strikingly original; and sweetly harmonised if not profoundly learned. In short, a better drawing-room song for ambitious young ladies, who, possessing a smattering of German are given to make display of so much as they have acquired, through the medium of voice and piano, could not easily be asked for, or, if asked for, not easily obtained, or if obtained, not easily laid aside, or if laid aside, not easily resumed; for all such ephemeral things, be they ever so much engaging, have their hour, the last second whereof having expired, it no more returns than a shotten thrushchen to its parents' house. Herr Abt, however, for such as he is, may be recommended, and his song, for such as it is, a graceful bagatelle. We give the German title for the convenience of our lady readers.—"Wenn die Schwalben herwärts zieh n."

"THE FONTENOY POLKA"—By Miss O'BRIEN. Ollivier.

This really brilliant, really sparkling, and really pleasing—for these terms are too often falsely applied—Polka (which, by the way, is a Polka, not to be said fairly of all Polkas so called) is, we understand, the composition of an amateur. It requires, nevertheless, no such plea in its behalf. Not to say that it is superlative, it is fine to recognise not merely in an amateur, but an amateureess, conjointly with a lively flow of tune, which would make Terpsichore dance in spite of herself, a skilful method of arrangement and a facility in the disposition of the accompaniment, betokening no inconsiderable musical acquirement. The title of this Polka, which we recommend heartily to our dancing friends, is derived from Spinoza Hannay's able and popular novel, Singleton Fontenoy; and if the Polka of Miss O'Brien find as many readers as the novel of Mr. Hannay, we shall have to congratulate the authoress, of which we have no doubt.

Foreign.

PARIS.—After several representations of the Prophete at the Grand Opera, Alboni reappeared as Leonore in the Favorite with the same brilliant success as before. Mdlle. Nau ha made her rentrée. The production of the Barbiere is talked of for Alboni.

BERLIN.—The operatic star at present here is Roger, the French tenor, who, to use the expressive phraseology of your not over-well informed, "Own Correspondent" at Vienna, has for the present "snuffed out" the three contending prime donne. He has been alternately playing, and with equal success, Raoul in the Huguenots, George Brown in La Dame Blanche, and Jean of Leyden in the Prophete. He has, to traduce a French expression, "held head" successively against Madame Kæster, Mdlle. Tucsek, and Mdlle. Wagner, and has borne him bravely. I am glad to say that hitherto the popular French tenor has refrained from the absurd claptrap of singing an opera at one time in French and at another time in German, for which he was so much belauded in a certain free town of Germany, not a little conceited about its musical taste and means of execution. It is one thing to hear a fine performance, and another thing to be favoured with oral persuasion that M. Roger is familiar with divers tongues; which, though to him a matter of pleasure and importance, is not of the slightest consequence to the subscriber of the opera, or the musical public in general.

By the way, as far as I can dive into the meaning of your "Own Correspondent" at Vienna, sunk as it is at the bottom of a deep well of verbiage, rather muddy than clear, he appears to me greatly misinformed on certain matters of no little interest to the operatic world. I especially allude to the announcement of Mdlle. Wagner's engagement in London, and the destination of Meyerbeer's Africain. Your "Own Correspondent" insinuates—if I rightly translate his meaning, wrapt up as it is, mummy-wise, in phrasy foldings—that Dr. Billing (whom he means, I presume, by Dr. B. six stars), had engaged Mdlle. Wagner, and secured the partitur of L'Africain for Her Majesty's Theatre. Unluckily for your "Own Correspondent's" veracity, I have reason to believe, and my information springs from a near source, that the voice of the celebrated Tedescan prima donna, and the partitur of the illustrious Tedescan composer, are destined to a direction further east; and that a certain edifice, bounded on the north by Hart Street, on the west by houses, on the south by Covent Garden market, and on the east by Bow Street, will enjoy the incalculable advantage of the voice and talent of Jenny Lind's rival, and the unheard partitur of Weber's successor. Mr. Gye—mind I state this on good grounds—Mr. Gye (not Mr. G. two stars) is here while I write, and has been seen issuing from the house of Mdlle. Wagner, heavily laden with papers—not newspapers, but evidently scritura. It is also well known that Mr. Gye took Boulogne-sur-mer on his way to Berlin, and had two lengthy conferences with the illustrious composer of the Huguenots, from whose residence he was seen to issue laden with papers—not newspapers, but evidently scritura. These after all are but data whereon to build conclusions; points from which surmise hitches up his trousers, holds his breath, and addresses him to the goal. Nevertheless, one thing is certain, that Mdlle. Wagner is engaged for London next season: and one thing is uncertain, that Meyerbeer will give his Africain in the spring either to Paris or to London. The moment I have any more definite information, you shall be put in possession of it without delay.—From our own Correspondent.

MILAN.—At the present epoch political movements, have entirely taken up the minds of the Italian people in consequence of which all the eminent theatrical artists have gone to seek attraction elsewhere, by which it may easily be understood that the theatres are very badly attended. Milan is, nevertheless, the seat of all the musical attractions in Italy, where theatrical managers go to look for artists, and where nearly all the principal operas of Rossini, Bellini and Donizetti have been for the first time presented. For the last four years, however, Milan has been nearly forgotten, no operatic representation has attracted any attention. The new managers of the theatre La Scala, have engaged the Maestra Signor Buttera to compose a new opera—Atale and Chactas—in which one of the principal attractions has proved a very beautiful solo for the flute, executed by Signor Rabboni, an executant of deserved celebrity upon Böhm's flute. This has produced an effect never before attained by any flautist at Milan, and crowded audiences have been nightly attracted to the theatre, simply to hear this solo performed by Signor Rabboni. The effect indeed has been such, that the public call the flute upon which it is played a new instrument invented by Signor Rabboni.—(From a Correspondent.)

MILAN.—L'Opinione de Turin recounts that to do honour to the presence of the Emperor of Austria, who is on a visit to his Italian dominions, the municipal authorities proposed to open the Scala for a few nights, and to engage a troupe expressly for the occasion—the same which has been recently at Bergamo, including Madame Gazzaniga. To ensure full attendance, the municipal authorities invited all the proprietors to declare if it was their intention to assist at the performances. The mute and expressive reply of the proprietors was the transmission of the keys of their boxes, which they placed at the disposal of the municipal authorities. Consequently, as the last number of La Fama informs its readers, the performances were “suspended.”

AN ANECDOTE OF JOSEPH II.

Karl Dittersdorff visited Vienna in 1789, for the purpose of making arrangements for the performance of his oratorio of Job. He wished likewise to have his symphonies on Ovid's Metamorphoses performed at the Imperial Gardens. For this it was requisite to obtain the Emperor's permission, to solicit which Dittersdorff was honoured with an interview with Joseph II. He had been informed that the Emperor was in the habit of making very minute inquiries on any subject which excited his interest; and that when, in the course of a conversation, he made those inquiries, he liked to receive a decided answer, given without timidity or hesitation; and that any expressions indicating humility or flattery were sure to displease him.

The Emperor received Dittersdorff in his private cabinet, and after a little conversation on the oratorio of Job, on which the Emperor made some observations highly complimentary to the composer, the following dialogue ensued. It is here given as related by Dittersdorff himself.

Emperor.—“Are you still employed by the government of Silesia?”

Dittersdorff.—“Yes, your Majesty.”

E.—“In what capacity?”

D.—“In the departments of finance and jurisprudence.”

E. (in an emphatic manner).—“And do you possess the requisite information on those subjects?”

D.—“As I have held my appointment for the space of thirteen years, I may fairly presume that I am deemed competent to discharge its duties.”

E.—“How have you made yourself master of so many various attainments?”

D.—“Having been born and educated in Vienna, it would have been a disgrace to me had I learned only to play the violin and to compose music.”

E.—“Have you heard Mozart?”

D.—“Three times, your Majesty.”

E.—“What do you think of his playing?”

D.—“My opinion concurs with that of all musical connoisseurs who have heard him.”

E.—“Have you heard Clementi?”

D.—“Yes, Sir.”

E.—“There are some persons who prefer Clementi to Mozart. What is your opinion on that question? Tell me frankly.”

D.—“Clementi's playing is characterised by a vast deal of skill and science. With those qualities Mozart combines the inspiration of an exquisitely fine taste and fancy.”

E.—“That is my opinion, and I am much gratified to find that it agrees with yours. What do you think of Mozart's compositions?”

D.—“They appear to me to be the creations of a bold and original genius. I know of no composer who is gifted with so rich a fund of new ideas. I should wish him to use them more sparingly. He never affords his listeners time to breathe. When the ear is disposed to dwell on a beautiful idea, another rises up and puts it to flight. Thus the mass of hearers—the unscientific (but those, after all, to whom music ought to be addressed, as well as to the more educated and learned)—are unable to catch and follow the multiplicity of beauties which Mozart so lavishly diffuses through his compositions.”

E.—“You are right. In his operas he frequently introduces such a crowd of notes in the accompaniments that the singers complain.”

D.—“That is not a fault, so long as a composer has skill to keep the orchestral parts subordinate to the vocal.”

E.—“As you have done, Dittersdorff, in your new work. By the by, what do you think of the compositions of Haydn?”

D.—“I have not heard any of his operas.”

E.—“You have lost nothing by that. But what do you think of his instrumental compositions, his canzonets, &c.?”

D.—“That they deserve the admiration they universally excite. Haydn does not enjoy an evanescent glory like those insects whose existence lasts only from morning till night. He understands the art of embellishing so exquisitely even a trivial idea, that it presents an air of novelty to the most experienced ear.”

E.—“Does he not sometimes indulge in eccentricity?”

D.—“Yes: but without overstepping the boundaries of genuine art.”

E.—“Right. I some time ago amused myself in comparing Haydn and Mozart. I should like to hear you draw a similar comparison, so that I may know how far your notions correspond.”

D.—“Your Majesty imposes upon me a very difficult task, and before I attempt to execute it, I must request permission to address a question to your Majesty.”

E.—“The permission is granted.”

D.—“What comparison would your Majesty be inclined to draw between the works of Klopstock and Gellert?”

E. (after a short pause).—“Hem! Both are great poets. One must read the writings of Klopstock several times over before we can discern all their beauties. On the contrary, the beauties of Gellert are apparent at first glance.”

D.—“Your Majesty has now answered the question which you put to me.”

E.—“Then, I presume, you would compare Mozart to Klopstock, and Haydn to Gellert?”

D.—“That, I think, would be a fair comparison.”

E.—“I cannot dispute it.”

D.—“May I request to know the similitude which your Majesty has established between the two great composers?”

E.—“You shall hear. I compare the compositions of Mozart to a gold snuff-box made in Paris, and those of Haydn to one of London make. Both are beautiful. The former excels in tasteful ornament; but the latter is distinguished for its chaste simplicity and fine polish. Thus you see our opinions very closely approximate. I am very glad to have made acquaintance with you, and am happy to find you a different man from what you have been described to me.”

D.—“How your Majesty?”

E.—“I was given to understand that you were egotistical and vain, and that you were unwilling to award praise to other composers. I rejoice at having discovered the contrary, and I shall be happy to have the pleasure of conversing with you frequently. You will always find me ready to receive you at the hour at which you were admitted to-day.”

Original Correspondence.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—Private property in literature, like private property in umbrellas, is of so exceedingly doubtful a nature that we have almost brought ourselves to consider any exclusive right in the matter as an idle chimera. But if a man were to borrow our umbrella, take out our initials from the handle, insert his own, and then flauntingly display it in a public thoroughfare, we should feel much inclined to seize him by the collar and accuse him before the bystanders of the theft.

In a series of articles written by me, some time ago, for your Journal, which were afterwards re-published in a volume, under the title of “Musings of a Musician,” one appeared called “A Plea for Operatic Basses.” This paper was inserted entire and word for word, in the last number of the Musical World, as an original communication to the editor, and signed "Saroni." Who "Saroni" may be I know not, but I shall feel much obliged if you will, in your next number, publish this letter, and call upon your anonymous correspondent to explain himself, not only for my satisfaction, but for the maintenance of the well known respectability of the journal which he has attempted to deceive.

I am, Sir,

Yours very truly,

HENRY C. LUNN.

32, Bloomsbury Square, 29th Sep., 1851.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

Atherstone, Oct. 1, 1851.

DEAR SIR,—I feel reluctant to trespass upon your time and space, but I also feel it to be my bounden duty to express my warmest thanks for, and unbounded admiration of Mr. G. A. Macfarren's magnificently written critique on Fidelio. These papers are intensely interesting, not only to the musician, but to the general reader, they are a truly intellectual feast. Mr. Macfarren deals with his subject, not only as a profound musician but as one who has a thorough knowledge of the profoundest depths of the human heart; indeed it is sometimes doubtful which to admire most, the master-mind of Beethoven, or that of the writer of so able an exposition of the great composer's intentions.

Young composers, of great works especially, may congratulate themselves on having a critic to refer to, so able and willing to do full and impartial justice to their labours. (Horsley's "David," to wit.)

I quite concur with your correspondent, Mr. Baker, that the thanks of all who feel interested in musical matters are due to Mr. G. A. Macfarren.

I am, dear Sir,

Yours very faithfully,

A SUBSCRIBER.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

MADAME EVELINA GARCIA DE TORRES.

SIR,—In the last number of the Musical World your reporter in giving an account of the concert which took place at Greenwich, on the 25th of September last, after stating that Rode's air and variations were "attempted" by me, asks, "Who is Madame Garcia?" To this question I beg to give the following reply: I am the daughter of Mdme. Loreto Garcia, who sung during 12 years at the Theatre Royal, Madrid, from which she has a life-pension. She was also prima donna for 4 years at La Scala, at Milan, and occupied the same position at the Theatre Royal des Italiens, at Paris, in 1828 and '29, at the same time as Madame Sontag. With regard to myself, I am the daughter of Don José de Torrès, Marquis de Villamejor, Visconte d'Iruestès, &c., Colonel of the Royal Regiment of Cavalry; but I have always sung under my mother's maiden name, as she did herself. My musical studies were made at the Conservatoire Royal de Musique in Paris, first under Garande, and afterwards under Borlogni. I have sung at concerts in most of the towns of Germany, in Belgium, Italy, Hungary, &c., and lastly, about a month ago, at Manchester, at the concert of the Philharmonic Society of that town, where, I will say, en passant, that the "variations," ("attempted," at Greenwich), were rapturously encored. A reference to the 29th number (vol. 24) of your journal will show that the Madame Garcia so unknown in 1851 to The Musical World, (or rather to its Greenwich reporter), was not by any means so in 1849, for on the 21st of July of that year, in the notice of my Matinée Musicale of the 9th, it is stated that "Signora Garcia de Torres, has a rich soprano voice, and vocalizes with considerable fluency. She sang Donizetti's aria 'Nel Sasso,' and Rode's air with variations, the latter with great brilliancy, and produced a corresponding effect." With what effect I sang these same variations on the 25th of last month, I desire no more flattering testimony than that of any one of those present among the audience. I have since been informed that Rode's variations were intended to have been sung (I will not say "attempted") by another. Can it be to this fortuitous circumstance that I owe the more than singular notice of your reporter? Let me add that he is also strangely "abroad" in his general account of the concert, so much so, as to lead one to believe that he was not present. I should make this letter too long were I to point out in detail the blunders he commits, but I will cite one or two in order to prove my assertion. Miss Binckes did not sing the air from the Sonnambula, "Ah non giunge," but "Una voce" from the Barbiere, nor did Mr. Whitworth sing any aria of Vogel's, and "The eternal Prayer from the Mosé in Egitto," was, this time, only "eternal" for your reporter, as it was not given at all. As for Mr. Frank Mori, seeing that he has been for the last three weeks at Brussels with his family, I do not see how it was possible for him to "officiate as conductor"—even with the aid of the electric telegraph. In conclusion, I must call upon you, sir, as an act of justice, to insert the present reclamation in your next No., as the manner in which your reporter has thought proper to notice me in your esteemed and widely circulated journal is calculated to do me injury.

I am, Sir, with the highest consideration,

Yours, most obediently,

EVELINA GARCIA (DE TORRES).

28, Davies Street, Berkeley Square, Oct. 2nd, 1851.

[The notice of the Greenwich affair came from an occasional contributor who will doubtless, like ourselves, feel obliged for the information supplied so politely by Mad. Garcia.—ED. M. W.]

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

Another four performances—how often have we repeated the same words?—and then in reality the opera season, the extra season, will be brought to a close—how many times have we repeated the same words? Now, however, we can assure our readers that the grand theatre will on Saturday next, close its portals until the ensuing spring, and lock up its echoes with the frosty months—the grand national concerts being dead beyond all hope of resuscitation.

The performances of the week, commencing on Wednesday, have been Lucrezia Borgia (Wednesday); Norma (Thursday); Barbiere (Friday); and to-night will be given Fidelio. To the three first were added selections from Der Freischütz, and Gustave for Madame Fiorentini, and the Pas de Poignards from Il Prodigio and the Bal Masqué from Gustave for the ballets.

Madame Barbiere Nini took her leave on Wednesday. The house was very full, and the audience applauded loudly the celebrated cantatrice, who sang and acted with all her usual force and emphasis, creating the customary furor in "M'odi, m'odi," and obtaining the old recall and honours.

Mdlle. Maria Cruvelli, sister of the gifted Sophie, who has been much too rarely at Her Majesty's Theatre, appeared as Maffeo Orsini, for the first time, and made an extremely favourable impression. The charming contralto voice of this young singer was exhibited to great advantage in the opening romance, "Nella fatal, &c.," which was deservedly applauded. To sing the "Brindisi" after Alboni was no light matter, and Mdlle. Marie Cruvelli wisely avoided comparisons by imitating the great Marietta in none of her "points," giving a version entirely her own, remarkable alike for taste, spirit, and musical feeling. She was unanimously encored, and well merited the compliment.

The Norma of Cruvelli on Thursday night deserves a special word. Having had four clear days' rest, Mrs. Lamley's prima donna came out with additional power of voice, and with more fire and energy than we have yet seen her exhibit in the acting. In short, Cruvelli's Norma, on Thursday night, was emphatically her best performance of that part; and this only proves what we have so often advanced, that even a voice as powerful as Cruvelli's must have cessation from labour, or its beauty and force cannot always be depended on. Mr. Lumley should take a hint from Cruvelli's magnificent singing on Thursday night, after four days repose. She was recalled after the "Casta Diva," again at the end of the first act, and twice at the conclusion of the opera. Mdlle. Feller, by the way, deserves a word of strong praise for the manner in which she sang the difficult music of Adalgisa. We always admired Mdlle. Feller's charming voice, but were not quite prepared for the vocal capabilities made manifest on Thursday night. Mdlle. Feller must be no less lauded for the zeal and exertion she displayed in attempting the music of Marcellina in Fidelio, in which character she makes her first appearance to-night.

Next week four more performances will be given, and Her Majesty's Theatre will positively close with the closing of the Grand Exhibition.

It may be here the place to state that the notice of the rumour of Balfe's retirement from the conductorship of Her Majesty's Theatre, which appeared last week in our miscellaneous columns, was taken from the Athenæum. We have reason to believe, as we hope, that there is no truth whatever in the report. The authority was inadvertently unacknowledged.

Dramatic Intelligence.

DRURY LANE.—The announcements of the American and French troupe at this theatre, remind us rather of that serpent kind of animal, the Hydra of ancient times, of whom our friend Ovid tells us:

Vulnibus fecunda suis erat illa; nec ullum
De centum numero caput est impune recisum
Quin gemine cervix hæcède valentior esset.

for old Father Time no sooner cuts off with his pitiless scythe their "last week," than two or three more instantly spring up to supply its place. The management are evidently of opinion that the precept, "Ne sutor ultra crepidam" does not apply to them, for if they had stuck to their "last" (week, tous ensemble) they would not have been performing now. We are not, however, going to quarrel with them about this, on the contrary, we are glad to see that they have enjoyed so large a degree of public patronage as to enable them to remain with us so long, as the entertainments they have provided have really been excellent. In a former article—which must remain an indefinite one, for we cannot say in what number of the Musical World it appeared—we asserted what we now repeat, that Equestrian Exercises can naturally only consist of a repetition of pretty much the same feats of skill and dexterity, and therefore easily become monotonous. On the other hand, however, it is equally true that these elementary feats may be twisted and twirled about, like the bits of glass in a kaleidoscope, so as still to attract by the novelty of their combinations, when they have long ceased to do so by their own originality. This truth is one which has been duly felt by the management of the American and French troupe, and the consequence is, that like Monsieur Robin, who showers forth myriads of bouquets from some old hat or other, which was previously innocent of the smallest rose leaf, they contrive to discharge, every evening, at about eleven o'clock, crowded audiences from the doors of a theatre, in which some little time ago, no one would any more have thought of looking for an audience than he would have expected to find a mob in Exeter Change.

But at present, now that reform has been introduced into the Court of Chancery, whose suits, unlike those of our tailor, were formerly warranted never to wear out, we feel justified in affirming that everything, even the performances of the American and French troupe must have an end, as surely as they also possessed an object, namely, that of making as much money as possible, and we therefore advise all such as have not yet witnessed them, to do so without delay, or they may otherwise lose the opportunity, for, in consequence of the theatre being let for other purposes, we believe that at the expiration of the period at present announced for the departure of the troupe from London, we shall, after having so often noticed the great finish of their feats, at last have to chronicle their conclusion as well.

LYCEUM.—Mercadet, a posthumous comedy by the late M. de Balzac, was produced last August at the Gymnase, and attracted an audience worthy of its author's celebrity. So great was the success obtained by the intrinsic merit of the piece, and by the admirable acting of M. Geoffrey in the principal character, that it still remains in the Parisian playbill as one of the most attractive pieces of the day. The previous dramatic labours of M. de Balzac did not earn for him a fame by any means commensurate with his reputation as a novelist. Indeed, for that talent in minute description, which is so fully displayed in his narrative works, and which is one of his chief characteristics, the stage offers no opportunity whatever. From these premises it might have been inferred that the drama was not his proper vocation, but this conclusion is prevented by his posthumous play, which shows that he had qualifications for a comedy writer of the highest order.

Mercadet, as the hero of the piece so called, represents a character especially belonging to the present day. He is a millionnaire, with the highest reputation on the Bourse, who has been ruined by the flight of a dishonest partner. To keep up his credit in spite of his loss, he has resource to all sorts of projects, and endeavours to form all sorts of companies. His desperate speculations, though sometimes prosperous, have ultimately raised an army of greedy creditors, and it is when he has lost everything and is hated by these persecutors that the play begins. He is shown working on the temperament of each individual creditor—coaxing one, bullying another, till he succeeds, not only in softening them, but in making them lend him more money. This is required to make the preparations for his daughter's marriage with the wealthy Count de la Brive, on whom all his hopes of restoring his credit depend. Everything seems straight, when suddenly he is astounded by the discovery that the Count is himself a ruined man, who hopes to retrieve his fortunes by marrying the daughter of the rich Mercadet. In fact, Mercadet and the Count have been trying to practise on each other like the Copper Captain and Estifania. The speculator is still undaunted, and as a last resource requests the Count, whom he has in his power, as a holder of acceptances, to personate the runaway partner, now returned with a large fortune. During the temporary restoration of credit which this fraud will occasion he hopes to effect advantageous operations in the share market. His wife, who is less unscrupulous than himself, dissuades the Count from joining her husband in so dishonourable a scheme, and in the meanwhile the real runaway partner really returns. The creditors whom Mercadet has called to his house are all delighted, their debts are all paid, and the only puzzled person is Mercadet himself, who knows last of all that the partner is no impostor, but a wealthy penitent who has brought him an immense fortune from India.

The character of Mercadet is admirably drawn. His indomitable courage and tact in facing the most formidable difficulties create a sympathy which he does not earn by any one moral virtue. He is a scamp at heart, but on such a grand scale that everybody rejoices to see him cleared from his embarrassments at last. The creditors likewise are delineated with an artistic hand. There is the brutal creditor—and the creditor who is an intimate private friend—and the creditor who assumes an appearance almost of mendicancy to extort his interest by charitable instalments; not one of them is a repetition of the other, though all are selfish and rapacious speculators. The situations of the piece are strongly marked, and the dialogue is natural and sharply to the point. Mercadet and his creditors have too serious a purpose to stand still for the sake of fine talking, though many a smart saying, and many a shrewd maxim falls from their lips. The only objection to which the play is open is the want of variety for the characters of the mother and daughter, and the honourable love of the latter, are too slight to interrupt the general tone of cupidity and selfishness. This is an objection that will be made more by those who take their standard from English comedy, than by the French, who are satisfied to see an idea well worked out.

At Mr. Charles Mathews' benefit, which took place last night, a version of Mercadet was brought out under the title of A Game of Speculation. The scene is laid in London, but in other respects the original is closely followed, though an attempt is made here and there to elevate the moral character of Mercadet. The execution of the piece is excellent. Mr. C. Mathews plays Mr. Affable Hawk (the English Mercadet) with infinite blandness and subtlety, and each of his victories raised the sympathetic laughter of the audience, many of whom had probably never seen the art of talking over so fully developed. Mr. Roxby was Sir Harry Lester (the Count), the easy impudent adventurer, and the peculiarities of the several creditors were well shadowed out by Messrs. F. Matthews, B. Baker, Suter, and Horncastle. The piece was completely successful, and a general demand was made for the author, when Mr. Roxby came forward and stated that his name was Lawrance.

ADELPHI.—A pièce de circonstance, entitled Bloomerism; or, the Follies of the Day, was produced at this favourite theatre on Thursday evening with the greatest success. The plot, which is far better than that of the ordinary run of pieces of this description, is pretty much as follows:—A number of gentlemen, Mr. Green, Mr. Bounce, Mr. Weakly, and others have all some croquet, in the shape either of Vegetarianism, or Universal Peace, or Hydropathy, or something else, by which, like many other clever men, they make very great fools of themselves. To cure them of their absurdities their respective wives are induced to imitate the example of a strong minded woman, Mrs. Green (Miss Woolgar), who has already gone the whole hog and mounted the platform in defence of Mrs. Bloomer. As a natural consequence of this, the absurdities of the ladies open the eyes of the husbands to their own and if they do not know the old motto they at any rate determine to act according to its spirit, and behave like sensible men in future.

"In medio tutissimus ibis."

This piece is remarkable for the wit and broad humour of the dialogue, as well as the great breadth and freedom with which the different characters—all real characters—are sketched in. The acting was excellent. That of the Misses Woolgar and Chaplin preeminently so, while the singing of Miss Fitzwilliam in one little parody was excessively charming. The audience were in a roar of laughter, from the beginning to the end of the piece; and at the fall of the curtain, after the whole company had ~~once more~~ appeared to bow their thanks to the audience, Mr. J. Nightingale appeared alone in obedience to a unanimous and most hearty "call" for the authors, his collaborateur, Mr. C. Millward, being at present in Liverpool. We may, by the way, mention that Mr. Nightingale is our own "Liverpool Correspondent," and Mr. Millward that of the "Era." We fancy that the farce of Bloomerism will remain on the Adelphi stage long after it has ceased to be enacted in real life.

SADLER'S WELLS.—The revival of Timon of Athens by Mr. Phelps is one of the most remarkable that have taken place during his management. It was just the play for a manager who shines in the exhibition of dramatic curiosities to take in hand. Although modern investigation has led to a belief that Shakespeare, whose name it bears, had but a small share in it, it has long enough held an unquestioned position in his works to be as inseparably connected with his name as the Latin tragedies of Seneca, whoever wrote them, are with that of the stoic moralist, and few plays are more familiar in the closet than the one which records the fortunes of the Athenian misanthrope. Nevertheless, it has not been seen on the stage since 1816, when the elder Kean played the principal character seven times—a date beyond the limit of an ordinary play-going life. Hence it had the two qualifications of an established reputation and of estrangement from the stage, and these combined are important elements in awakening curiosity. Nor were the difficulties which presented themselves in the way of production among the minor stimulants in awakening curiosity. It was well known that Timon of Athens contained some of the most forcible speeches ever written; but it was also known that it was wanting in variety of incident, that several successive scenes, though the different nuances of character are finely executed by the poet, were in point of action almost repetitions of each other, that the catastrophe was flat, and that it was utterly without female interest. In the Elizabethan days, when women were played by boys, this last defect was not very important; but since the introduction of actresses it has generally been regarded as a fatal objection to a dramatic work. Shadwell, who considered that he altered Timon into a play, and whose version, often since repeated, was first produced at Dorset Gardens in 1678, attempted to supply the gap by giving Timon two mistresses—one faithful, the other faithless, and allowing the former the privilege of strengthening the catastrophe by killing herself when her beloved was no more. Cumberland, whose version made its appearance at Drury-lane in 1771, adopted another method to remove the same fault. He gave Timon, not a mistress, but a daughter, and married her to Alcibiades. This sort of version was of course not to be taken by such an adherent to text as Mr. Phelps, who would shrink with horror from the notion of presenting Shakespeare, or even a pseudo-Shakespeare, in a Shadwell or Cumberland costume.

How, then, was the manager to proceed? The poet had, indeed, given him the forcible speeches of Timon, the cutting lines of Apemantus, and the small but interesting character of Flavius, but beyond these he had everything to do for himself. He solves the difficulty by carrying out to a great extent Mr. Macready's principle of appealing to the prevailing taste for decorative magnificence, when the effect of mere poetry and fable would be, at least, doubtful. The Greek symposia which occur in the piece are put on the stage with every detail of antique splendour. Timon's cave, with the surrounding landscape, is as wild and forbidding as the latter temperament of Timon himself; the less important scenes take place before interiors and exteriors, carefully painted after our knowledge of Athenian life. To heighten the catastrophe the march of Alcibiades is represented by a moving panorama, ending with a moonlit view of Timon's tomb on the sea-shore. This panorama, which is a sort of isolated character, is naturally exposed to the animadversions of those who regard with jealousy all extra-importance given to dramatic accessories, and who censured the employment of a similar expedient when Mr. Macready revived Henry V. at Covent Garden. The practical question, however, suggests itself—why, in an age when decorative beauty is remarkably attainable, and when its power of attraction is beyond a doubt, should a manager deny himself this chance of success? The scenery at Sadler's Wells does not stop the ears of him who wishes to listen to a text, very slightly altered, while he who loves show better than poetry likewise has a source of gratification. Timon, as a mere unadorned play, was evidently non-attractive, or we should not find it so frequently altered by different hands, or so seldom acted by Mr. Edmund Kean. Granted that additional means of attraction were requisite somewhere, it is surely more legitimate to strengthen the accessories than to alter the structure, just as it is more legitimate to shine in a drawing-room by means of a fine coat than by means of false colours. There is no doubt that without the accessories Timon of Athens would be heavy work, and if those who would shear them off were compelled to sit it out, we should probably be reminded of the artist of the brazen bull, who was made to perish in the instrument of torture he had himself invented.

The acting of the play harmonizes with the pictorial view which Mr. Phelps, who plays the misanthrope, has taken of it. Not only are the indignant speeches spoken with great force, but every endeavour is made to render the character a figure in the general picture. Timon the prodigal comes out boldly at the Symposium; Timon the man-hater, crouching on his spade, is a figure that might stand in a Poussin landscape. Apemantus not only well suits the bluff rugged manner of Mr. G. Bennet, but he is well placed in every scene in which he appears. The dress of Alcibiades (Mr. Marston) makes him much more historical than as delineated by the poet, who has strangely departed from the Alcibiades of antiquity. The quiet pathos of Flavius, the one good man amid a host of villany, is inobtrusively and judiciously rendered by Mr. Graham. Altogether the way in which Timon is presented to the public reflects great credit on every party concerned in it.

MARYLEBONE.—We have carefully reminded our readers, from time to time, of a truth respecting ourselves, of which they probably needed no enlightenment, and that is, that the Musical World is always in the right. Since this theatre opened for the enactment of English Operas, we have been urging the necessity of certain reforms in the performances, without which, it seemed pretty clear to us, that the theatre neither could nor ought to succeed. Accordingly the management, profiting doubtless by our hebdomadal and prophetic wisdom, announced on Monday Auber's charming Opera, Fra Diavolo, with a new company, and an enlargement and improvement of the orchestra and chorus. But great as has been the beneficial effect of these changes, we doubt whether they are yet such as fully to meet the demands of public taste. The gentlemen were most successful. Mr. Frazer (of Drury Lane, as the bills announce) was the Fra Diavolo, and Mr. Lawler, of the Sacred Harmonic Society, the Giacomo. Of Miss Condell, we regret that we cannot as yet speak in the terms of commendation that we could wish to do. Her voice has considerable power, but it is hard and not sufficiently under her control. Her passage singing is inaccurate and her intonation far from perfect. However, if she would confine herself to singing less elaborate music, she would doubtless be an acquisition to the theatre, for her appearance is prepossessing, and she is a pleasing and graceful actress. The theatre was well filled.

BRITISH SCHOOL, PENTONVILLE.—A selection of music was given here on Monday evening, the performers being Miss Messent, Miss Lizzy Stuart and the Misses Cole, Messrs. H. Dubourg, C. Cotton, G. Tedder, Herr Jonghman, with Mr. W. Thirlwell (on the violin). Although the attendance was thin, the concert went off with considerable spirit, and there were several encores. Miss Messent was called on for a repetition of Mr. Baker's Ballad, "I've a heart to exchange," and also in a Scotch Melody which, by the way, she sang with great vivacity. Miss Lizzy Stuart obtained an encore in Linley's Ballad, "Constance," Herr Jonghman in an aria buffa, and Mr. W. Thirlwall, a juvenile and promising violinist, in a solo. The rest of the performers acquitted themselves creditably.

Provincial.

LIVERPOOL.—(From a Correspondent.)—The seventh Philharmonic Society's concert of the season took place on Tuesday evening, Sept. 30th, and was attended by a select, though crowded audience. The performance was unusually good, and the orchestra, conducted by Mr. Herrman, played Romberg's symphony, in E flat, the overture of Les Abencerages, by Cherubini, and the march from Athalie by Mendelssohn, with remarkable care and spirit. Miss Louisa Pyne—who we understand was suffering from the effects of cold, and we venture to guess also from the fatigue very prevalent amongst singers of her proficiency towards the end of a London season—nevertheless sang, in her best manner, a ballad by Schira, the duet in the Pre aux clerics scene from the Huguenots, with Herr Formes, which was immensely applauded. Rode's air with variations was rapturously encored, and the very beautiful song, "So mild, so good," from Fridolin, by Frank Mori, originally composed for her, rendered in a most charming manner, which, notwithstanding the lateness of the hour, produced a marked sensation, eliciting very generally the desire that the Directors would shortly follow in the track so spiritedly marked out for them by the managers of the Worcester Festival, and give us in an entire state the whole cantata of Fridolin, already so successful in London and Worcester.

Herr Formes sang the Drinking song from Der Freischutz, the duet with Miss Louisa Pyne from the Huguenots, and the scena with chorus from Jessonda most admirably. Indeed we have seldom heard the talented basso profundo in better voice, nor sing with more gusto.

Mr. Chisholm played a fantasia by J. Berr, on the bassoon, and the chorus sang a madrigal by Marenzio, the market chorus from Massaniello, another madrigal by Morales, under the direction of Mr. Ludlow, in a way that might have set no bad example to the choristers of the metropolis.

Miscellaneous.

CATHERINE HAYES IN AMERICA.—The arrival of Catherine Hayes took place on Sunday, early in the morning. The Pacific arrived in the Bay on Saturday evening, but had to battle out the storm, as no pilot would answer letter, gun, or signal. There was a heavy fog during Sunday morning and the Pacific arrived at her dock almost before it was known in the city that she was approaching. Still there was a large crowd of the expectant public, and when Miss Hayes came to the gangway, she was received with enthusiastic cheers, and departed for the Astor House amid "three times three for Catherine Hayes." The passage out was rough and tempestuous; but one fine day, afforded Catherine Hayes an opportunity to give a concert for the benefit of the crew. This concert, in which Herr Mengis, Mr. Augustus Braham, and Mr. Lavenu assisted, realized a handsome sum, but before it was over the wild waves lifted their crested heads, and the storm recommenced. However, all things went well. The American Musical Fund Society had arranged to give the fair stranger a "Serenade of Welcome," on the night of her arrival, supposing the arrival would take place on Saturday, and a great many of the members went to the Astor House on Sunday night. Catherine Hayes, however, had the good taste to request a postponement of the intended honour until the following night. The directors and members of the Fund, concurring with Miss Hayes, the "welcome" was postponed, but the rumour had attracted hundreds in front of the Astor House, who were much dissatisfied.

On Monday evening before 9 o'clock the crowd began to assemble. Hundreds of inquiries were made at the hotel as to "which was her window," "where would she appear," &c., &c. It was originally the intention of the Musical Fund to give the serenade inside the Astor House, within the spacious quadrangle, and this report literally crammed every hall and lobby of the vast hotel; every kind of excuse was offered to gain admission, and had the Astor a thousand rooms, on that night there were more than double the number of claimants; but the "pressure from without" demanded a change of plan, for by 11 o'clock several thousand people surrounded the hotel, and clamorously demanded Catherine Hayes and the music. Yielding to public opinion, the members of the Musical Fund, preceded by a body of firemen, clad in uniform and bearing lighted torches, sallied from the hotel and formed in front of the window of Miss Catherine Hayes. They immediately opened the serenade with the national airs of America, during which, mingled with loud applause, continued cries were heard for Catherine Hayes, and when in obedience to the call she appeared at the windows accompanied by Mr. Wardwell, and backed by her accompanying artists, the shout of recognition was like a burst of thunder. The lady bowed her acknowledgments again and again, and at length retired amidst tumultuous applause. As soon as the shouts had died away the band played a pot pourri upon well known opera airs, many of which had been often sung by Catherine Hayes. The band of wind instruments was numerous and efficient. The people applauded heartily. The concluding piece, was an arrangement by Mr. G. Loder, of several Irish airs, among which the "Minstrel Boy," "Cruiskeen Lawn," "Garry Owen," and others. In the finale the three principal themes were brought together with admirable effect. This stirred up the enthusiasm of the crowd, and the cries for Catherine Hayes were too vehement to be resisted. A demonstration even more enthusiastic than that which greeted her first appearance welcomed her now, and the clapping of hands and the shouting of voices lasted long after the fair vocalist and the lights had departed from the chamber, and hundreds lingered round the house until the small hours of the morning had commenced. We never saw a more genuine "demonstration," and we are sure Miss Catherine Hayes will acknowledge, that if her old friends soothed her parting by demonstrations of affection and esteem, her new friends have given her such a welcome that will not cause her to regret parting from them. Catherine Hayes gives her first concert at Tripler Hall, on Tuesday evening next, Sept. 23rd.—Abridged from Saroni's Musical Times, Sept. 20th.

ON POETICAL AND MUSICAL EAR.—Some years ago a controversy was carried on in a periodical publication upon this question: "Whether there was a necessity of a musical ear for an orator?" Both parties were obstinate in their respective opinions. Let us examine them. Those that hold a musical ear to be necessary for an orator, support their opinion in this manner:—Every voice has its proper key, from which though the speaker may wander for sake of expression, yet it must return to it again. The different modulations of the voice must be either a little above, or a little below the key, in which it should always close. Any thing out of the key of the voice offends as much in speaking as in singing. Music besides tune, having rhythms, so also is there a measure in oratory, which we cannot falsify without offending the ear. As there are rests in music, so are there pauses in speaking. From all these considerations it is evident that a good ear is equally necessary for an orator and for a musician. To this the other party replies:—As all persons speak, but have not all a musical ear, it is evident that if the latter were necessary for the well doing of the former, those who have no ear would speak in a manner peculiar and disagreeable. If the assertor says that it is not in common speaking, but in oratory that a musical ear is requisite, the other answers:—That as oratory is but the perfection of speaking, there is nothing in oratory that has not its foundation in common speech.

ON THE STATE OF MUSIC FROM THE DEDICATION TO THE DESTRUCTION OF THE TEMPLE AT JERUSALEM.—After the dedication of the Temple a century elapsed without anything remarkable being mentioned concerning the music of the Hebrews, except the passage already named when Elisha calls for a minstrel previous to his prophesying. In the year 896 B.C., the singers are mentioned in 2nd Chronicles, 8th chap. 14th verse, to have contributed greatly towards obtaining a singular advantage in favour of Jehoshaphat, over the Amorites, and Moabites; and the Hebrews frequently attributed their success in battle to the animation given the troops by the trumpets, and it was the custom to place the musicians in the front of the armies of Israel. The ancient Gallic, German, and British Druids, who were not only priests, but musicians, used also to animate their countrymen to the fight. The Babylonish captivity swept away all traces of music for a time, but that the art did not perish is obvious from this passage, "The singers, the children of Asaph, a hundred and twenty-eight," but that it languished very much is to be learned from the beautiful commencement of the 137th Psalm, "By the waters of Babylon we sat down and wept," nevertheless music was not discontinued in the Temple, but the pomps and ceremonies of the law were established by Ezra, and we learn from Josephus that the use of sacred music was continued up to the destruction of the Temple.—From T. H. Tomlinson's Lectures on Ancient Music.

SINGING.—The mechanical part of singing, even the most perfect, is an indispensable part of the merit of a good singer; but this is not all. The most successful delivery of the voice, the best regulated respiration, the purest execution of the ornaments, and, what is very rare, the most perfect intonation, are the means by which a great singer expresses the sentiments which animate him; but they are nothing more than means; and he who should persuade himself that the whole art of a singer is comprised in them, might sometimes give his audience a degree of tranquil pleasure, but would never cause them to experience vivid emotion. The great singer is one who identifies himself with the personage whom he represents, with the situation in which he is placed, and the feelings which agitate him; who abandons himself to the inspiration of the moment, as the composer would do in writing the music which he performs; and who neglects nothing which may contribute to the effect, not of an isolated piece, but of the whole character. The union of these qualities constitutes what is called expression. Without expression, there never was a great singer, however perfect the mechanical part of his singing might be; and expression, when it is real, and not merely laboured acting, has often obtained pardon for an incorrect performance.

THE FIDDLE BOW.—The antiquity of the use of the bow in the violin has been the subject of many conjectural disputes. Some have fixed the era of its being known in England about the beginning of the fourteenth century. None have gone farther back; but it is evident, from a monkish device, in the cathedral of St. Augustine, in Bristol, that the bow was known much earlier here. This cathedral was founded in 1148, and on the ornaments of one of the Gothic pillars, in the same style on those throughout the whole building, is the following device, not tamely represented—a shepherd sleeps, the ram playing on the violin with a remarkable long bow, and the wolf eating the sheep. There is a tradition that the use of the bow in the violin was introduced into England by the attendants of the Pope's nuncios, when they came here to receive Peter-pence, it being customary for foreigners to take many musicians in their trains.

MUSIC IN WALES.—A magnificent Eisteddfod is to be held at Denbigh in the autumn of 1852. Prince Albert and the Princess of Wales have been invited to attend.

LEOPOLD DE MEYER left London a few days since for Paris, where he intends to pass the winter.

FORMES, the German basso, started on Wednesday for St. Petersburg.

MARIO AND GRISI are more than half way by this time on their route to St. Petersburg.

MADAME BARBIERI NINI has left for Paris. It is expected she will open the campaign there in Lucrezia Borgia, on the 14th.

MR. LUMLEY.—The celebrated impresario of Her Majesty's Theatre and the Theatre Italien, has gone to Paris for a few days.

FENNIMORE COOPER, the celebrated American novelist, died at his residence, Cooper's Town, in the middle of last month, at the age of 62.

THE LATE MUSICAL FESTIVAL AT WORCESTER.—A meeting of the stewards and committee took place on Monday last, the Lord Bishop of the diocese (president of the festival) in the chair. The statement of accounts submitted by the hon. secretary, the Rev. R. Sarjeant, gave the greatest satisfaction to every person present. The pecuniary result of the festival exceeds expectation, considering the adverse circumstances of the year; the call upon the subscribers to the guarantee fund amounts to no more than 6s. 3d. in the pound. The total receipts for the charity now reach 1,008l.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL OF BRADFORD.—The town of Bradford, Yorkshire, was the scene of great festivity on Monday last, consequent on the laying of the foundation stone of a New Music Hall, which ceremony was performed by the Right Hon. the Earl of Zetland, the grand master of the craft, attended by the brethren of the Provincial Grand Lodge of West Yorkshire, and most of the district lodges. The day was observed as a general holiday, and was observed with great rejoicing. The building, which is to be named St. George's Hall, will, when finished, bear comparison with the best structures of the sort in the kingdom.

JULIUS JANIN'S Letters on the Great Exhibition, reprinted in a neat volume at Paris as well as at London, have procured him the honour of a very complimentary autograph letter from Prince Albert.

EDOUARD WOLF.—This celebrated pianist and composer for the piano, at present in Paris, where he holds an eminent rank among resident musicians, will pass next season in London, when he will doubtless figure as one of the most brilliant etoiles.

THAT clever actress, Mrs. Sterling, is no longer a member of the Olympic Theatre; she has been engaged by Mr. Webster for the Haymarket. We sincerely congratulate Mr. Webster on his acquisition.

ROBERT B. BROUGH, Esq., the well-known dramatic author, has been married to Miss B. Romer.

GOOD TUNES.—It is, I think, by singing, as it by preaching; a fine judge of composition will admire a sermon which yet makes no manner of impression upon the public mind, and therefore cannot be a good one. That is the best sermon which is best adapted to produce the best effects; and the same may be said of a tune. If it correspond with the feelings of a pious heart and aid him in realizing the sentiments, it will quickly be learnt, and sung with avidity. Where this effect is not produced, were I a composer, I would throw aside my performance and try again.

THE RANGE OF THE HUMAN VOICE.—There are about nine tones, but 17,592,186,044,415 different sounds; thus, 14 direct muscles, alone or together, produce 14,383: 30 direct muscles, do, 173,741,823, and all in co-operation produce the number we have named; and these independently of different degrees of intensity.

SUMMER "WARBLERS," AND THEIR RIVALRY.—It is perhaps, not so well known as it ought to be, though I have already hinted at it, that the nightingale, when in confinement, is a most cruelly jealous bird—jealous not only of his master or mistress noticing any other bird than himself—but jealous of his own tribe. His motto is—Aus Caesar, aut nullus. He will admit no rival near the throne. Hence, to keep two of these birds in one room would be ridiculous. The same extraordinary failing prevails in most of our "warblers." If outdone in song they frequently fall "dead" from off their perches. Some of these rival musicians, be it known, do not weigh a quarter of an ounce! When, therefore, it is considered desirable to keep several nightingales, let each occupy a separate apartment. By this precaution, not any one of the birds will be put down or silenced, and each will sing without having his temper ruffled.

THE OPERA AT CUBA.—I was told that, owing to the prevalence of fasting during Lent, I should not see the opera, but this happily proved untrue. It seems that Lent does generally bring with it a cessation from these sort of amusements, but the manager having got Meyerbeer's Huguenots rehearsed and ready, thought it an excellent time to show conjointly his love of music, religion, and full houses, and accordingly applied to the Captain-General or Governor, who is the great potentate of the island, and much more absolute in his authority than even Queen Isabella, to grant him the licence requisite for its performance. This gentleman's jurisdiction embraces every person, from the police-force to the opera corps. In opera affairs he is really of the greatest service to the public. If, for instance, a sullen basso, a captious tenor, or a spoilt prima donna, gets up an indisposition, a sore throat, &c., at five minutes' notice, to suit some particular whim, or under the influence of the same feelings sings out of tune, though he or she be backed by the certificates of all the Brodies or Lococks of Cuba, nothing can prevent this prompt benefactor from arresting the offender, and signing an order for a week's meditation in jail. However, though he be the ruling man in the place, he is by no means the ruling power, as report will have it that he is quite subject to his wife, who is a very serious woman, and a close observer of the most minute requirements of her creed. As a matter of course she sets her face against the opera, and, of course, so did her lord. "But suppose," urged the persevering manager, "that we call it El triumpho del fe" (the triumph of faith)! "Ah! that's a good idea," said the lady; ditto said her husband. This idea seemed to have a happy combination of amusement and religion. "But," urged the lady, "the leading singer has to sing Morta al Papa (death to the Pope); that will never do!" "But we can alter that," said the manager, and he shall sing Via al Papa" (long live the Pope)! This alteration made no matter, it did not interfere with the score, and the opera, with numerous excisions, was duly performed, to the intense delight of both audience and manager. People went to see it last Sunday after they had spent the morning at mass, the afternoon at a bull fight, and when they were looking forward to a masked ball as a grand finale to their Sabbath revelry.—Transatlantic Rambles.

MUSIC AT LIVERPOOL.—Miss Louisa Pyne and Herr Formes sang at the last concert of the Philharmonic Society, which took place on Tuesday, and Mr. Chisholm performed a solo on the bassoon. The engagements for the ensuing winter are likely to prove exceedingly attractive. An extra choral concert is to be given on the 14th October, when selections from the hitherto unknown vocal works of J. S. Bach are to be produced, while, on the 22nd and 24th of October, we are to have a great treat by the exertions of the glee and madrigal party, who have, under the patronage of the Queen and Prince Albert, gained great popularity in London, during the past season. There is also a talk of Mr. Sims Reeves appearing in the oratorio of St. Paul, while all lovers of amusement will rejoice to hear that Mr. Albert Smith appears on the 5th, 8th, and 7th of November, when he will give his entertainment entitled the "Overland Mail," in which he will introduce a description of his recent ascent of Mont Blanc.

ENGLISH GLEE AND MADRIGAL UNION.—The success of this society during the week at Brighton and Hastings, under the direction of Mr. Land, has been completed. Next week we hear their campaign will begin in the Midland Counties, commencing on Monday, at Northampton.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A CORRESPONDENT has called our attention to the fact of our having omitted to notice the very clever performance of Signor Faltoni's Figaro in the Barbiere at Her Majesty's Theatre, undertaken at a very short notice.

W. S.—We regret we are unable to supply our correspondent with the information he desires.

A REGULAR SUB.—For Counterpoint, Cherubi's Treatise, Cocks & Co.—For Harmony, Dr. Alfred Day's Treatise, Cramer and Beale. For Composition, Godfried Weber's Theory, Cocks and Co. We are unable to state the publishing prices. To our Correspondent's second question, it is not in our province to reply. He had better apply to one of the great publishing houses.

Advertisements.

THE ENGLISH GLEE AND MADRIGAL UNION,

(UNDER THE PATRONAGE OF HER MOST GRACIOUS MAJESTY),
CONSISTING of Mrs. Endersohn, Miss M. Williams, Mr. Lockey, Mr. Francis, Mr. Land, and Mr. H. Phillips, will sing at NORTHAMP-TON, October 6th (Morning and Evening): Leicester, 7th; Nottingham, 8th; Birmingham, 9th; Cheltenham, Friday Evening 10th, and Saturday Morning 11th.
E. Land, Hon. Sec., 6, Foley Place, London.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE. PLAY-HOUSE PRICE NIGHTS.

IT is most respectfully announced that the LAST FAREWELL NIGHTS will be given, viz., on WEDNESDAY, OCT. 8, 1851.

THURSDAY, OCT. 9.
FRIDAY, OCT. 10.
SATURDAY, OCT. 11.

Being most positively the LAST FAREWELL NIGHTS. The Theatre closing with the Great Exhibition.

The particulars of which will be announced forthwith.

Prices—Pit, 5s.; Gallery, 2s. 6d.; Pit Stalls, 10s. 6d.; Gallery Stalls, 5s.; Boxes, Two Pair, 11s.; One Pair and Pit Tier, £1 11s. 6d.; Grand Tier, £2 2s.; Box Seats, 5s. 6d. and 7s.

Applications for Boxes, Stalls, and Tickets, to be made at the Box Office of the Theatre. The Opera to commence at Eight o'clock.

ST. ANDREW'S HALL, NORWICH.

ON THURSDAY EVENING, will be produced Dr. Bexfield's New Oratorio, ISRAEL RESTORED. Principal Vocal Performers:—Miss Birch, Miss Williams, Mr. Benson, and Mr. Phillips. The principal Instrumental Performers from London. Organ, Mr. Harcourt; Conductor, Dr. Bexfield. The Orchestra will number nearly 400 performers. Tickets (reserved), Four Shillings each, may be had of Mr. Howlett, 3, London-street.

THE "CLIPPER," OR REGATTA POLKA.

By J. G. CALLCOTT,

AUTHOR of the "Elfin Polka," "Queen of the Night Waltzes," &c., is now ready at Cramer, Beale, and Co.'s, 201, Regent-street, with an illustration of the American schooner. Price 2s.

PIANOFORTES BY BROADWOOD, ERARD, &c.

MR. KELLY, MUSICAL INSTRUMENT AUCTIONEER, will, on WEDNESDAY NEXT, OCTOBER 8th, at One for Two o'clock, submit for Sale at 21, Old Bond-street, upwards of 40 new and second hand Pianofortes and Harps by the most celebrated makers; also Finger and Barrel Organs, Harmoniums, together with a number of other Musical Instruments. May be viewed the day prior and morning of Sale. Catalogues forwarded on the receipt of two postage stamps enclosed to the Auctioneer, 8, High-street, Kensington.

TO ORGANISTS AND OTHERS.

A N Organist and Professor of Music, residing about fifty miles from London, having a good connexion of Teaching, Tuning, &c., wishes to meet with a Gentleman whom he could introduce and recommend as his successor. The Organist's salary is £30 per annum, and the Teaching, &c., realises a respectable income. For terms, apply to A. B., Messrs. Jewell and Letchford, Music Publishers, 17, Soho Square.

GREAT DISCOVERY IN HARMONY.

Now ready, price 5s.

THE PRINCIPLES OF NATURAL HARMONY, being a Perfect System founded upon the discovery of the True Semitonic Scale, by J. J. Haite. London, Published by the Author, 76, Leadenhall-street. To be had of Messrs. Ewer and Co., Newgate-street, and Messrs. Cocks and Co., New Burlington-street.

SCHOTT AND CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

VIOLIN SOLOS WITH ACCOMPANIMENT FOR PIANO OR ORCHESTRA.

Alard, Delphin. Op. 21, Souvenirs de Mozart.
Beriot de, Ch. Op. 70, 6me. Concerto.
" " Op. 76, 7me. " "
Hu, Fr. Op. 2, Schwaucht nach der Schweiz. Variations.
Leonard, H. Op. 14, 2nd Concerto.
" " Op. 18, Grande Fantaisie Militaire.
Sainton, Prosper. Lucrezia Borgia. Fantaisie.
" " Fille du Regiment. " "
" " 1st Concerto.

Schott and Co., 89, St. James's street.

TEDESCO'S PIANOFORTE WORKS.

PUBLISHED BY WESSEL & Co.

Premier Nocturne	2s. 6d.
"The Cottage,"	{ Three German	2s. 6d.
"True Love,"	{ Melodies,	2s. 6d.
"Loreley,"	{	2s. 6d.
"Les Etoiles,"	{ Three Etudes	2s. 6d.
"Le Torrent,"	{ de Concert.	2s. 6d.
"The Curfew,"	{	2s. 6d.
"Passe," second Nocturne...	2s. 6d.
"Scène Russe," Caprice brillant	4s. 6d.
"Farewell,"	{ Three German	2s. 6d.
"Faithfulness,"	{ Melodies,	2s. 6d.
"Adieu,"	{	2s. 6d.
"L'Adieu de Mozart,"	2s. 6d.

The above are Copyright.

Wessel & Co., 229, Regent-street, London.

THE ORGANIST'S COMPANION,

BY JOHN GOSS, Organist of St. Paul's Cathedral. A series of voluntaries, for the commencement, middle, and conclusion of divine service; also, a collection of interludes or short symphonies, to be played between the verses of the psalms or hymns, in numbers 2s. 6d. each, or 4 vols., 12 each.

PAROCHIAL PSALMODY.

A COLLECTION of Ancient and Modern tunes; also a variety of favourite responses to the Commandments, with directions for chanting, with an accompaniment for the Organ or Pianoforte, by John Goss, price 6s.

SACRED MELODIES.

SELECTED from eminent composers, and arranged for one or two voices, with an accompaniment for Organ or Pianoforte, by J. Goss, Organist of St. Paul's Cathedral. Price 6s.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent-street, and 67, Conduit-street.

THE POPULAR SONG OF THE DAY.

"TALK OF HIM THAT'S FAR AWAY," composed by THOMAS CHANTREY. A new edition of which is just issued, may be had at ADDISON & HOLLIER'S, 210, Regent-street, London. For simplicity, elegance, and originality of melody, it is unrivalled.

Also, by the same author, "Why wilt thou not love?" and "The dream is past."

JOULE'S DIRECTORIUM CHORI ANGLICANUM.

Second Edition, price 1s. in cloth 1s. 6d.

THE most complete Choral Service book that has yet appeared. Dedicated by permission to the Lord Bishop of Manchester. For highly favourable reviews see "Christian Remembrancer," "Theologian," "Parish Choir," &c. &c. London: J. A. Novello.

A few copies of the quarto edition, price 15s., still on hand.

CURES FOR THE UNCURED!

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.—Cure of a Red Leg of more than sixty years' standing.—Mr. Barker, of No. 5, Graham's Place, Drypool, near Hull, had ulcers on his leg from the age of 18 until upwards of 80, and although for many years he had sought the first advice in the country, nothing was found to cure them. He often suffered excruciating pain for long periods together, which incapacitated him from attending to his business. He had given up all hopes of getting a cure, when at last he was persuaded to try Holloway's Pills and Ointment, which he did, and however wonderful it may appear, the leg was thoroughly healed by their means, and by continuing to use the Pills alone after his leg was well, he has become in health so hale and hearty as now to be more active than most men of fifty. N.B.—The truth of this extraordinary statement can be vouched for by Mr. J. C. Reinhardt, 23, Market Place, Hull. Feb. 20th, 1850. The Pills should be used conjointly with the Ointment in the following cases:—
Bad Legs Coco Bay Contracted and Lumbago Scurvy
Bad Breasts Chiego-foot Stiff Joints Piles Sore-heads
Burns Chilblains E'phantiasis Rheumatism Tumours
Bunions Chapped hands Fistulas Scalds Ulcers
Bite of Mosche- Corns (Soft) Gout Sore Nipples Wounds
toes and Sand- Cancers Glandular Swell- Sore-throats Yaws
Flies ing Skin-diseases

Sold by the Proprietor, 244, Strand, (near Temple Bar), London; and by all respectable Vendors of Patent Medicines throughout the Civilized World, in Pots and boxes, at 1s. 1d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 22s., and 33s. each. There is a very considerable saving in taking the larger sizes.

N. B.—Directions for the guidance of Patients are affixed to each Pot or Box.

Printed and Published for the Proprietor by MICHAEL SAMUEL MYERS, of No. 3, Studley Road, Clapham Road. Clapham Road, in the parish of Lambeth, at the office of MYERS & Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, in the parish of St. Paul, where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed, post paid. To be had of G. Parkes, Dean Street, Soho; Allen, Warwick Lane; Vickars, Holywell Street, and at all Booksellers.—Saturday, October 4, 1851.

The Musical World.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s.; Half year, 8s.; Three Months, 4s.; (Stamped Copies 1s. per Quarter extra,) payable in advance, to be forwarded by Money Order, to the Publishers, Myers & Co., 22, Tavistock-st., Covent Garden

No. 41.—VOL. XXIX.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 11, 1851.

Price Fourpence.
Stamped Fivepence.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

RESUME OF THE SEASON.

Concluded from our last.

The general observations we have to make will not occupy much space. As the season of 1851 must be counted among the most extraordinary in the annals of Her Majesty's Theatre, so must it be set down as one of the least happily directed. More enterprise, spirit, and liberality could hardly have been looked for by the subscribers; but sounder judgment might advantageously have been exercised in a vast number of instances, and a clearer and more decided line of policy throughout the season would have been desirable. First, with regard to the department of prima-donnas, we would ask—as many have asked, without receiving an answer—why so many?—and still more, why so many in the same style and entrusted with the same line of characters? For example, Mdlle. Caroline Duprez, Madame Ugalde, and Mdlle. Nau, as light soprani, are all excellent, especially the first, who is young, pretty, and engaging in the bargain; as singers of bravura, are all good, especially the second, who executes passages with unsurpassable velocity in the bargain; as useful artists, and practised musicians, are all valuable, especially the third, who is acquainted with the entire Italian repertoire in the bargain. But why three of them, when one would have done—unless to treble the expenses? And why treble the expenses—unless to embarrass the treasury? But why embarrass the treasury? Moreover, “too many cooks spoil the broth;” and, moreover, not only spoil the broth, but foment jealousies and ill-feeling among themselves. One will perforce do the work of the others; and so, as the quarrel proceeds, the pot-au-feu is upset; the steak, as though placed upon a gridiron without ribs, falls into the midst of the flaming coals, and, instead of affording nourishment and good cheer to the expectant guests, leaves nothing but four hissing corners to afflict the ears and mock the eyes of the contumacious cooks, when the sound of the dinner-bell announces the hour of repast, and proclaims the appetites of the assembled Convives. We object to comparisons; but, were suggestion not impertinent in this place, we should take the liberty to suggest that Mdlle. Caroline Duprez (the first comer, and therefore, no offence to the other two eminent artists), whose real place was not the Opera Comique, like Madame Ugalde's, nor the Theatre de la Nation, like Mdlle. Nau's, would have amply sufficed for the particular line which suits her talent and should have constituted her repertoire even in a great and highly respected establishment like Her Majesty's Theatre. Not, at the same time, that we should have objected to the engagement of Mdlle. Nau, or some one else, her equivalent, as a substitute for Mdlle. Duprez in case of illness, which would have been in unison with Mr. Lumley's usual munificent policy in the direction of his theatre—over munificent, perhaps, for his own ultimate interests. This would have been entirely satisfactory to the subscribers without the further engagement and the inevitable sacrifice of the celebrated French artist, Madame Ugalde.

In another and a higher department the prodigality to which we have alluded was even more remarkable. We put it to a reasonable subscriber, who might have learned from the prospectus issued in the before season, that the list of absolute prima-donnas comprised Mdlle. Alboni, Madame Fiorentini, Madame Sontag, and Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli, whether he would not have been perfectly content with his bill of fare? Here were four admirable ladies, in different styles, all of whom should have been “trump-cards” to Mr. Lumley's hand at “whisht.” But when to these are superadded Madame Barbieri Nini, Mademoiselle Alaymo, Mdlle. Parodi (whose noncoming, by the way, was well atoned for by the brilliant and un-anticipated Sophie Cruvelli), not to name others who were not named, each also in her person an absolute first “donna,” speculation is abashed, and the “why” and “for-what-object” of their engagement leaves conjecture tongue-tied. The only possible use of Mad. Barbieri Nini would be to “snuff out” Mdlle. Cruvelli; the only possible use of Mdlle. Alaymo to “snuff out” Mad. Barbieri; hna the only possible use of Mdlle. Parodi, who happily remained in the United States, to “snuff out” all three of them. As things turned out, this flux of prima donnas of the “hors ligne” category turned out useful, since without Mad. Barbieri Mr. Lumley would have been puzzled to make out the programmes of his “play house” nights; and without Mdlle. Sophie, especially during the last weeks, he would not have been able to make them out at all. But an unforeseen accident does not sanctify an unwise policy; and in the teeth—the white, and pearly, and beautiful teeth—of the lovely prima donnas, one and all, we must arraign their company as over-numbered and superfluous.

En fait of tenors, we have also objections to urge—strong objections. There were too many, and yet not enough for the work in hand. Calzolari and Gardoni, both capital, would each have done better in the absence of the other. Sims Reeve and Pardini were only in each others way, to the detriment of both. (Mind, reader, we are neither making nor ruminating comparisons, which are altogether beside our present purpose.) Scotti, another tenor, a nonentity, was chiefly tasked with taking small parts from Mercuriali, a very capable second tenor; while Poultier, an artist of eminence from the French Grand Opera, was of no utility whatever except in extracting tant from the treasury, which he extracted, and in the middle of the season "cut his stick," much to the regret of his sincere admirers, who regretted sincerely to have had so few opportunities of admiring him.

In another department, the basses, the troupe was manifestly weak. Lablache, though a host in himself, was not enough for the purpose, and besides could not be expected to sing every night. Balanchi is a respectable artist; but to be a respectable artist is not necessarily to be a good bass; and Balanchi is not a good bass, since his lower notes are inaudible—Rocco to wit. Casanova would be better if he had a better voice, and could sing better. Scapini, who appeared in several parts of importance, which it would have been more prudent to have assigned to Lorenzo, is unfitted by physique and acquirement to occupy so high a part as that of primobasso at Her Majesty's Theatre. Of Lorenzo we have great hopes. He is a good actor, a zealous and eager artist, who only requires the practice and experience which time will doubtless confer, to reach an enviable position in his profession. Lorenzo is young, and, as we have said, we have great hopes of him. He is a good actor, a zealous artist, and an eager. He has ambition. Let him make that the rider to industry, and he will arrive full gallop at the goal, provided always he does not have a fall by the way-side.

In another department, the barytones, weakness was less manifest. Coletti, like Lablache, is a host in himself, and, to boot, well received of the public. Massol is a comet of eccentric motion, brilliant and burning, and, to boot, well received of the public. Frederick Lablache is a "chip of the old block," and, to boot, well received of the public. To Ferranti we can only apply the words which the great Lord Bacon applied to himself in soliciting the Great Seal at the hands of King James, after the demise of Lord Chancellor Egerton—"Gloria in obsequio"—not daring to promise Mr. Lumley on the part of Ferranti, as Lord Bacon King James on the part of himself—"that if he (Ferranti) hold that place"—primobarytone—"his (Mr. Lumley's) business shall not make such short turns upon him as it hath; but when a direction is once given, it shall be pursued and performed; and he (Mr. Lumley) "shall only be troubled with the true care of a manager, which is to think what he would have done in chief, and not how for the passages"—since Signor Ferranti cannot yet execute the "passages," whatever he may do, and he is young, by and bye. Of the other barytones of the season having said nothing, we need say no more. Have they not been chronicled in the Post, posted in the Chronicle, and heralded in the News—"daily?" (no pun!) We have spoken thus generally, since our readers and the public have better taste of concretum than of abstractum. He that cannot see well, let him go softly. At the same time, we should be loath to deny that the waves of men's affections—opera subscribers as others—flow rather towards persons than things.

Of the orchestra we can say that it is improved, though not to the degree anticipated. Of the chorus we can say that it has retrograded, and beyond the degree anticipated. Of Balfe, the chef-d'orchestre, and director-general of the music, we can say, as we have been saying since 1846, that he has shown no less zeal than ability; no less readiness at his work than love of it; no less industry than amiability; no less decision than presence; no less care for his artists than respect for himself; no less pride in his position than independence in its maintenance; no less fidelity to his director than affection for his orchestra, the principal members whereof, headed by Tolbeeque, Nadaud, Remusat, and other distinguished players, as a mark of their esteem and attachment, at the termination of the regular season, presented him with a testimonial, in the shape of a handsome piece of plate, accompanied by speeches laudatory, congratulatory, and heartfelt. That Balfe is a favourite with his orchestra there can be no doubt; that he is a favourite with the singers and other artists there can be no doubt; that he possesses every requisite to constitute a conductor and music director of the first class there can be no doubt; that he has proved the two first propositions and established the last, by continued manifestations of zeal, activity, and talent, there can be no doubt; that he is an able musician, a prolific composer, and a great popular favourite, there can be no doubt; that he has an European name there can be no doubt; that he has, during six seasons of trying and unexampled difficulty (from 1846 to 1851, inclusive), sustained that name without a spot or blemish, at Her Majesty's Theatre, under Mr. Lumley's management, there can be no doubt; and that he is an Englishman, or rather an Irishman, there can be no doubt. With these convictions then, which, inter alia, we entertain positively, we shall pay no attention, until the proper time arrives, to the report which has gone about of Balfe's approaching secession from the post which he has so long and honourably sustained in the service of Mr. Lumley. All we can say, at the present moment, is—should the report be true, which we trust it may not be—it is to be hoped that Mr. Lumley will be able to find a more able servant, and one more devoted to his interests. For our own parts we wish he may get one.

We have now to speak of the ballet—of the ballet, whereon Mr. Lumley has partially built the temple of his fame. The ballet, in regard to its personnel, has not been shorn of any of its ancient splendour.

"Grates reddimus et sacramus hymnos!"

Where the incomparable Carlotta Grisi is the sun, the system cannot fail of comets fiery and luminous, planets warm, of annules circular, of asteroids and satellites twinkling and refulgent; where Carlotta Grisi is the moon, the sky cannot fail to be bathed in light, the concentration of her very beams; nor has the system failed of comets, planets, annules, asteroids and satellites; nor has the sky been dark: "An véré," as Vaninus says in his dialogues, when he finds himself at a standstill, quid pūlas originem vacui?—how account for the void? Verisimile est—verily, this sun, this moon, has had no place to shine. These comets, planets, asteroids, annules and satellites have had no place to move and dance in. They have beheld Carlotta, their sun, whirling in the solitude of M. Paul Taglioni's embrace, through the pigmy pirouettes of a valse or masurka. They have beheld their moon, Carlotta, streaming through the gymnastics of an unhelped and helpless styrienne. That sun, that moon—erst the centre of a luminous cycle, where many comets, planets, asteroids, annules and satellites danced and did it homage—sparkling, unattended, and for so brief a space that the eye of the spectator, through the microcosmic tube of opera glass and binocle, had scarcely time to fix its focus, and draw in the brightness, ere it vanished wingwards, and was seen no more. To come down from the stars, lay aside the opera glass, and speak plain English—there was Carlotta for the ballet, but no ballet for Carlotta. The greatest dancer in the world was employed during a period of two months in executing, between the acts of the opera, or previous to the fall of the curtain, every evening (at an enormous expense to Mr. Lumley) little more than a few fragments of antique ballets, and a few used-up and insignificant pas de caractère, which might have been as well performed by the meanest of the Coryphées. The only new ballet in the course of the season was that we have already spoken of, L'Île des Amours, for Amalia Ferraris, who had also the "pick" of the dances in Masaniello, which, by the way, were magnificently got up, as were those in the Prodigo, in which Rosati had the lion's share in the part of Lia generally, and the pas de poignards in particular. But Ferraris and Rosati, though both dancers of the first class, had no more than this to do, while Fanny Cerito, a dancer of a still firster class, had positively nothing to do but flirt with her own shadow, and depart, after a few nights, with a migraine. At whose door must this delinquency be laid? Surely at that of M. Paul Taglioni, maitre de ballet, and premier danseur elect of Mr. Lumley's establishment, whose duty, it would appear to the uninitiated, at a glance, was to have maintained Mr. Lumley's ballet (which involves so vast an expense) in all its ancient glory by the seasonable and adequate production of novelties worthy the fame of the theatre and the reputation of the great Terpsichorean artists whose names added lustre to the prospect. If the policy be to abandon the ballet henceforth to the mediocrity and inefficiency, from which Mr. Lumley was the first to rescue it by raising it to a higher position than it has ever enjoyed in any other theatre in Europe, we should be sorry, very sorry, since the policy, we are convinced, would be a mistaken one, and calculated to deteriorate from the prestige of the theatre. In the evanescent and extraordinary reign of Jenny Lind, who engrossed the exclusive attention of the public for two seasons and part of a third, even to the exclusion of some more gifted than herself (in 1848, Sophie Cruvelli—in 1849 and '50, Albert), there was some reason for this neglect of the ballet, since no other attraction than the "Swedish Nightingale" was requisite to fill the theatre to overflowing. But now that the mania has subsided, and the subscribers and the public have eyes for all that is worth seeing, and ears for all that is worth hearing, the same excuse does not hold, and it behoves the management to reconsider the present state of one of the safest and most enduring attractions of his theatre. Better first-rate dancers—prima donnas in short—than Carlotta Grisi, Cerito, Rosati, Amalia Ferraris, and Marie Taglioni; a more admirable second dancer than Petit Stephan; younger, prettier, and cleverer coryphées than Rosa, Jullien, Lamoureux, Esper, Ausandon, Dantoni, Kohlenberg, &c., &c., &c., could not be found throughout the length and breadth of Europe; or a more active and promising premier danseur than M. Charles; or a more able and intelligent general dancer than M. Silvain, who has supported, with so much credit, the whole weight of the male ballet department during the playhouse nights; or a more thoroughly efficient regisseur than M. Petit; or a more distinguished, talented, and zealous professor than M. Gosselin. With such forces under his control Perrot would have done wonders, and M. Paul Taglioni might, and will, we trust next season, do likewise. Verbum sat.

On the whole, however, allowing for every possible objection, for every short-coming and superfluity, the season of 1851 has been one of the most memorable, magnificent, and remarkable since Mr. Lumley first placed Her Majesty's Theatre in that exalted position it now holds among the lyrical establishments of Europe. The number of works absolutely new and original, and of works new to the theatre, is without precedent in the records of this or any other Opera. The production of Beethoven's Fidelio with Sophie Cruvelli, the young and brilliant representative of Leonora, would alone have made this season worthy of remembrance.

And now having nothing more to say, with a word of strong acknowledgment for the highly efficient manner in which the general service of the theatre is performed before the curtain, under the zealous, intelligent, and long-experienced Mr. Nugent, and elsewhere under that of Mr. Fish, the very emblem of courtesy and obliging politeness, we bid adieu to Her Majesty's Theatre until 1852, sincerely wishing it and Mr. Lumley a happy and prosperous new year.

HERR JANSÁ.

We are indebted to the recent political convulsions in the empire of Austria, to what will in all likelihood be the permanent sojourn among us of the above-named eminent musician. It is unnecessary for us to inform those who have been to Vienna who and what is Herr Jansa; while those who have not, have already been instructed on the subject by Mr. Ella, director of the Musical Union, and other speculative and intelligent travellers, but especially Mr. Ella. The fact, however, of Mr. Jansa's present residence in London deserves publishing, as one of interest and importance to the musical world at large.

Herr Jansa was brought up to the bar and came to Vienna in 1817 to pursue his studies in the University of that capital. Having a great turn for music, and excelling especially, though an amateur, as a player upon the fiddle, Herr Jansa turned a cold eye to red tape and parchment, neglected the pandects, and gave almost exclusive attention to the science of sweet sounds, as manifested upon the four strings of the violin. In short, Herr Jansa's right hand was rarely undivested of a bow, his left shoulder unpressed by a fiddle. The laws of nations, the canon law, the law ecclesiastical, the common law, and the law of the small courts, mere dead letters in the mind of Herr Jansa, who could perceive in them no harmony, and much less melody. And so, one fine day, he broke the barriers, escaped from the confines of University rule, and threw himself into the arms of the muse, swearing undivided and eternal affection.

Those who are acquainted with the incidents connected with the social and artistic life of Beethoven will remember the Count de Brunswick as an intimate friend, wide patron, and dedicatee of the giant of the orchestra. The Count de Brunswick about this period of Herr Jansa's life came across Herr Jansa; or rather, Herr Jansa, about this period of the Count de Brunswick's life, came across the Count de Brunswick, and either was well pleased with other; so much so indeed that the Count de Brunswick, a great amateur of quartets in particular and fiddle music in general, proposed to Herr Jansa, already a great player of quartets in particular and fiddle music in general, an engagement as his, the Count de Brunswick's violinist, which he, Herr Jansa, accepted without preamble or palaver. Henceforth our young musician began to study composition under the noted contrapuntist, Sechter, who explained to him the tetrachord, laid bare to his intelligence the binary roots, and exercised him in the campagne of fugue and canon. Jansa was an apt scholar, and having learnt in a few years as much as Herr Sechter could teach him, and more, namely, the art of composing (which the subtle contrapuntist may be affirmed to ignore)— having learnt that, betook him in 1824 to shake off the fugal shackles and to accept an appointment, by imperial decree, as violinist of the band royal at Vienna, which appointment was almost immediately followed by two others, that of Professor of the violin, pianoforte, and composition to the Emperor's choir, and professor of the violin at the Conservatorium. He was also, at the same time, created honorary member of several of the Philharmonic Societies of Germany.

"Tanto hic plus laudis Cæsare Cæsar habet"—

The influence of Herr Jansa at Vienna in the triple capacity of solist, quartet player, and concert conductor, was beneficially proved and warmly acknowledged by the press and the public, the most eminent artists who went to Vienna to give concerts (among others Hummel, De Beriot, Thalberg, Artot, &c. &c.) invariably selected Herr Jansa as their chef d'orchestre, his ability and known experience eminently adapting him for that part. Not the least interesting incident in Herr Jansa's career was, that he enjoyed the honour of playing in the orchestra under the direction of the immortal Beethoven himself.

Who that is interested in the seventeen quartets of Beethoven can fail to remember the name of Schuppanzich? Schuppanzich—we love to repeat the name—was the director of the celebrated quartet party which first had the advantage of rehearsing the magnificent productions in manuscript, under Beethoven's own superintendence, and performing them in public. Schuppanzich—we love to iterate that we repeat the name—was moreover, and better, the attached friend of Beethoven; and was regarded by Beethoven and the connoisseurs of Vienna as the best quartet player of his day. "Hic solo (no pun,) vicit ab ingenio." He died in 1832, and was succeeded by Herr Jansa, who, from that time to 1850 carried on the quartet parties which Schuppanzich had founded with the same players who had studied them under Beethoven's personal direction; and brought the performances to that state of perfection for which they have been so deservedly renowned.

The compositions of Herr Jansa, most of which are published at Leipsic and Vienna, are very numerous, and consist of concert pieces for violin with full orchestra, duets, trios and quartets for stringed instruments, duets for pianoforte and violin, a trio for pianoforte, violin and violoncello, besides a symphony and other manuscript works. They are much esteemed by judges for their school, ingenuity and learning.

In the spring of the present year Herr Jansa was dispatched by the Austrian government to the Great Exhibition in London to examine and report upon the stringed instruments of music, a proof of the high estimation in which he must have been held in his own country. In July a concert was announced for the benefit of the Hungarian refugees in London, at which Herr Jansa was invited to play, and for which he was requested to compose a duet for harmonica and pianoforte on popular Hungarian airs. The innocent part which Herr Jansa took in this charitable performance gave such offence to the Austrian Government that he was peremptorily dismissed from that post which he had filled with so much credit for seven and twenty years; which sudden and unexpected change of circumstances has compelled Herr Jansa to establish himself in this metropolis, where, we trust, with a success to which he is so justly entitled, he may long continue to prosecute his professional labours.

SOME DOUBTS ABOUT CHERUBINI.

(From a Sceptical Contributor.)

We have been thinking about Cherubini and know not what to make of him. According to some, Cherubini was the greatest composer the world ever saw—according to some, he was a mere schoolmaster—according to others, a kind of medium between the two. We confess that we know hardly enough of him to venture a decided opinion of his merits. What we do know of him by no means puts him on a level with Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, or Mendelssohn—though we have heard him preferred to each and all of these, and by no mean authorities. Mr. P—— told us, once upon a time, that Cherubini's opera, Medea, was one of the mightiest things in dramatic music, and Mr. P—— is a first-rate judge. Of Medea, we know the overture—the overture and nothing more. Our impression of this overture is of a mixed kind. To begin—we think it not a first-rate work. To compare it with the Zauberflöte of Mozart, the Egmont of Beethoven, the Der Freischütz of Weber, the Faust of Spohr, or the Fingal of Mendelssohn, would be absurd. Where such things are, it must not be named. Although bold in style and masterly in conduct, it has the fault of prosiness, unpardonable in a musical composition. Certainly it gives no promise of anything great to follow; it holds out no likelihood of the excellence which Mr. P—— predicates in favour of the entire opera. Then, again, we are told that Les Deux Journées, known in Germany as the Wasserträger, or "Water-carrier," is the best comic opera since Mozart. Of this, again, we know but the overture, which we acknowledge to be worthy of any master that ever lived. We have faith in the Deux Journées, from the excellence of its overture; but we are unacquainted with any other part of the opera—a loss no doubt. What else do we know of Cherubini?—The overture to Faniska, one of the quaintest and freshest outpourings of musical fancy—the overture to Lodoiska, at least twice as good as that of Kreitzer—the overture to Anacreon, a brilliant, though overrated work—the overtures to Les Abencerrages, La Prisonnière, and L'Hotellerie Portugaise, none of which betray any striking qualities—the Requiem in C minor, a fine work, but by no means comparable to Mozart's, to which it has, nevertheless, been preferred—three violin quartets, works of great labour and research, shewing more of the pedant than the poet—and other compositions of less consequence. Except these, we know nothing of Cherubini, and yet we join others in acknowledging him one of the great masters of the art. What is there in these works that entitles him to such distinction? The quartet in C major, the Requiem in C minor, and the overtures to Les Deux Journées and Faniska, have certainly a portion of the “divine fire,” but hardly sufficient to entitle Cherubini to the high position he maintains. After all, who thoroughly knows Cherubini? For the opinion of the French we care not greatly—for that of the Italians, not at all. Remain, Germany and England—and, even in these countries, with rare exceptions, Cherubini is not merely unappreciated, but unknown.

There was a singular mixture of selfishness and independence in Cherubini. He feared not to offend Napoleon, yet he left a letter from Beethoven unanswered! What was Cherubini in comparison with Beethoven? Ought not Cherubini to have felt honoured and flattered by the humble communication of the great symphonist? Ought he not to have welcomed it with ardour, and answered it with enthusiasm? Truly he ought—but he left it unanswered. What an indignity to Beethoven! How his proud nature must have writhed under the infliction of such contumely! In that letter, moreover, Beethoven boldly styles Cherubini the most gifted living composer—a distinction which the great German must fully have been conscious none but himself could claim. Can you imagine, reader, an eminent musical composer to have lived and flourished, from the beginning to the end of BEETHOVEN'S career without once having been known to express the slightest interest in his works? Can you imagine it?—No—you cannot; yet, such was the case. Cherubini was never heard to give utterance to one syllable of eulogy in favour of Beethoven. The fact is natural, but not the less true. It is somewhat odd, en revanche, that, often as we conversed with Mendelssohn about the works of the great composers, we do not recollect his having at any time alluded to Cherubini—and yet, Cherubini ranked as one of the foremost musicians of his time—a fact which none seem disposed to deny, while none seem inclined to illustrate it by examples from his works. Some strange fatality has divided Cherubini from the other great masters. We are constantly in the habit of citing Handel and Bach—Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven—Mendelssohn and Spohr; but the name of Cherubini is excluded from this goodly company—it is a thing apart—an isolated greatness—a majesty in solitude. We own we are sceptical on the subject. What we know of Cherubini does not warrant the praises that have been lavished on him. Moreover, in the symphony—the greatest test of musical genius—the most comprehensive form that music can assume—Cherubini has produced nothing that has survived him. One specimen alone proceeded from his pen—a symphony written expressly for the Philharmonic Society, and shelved ever since the first season of its production. From which, we—judging from the ordinary tenor of Philharmonic policy—are inclined to suspect that it is among the best efforts of the composer. It has shared the fate of other things of the kind—it has been laid by and forgotten. Why does not Mr. Costa exert a little of his spirit of enquiry, and bring it to life for a season—with its equally abandoned companions, the one symphony of Clementi, and the one symphony of Woelfl! The announcement of any of these would be an attraction.

M. Fétis tells us, in one of his articles on the autograph MSS. of Cherubini, that the reverence of the pupils of the Conservatoire was unprecedented; his surliness of temper and brusquerie of manner were nothing—he was worshipped. This speaks volumes; and yet his favorite pupils, Auber and Halévy—a man of consummate genius and a man of consummate drudgery, or in other words a man of genius without drudgery, and a man of drudgery without genius—bear no resemblance to him whatever; his manner has in no way influenced them. With Auber, a composer of a very original turn of mind, this is not surprising—but with Halévy, who has no fixed style, and whose music resembles everything, it is singular. At least we might have looked for a pedantic imitation of his master's peculiarities; but no—Halévy imitates all composers but one—and that one his preceptor—a fact, on the whole, irreconcilable with our experience of things in art. Has the style of Cherubini no charm?—or is it that it differs not materially from that of Mozart, Haydn, and the other classical composers? We think not. We find in the few works of Cherubini with which we are acquainted, a marked and unmistakable character—a considerable flow of melody—a great command of harmony—a skilful use of counterpoint, and a masterly completeness, which render them, if not worthy of competition with the master-pieces of the greatest composers we have named, at least objects of interest to the jealous and enquiring musician. Cherubini is a riddle to us—a riddle we should like to solve, but do not exactly see how we are to solve it. We shall, perhaps, return to the subject, and, in the meantime, endeavour to get a peep at some of his compositions.

PYRRHUS.

[“Pyrrhus” doubts prettily, and writes well; but we rise from a perusal of his essay with the conviction that he knows nothing of the subject of his enquiry.—Ed. M. W.]

VICTOR HUGO'S TRAGEDY OF ERNANI.

That exaggerated view of the laws of honour which was so prevalent in romantic Spain, and which forms the moral foundation of Victor Hugo's tragedy of Ernani is thus illustrated by Sismondi, in his History of the Literature of the South of Europe:—

“In the faithful picture of Spanish manners which Lope de Vega has presented to us, the most striking and most incomprehensible feature is the extreme susceptibility of Spanish honour. The slightest coquetry of a mistress, of a wife, or of a sister, is an insult to the lover, the husband, or the brother, which can only be obliterated by blood. This mad jealousy was communicated to the Spanish by the Arabians; its existence amongst the latter, and, indeed, amongst all oriental nations, may easily be accounted for, because it is in accordance with their national habits. They keep the female sex in close confinement; they never pronounce their names, nor do they ever seek any intercourse with them until they have them absolutely in their power. Indulging only emotions of love and of jealousy in their harems, they seem in every other place to forget the existence of the sex. The manners of the Spaniards are entirely opposite; their whole lives are consecrated to gallantry. Every individual is enamoured of some woman who is not in his power, and makes no scruple of entering into the most delicate intrigues to gratify his passions. The most virtuous heroines make assignations in the night-time at their chamber windows; they receive and write billets, and they go out masked to meet their lovers in the house of a third person. So completely is this gallantry supported by the spirit of chivalry, that when a married woman is pursued by her husband or by her father, she invokes the first person whom she chances to meet, without knowing him or disclosing herself to him, she requests him to protect her from her impertinent pursuers, and the stranger thus called upon cannot, without dishonouring himself, refuse to draw his sword to procure for this unknown female a liberty perhaps criminal. He, however, who thus hazards his life to rescue the flight of a coquette, who has himself made many assignations, and written billets, would be seized with unappeasable fury if he discovered that his own sister had inspired any person with love, had entertained that passion for another, or had taken any of those liberties which are authorized by universal custom. Such a circumstance would be a sufficient motive in his eyes to put to death both his sister and the man who had ventured to speak to her of love.

"The theatre of Spain everywhere affords us examples of the practical application of this singular law of honour. Besides various pieces of Lope de Vega, many of those of Calderon, and, amongst others, The Lady Spectre and The Devotion of the Cross, place in the clearest light the contrast between the jealous fury of a husband or a brother, and the protection which they themselves afford to any masked damsel who may ask it, who, as it often happens, is one of the identical persons they would have the greatest desire to restrain, if they had known her. But the argument which a Castilian philosopher advances against these sanguinary manners in a comedy of an anonymous author of the court of Philip IV. is still more extraordinary. A judge is speaking of a husband who has put his wife to death;—

"Our worldly laws he has obeyed,
But not those laws which God has made;
My other self now is my wife,
It is then clear that if my life
I must not take, I cannot do
That violence to her. 'Tis true,
Man very rarely can control
The impulse which first moves his soul."

A singular morality, which would prohibit murder, only when it resembles suicide!"

Much that appears exaggerated in Hugo's remarkable drama becomes thus explicable and clear.

MORE ABOUT LOLA MONTEZ.

Paris, Oct. 2, 1851.

As the time draws near when the old world is destined to be forsaken by as much of its grace and beauty—its genius and its wit—as can be conveniently carried off, in the possession of one lady; or to speak in plainer terms, as November draws near and the Countess of Landsfeld shows no symptoms of changing her mind on the subject of visiting America, the regrets of her friends become equalled only by the curiosity of the general public. Of the former class, the more sentimental may be seen with drooping eyes, and moustaches to match—moustaches which, for the want of the cire have fallen into the "yellow leaf"—hovering near the Place Vendome, and looking up at the lightless windows, that yet retain their charm on the principle of our old friend the "Vase in which roses have once been distilled."

That, the poet assures us, can never part with its perfume, though the flowers are no more. The wiser among those disconsolates qualify their despair with philosophy, as they do their coffee with cognac, and may be seen any day sitting on the Boulevards deep in these respective mixtures. To console either class of admirers would be a vain attempt; so I will leave them ruthlessly to their fate; but to satisfy, to some extent, the curiosity of the general public is an easier matter. For their benefit, then, be the information that Lola's dancing lessons are at an end; that Marbille has anticipated the verdict of the Western World, and pronounced her perfect; and that a series of provincial and other performances—better described as "dress rehearsals"—which have been occupying her for the last two or three weeks, are the immediate prelude to her departure.

Everywhere during this recent "progress"—whenever the boards have been fluttered by those infinitesimal of feet—the most terrible consequences have ensued. Boulogne has lost its head if it ever had one; and Brussels its heart—if hearts can really be lost or won. At Anvers the excitement took a novel turn. Poets and painters had poetized and painted poor Lola beyond all hope; at Anvers it was reserved for politicians to tender their homage. Lola's reforming tendencies in Bavaria had not been forgotten, and her appearance at the theatre attracted the liberal party in large numbers. It is doubtful whether upon this occasion they found their seats were more limited or sympathies more enlarged than usual, but it is certain that they found the presence of a large number of the legitimate party not very conducive to their comfort. Accordingly, with "Reform and Lola Montes" for a watchword, fierce onslaught was made upon the anti-reformers, who were very handsomely expelled from the theatre, after a pitched battle, conducted in a style which we of chivalrous sympathies are wont to admire, but which I have heard police magistrates characterise as "disgraceful to all parties concerned." The performance then proceeded peaceably. At its conclusion, the audience, not satisfied with the usual demonstration of a civilized public—calling the favorite before the curtain—waited at the doors in great crowds, and, without any hostile intentions, "called her out." Her appearance among her myriad of admirers was the signal for what they call in England "a scene," the ovation concluding with three loud and lasting cheers.

At Brussels there was a "scene" of another description, which may have found its way into the English papers. The manager of the Hippodrome sent an ambassador to the Countess, offering her some extraordinary terms nightly to ride on horseback two or three times round the circle. Her reply was characteristic; drawing herself up to her full height, she examined the gentleman from head to foot: "What do you take me for, Sir? Do you know that I am a Grand Cross of the Order of Maria Theresa, that I am Countess of Landsfeld, that I have my entrées at the court of Bavaria, that I have married a man belonging to one of the most illustrious families of England! Know, Sir, that if I cultivate the art of dancing it is from taste, and that it is an insult to think me capable of taking wages from a director of mountebanks." Adding—"If my friends or my husband were here you should wipe away this insult with your blood."

Foreign.

JERSEY.—Our last three Musical Soirées, at the Queen's Assembly Rooms, have been but indifferently attended, and though there are a number of musical persons in the town, and others who affect to be fond of music, few have thought proper to patronise English singers. The countenances of Sir James and Lady Reynett, ought to have secured a full and fashionable attendance. Thursday, however, was an exception; the Room was full, under the patronage of Major Cuthbert and the Officers of the 15th Depot. Miss Rebecca Isaacs, who has filled the principal role of characters in London and elsewhere, is very young, her voice is sweet and even, with a good volume, which she takes care never to exert to the full. Her crescendo and diminuendo are good, and managed with judgment. Mr. Frazer, an old favourite, took us back to old Drury Lane, and the palmy days of Covent Garden. After so many years of arduous labour, he comes to us with a voice unimpaired. Miss S. Lowe was introduced to us for the first time. Added to a personal appearance the most agreeable, she possesses a soprano voice of freshness and power, joined to a rapidity of execution that shows command of fine organs. Her cantabile singing is excellent, while her execution of fiorette is brilliant. Her ballad singing is almost faultless, while her "Dearest Companions" and "Regnava del Silenzio," force us to acknowledge her pretensions to the higher school of art; and her interpretation of Sir H. Bishop's far-famed "Home, Sweet Home," proved that though art has done much, nature has done her full share. In short, Miss Lowe is a charming and talented vocalist. Mr. Henri Drayton's interpretation of Knight's "Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep," was greatly admired. Mr. Drayton is gifted with a bass voice of more than average compass and quality. We hope to see the highly 'deserving lessee, Mr. Charles Poole, supported by the inhabitants and visitors. No man could have exerted himself more than the manager of these Rooms has done, and we do sincerely trust he will receive the ample reward he so fully merits.—Abridged from the Jersey Press.

NEW YORK.—The New Yorkers have at length heard the "Swan," and we suppose little else will be talked of for some time to come. There was an immense assemblage at Tripler Hall last night, to greet Miss Hayes on her first appearance; every seat was full from the top to the bottom of the house. Uppertendoms were there in throngs, and the no less appreciative middle classes were to be seen in large numbers. The audience was indeed a brilliant one—made up of the fashion, beauty, and talent of the great metropolis. The enthusiasm on the occasion was overwhelming, and on the appearance of the fair vocalist, the stage was literally strewn with flowers; bouquets were to be seen flying from all parts of the house, and when at length the shouting and clapping of hands had ceased, the accompaniment was struck up, and Miss Hayes commenced the "Ah mon fils" in a clear, firm and subdued voice that commanded a silence almost as painful as had been the thunders of applause that had just preceded. At the conclusion of this performance her auditors appeared perfectly enraptured; another shower of bouquets followed, and the bravas and clapping of hands were almost deafening; and some of the more enthusiastic expressed their approbation by sundry bursts of feeling which we can hardly find words to describe. These evidences of satisfaction and admiration were given throughout the evening; every piece Miss Hayes sang but one was encored—and in reality that was encored, but she declined repeating it. Her two best performances last evening were the "Ah mon fils" from the Prophete, and the "Ah non giunge" from the Sonnambula. Her ballads were really enchanting, but the gems of the evening were the two performances just named. Her success among the Americans is already beyond a doubt, and we predict for her a triumph not inferior to that of Jenny Lind. The performances of Mr. Braham and Herr Mengis were exceedingly happy. Braham's "Flowers of the Forest," and Mengis's "Happy Switzer," were among the best things of the evening—the first overflowed with tender pathos, and the latter bursting with happiness. Both gave evidences of superior artistic merits. The orchestral performances did great credit to Mr. Lavenue and those under his direction; and on the whole we consider the musical entertainment of last evening as among the very best ever given in our city.—Abridged from the Weekly Day Book, Sept. 27.

PARIS.—A great scandal occurred at the Ambigu on the occasion of the first production, last Saturday, of a piece called Marthe et Marie, when M. Gaiffe, the dramatic feuilletoniste of the Avènement, was rudely expelled from the theatre, for having previously severely criticised a piece founded on Balzac's Peau de Chagrin, which had been a short time ago brought out at this theatre. The proceeding caused a tremendous fracas in which Jules Janin, Paul de Musset, Lireux, and other feuilletonistes took part with M. Gaiffe, who, at the end, was triumphantly led to his place on the arm of M. Musset, amidst a triumphal march unanimously struck up by the orchestra. This incident supplied the feuilletonistes with something to write upon, of which they took advantage at length in their last articles, talking magnanimously of themselves. It is now definitely decided that M. Marc Fournier is entrusted by M. Leon Faucher, Minister of the Interior, with the direction of the Porte St. Martin. The appointment has given general satisfaction. There is nothing to state about the Grand Opera, except the continued successes of Alboni in the Prophete and the Favorite, which, drawing crowds to the theatre, renders it unnecessary for the management at present to think of novelty. At the Opera Comique, Donizetti's Fille du Regiment, with Madame Ugalde as Marie, a performance which has excited a great variety of criticism, has been the principal event. Although originally composed for the French stage, this sparkling opera loses much of its charms by being removed from the Italian boards.

The third lyric theatre has opened with a new opera in three acts, the piece by Scribe and Vaez, the music by Xavier Boisselot. Here is a reproach to London: while Paris has no less than three National Operas, London is unprovided with one. M. Boisselot's opera was successful. The Barbier of Rossini, has since been produced with the greatest success at the same theatre (National Opera). Mdle. Duez, the Rosina, has been greatly admired; but the rest of the company is very mediocre.

BERLIN.—Roger continues his representations here in the Huguenots, the Prophete, the Dame Blanche, and Jean de Paris. His success is complete; but the critics unanimously give a preference for his performances in comedy, and the critics I think, ont raison. Marie Taglioni has returned, and made her rentrée in the ballet of the Corsaire with great success. Although M. Paul Taglioni received the privilege of the Italian and French theatres, litigation still goes on, and nothing positive has been arranged about their opening. The great event about which the musical public are at present interested, is the forthcoming production at the Grand Opera of Spontini's Olympia, which will be executed on the day of the King's fete. The preparations are on the most magnificent scale. There are to be nine new scenes and two hundred and fifty new costumes. It is said that altogether no less than four thousand persons will be employed in the representation of Spontini's opera, which I cannot help stigmatising as much ado about nothing. I shall report to you an account of its reception.

Great curiosity prevails here about the absolute destination of our native prima-donna, Mdle. Wagner. It now appears—I do not give it upon my own authority—that neither Mr. Lumley nor Mr. Gye is to be the happy possessor of the new lyrical wonder, who at one puff is to extinguish Grisi, Viardot, Alboni, Sontag, and Sophie Cruvelli. That puff will be blown by the celebrated critic, Relstabb, who tried in vain, some years ago, to write down Mendelssohn. If not Mr. Lumley, nor Mr. Gye, then we will ask, Who is to have Miss Wagner?—answer, Mr. Bunn. It is now currently accredited that the very tall Teutonic singer will utter her first lyrical cry in London on the boards of a theatre bounded on the north by Little Russell Street, on the south by Vinegar Yard, on the east by Drury Lane, and on the west by Catherine Street—that the Opera in which she will utter her first cry, will be neither less nor more than that gigantic inspiration of the illustrious Meyerbeer, entitled The Prophete, in which Mad. Fiorentini, the charming and gifted Spaniard, who only two seasons ago was the delices of the Prussian capital, will be the Bertha. Between this and then (which is January) Miss Wagner will doubtless amuse her leisure hours with the study of the English language, in which at present she is not profoundly versed. And thus for the present matters rest. It will be for the future to decide whether Lumley, Gye, or Bunn is to exult in the possession of the celebrated cantatrice, and set the Thames on fire with a glance from her eye.

Besides the Hippodrome, which is doing very badly now under the direction of M. Guerra, owing to the unfavourable state of the weather, we are to have three Cirques this winter, those of M. Dejean, M. Rens, and M. M. Tourniaire. I prophesy failure to them all, except M. Dejean.

MR. FORREST AT THE BROADWAY.

(From the New York Weekly Day Book.)

Mr. Edwin Forrest, the celebrated tragedian, after an absence from the stage of nearly two years, made his appearance last night at the Broadway theatre in the character of Damon. Being somewhat curious to see this celebrated character, the Editor of the Day Book took it into his head to stay in town last night and "go to the theatre." Not being very fond of such wild sports, he did not "hurry up" as a lover to see his mistress—consequently was not in time to see all the fun, but what he did see and hear was worth noticing.

The play was nearly over when we worked our way through the crowd to get a standee inside the door behind the last row of seats in the second tier. The play was at its height and passion was blazing up like a volcano, exciting the vast concourse of people that crowded the theatre from pit to gallery. Pythias chained, came from his cell, and Pythias's wife that was to be and father, who had all the means ready for his escape, begged and pleaded and cried to induce him to run away, and Pythias wouldn't. Then Pythias's wife cried harder and pleaded more—then he thought he would, then he said something about Damon's coming back to ransom him, then he wouldn't again. Then Pythias's wife—that was to be—screamed, then Pythias rushed into his cell, then his wife fainted—then the curtain dropped. Then Damon's wife and little boy came on, then Damon came, then Damon told his wife and little boy that he must go back and be executed in Pythias's stead. Then Damon's wife had a time—she screamed and cried and pulled and hugged and kissed Damon, and begged and pleaded for her sake and the little boy's sake—who by the way was another woman's little girl—that Damon wouldn't go back and be killed. Then Damon (Mr. Forrest) showed off. Oh, how he did pull his hair, roll up his eyes, hugged his wife—Mrs. Damon, we mean—strike his breast and sigh and cry and "make as if he would die." Then he kissed the little boy. Mrs. Damon clung closer and tighter to him, then she fainted, then he laid her gently on the sofa and stepped out and the curtain dropped again.

Then the soldiers appeared and a scaffold. Pythias was brought out, and his wife, that was to be, came in. Six minutes more and his head was to be chopped off. Then he and she had a time; they raised such a storm of passion and tore it into tatters so fast that the ladies all began to cry, just as if the great gilt paper axe was going to chop poor Pythias's head right off there in the theatre. Then the six minutes were up—and poor Mrs. Pythias, that was to be, had to be torn away from Mr. Pythias. Then she thought she saw Mr. Damon coming over the hill—then she didn't; then she fainted, and was carried out; then the ladies cried, just as if she had not come to as soon as she got behind the scenes, and was quietly sitting on the sofa, eating the cold leg of a chicken. Then Pythias marched up on to the scaffold with an awfully firm step; then "the two horsemen" were seen coming over the hill; then there was an awful pause—then in rushed Mr. Damon, (Forrest.) He sees Pythias—who ain't dead yet—he raises up both hands, shakes all his fingers, "hollers" "Ha, ha, ha-a-a! he lives!"—then falls, and such a fall—he is dead. No, he breathes; he raises up his head. Pythias comes to his assistance—helps him up. Damon takes Pythias's place on the scaffold, and somebody comes forward and pardons him—and the curtain falls!

Then there was a cry for Forrest, Forrest, Forrest, from all parts of the house. Mr. Forrest comes forward and makes the following speech, which was to say the least of it, conceived in a bad spirit and spoken in bad taste, and we think will do him more harm, make him more enemies, and degrade him more in the estimation of honorable and highminded men than anything he has ever done or said. He had no right to inflict a history of his private griefs upon the public ear. The people who attended the theatre went to see him play Damon and not "The Jealous Husband;" it was the actor on the stage and not the man before a court that the audience had paid to see. And though every charge he has brought against his wife may be true, he has not yet proved it to the satisfaction of a court; and it was in bad taste on the part of a man in whom discretion had been carried away by passion to brand her from the stage as a prostitute and trumpet his own shame and dishonour. We have taken no part in this quarrel between Mr. Forrest and his wife, and do not mean to; we deeply deplore for many reasons that it exists, and would gladly, were it possible, see the breach healed rather than do anything to widen it, but we have a right to express our opinion of the course Mr. Forrest pursues, when he steps out of his way and takes advantage of his position as an actor to drag his griefs and his wrongs, his prejudices and his hatred, before the public. We give it our unqualified disapprobation, and we trust that after our readers have perused the following report of his speech they will agree with us:

He said in substance, that he was so overpowered with his reception that he could not find language to express his gratitude; and the more, as during the last two years, he had been "the best abused" man in the country. He had been persecuted, misrepresented and vilified by a certain holy alliance. He had been set on by the "little dogs," the "Tray, Blanche and Sweetheart" of the press; assaulted in a public theatre without provocation, by a person whom he had never seen in his life, set on by dastards; a man whom drunkenness had inflamed to a momentary courage; who boasts of being an Englishman, and whom the interference of his friends saved from sudden death. He had been vilified by a fashionable editor; misrepresented and persecuted by a mendacious dungeon lawyer, who had admitted that he had a prostitute for his client, and who had sought perjured testimony against him from brothels; and all this, because he would not submit to be dishonored in his own house. He avowed himself incapable of any act to which manly power would blush. He had always acted in a way to secure public respect, and of that he would not consent to be robbed, and he closed by quoting the well known passage from Othello:

"Who steals my purse steals trash;
'Tis something, nothing—'twas mine—
'Tis his—and has been slave to thousands.
But he who filches from me my good name,
Robs me of that which no enriches him
And makes me poor indeed."

Original Correspondence.

MRS. SIGOURNEY.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

In a very kind review of the "American Magazine" in your journal of the 23rd ult., you state that Mrs. Sigourney, the delightful poetess of America, is dead. This is an error, as she is at present in Italy, having taken up a temporary residence there by way of relaxation from a long series of literary duties in the United States. Some time since this lady experienced a sudden bereavement in the death of a favourite son; and this fact, by some mutation of the types, may have given rise to the mistake. As Mrs. Sigourney has many literary and personal friends in England, and deemed this correction of importance to both them and herself.

With much respect,
I remain, yours, &c.,

HENRY HOWARD PAUL.
Editor "American Magazine."

Oct. 8, 1851.

OUR GREENWICH REPORTER AGAIN.(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—In the Musical World of Saturday the 27th September last, there is a report of the effects of an evening concert, under the direction of Mr. Albert Schloss, given at the Lecture Hall, Greenwich, which report is, I consider, a gross and scandalous libel upon my daughter, and entirely destitute of truth, as your "own reporter" must be perfectly well aware, but as you may not be so, I have thought it better, (before resorting to legal measures for redress) to address myself to you, in order that you may have an opportunity of affording me and my daughter that satisfaction to which we are entitled at your hands. You must be well aware that such a report, if not speedily contradicted, is calculated to inflict serious injury on my daughter's professional reputation. I shall therefore expect that a suitable and proper apology be inserted by your own reporter, in at least two newspapers that I shall name, with your sanction appended thereto.

But previous to its publication I must beg to have a copy sent to me for my approval.

Awaiting your early reply,

I am Sir,

Your obedient humble Servant,
S. BINCKES.

[Our Greenwich Reporter has been dismissed, and we shall be happy to publish a memoir of Miss Binckes.—Ed. M. W.]

Poetry.

TO CATHERINE HAYES.

(WRITTEN AT REHEARSAL, SEPTEMBER 22.)

Like chaos, ere the morning beam
Of the new sun had pierced his wave,
So slept my soul, till to its night
Creative life thy accents gave.

Then swelled the long imprisoned flood
Of passion, 'neath thy burning spell,
The world's of sweet emotions thronged,
Their new discovered joy to tell.

Then rose my heart on wings of sound,
To cast itself before thy feet,
And pay its homage where, alone,
The gifts of art and nature meet.

Oh, welcome to this hum-drum land,
Where make belief is all we know—
Where tinsel stands for precious gold,
And even sentiment is but show!

Thy voice persuasive shall impart
Diviner lessons to the soul—
Shall teach the dignity of art,
And how all things it can control.

Yes—we will learn of thee to love
Something beyond the day and hour—
Something that speaks to us of God,
And soothes us with celestial power.

Oh, let us learn of thee to prize
The mystery of genius, and to deem
That the soul's destiny's not comprized
Within life's brief and fleeting gleam.

Hark! Those rapt tones speak not of earth—
Immortal longings tremble there—
And, hushed and melted by thy voice,
My soul subdues itself to prayer.

F.

*New York Weekly Day Book.GOVERNMENT SCHOOL OF DESIGN.

Mr. Wornum delivered an interesting lecture on Friday evening at the Government School of Design, Somerset House, on some of the prominent art manufactures in the Exhibition. In his opening remarks, the lecturer mentioned the different styles that were to be found there. There was the Greek style developed to some extent, the Oriental or Byzantine, a tolerable sprinkling of Cinquecento, a little Gothic as shown in the Mediæval Court, some Elizabethan, and an immense quantity of Louis XIV. and Rococco. It was impossible to give more than a general view of the different styles. They were all very important to know, as it was the first business of every designer to make himself master of the different styles. The study of one style alone would be more fatal to his success than the absence of any; for in the former case his mind would be left free, but in the latter he became regularly stereotyped, and marked everything with one style, under all circumstances. After impressing on his hearers that natural forms might be used in design, if attention was paid to a fit combination and use of them, he considered the question how far using the revival of past styles might be considered a servile following of mediæval art, and not sufficiently expressing the sentiments of the present age. In using the old styles, they must be careful not to ignore the purposes their designs would be intended for in the present age. There might sometimes be injudicious revivals, but that which was naturally beautiful, must remain so for all ages, and the revival of classical ornament was a good proof of the inherent beauty of those forms. It was perfectly legitimate to preserve beauty, but not to let it interfere with the uses for which it was designed. In the pottery department of the Exhibition, he called attention to the difference shown in the articles exhibited by Messrs. Wedgwood and another house. Wedgwood's pottery was a revival of Greek taste, not slavish copies, but a classical taste adapted to the present requirement in those articles. In the other case, they were merely Greek copies, perfectly ignoring present use. This was an example of the good and bad use of the past styles. Alderman Copeland, who exhibited in statuary porcelain with great success, also adopted the Greek style, and in that material had greater scope to display it. The Greek was the most important of the ancient styles, as it was the result of the labour of 800 years. The more modern nations had never the opportunity to devote so much time to the elaboration of any of their styles. The Sevres china exhibited by the French, was very beautiful, but its costliness did not make it so important to the many as the manufacture before mentioned. The display in bronze was, considering all things, but small, and the general style trifling. France and England were the principal exhibitors. The principal works of France were clocks and candelabra in the renaissance, although there were other styles as well. The renaissance was much used by jewellers and goldsmiths, while the purer style, the Cinquecento, was principally used by painters, sculptors, and architects. The Damascened work from Liege was very fine. In hardware, he regretted that a high tone of art was not applied to the cheaper articles in cast iron. In the silver work, he pointed out the great advantage of oxydising the silver, or rather, rubbing it with sulphur and ammonia. The effect of this was to make the silver of a more leaden hue, but at the same time the design was seen to much greater effect. Sometimes this was done to too great an extent; but it might be very slightly oxydised, so as to be hardly perceptible, and yet take off the dazzling glare which prevented design being seen. He recommended this process more to the notice of the English. If they wished merely to exhibit their work for its value as a precious lump of silver, it was useless making it look like lead; but if their object was to exhibit design, it must not have a bright and glaring surface. He mentioned three specimens of oxydised silver in the English department—the group of Queen Elizabeth and Leicester, exhibited by Elkington, and the Shakespeare shield and Titan vase, by Messrs. Hunt and Roskell. In wood carving, he awarded the palm to the French, although it was all in the renaissance style, and exemplified by a description of one of the English furniture the faults to be found in an unhappy combination of ornament. In one case, the artist had supported his sideboard by cornucopias for legs, but, not contented with that, had made a satyr's head peeping out of the top of each horn support the slab; and a dolphin's head at the extremities form the lower support, so that there were heads at both ends. Again, he said, the strong parts of the ornament in the French work, although most elaborate, were so arranged that they protected the weaker parts, and might be brushed all over with a hard broom without fear of breakage; but the English he should be afraid to touch with a feather broom, there were so many exposed delicate angles and corners. In shawl fabrics, he thought the English did not employ sufficient colours, nor were they always well contrasted; but the principal reason of this was, that as they worked by machinery, the shuttle was thrown right across the web, and the colour consequently appeared all through the shawl, whereas in the costly French specimens, the web was worked in by hand; and in the Indian shawls the whole was worked by hand, leaving it to the taste of the workman what colour should be used; also that it was impossible to judge of the effects of a combination of colours when viewing them separately, and throwing the shuttle by machinery, the effect could not be judged of till the work was done. Of course, in England they would not produce shawls by hand, as in India, owing to the difference in wages, as in the latter country they could get workmen for a penny a-day; but he thought if ladies would get over the prejudice, that no one but the French could produce good things that the English could compete with them. For although people would give fifty or sixty guineas for a French shawl, they would not give more than twenty for a Spitalfields one. Mr. Wornum exhibited, as an example, a shawl of the latter manufacture, which was chosen by Prince Albert for her Majesty, and said by him to be the best in the Exhibition. Mr. Wornum described several other departments of art manufacture in silks, printed and woven fabrics, glass, gutta percha (which he said exactly resembled bronze, and possessed the additional value of not being frangible), and many others, and was listened to throughout his lecture with great attention.

MRS. WARNER.

(From Tallis's Dramatic Magazine.)

Mary Huddart, now Mrs. Warner, is a native of Manchester, but of Irish parentage. Her father was a partner in the firm of Jenkins, Huddart, and Co., wholesale chemists, in Dublin, of which city he was the common councilman. He embraced the theatrical profession late in life, resigning for its precarious honours a lucrative share in business.

At the age of fifteen, Miss Huddart was engaged by Mr. Brunton, the manager of the Plymouth, Bristol, and Birmingham theatres. At the first-named theatre, the young lady was noticed by Mr. Macready, and played even at that early age the part of Lady Macbeth to the noble Thane of the rising tragedian. Miss Huddart then went to Dublin, where she was engaged by Mr. Calcraft, and became speedily a public favourite; playing during the summer seasons in Liverpool and Manchester, and the principal towns in Ireland.

After several other successful engagements, she appeared at the Haymarket as Evadne in The Bridal, and at once established herself as an extraordinary artist by her surprising victory over one of the most difficult characters in the whole range of the drama. At the end of this season she married.

In the year 1844, Mrs. Warner undertook, in conjunction with Messrs. Phelps and Greenwood, the management of Sadler's Wells Theatre. The experiment was altogether indebted to this lady's energy for its starting point. No other performer had until very recently the slightest pretension to the Siddonian crown; and this was now worn by the manageress of a suburban theatre. A new era of the stage dates from this memorable evening.

In the course of the same season, Mrs. Warner performed Gertrude in Hamlet, and the remarkable and difficult role of Evadne in The Bridal, with signal triumph. She then appeared in a round of Shakspearean characters, which were highly successful, and attracted crowded houses night after night.

So far Mr. Phelps and Mrs. Warner had gone on successfully together, but thenceforth they were destined to pursue separate paths. The next appearance of Mrs. Warner was at the Marylebone Theatre, the management of which was undertaken by this lady in 1847, and was conducted by her with unexampled spirit. In conducting this establishment, Mrs. Warner had an opportunity of shewing that she possessed greater variety of characterization than she had previously exhibited. She ventured upon the higher range of comedy as well as tragedy, appearing as Julia in The Hunchback; as Lady Teazle in The School for Scandal; and Mrs. Oakley in The Jealous Wife, and as Lady Townley in The Provoked Husband.

In November of the same year, Mrs. Warner made a bold step in the revival of Beaumont and Fletcher's Scornful Lady, slightly altered, and cleverly adapted by Mr. Serle. The manner in which the revival was achieved exceeded in effect and sterling effort all previous examples. In the course of the next year (1848) Mrs. Warner re-appeared in her original character of The Wrecker's Daughter. In the trance scene—in which the truth, hid from the heroine in her waking condition, is, as it were miraculously revealed, thereby bringing confusion on the great criminal of the drama—Mrs. Warner was original, efficient, and grand. In April the same year, Mrs. Warner ventured on an elaborate revival from Beaumont and Fletcher—The Double Marriage, also adapted by Mr. Serle, which was produced on the most costly scale of decoration, and with decided effect. With the season concluded Mrs. Warner's management of this theatre. Mr. Macready illustrated with his presence and acting her retiring weeks.

Having pursued this highly honourable career as manager, and given undoubtedly a fresh impetus and tone to legitimate dramatic performances, highly advantageous to the cause of good acting and good writing, Mrs. Warner was again restored to the general stage as an actress and an artist of the highest claims. These she has since well maintained, both in the province and at the Haymarket, where she was uniformly engaged with Mr. Macready to undertake the principal female characters in company with his masterly impersonations. The farewell performances of this great actor derived a lustre from the presence of Mrs. Warner in the scene. The genius of Mrs. Warner is eminently tragic, and in particular suited for the severe and majestic. Beautiful of person, and formed in one of nature's grand moulds, she is specially fitted for the great characters of the drama. She looks them without effort, and rises frequently into the passion of the loftiest parts with a genuine inspiration. In private life, Mrs. Warner has ever maintained an irreproachable rank as a daughter, a wife, and a mother. She has always been distinguished for the propriety of her conduct and the purity of her reputation. The public estimation in which she is held on the stage is but as it were an echo of that deeper esteem which renders her domestic life as honourable as it is happy.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

THE "positively last performances" are at length in reality about to be brought to a final close. This evening terminates absolutely, and definitely, and without reservation, the longest season in the annals of Her Majesty's Theatre. The speculation of a season at low prices cannot fail of proving suggestive to the managers of both Operas. Since their commencement Her Majesty's Theatre has been filled every night, and if the audiences were not brilliant and aristocratic, they were at least respectable and well-conducted, and everybody paid. Whether next year an extra season at play house prices, without the direct influence of the Exhibition, would prove remunerative, it is not for us to say. It has been asserted frequently, and by persons not unlikely to know something about the matter, that the prices of admission to the Opera are too high, and that the treasury will never prove a California to the manager unless he consult the means of the general public, as well as of the aristocracy. This is a question we are not going to discuss at present. Enough to say, that there is much to be affirmed on both sides, and when time serves, we shall advance our own argument, and with a bold pen.

The past representations have been, on Wednesday night, Fidelio; on Thursday, Barbiere; and last night, Sonnambula; and to-night, a pot-pourri will be given for the terminating performance. It will be seen that Cruvelli, since Madame Barbieri Nini left the theatre, has been not only the mainstay of the establishment, but the sole-stay. Indeed, upon her shoulders the whole weight and responsibility of the performances have fallen. But Cruvelli has risen with the importance of her trust. Whether it be that singing every night has given her voice more power and flexibility we cannot say, but most assuredly we never heard her sing so magnificently as she has the last five or six nights. Her Fidelio on Wednesday by many degrees surpassed all her previous efforts, so much so, indeed, that Balfe was heard to express his astonishment and delight in terms not to be mistaken at the end of the opera. In the Barbiere, too, on Thursday—Cruvelli's Rosina does not, however, thoroughly satisfy us: a little more Rossini, and a little less Cruvelli would be more acceptable—she sang the "Una voce"—in her way—and "Rode's air"—a daring and delicate attempt after Sontag—so splendidly as to elicit loud and unanimous encores. Her Sonnambula last night was finer and better sung than ever, and excited more enthusiasm than on any former occasion; and in short, Cruvelli has done more for herself by these extra nights than during the whole anterior part of the season. The Exhibition nights have turned out particularly fortunate for the young and gifted artist. Without them, her Amina—a character in which her powers and capabilities have been more satisfactorily demonstrated than in any other, not excepting Fidelio—would not have been seen and heard. We do not say that Cruvelli's Amina is a more highly finished and artistic performance than Fidelio, but that there being more scope to judge of the former by comparison, people were more capable of forming an estimate of its superiority, and awarding it its true distinction. Be this as it may, Cruvelli is a greater favorite than ever with the public, and improves her position nightly.

Her Majesty's Theatre, we repeat, will positively close to night.

Dramatic Intelligence.

HAYMARKET.—On Wednesday, a crowded and most fashionable audience, among whom we noticed some of the most distinguished literary men of the day, assembled within the walls of this theatre to testify their respect for the lessee, Mr. Benjamin Webster, who took his benefit upon the occasion: Few managers deserve so well of the public as Mr. Webster, and few men have laboured so strenuously and successfully in their behalf. Before Mr. Webster took the Haymarket Theatre, it had long since fallen from its high estate, and if it continued to exist, it was simply by living on its former reputation, as sick people sometimes do on their fat. Persons went, and paid their money, to be ennuyé by the air of dingy dullness which pervaded the place, simply because they recollected that the Colmans had once presided there, and

"You may break, you may shiver the vase as you will,
The scent of the roses will cling to it still."

Such was the state of things when Mr. Webster assumed the management, and, in his very first season, restored the theatre to its former high position. We are not going to give a history of Mr. Webster's reign as a manager, as our space will not allow it; we will merely observe, that since he assumed the reigns of government, he has never once relaxed his endeavours; no difficulties could ever daunt or make him swerve from the course he had chalked out; and the consequence is, that although he has had to contend with a variety of ephemeral attractions that at various periods have taken the Londoners by storm, and bear up against a sort of apathetic indifference to dramatic affairs, which was almost universal some year or two ago, he has at last received a substantial reward in the receipts of the present season, and a proof of respect, in the attendance on Wednesday, for the great services that he has incontestably rendered the English stage. The character selected by Mr. Webster was "Tartuffe." We have delivered our opinions on his forcible yet delicate rendering of the character so often and so lately, that we refrain from doing so on the present occasion, and will merely add that his performances elicited repeated marks of the most hearty applause. The house was densely crowded.

ST. JAMES'S.—The Bateman prodigies still continue to attract great audiences to this theatre. Last Monday was produced the comedy of "Sweethearts and Wives," or rather a portion of it, for the benefit of the little Ellen, who played Billy Lackaday. The manner in which she entered into the character was really astonishing, and we are convinced that she acts, not from mere teaching, as a parrot speaks, but from a thorough appreciation of the grotesque and ridiculous, an appreciation implanted in her by nature itself. We have now witnessed the performances of these gifted children some dozen times, and have come to the conclusion that no schooling and tutoring in the world could produce such astounding results, unless the little girls had a peculiarly formed intelligence to receive, as well as a memory to retain, the lessons of their instructor. A child may be made to repeat a certain number of words with a certain emphasis, and go through a scene with a certain number of gestures learned before hand, but it is only one child out of a million who can understand what all these things really mean, and such a child is Kate Bateman, and such a child her sister Ellen. To all who have not already seen the two little girls, we say, lose no time in doing so, for when they are once gone, it will be long, very long, before you will ever have the chance of seeing such another "Young Couple."

PUNCH'S PLAYHOUSE.—We were led to suppose by the title of a new farce, "The Alderman's Gown," produced here last Monday, that we should enjoy a hearty laugh, more particularly as the bills told us the scene was laid in Boulogne,

A.D. 1851. We were, however, disappointed—miserably disappointed—a more common-place, flimsy, extravagant, and absurd concoction than “The Alderman’s Gown,” we never saw, and would strongly advise the management to withdraw it as soon as possible.

SURREY ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.—The concerts and other evening amusements here, terminated for the season on yesterday sennight. The Gardens have reaped their full share of the golden harvest which the Exhibition has brought with it, the number of visitors during the height of the season having exceeded twenty thousand daily. Jullien and his unrivalled band have been the main musical feature, but the judicious introduction of vocal music has given a grace and variety to the selections which has materially aided their attraction. We have before alluded to the pleasing effect of the music in these gardens, which is no doubt aided by the acoustical construction of the orchestra, the large open space in front of it, and the sheet of water (a well known conductor of sound). These causes aided by the very efficient way in which the selections have been performed, have given the music here a more than ordinary share of attraction. Mr. Leffler and the other gentlemen contrived to give as much point and effect to the glees, catches and part songs as such ephemera are capable of producing. The songs have been confided chiefly to Miss Messent, than whom there are few more graceful and neat interpreters of our national ballads, in which our musical England has got so much to say for itself. The Art has nothing more simple in form than these melodies, yet Miss Messent imparts both variety and depth to their expression, especially in the Scotch songs, in which the dialect as well as melody admit of a quaintness and latitude of interpretation of which the fair artiste avails herself with great adroitness. Among the pieces received with most favor during the last week was the “Giselle Polka,” of Mr. D. Godfrey, a well written and sparkling dance, which has only to be heard to become a general favorite. We would recommend, in future arrangements, an enlargement of the orchestra, the introduction of stringed instruments, and the performance of full instrumental pieces. A symphony of Haydn or Mozart would give a vis poetica to the gardens that could not fail to raise them another step in public esteem.

Reviews of Music.

THE AMATEUR ORGANIST, A COLLECTION OF VOLUNTARIES FOR ORGAN OR PIANO—VOL. I.—EDWARD TRAVIS. Lee and Coxhead.

To the amateur organists, a very numerous and intelligent class of the musical dilettanti, and, by reason of the instrument of their choice, a class whose appreciation must naturally be refined and elevated by the study and contemplation of the serious works of the great composers of sacred music, we could not offer a more useful and comprehensive digest of the numberless beauties of these favourite composers than the present collection of voluntaries, by Mr. Travis, who, in the accomplishment of his labour, has demonstrated an universal acquaintance with the best models an admirable judgment in selecting materials for the object in hand, and extreme taste in their arrangement for the noble instrument to which they are especially devoted. The only fault we can possibly find with the pieces of which this book of voluntaries is composed is their brevity, which, however, is not only the most easily excused of faults, but, in the present instance, becomes inevitable, since the purpose of Mr. Travis is simply to furnish amateurs with short, agreeable, and sensible pieces of music to perform as voluntaries, whereby, not only the ears of their audience may be ravished, but their own musical feeling guided into the right channel, and fed upon wholesome repast. There are some few more lengthy extracts, in the shape of sundry of the great choruses of Handel—among others, “The horse and his rider,” “Fixed in His everlasting seat,” “Thou art the King of Glory,” Haydn’s air, “Now vanish,” from the Creation, &c., &c., the “Hallelujah” from Beethoven’s Mount of Olives, a “Gloria” of Mozart’s from the Twelfth Mass, &c., &c., which extend to four, five, and even six pages; but there are exceptions, the majority of the selections consisting of one, two, or three pages. The volume is divided into six books, each containing about twenty pieces, and each book may be had separately.

The extraordinary variety of this selection may be judged of from the following list of names, all of which are pressed into the service by Mr. Travis:—Handel, Bach (J. S.), Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Spohr, Corelli, Pleyel (Ignace), Rinck, Haumann, Weber, Rode, Hesse (Adolphe), Hummel, Gemioiani, Keller (Max), Marsh, Haydn (Michael), Gretry, Himmel, Green, Müller (J. A.), Caldara, Kent, Defesch, Arne, Scott (who is Scott?), Schneider (F.), Battiskill, Long (who is Long?), Boyce, Moreira (L. E. A. L.), Marcello, Winter, Graun, and, last not least, Mr. Travis himself, who has modestly confined his contributions to a short interlude, in D, of three lines, so good of its kind, that we should have preferred it in three pages. The entire volume comprises 223 pages, and the number of pieces 123, consisting principally of short adagios and andantes, marches and minuets, preludes and the themes of airs, fragments of choruses, choruses entire, &c., &c., a collection almost unequalled in richness and variety, and worth at least double the price (18 shillings) affixed. We recommend the work with confidence.

In the second volume, which we presume Mr. Travis intends to follow the first speedily, we suggest to his consideration a list of composers whom he has overlooked in the first, from whose works, nevertheless, may be gathered a rich harvest of gems, precisely suited to the object in view, and easily falling into the shape of voluntaries. The names are,—MENDELSSOHN, DUSSEK, CLEMENTI, Steibelt, CHERUBINI, PALESTRINA, Bishop, Balle, Sterndale Bennett, Macfarren, Barnett (John), Rossini, Meyerbeer, Auber, Piccini, Cimarosa, GLUCK, PAESIELLO, JOMELLI, WOLFF, REISIGER, Schubert, Marschen, Weigl, BOELDIKU, Herold, Bellini, Donizetti, Loder (Edward), PURCELL, Croft, Horsley (Charles), PERGOLESI, Paer, Meyer (Simon), MEHUL, Kalliwooda, Pinto, Potter, Crotch, Scarlatti, Paradies, Adam (not Adolphe), Cramer (J. B.), Gossec, Lesueur, Lulli, Mercadante, Smart (Henry), Mudie, Spontini, &c., &c., which will be enough until volume three is announced, when we may have another list in preparation.

The book is neatly got up, strongly and handsomely bound, and printed with great clearness and beauty of type. If volume 1 of Mr. Travis’s “Amateur Organist” meet with half the success it deserve, and which we confidently predict for it, the demand for volume 2 will be urgent and unanimous.

“A SET OF SONGS AND TRIO FOR FEMALE VOICES”—English Version by THOMAS OLIPHANT, Esq.—Music by GIACOMO MEYERBEER. Cramer, Beale, and Co.

The variety and richness of Messrs. Cramer and Beale’s catalogue is hardly more to be admired than the rapidity with which the publications successively issue from the hands of their army of engravers. The name of Meyerbeer would add strength and value to the strongest and most valuable of catalogues; and therefore adds strength and value to the already unusual strength and value of the catalogue of Messrs. Cramer and Beale. Although none of these songs is absolutely new, at least none of the eight out of fourteen with which Messrs. Cramer and Beale furnished us, all of them are welcome, if not merely for their intrinsic merit and beauty, for the name they bear. Meyerbeer is a myth, by which we would signify, one who does not write merely for the day; and even in trifles of less moment than the songs before us it is evident that the sincere love of his art leads him to employ all his knowledge and all his taste in finishing them so as to satisfy the most fastidious judgment. The names of the songs under examination are:—No. 1. “May Song” (Mailed); No. 3. “The Monk” (Der Mönch); No. 6. “My Heart’s Garden” (Der Garten des Herzens); No. 7. “Barcarolle” (Lied des Venezianischen Gondolier’s); No. 9. “She and I” (Sie und Ich); No. 10. “The Young Mother” (An Eine Junge Mutter); No. 12. “Sabbath Song” (Sontagslied); No. 14. “Song of Thanksgiving,” Trio, (Kindergebet). All the above songs are gems in their way, and we can recommend them unhesitatingly to our readers.

"ORPHEUS"—No. 17.—FOUR VOCAL QUARTETS FOR MALE VOICES—F. MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLODY. Ewer and Co.

We have before stated the design of this publication, and praised it for its utility and general interest. The present number is one of the most interesting of the whole collection. We scarcely know which most to admire of the four quartets, which are not only signalised by the rich and tasteful harmony for which Mendelssohn is always distinguished, but by a simplicity and freshness of melody admirably adapted to the "Table-song," as the Germans entitle the glee. The style of No. 1, "The Merry Wayfarer," in E, is light and sparkling; No. 2, in D, "Farewell Meeting," is bold and animated; No. 3, is a graceful serenade in B flat; and No. 4, in E, a spirited musical illustration of Goethe's "Drinking Song."

They are all gems and all worthy of Mendelssohn, to whose leisure moments we owe so many exquisite trifles, vocal and instrumental.

We cannot, perhaps, serve the purposes of Messrs. Ewer and Co. better than by giving their own printed statement of the scope and intention of the present publication, so aptly called "Orpheus":—

"In submitting this work to the musical world, the publishers beg to say a few words respecting the form in which it appears. Taking into consideration the high state of excellence to which glee-singing has arrived in this country, it is surprising that the compositions of our German neighbours, in that style of music, should continue so little known. The object of the publishers has been to enable amateurs to form an acquaintance with the glees of Weber, Spohr, Kreutzer, Blum, Eisenhofer, Werner, and others, the style of which is so widely different to what singers of English glees have been accustomed. In order to do this in the cheapest possible manner, they have printed them in the present form (after the German fashion), in preference to score, as usually practised in England, as it enables eight to sing with the same comfort, and for the same expense, as two from a score.

"The intention of the publishers is to continue, in future numbers (which will appear at intervals), to make their selection from composers whose names are in the highest estimation in Germany; and when the cheapness of the work is considered, they have no doubt of its being encouraged by an extensive circulation."

We strongly recommend this publication to Messrs. Land, H. Phillips, and their travelling glee parties, who appear to be reaping as large an amount of success in the provinces as they did in London.

"THE DRAWING-ROOM WALTZES"—Composed and Arranged for the Pianoforte, by J. Tomlinson. Metzler and Co.

A very neat and sparkling set, well marked, well-contrasted, and well-adapted for dancing. If not strikingly original, the "Drawing-room Waltzes" are, nevertheless, as new as might be expected.

UNIVERSAL PSALMODY.—T. H. TOMLINSON.—Metzler and Co.

This publication contains upwards of one hundred and seventy psalm and hymn tunes of various metres, to be used in public or private, with fifty double chants. It is particularly valuable from the fact that it comprises the whole of the psalm and hymn tunes extant in the Churches in York, re-arranged with harmonies suitable to the rhythm and character of the subjects. The work also includes a number of hymn tunes which have long been favourites at St. Saviour's, where they have been used from the original MSS, and a number of new tunes by composers of eminence, which will be found fitting associates for the old standard tunes so long in use in our Churches. Altogether Mr. Tomlinson's "Psalmody" is one of the most complete ever published. Instead of requiring three or four works as heretofore, the one under notice will be found to contain every necessary tune for the psalms and hymns used in Churches. The chants, fifty in number, are many of them old favourites with our Church congregations; whilst they who seek after novelties will here find a rich store of new compositions. The work is equally adapted for the pianoforte and the organ, and will be found a valuable auxiliary for either public or private worship. The profits of the entire edition Mr. Tomlinson has liberally determined to devote towards the restoration of the Church of St. Saviour's,—in which Church he has for many years been organist.

Provincial.

MONMOUTH, OCT. 3.—On Monday evening Miss Rachael Evans's concert took place at the Town-Hall, before a respectable and numerous audience. The programme embraced a judicious selection of pieces, and Miss Evans was assisted by artistes of ability. After the National Anthem, Miss Haywood and Miss Reeves sang a duet, "Greeting," of Mendelssohn, with considerable taste. Miss Haywood is a well educated vocalist, who possesses a voice of depth and richness of tone, which she manages with judgment. Miss Reeves is young; her voice is of great compass, her intonation good. Her rendering of the cavatina, "Prendi per me," by De Beriot, was excellent. Miss Evans was hailed, on her appearance, with repeated greetings. The first medium for the display of Miss Evans' talents as a pianist, was Hummel's Concerto in E, which was performed with cleverness and brilliancy of fingering. The approval of the audience was loudly expressed. The next attractive production was the singing lesson, by Miss Reeves and Mr. Frank Bodda, which was remarkably well done. In this, and Rossini's bustling "Largo al Factotum," (both of which were encored), Mr. Bodda found himself quite at home. His rendering of "L'usato Arditi," from Semiramide, with Miss Haywood and Miss Reeves, was also very good. The second part commenced with, "Hark, 'tis the Indian Drum," by Miss Reeves, Mr. Jones, and Mr. Bodda, of which the audience expressed great approbation. Mr. Jones' voice is a counter-tenor. Mr. Jones' and Miss Haywood's duet, "Rose softly blooming," was among the best things of the evening. Miss Reeves sang "By Isca's stream in days of yore," in a manner which gave unanimous satisfaction, and crowned her efforts by "Nou piu mesta," which drew applause and "bravos." Miss Evans played the rondo brillante in B minor of Mendelssohn, and a fantasia on Lucia di Lammermoor, in the latter of which she was encored. Mr. Bodda's "Sally," and the "Widow Macree," of Lover, evinced a vein of humour, and the "Gypsies' Laughing Glee," by all the vocalists, sent people home in good spirits, after the enjoyment of an innocent pleasure, which cheers us in the toils of life's journey, and flings flowers over its dreariness.—Monmouthshire Merlin.

NORTHAMPTON—(From our own Correspondent.)—The first grand concert of a series of six, announced by the Northampton Musical Society, came off on Thursday evening; and, if we may judge by the liberal applause bestowed upon the different performances, to the perfect satisfaction of the very numerous and highly respectable audience assembled in the noble Music Hall in our new Corn Exchange. It would be unfair to criticise too minutely where the greater portion of the performers are amateurs; suffice it, therefore, to say, that from the specimen of the talent exhibited on Thursday evening, we lead ourselves to hope that Northampton may yet take, at an early period, a very high standing in the musical world. The principal artistes engaged were the Misses Pyne (vocalists), and Mr. H. Nicholson (solo flute), who all sustained the high reputation they have so deservedly acquired. We must also notice the very efficient aid rendered in the orchestral pieces by the members of His Grace the Duke of Rutland's Private Band. The encores during the evening were very numerous, commencing with Mr. Nicholson's flute solo, and followed up no less than six different times in the songs, duets, &c., of the Misses Pyne. To the Committee of the Society, with Mr. G. Shepherd at their head, the best thanks of the musical public of this town are due, for their indefatigable exertions to promote this series of concerts, and we sincerely hope they will receive that patronage and support they so eminently deserve.

MANCHESTER.—The Theatre Royal opened on Saturday with a series of operatic performances, the orchestra under the direction of Edward Loder. The opera was Sonnambula, supported by Madame Clara Novello, Mr. Whitworth, Sims Reeves, and Miss Susan Kenneth. The Elisir d'Amore was played on Tuesday, the principal artists being Miss Rebecca Isaacs, Herr Stigelli, and Mr. Whitworth.

MUSICAL EDUCATION IN ENGLAND,

IN THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY, AND IN THE NINETEENTH.

The boasted superiority of the present age may be questioned, in various branches of human knowledge, as well as in many habits of social life. There is no doubt that music was more generally cultivated in England in the sixteenth century than now. In the days of Elizabeth, knowledge of the principles of music, and skill in its practice, were diffused among all classes of society with any pretensions to a liberal education, that any lady or gentleman who betrayed ignorance of the art was looked upon as being low-bred, and unfit to make a decent figure in respectable company. That this was the case, appears from innumerable passages in old plays, and afford views of the society and manners of England in those days: and a curious evidence of the fact is to be found in Morley's celebrated treatise, entitled "A plaine and easie Introduction to Practical Musicke."

Thomas Morley, one of the most celebrated musicians of the sixteenth century, and the author of several of our finest Madrigals, was one of the Gentlemen of Queen Elizabeth's Chapel, and died about the year 1605. The above treatise not only became, for a long time, the standard manual of musical instruction in England, but acquired celebrity in foreign countries. Doni, the Italian historian and critic, who wrote about the middle of the seventeenth century, speaks of "Tommaso Morley, erudito musico Inglese." Morley's Treatise is divided into three parts.—the first teaches to sing; the second treats of Descant, or the method of composing or singing on a plain song—or, in other words, putting an additional part to the old and simple chants, or melodies, used in the churches; and the third explains the art of composition in three or more parts. "Each of the three parts of this book," says Sir John Hawkins, in his "History of Music," "is a several and distinct dialogue, wherein a master, his scholar, and a person completely skilled in music, are the interlocutors; and in the course of their conversation, so many little particulars occur relating to the manners of the times, as render the perusal of the book in a great degree entertaining even to those who are unacquainted with the subject of it." Of this kind is the passage to which we have already alluded, as showing the general diffusion of musical knowledge and skill in respectable society. It occurs at the commencement of the book. The speakers are Philomathes, a gentleman who desires to learn music; and Polymathes, his friend; and the dialogue opens thus:—

"Polymathes. Stay, brother Philomathes, what haste? Whither go you so fast?"

"Philomathes. To seek out an old friend of mine.

"Pol. But, before you go, I pray you tell me some of the discourses which you had yesternight at Master Sophobulus' banquet, for commonly he is not without both wise and learned guests.

"Phi. It is true, indeed. And yesternight there were a number of excellent scholars, both gentlemen and others: but all the purpose which then was discoursed upon was music.

"Pol. I trust you were contented to suffer others to speak of that matter.

"Phi. I would that that had been the worst; for I was compelled to discover mine own ignorance, and confess that I knew nothing at all in it.

"Pol. How so?"

"Phi. Among the rest of the guests, by chance, Master Aphron came thither also, who falling to discourse of Music, was in an argument so quickly taken up, and hotly pursued by Eudoxus and Calergus, two kinsmen of Sophobulus, as in his own art was overthrown. But he still sticking in his opinion, the two gentlemen requested me to examine his reasons, and confute them. But I refusing, and professing ignorance, the whole company condemned me of discourtesy, being fully persuaded that I was as skilful in that art as they took me to be learned in others. But supper being ended, and music-books, according to the custom, being brought to the table, the mistress of the house presented me with a part, earnestly requesting me to sing. But when, after many excuses, I protested unfeignedly that I could not, every one began to wonder, yea, some whispered to others, demanding how I was brought up. So that, upon shame of mine ignorance, I go now to seek mine old friend, Master Gnorinus, to make myself his scholar.

"Pol. I am glad you are at length come to be of that mind, though I wished it sooner. Therefore go, and I pray God send you such good success as you would wish to yourself."

What a change in the cultivation of music since the days of old Morley! To be sure, the state of things which he describes has not entirely disappeared, though few vestiges of it remain. Old-fashioned domestic and social circles are still to be found, where, after a cheerful supper, "the music books are laid upon the table," and the company recreate themselves in giving utterance to the rich and beautiful harmonies of the olden time. But such a pastime demands an extent of musical instruction very different from that which prevails in what is called genteel society. That most social of meals, the quiet and moderate supper, is no more. Summer is turned into winter, and day into night. The late and luxurious dinner is followed by the brilliant, but comfortless soirée, where people crowd together for the purpose of murdering time—an object in which, to judge from their languid and weary looks, they are very unsuccessful. Among the other modes of warfare against this great enemy, music is called into action. But what sort of music? One young lady, who has had what might be a decent patrimony spent on her musical education sits down to the piano and boldly attacks the last Fantasia of Thalberg; while another favours the company with an entirely new version of Grisi or Persiani's favourite bravura at the Opera-house. Their discordant efforts are lost amid the clatter of tongues; for it generally happens that the commencement of a piece of music is a signal for conversation, except, perhaps, to a few unfortunate persons, who, constrained by politeness, or other motives, listen, like Pope,

"With sad civility and an aching head," and load the fair exhibitor with a profusion of compliments, the extravagance of which is a cloak for their insincerity. It is not among the higher classes only that music is thus abused, and converted into a nuisance. Fashion has always a downward tendency. "The toe of the peasant," says Shakspeare, "galls the kibe of the courtier," and there is hardly any class of society in England, however humble, in which there are not attempts to emulate the modes and amusements current in the gilded saloons of the great.

Such was the state of music in England, as a branch of liberal education and a source of social enjoyment, in the sixteenth century; and such, in these respects, is its state in the nineteenth. Then, it was cultivated for its own sake, and for the pure and elevated enjoyment which it afforded; now it is cultivated as a vain and frivolous accomplishment, to be exhibited for the gratification of vanity. But we think we perceive signs of the approach of a better era. The English are essentially a musical people; and they are by no means characterised by a love of frivolity, even in their amusements. A desire for a solid musical instruction is on the increase, and a growing attention is paid to that branch of the art which, while it least of all ministers to personal vanity, is most conducive to real enjoyment—the practice of vocal harmony. And we hope the days may return, when, if any body moving in respectable society shall decline accepting one of the music-books laid on the table, the company will begin to wonder, and whisper to each other, demanding how he was brought up.

Miscellaneous.

VIVIER.—The celebrated quadruple cornist, the magician of the twisted brass, the king of crook wielders, the Behemoth of bell-holders, the leviathan of laugh-exciter, the humourist, homme d'esprit and de cœur, and boon companion, to whom the application of laudatory epithets in adjective form would be superfluous and banale, has returned from the Pyrenees, with renewed strength and health, to be the sought of all the seekers, the admiration and delight of society, noble, aristocratic, fashionable, artistic, and wealthy, during the winter months at Paris.

CARLOTTA GRISI.—On her route to St. Petersburg, the charming prima donna of the dance was arrested at Cologne by a somewhat original circumstance. The shoes which Carlotta Grisi wears on the stage were seized by the authorities at the Douane, on the plea that they were so small that it was impossible they could belong to her and they were about to retain them, doubting the identity of Carlotta Grisi the artist, and persisting in believing she was a marchande de souliers, passing through the country to dispose of her wares. Poor Commissioners!—they had never seen Carlotta dance, or they would have recognised a foot so small that even the glass slipper of Cinderella would have been spacious enough for two such. Carlotta Grisi, however, by putting on the shoes, soon convinced the Custom House Officers of their blunder, and having lost the train, lost the next boat at Stettin, and was obliged to remain several days at Berlin. The Emperor and Empress of all the Russias, however, who are very fond of Carlotta, treat her with the greatest consideration, and converse oftener and more familiarly with her than with any other artist, (besides making her magnificent presents), will pardon the late arrival of the "small footed lady," and have a hearty laugh at the contretemps.

MR. HANDEL GEAR the vocalist is about to pay a professional visit to the United States of America.

MR. EDWIN FORREST, the well known American tragedian, has returned to the stage.

JENNY LIND.—N. P. Willis has discovered that Jenny Lind has an imperfection! She cannot mount on horseback without a chair. Mr. Barnum lately informed Jenny that the "musical critics" of Boston intended to wait on her in a body. The Swede replied in her own expressive language, "Oh, no, Sir! I have been presented to Mayors, Senators, Governors, and lots of other bores, but really I cannot stand this." Barnum calmed her fears; he said, "It would not cost much to induce them to forget their intended visit."—Western News.

THE KING OF PRUSSIA allows yearly 250 dollars to the young violinist, Gross, 10 years old, during the term of studies.

VIEUXTEMPS has returned to St. Petersburg, where also Jules Schulhoff is now creating a furore by the elegance of his performance and his effective compositions. Amongst the latter his "Caprice sur des Airs Bohémiens" was mostly applauded.—St. Petersburg, Oct. 5, 1851.

AUGUST CONRADI has composed an opera entitled "Musa, the last Prince of the Moors." (Berlin.)

THE BIRTHDAY OF PROFESSOR RUNGENHAGEN in Berlin was lately celebrated by his numerous friends and the Singing Academy.

DR. KULLAK intends visiting London in the spring of next year, where he no doubt will be received with such honours as his distinguished talent merits.

CONRADIN KREUTZER's posthumous opera Aurelia, has been performed at Cassel on the birthday of the Grand Duke with moderate success.

DER WILDSCHUTZ, a favourite with the Berlin Public, by the late M. Lortzing, is to be played at the Opera House, Oct. 5.

RICHARDSON.—Our great little English flautist, we are delighted to inform our readers, has been appointed solo flautist to Her Majesty, and a member of the Queen's private band. No choice, we are sure, could have given more unanimous satisfaction. The appointment of Mr. Richardson is the more welcome since it indicates a desire on the part of Her Majesty to encourage and support the most eminent native talent.

RACHEL.—The Emperor of Russia will not permit Rachel to fulfil her engagements at Warsaw, because she has been guilty of chaunting the Marseillaise hymn.

DRURY LANE.—It appears that things are now in a more forward train, and that Mr. Bunn has in reality the theatre, and will open his operatic-pantomimic campaign for the winter months in January. Among the engagements already made we hear of that of the popular cantatrice of Her Majesty's Theatre, Madame Fiorntini, as prima donna, and of Mdle. Feller, the rising mezzo-soprano. There is also talk of Sims Reeves, but unless our great English tenor possessed "ubiquity like the birds," we cannot make out how he could appear at Manchester, London, and Paris at the same time. Balfé, however, it is positively stated, is writing an opera in which Sims Reeves is to take the principal tenor part, and as the gifted author of the Bohemian Girl is also we understand, writing an opera for Mr. Webster in conjunction with Dion Bourcicault, he will have his hands full.

ROGER, the celebrated Tenorist, left on the 27th Sept. for Dresden, and returned to Berlin on the 4th inst., at first to sing in a concert arranged by the Members of the Choir of the Grand Opera, the French romance of Ecuyer-pape, and the fourth act of Donizetti's La Favorita, with Mdle. Wagner. Afterwards he appeared in the Prophete and Robert le Diable.

MR. JAMES RUSSELL, the well-known ex-comedian, has been giving readings of Shakspeare at Monmouth.

ON THE EFFECTS ATTRIBUTED TO THE MUSIC OF THE ANCIENTS.—So many stories have been related by several of the most respectable historians and philosophers of Greece and Rome, concerning the moral, medicinal, and supernatural powers of ancient music, and the admirers of antiquity have so long read and revered all these narrations, that they are impressed with an extravagant idea of the excellence of ancient music which they are unwilling to relinquish. There can be no doubt but music has been productive of great good in softening the manners, promoting civilization, and humanizing men naturally savage and barbarous. An instance of the most striking kind is related by Polybius, in spea king of the Cynæthens, who, from being celebrated for their virtue and good qualities, became noted for the savage roughness of their lives and manners, and distinguished by their wickedness and cruelty above all the Greeks. The cause of this difference he attributes to their being the first and only people among the Arcadians, who threw away the institution which their ancestors had established for the promotion of natural genius, and the discipline and exercise of music. For music was at first established by the Arcadian government, not for the sake of vain pleasure and amusement, but for such solid purposes, as should engage them never to desert the practice of it, being to soften and improve their manners.—From T. H. Tomlinson's Lectures on Ancient Music.

Advertisements.

THE ROAD TO HEALTH!

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—Cure of a disordered Liver and Bad Digestion. Copy of a Letter from Mr. R. W. Kirkus, Chemist, 7, Prescott-street, Liverpool, dated 6th June, 1851. To Professor HOLLOWAY, Sir,—Your Pills and Ointment have stood the highest on our sale list of Proprietary Medicines for some years. A customer, to whom I can refer for any enquiries, desires me to let you know the particulars of her case. She had been troubled for five years with a disordered liver and bad digestion. On the last occasion, however, the virulence of the attack was so alarming, and the inflammation set in so severely, that doubts were entertained of her not being able to bear up under it; fortunately she was induced to try your Pills, and she informs me that after the first, and each succeeding dose, she had great relief. She continued to take them, and although she only used three boxes, she is now in the enjoyment of perfect health. I could have sent you many more cases, but the above, from the severity of the attack, and the speedy cure, I think speaks much in favour of your astonishing Pills.

(Signed)

R. W. KIRKUS.

These celebrated Pills are wonderfully efficacious in the following complaints:—

Ague	Constipation	Fevers of all kinds	Lumbago	Tie Douloseux
Asthma	the Bowels	Piles	Tumours
Bilious Com-	Consumption	Gout	Rheumatism	Ulcers
plaints	Debility.	Head-ache	Retention of Urine	Worms of all kinds
Blotches on the	Dropsy	Indigestion	Scrofula or King's Weakness, from whatever cause
Skin	Dysentery	Inflammation	Evil
Bowel complaints	Erysipelas	Jaundice	Sore Throats	&c., &c.
Colics	Female Irregu-	larity	Liver complaints	Stone & Gravel

Sold at the Establishment of Professor HOLLOWAY, 244, Strand (near Temple Bar), London, and by all respectable Druggists and Dealers in Medicines throughout the Civilized World, at the following prices—1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6½d., 11s., 21s., and 33s. each Box. There is a considerable saving by taking the larger sizes.

N.B.—Directions for the guidance of Patients in every Disorder are affixed to each Box.

SCHOTT AND CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

TENOR SOLO WITH ACCOMPANIMENT FOR PIANO.

Bessens, A. Souvenirs élégiaques 4s. 0d.

VIOLINCELLO SOLOS WITH ACCOMPANIMENT FOR PIANO.

Demunch, F. Op. 1, Fantaisie and Variations sur des Thèmes Russes 5s. 0d.
Pietti, Alfred. Op. 10, Amour et Caprice. Fantaisie... .. 4s. 0d.
 " " Op. 11, La Suedoise. Caprice sur des airs nationaux ... 3s. 6d.
 " " Op. 12, Divertissement sur un air Napolitain ... 3s. 6d.
Stainlein, Louis. Op. 4, Fantaisie caractéristique sur des motifs Hongrois ... 5s. 0d.
Servais, F. Op. 9, Fantaisie burlesque ou le Carnaval de Venise ... 5s. 0d.
 " " Op. 10, Souvenir de la Suisse. Caprice 4s. 6d.
 " " Op. Souvenirs épiques par Bessens 4s. 0d.

* May also be had with accompaniment for Orchestra or Quartett.

FLUTE SOLOS WITH ACCOMPANIMENT FOR PIANO.

Bricciardi, G. Op. 63, Deux Fleurs. Morceaux de Salon:
 No. 1, La Pensée 2s. 0d.
 No. 2, La Rose 3s. 0d.
Dencus, I. Op. 28, Le Carnaval de Venise de Servais 4s. 0d.
Oriner, A. Piece de Salon. Romance 2s. 6d.
Gabrielski, I. Ime. Fantaisie 4s. 0d.

Schott and Co., 89, St. James's street.

FAIRY VISIONS,

Price 2s.

MESSRS. KAUFMAN and SON, of Dresden, who have performed before Her Majesty the Queen by special command at Buckingham Palace, have given concerts at Manchester and Liverpool with the greatest success, and have specially engaged Miss Rebecca Isaacs, who introduced her celebrated song, "Fairy Visions," in which she completely took the audience by surprise, this song being well suited to her refined and beautiful voice; she met with the most enthusiastic encore. The fairy like manner in which the words were expressed will render "Fairy Visions" the most popular song of the season.

LXX & COXHEAD, 48, Albemarle-street, where may be had "We're Messengers from Fairy Land," Duet for two Sopranos, price 2s. 6d.

MESSRS. COCKS & CO.'S

NEW MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

NEW PIANO MUSIC, by BRINLEY RICHARDS:—The Angel's Song and the Vision, each 2s.; the Sturm Marsch Galop, the Ash Grove, the Rising of the Lark, and Poor Mary Anne, each 3s.

CHURCH MUSIC.—Just Published, A COLLECTION OF NINETY THREE CHANTS, for the use of the United Church of England and Ireland, compiled by JOHN BISHOP, of Cheltenham, with copious Introductory Remarks. Vocal score, with organ accompaniment, price 1s. 4d.

HAMILTON'S MODERN INSTRUCTIONS for the PIANO-FORTE, twenty-second edition, fingered by CZERNY, 4s. "The veriest child may learn from Hamilton's book. The instructions are more like the oral communication of a person conversing with the learner than like the essays of bookmakers."—Vide Berwick Warder.

TO THE HEADS OF SCHOOLS, &c.—STEPHEN GLOVER'S VOCAL DUETS:—The Midnight Moon, The Murmuring Sea, The Echo Duet, A Voice from the Waves, Why do you Watch the Lone Lone Deep? Voices of the Night, Tell me where do Fairies Dwell? The Two Forest Nymphs, The Gipsy Countess, Tell me where is Beauty Found? Happy Days, Peaceful Nights, Music and her Sister Song, There is a Sweet Wild Rose, and his lovely duet What are the Wild Waves saying? Each 2s. 6d. and 3s.

NEW MUSIC by COMETTANI, for the PIANOFORTE.—March Bohemian, Spanish Chant, Rayonet les Ombres, St. Patrick's Day, La Brabançonne, La Marsellaise, God Preserve the Emperor, Russian Hymn, Christina Polka, La Fée des Nuits Polka, Exhibition Polka, Souvenir des Gisors, L'Aeride Etude, Schottisch, La Vision Redowa, Carnaval de Venise, Fantasia Orientale, God Save the Queen, Rule Britannia, La Chinoise Etude, Exhibition Galop, Eoline Etude, Pettis Oiseaux, three Valses Elegantes, Gabrielle, Etude de Velocite. Each 2s., 2s. 6d., and 3s.

London: Messrs. R. Cocks & Co., New Burlington-street, Publishers to the Queen.

N.B.—Now ready, gratis and postage free, Part IX. of their Catalogue of New Music, ditto of their elegant Pianofortes.

BLUMENTHAL'S NEW PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

FLURS EMBLEMATIKES:

No. 1, Primavera 4s. 0d.
 " 2, Violette 3s. 0d.
 " 3, Rose 3s. 0d.
 " 4, Romanin 3s. 6d.
 " 5, Pensée 2s. 6d.
 " 6, Heliotrope 3s. 6d.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent-street.

MUSIC FOR THE ORGAN OR HARMONIUM.

THE AMATEUR ORGANIST—a collection of soft and full Voluntaries, arranged in six Books, 3s. each, by EDWARD TRAVIS, and may be had elegantly bound, price 18s. "Mr. Travis has introduced to the musical world a new and interesting work for the Organ or Harmonium, under the title of 'The Amateur Organist.' Mr. Travis has availed himself of an extensive and classical music library, and selected with great taste the most beautiful morceaux of the great masters, Foreign and English. To lovers of classical music this work will be found to be the most superb selection that has ever issued from the musical press."—Vide Musical Review.

THE AMATEUR INTERLUDIST—a collection of short Interludes to play between the Verses of the Psalms, in one Book, price 4s., by EDWARD TRAVIS and J. P. DYER.

THE AMATEUR PRELUDIST—a collection of Preludes, with the Organ Stops carefully marked, in one Book, price 4s., by EDWARD TRAVIS.

SACRED VOCAL MUSIC.

KELLER'S Collection of ANTHEMS, CHURCH SERVICES, CHANTS, &c., arranged for the Voice and Piano, in six Books, price 3s. each, with six beautiful and appropriate designs by Brandar, arranged by ALBERT KELLER. The six Books can be had in one Volume, elegantly bound, price 18s.

THE PSALMODIA BRITANNICA—a selection of Psalms and Hymns for the Voice and Organ, in six Books, price 3s. each, arranged by EDWIN FLOOD, and may be had in one Volume, neatly bound, price 18s.

London: LXX & COXHEAD, 48, Albemarle-street, and can be had of all Book and Musicellers.

N.B.—A New Edition of "Hark, the Sabbath Bells," by Edwin Flood.

JOULE'S DIRECTORIUM CHORI ANGLICANUM.

Second Edition, price 1s., in cloth 1s. 6d.

THE most complete Choral Service book that has yet appeared. Dedicated by permission to the Lord Bishop of Manchester. For highly favourable reviews see "Christian Remembrancer," "Theologian," "Parish Choir," &c. &c. London: J. A. Novello.

A few copies of the quarto edition, price 15s., still on hand.

TEDESCO'S PIANOFORTE WORKS.

PUBLISHED BY WESSEL & Co.

Premier Nocturne	2s. 6d.
"The Cottage"	2s. 6d.
"True Love," { Three German	2s. 0d.
"Melodies"	3s. 0d.
"Loreley," { Three Etudes	2s. 6d.
"Les Etoiles," { de Concert	3s. 0d.
"Le Torrent," { Three Etudes	2s. 0d.
"The Curfew," { de Concert	3s. 0d.
"Passe," second Nocturne	2s. 0d.
"Scène Russe," Caprice brilliant	4s. 0d.
"Farwell," { Three German	2s. 0d.
"Faithfulness," { Melodies,	2s. 0d.
"Adieu,"	2s. 6d.
"L'Adieu de Mozart,"	3s. 6d.

The above are Copyright.

Wessel & Co., 229, Regent-street, London.

THE POPULAR SONG OF THE DAY.

"TALK OF HIM THAT'S FAR AWAY," composed by THOMAS CHANTREY. A new edition of which is just issued, may be had at ADDISON & HOLLIER'S, 210, Regent-street, London. For simplicity, elegance, and originality of melody, it is unrivalled.

Also, by the same author. "Why wilt thou not love?" and "The dream is past."

GREAT DISCOVERY IN HARMONY.

Now ready, price 5s.

THE PRINCIPLES OF NATURAL HARMONY, being a Perfect System founded upon the discovery of the True Sansonic Scale, by J. J. HAITE. London, Published by the Author, 76, Leadenhall-street. To be had of Messrs. Ewer and Co., Newgate-street, and Messrs. Cocks and Co., New Burlington-street.

THE "CLIPPER," OR REGATTA POLKA.

By J. G. CALLCOTT,

AUTHOR of the "Elfin Polka," "Queen of the Night Waltzes," &c., is now ready at Cramer, Beale, and Co.'s, 201, Regent-street, with an illustration of the American schooner. Price 2s.

Printed and Published for the Proprietor by MICHAEL SAMUEL MYERS, of No. 3, Sudley Road, Clapham Road, Clapham, in the parish of Lambeth, at the office of MYERS & Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, in the parish of St. Paul, where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed, post paid To be had of G. Purkers, Dean Street 8 ho; Allen, Warwick Lane; Vickers, Holywell Street, and at all Booksellers.—Saturday, October 11, 1851.

The Musical World.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s.; Half year, 8s.; Three Months, 4s.; (Stamped Copies 1s. per Quarter extra, payable in advance, to be forwarded by Money Order, to the Publishers, Myers & Co., 22, Tavistock-st., Covent Garden).

No. 42.—VOL. XXIX.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 18, 1851.

Price Fourpence.
Stamped Fivepence.

PROSPECTS OF A NATIONAL OPERA.

DAY by day the anticipations formed by the prospects of a National Opera have faded away and vanished into thin air, and now we scarcely ever hear the subject mentioned even in casual conversation, much less mooted, argued and discussed in private meeting or in public print. Even our own correspondents, so fiery and sanguine a few weeks back, so eager to uphold their individual opinions, and so ready to embark in the speculation—constituted according to their own suggestions—have laid aside their pens, and deliver themselves no longer to hints, surmises, meditations, probabilities, issues, and accomplishments. Are therefore the prospects of a National Opera dead, and shall we lay aside our labors in its behalf, because others are faint of heart and scant of hope? Not while there are in the country poets to write, musicians to compose, and audiences to approve. While Paris has three theatres solely devoted to the purposes of the national lyric drama, it may be asked, why has not London one? Does this most unaccountable circumstance arise from the dearth of composers and singers? Certainly not. Among composers have we not Balfe, Matfarren, Loder, John Barnett, Henry Smart, Frank Mori, and others, whom, no doubt, opportunity would force into existence? Except Auber among the French, and we have no hesitation in awarding the palm of superiority to our own composers. It cannot, therefore, be that our National Opera fails from want of writers of opera. In singing, it must be owned, that the French are vastly our superiors. They have better schools of teaching, provide better instructors, pay more attention to the pupils, and have altogether a higher notion of the art. At the Academie Royale if a pupil give indication of a good voice, his attention is especially directed to singing. In our English schools counterpoint and composition appear to be the end and aim of musical indoctrination. It is generally considered by teachers in this country that no singer can arrive at any height in his profession unless he is a first rate musician. This is an error which the history of art clearly indicates beyond the possibility of refutation. Among those singers who knew, or know, little or nothing of music, we may adduce Catalani, Pasta, Ambrogetti, Donzelli, Rubini, Tamburini, Ronconi, Grisi, Alboni, and a host of other celebrities. There are great exceptions certainly, such as Malibran and Jenny Lind; but they are few and far between, and only confirm the rule. In fact, a thorough knowledge of music is not essential to the constitution of a good singer. That such, certainly, would prove of the greatest service to a vocalist no one can deny; but as so much time must be expended in gaining a clear and profound insight into its mysteries and arcana, it is evident, if a pupil have to make his bread by singing he had much better pay attention to his sol fa than endeavour to fathom and penetrate the depths and labyrinths of so abstruse a science.

At the present time, however, some few of our native singers may compete with the best which France can produce; but they, it must be observed, have been taught in Italy. They are, as our readers have already surmised, Catherine Hayes, Clara Novello, and Sims Reeves. From our native-taught vocalists we may select Miss Louisa Pyne (by the way, instructed for a space on the continent), Miss Bassano (instructed for a space on the continent), Miss Birch (instructed for a space on the continent), Miss Dolby (purely indigenous), Miss Poole (ditto), and others; Mr. William Harrison, Mr. Allen, Mr. Whitworth (by the way, instructed for a space on the continent), and others, well adapted to lend lustre, in their varied and several brilliancies, to a National Opera. Therefore it cannot be for lack of native talent in singing that we possess no lyric drama of our own.

When first, some seventeen or eighteen moons since, or, by'r lady, thereabouts, a National Opera was contemplated, it was resolved by a select few, with closed doors, that the managing directors should consist of eight members—namely, two poets to write the books, two musicians to compose the music, two publishers to sell the works and make all the money, and the other two to be manager and treasurer. When this monstrous monopoly was brought to light it frightened speculation from its propriety, and helped to turn the whole thing into ridicule. The National Opera died in select committee, with closed doors, and never passed beyond the circle of the two poets, the two musicians, the two publishers, the manager, and the treasurer. But from the ashes of this Phoenix arose another bird of gay plumage and bright promise. A second enterprise was started—a second view taken—a second committee called. The idea of restricting the composition and publishing of the works to the members was scouted. Oligarchy yielded to democracy, and everybody was invited to constitute himself part of the government—if in possession of money the more welcome. But as too many cooks spoil the broth in cooking, by a parity of reasoning, too many musicians were likely to spoil the National Opera in composing—and so it turned out. The republican form of government was found as difficult to establish as the oligarchic, and the idea of a National Opera was again knocked on the head. The republicans, though they went farther than the oligarchists, did not go far enough. They wanted to confine the National Opera to works of native authors and composers, to native singers, native fiddlers and other strings, native wood and brass, native drums, native cymbals, native triangles, and a native conductor. They should have carried the absurdity to its true height, and prescribed native gut, native resin, and a native audience, above all, as indispensable.

And now Mr. Bunn is about to open Drury Lane as what he calls "the Real National Opera," with works of all composers, interpreted by artists of all nations, in English—as good as may be obtained. And such, after all, is the idea of a "National Opera" all over the world. In the Grand Opera of Paris, the Academie Royale, the real National Theatre, no foreigner is refused admittance, provided he exhibit talent to deserve it; and accordingly we find the works of Italian, German, and English musicians received there without preference or distinction. Rossini and Meyerbeer have sustained the fortunes of the great French Lyric Theatre no less than Boieldieu and Auber, and genius alone is the open sesame to its portals.

The Parisians have three lyric theatres devoted to French works—or works in the French language, and London at this moment does not possess one.* We are at length about to possess an "English Opera" at Drury Lane, and Mr. Bunn may convert the term if he please into "National Opera." We shall wait until Drury Lane opens, before we hazard any remarks as to the prospects of the theatre under the new management. One thing is clear, that unless novelty be combined with excellence, the manager may anticipate a disastrous failure. The two Italian Operas have made the London musical public familiar with the best music and the best artists; and if they cannot obtain that, they must have the next best. With this Mr. Bunn can furnish them, and will, if he possess as much foresight as enterprise.

CLOSING OF THE GREAT EXHIBITION.

The opening of the Great Exhibition of All Nations was ushered in with smiles and sunshine; its going out was accompanied with tears and darkness. All nature seemed to weep over the sudden extinguishing of the mightiest and most splendid palace that ever shone out of the records of Arab tale or fairy lore. The sun disdained to shine that day, and hid himself within his chamber of clouds. He would not countenance with his lordly gaze the desecration of a temple that courted, not forbade his beams, and where for five months and upwards he had been permitted to wander unblinded, save at fiercest noon, through aisle and walk, and channel, and chamber, and gallery. In homely phrase, Wednesday, the official day of closing, was one of the wettest of the whole year. The rain fell in torrents all day, and the streets and roads were deluged with water. Nor was there a single glimpse of sunshine from morning to night.

* The Haymarket, although it gives operatic performances, must be excepted; it is not devoted to opera.

Nothing could be more gloomy or disheartening than the appearance presented outside by the Crystal Palace. The flags on high hung damp and lifeless beside their standards. Not a flutter was observed among them, and their colours seemed to have vanished for ever. The splendours of the crystal walls were dimmed by the rain, and reflected back no quivering lines and patches of light. Richard Cœur de Lion was out of his element; the anthracite specimens gained a sickly transparency; and even the new life-boats with their barrels to preserve humanity fresh had lost all interest for speculation. Cabs and carriages added some life to the murky scene. They rolled hither and thither, the coachmen coated and caped, the horses heavy and halting, evidently having forgotten all about the wet season, and wondering at the cause of mid-day gloom and slanting rain.

The inside, however, afforded a different aspect. There all was at least comfortable if not brilliant, and if the sun refused to shed his light, the splendour and magnificence of the surrounding objects could not be concealed even in his partial eclipse. All the doors, including the exit doors, except those at the south entrance, were opened at ten, and closed at half-past eleven. The doors at the south entrance were reserved exclusively for Her Majesty's Commissioners, the Foreign and Local Commissioners, and the lady Exhibitors.

At twelve o'clock precisely His Royal Highness Prince Albert, with the Royal Commissioners, took their seats in the centre of the transept, when the first verse of the National Anthem was sung by the choir of the Sacred Harmonic Society, under the direction of Dr. Henry Wylde; the Windsor choir, directed by Dr. Elvey; two bands of the Life Guards led by Messrs. Boosé and Schott assisting, and most of the visitors joining. The effect was very grand, and would have been sublime had there been one rehearsal, and had the respected amateurs kept their sweet no-voices to themselves. Mr. Costa was expected to the last moment, but not having arrived, the general direction of the chorus was given to Dr. Henry Wylde, who acquitted himself ably and efficiently, and proved himself, though taken unawares, no unworthy substitute of the renowned missing chef-d'orchestre.

Lord Canning then, on behalf of the juries, read a report of their proceedings, and presented a list of the names of those Exhibitors entitled to rewards, together with the reports of the juries. The names, he declared, would be published in the London Gazette, on Friday, Oct. 17th (yesterday); and the medals, reports, and certificates, would be given out as soon as arrangements could be completed, of which due notice would be given.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert received the Reports from the hands of Lord Canning, and read a reply; after which the second verse of the National Anthem was sung in full chorus, the amateurs again chiming, or rather, unchiming in detrimentally.

A prayer of thanksgiving was then offered up by the Bishop of London; and the whole proceedings wound up with the Hallelujah Chorus from the Messiah, which had a splendid effect, the members of the Sacred Harmonic Society coming out like thunder, and the fine treble voices of the Windsor choir telling admirably in this mightiest of mighty compositions.

And so in thunders and rain, fit accompaniments for the expiration of this monster monument of human industry and human ingenuity, closed for ever the Great Exhibition of All Nations!

PROTEST TO THE ROYAL COMMISSIONERS OF THE GREAT EXHIBITION.

IN RE BROADWOOD AND SONS.

The subjoined protest was drawn up, signed, and sent to the Royal Commissioners of the Exhibition by six out of the ten members forming the Musical Jury (Class Xa), on learning that their award in favour of Messrs. Broadwood had been annulled by the Council of Chairmen:—

To HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE ALBERT, K.G., &c., &c., &c., President,

AND TO THE ROYAL COMMISSIONERS OF THE GREAT EXHIBITION OF THE WORKS OF INDUSTRY OF ALL NATIONS, 1851.

May it Please your Royal Highness, My Lords and Gentlemen,

The Jury Class Xa, consisting of the following members:—

SIR H. R. BISHOP (Chairman and Reporter)	LE CHEVALIER SIGISMUND NEUKOMM
SIR GEORGE SMART	DR. SCHAPHAUTL
M. THALBERG	MR. W. STERNDALÉ BENNETT
MR. CIPRIANI POTTER	DR. BLACK
MONS. BERLIOZ	DR. HENRY WYLDE,

of whom all were present except Dr. Black and Dr. Wylde, decided unanimously to award the great medal to the house of Broadwood for its successful improvements in pianofortes and pianoforte making. Dr. Black subsequently declared in the Jury-room his agreement with the award of his colleagues. This decision of the Jury was confirmed in the meeting of the group.

The Council of Chairmen, however (as it has been generally reported), rejected the award thus doubly confirmed, and in seeking for the grounds of this rejection the Jurors of Class Xa, who transmit these papers, are compelled to state it as their opinion that undue weight must have been attributed to mis-statements made at the meeting of the group, in the presence of many of the Chairmen, affecting Messrs. Broadwood's claim as improvers of the pianoforte. The mis-statements were upon remonstrance withdrawn; but it is a lamentable fact that the injurious effect of such statements positively put forth can seldom be completely effaced by a retraction.

Should such a decision of the Council of Chairmen respecting Messrs. Broadwood be reported to the Royal Commissioners, the Jurors who transmit this memorial beg most respectfully to be allowed to point out to His Royal Highness and the Royal Commissioners that, in this case, a decision which was arrived at, after due deliberation by the Jury Class Xa, specially qualified and selected in consequence of technical knowledge of the objects to be submitted to its judgment, and which received subsequent confirmation from the group of associated Juries, has been set aside by a body of gentlemen, who, distinguished as they are for their general attainments, may have no special and technical knowledge of pianofortes and pianoforte making, nor have they in their capacity as Chairmen (except the Chairman of Class Xa, whose opinion and statements ought to have had due weight), even inspected or been called upon to become acquainted with the instruments upon which the award which they rejected was made; in spite of this fact the responsibility of the award will still probably, in the eyes of the public, rest with the primary Jury, and the memorializing Jurors, feeling that their professional and scientific reputation would be compromised by a decision so contrary, in their opinion, to the merits of the case, and which will, they are sure, astonish the whole European musical world, earnestly entreat His Royal Highness and the Royal Commissioners to take the case into their consideration, and to apply to it such remedy as may seem best fitted in their judgment.

With this statement is transmitted an extract from an official document, setting forth the special mechanical improvements on which Messrs. Broadwood's claims are founded. And the memorializing Jurors conclude by expressing their conviction that the house of Messrs. Broadwood has eminently fulfilled every single condition contained in the "Instructions to the Juries," combining in their instruments "novelty of invention (of considerable importance and usefulness), perfection of workmanship, beauty of design, and superior quality of tone."

(Signed by) HENRY R. BISHOP, Knt. (Chairman, the Professor of Music at the University of Oxford,
DR. SCHAPHAUTL, Commissioner from Bavaria, and Juror, Member of the Royal Academie, and Professor and Head Librarian in the University of Munich,
LE CHEVALIER SIGISMUND NEUKOMM,
WILLIAM STERNDALÉ BENNETT, Professor in the Royal Academy of Music and Queen's College, London,
CIPRIANI POTTER, Principal of the Royal Academy of Music,
GEORGE T. SMART, Knt., Organist and Composer to Her Majesty's Chapel Royal.

GREAT EXHIBITION PRIZES.

The following is a list of the Medals awarded for the Musical Instruments, and articles connected with their manufacture.

JURY Xa.

THE COUNCIL MEDAL.

- | | | |
|-----------------------------------|----------------|--|
| Munich ... | 23... | Boehm, T., for important scientific improvements of the flute, and the successful application of his principles to other wind instruments |
| France ... | 173... | Ducroquet, P. A., for his application of the pneumatic lever to a church organ |
| U. Kingdom and }
France } | 496&...
497 | Erard, P., for his peculiar mechanical actions applied to pianofortes and harps |
| U. Kingdom | 555... | Gray and Davison, for their invention in organ building, of a new method of connecting the great organ with the swell organ, by means of a pedal, and of a new stop called the Keraulophon. |
| U. Kingdom | 556... | Hill and Son, invention of a stop of great power, and for their mode of shifting the stops by means of keys |
| France ... | 1725... | Sax, A., for his invention of several classes of wind instruments in wood and metal |
| France ... | 735... | Vuillaume, J. B., for new modes of making violins, in such a manner that they are matured and perfected immediately on the completion of the manufacture, thus avoiding the necessity of keeping them for considerable periods to develop their excellences |
| U. Kingdom | 209... | Willis, H., for his application to organs of an improved exhausting valve to the pneumatic lever, the application of pneumatic levers in a compound form, and the invention of a movement in connexion therewith for facilitating the drawing of stops either singly or in connexion |

THE PRIZE MEDAL.

- | | | |
|------------|--------|---|
| U. Kingdom | 487... | Addison, R., for a "Royal Albert" transposing pianoforte |
| France ... | 421... | Bernadel, sen., for violins |
| France ... | 424... | Besson, G., for various metal musical instruments |
| U. Kingdom | 519... | Betts, A., for two violins |
| Saxony ... | 25... | Breitkopf and Härtel, for a grand pianoforte |
| U. Kingdom | 518... | Broadwood, John, and Sons, for their successful improvements in pianoforte making |

U. Kingdom	735...	Bryceson, H., for a church barrel organ
France ...	442...	Buffet, A., for oboes, clarionets, flutes, and a corno-inglese
U. Kingdom	— ...	Calicot, J., for his invention of a French harp without loose crooks
U. States ...	458...	Chickering, J., for a square pianoforte, and the jury think highly of his grand pianoforte
U. Kingdom	168...	Collard and Collard, for pianos, and for their successful application of several improvements in pianoforte making
France ...	1172...	Debain, A., for a mechanical pianoforte
Tuscany ...	58...	Ducci, A. and M., for an organ with a "Baristata" stop
U. States ...	481...	Eisenbrant, C. H., for clarionets and flutes
U. Kingdom	509...	Forster, S. A., for a violoncello, violin, and viola
France ...	1234...	Franché, C., for a new repetition action in a pianoforte
Spain ...	272...	Gallegos, J., for a "Guitarra harp"
Prussia ...	848...	Gebauhr, C. J., sen., for a pianoforte
U. States ...	442...	Gemunder, G., for a Joseph Guarnerius violin (chiefly), and for three other violins, and a viola
France ...	454...	Godfrey, C., Sen., for flutes
Nassau ...	8...	Heckel, J. A., for a bassoon of a new and improved construction
U. Kingdom	615...	Heeps, J. H., Hearing, apparatus, made of gutta percha
Wurtemberg	24...	Helwert, J., for a bassoon with 19 keys, of an improved construction
U. Kingdom	500...	Hopkinson, J. and J., for a horizontal grand pianoforte, with new patent action
U. Kingdom	486...	Hund, F. and Son, for a cottage pianoforte, in the form of a lyre, termed the "Lyra" pianoforte
Belgium ...	176...	Jastrzebski, F., for an upright pianoforte
France ...	1274...	Janlin, J., for a panorgue, and for his improvements in free reed
U. Kingdom	484...	Jenkins, W. and Sons, for an expanding pianoforte for yachts, &c.
U. Kingdom	487...	Kirkman and Sons, for a semi grand-piano, and an oblique piccolo piano
Bavaria ...	100...	Knocke, A., for his mechanical improvements in kettle drums
U. Kingdom	549...	Köhler, J., for a slide trombone, and for the application of his patent valves to other metal wind instruments
U. Kingdom	100...	Lambert and Co., for a cottage pianoforte
U. Kingdom	673...	Macfarlane, G., for an improved cornet à piston
Belgium ...	175...	Mahillon, C., for clarionets, and a trombone and ophicleide
United States	474...	Meyer, C., for two pianofortes
France ...	1665...	Montal, C., for four cottage pianofortes.
United States	374...	Nunns, R., and Clark, for a 7-octave square pianoforte
U. Kingdom	520...	Oates, J. P., for improvements as applied to cornets
France ...	943...	Papc, J. H., for certain improvements in pianofortes
U. Kingdom	504...	Pask and Koenig, for clarionets and bass instruments
U. Kingdom	537...	Purdy and Fendt, for a double bass (chiefly), and for four violins and two violoncellos
France ...	67...	Roller and Blanchet Fils, for three pianofortes
U. Kingdom	536...	Rudall, Rose, and Co., for a Boehm's patent flute
Wurtemberg	23...	Schiedmayer and Son, for a square pianoforte in mahogany
Prussia ...	707...	Schulze, J. F., and Sons, for an organ

U. Kingdom	469...	Southwell, W., for a grand pianoforte
U. Kingdom	470...	Stodart, W., and Son, for a square pianoforte
France ...	1510...	Tribert, F., for oboes and a "corno inglese"
U. Kingdom	527...	Ward, C., for a new-constructed bassoon, and a pair of kettle drums
U. Kingdom	526...	Wheatstone and Co., for a novel invention of a portable harmonium
U. Kingdom	499...	Wornum, R., for an improved piccolo pianoforte

MONEY AWARDS.

U. Kingdom	468...	Greiner, G. F., for his new and useful method of bringing into unison the strings of each choir of the pianoforte, also for his invention of a new and mechanical contrivance for pianos, combining the advantage of Erard's machine with greater simplicity of construction and durability, 50l.
United States	—	Wood, J. S., for the expences incurred in constructing his piano violin, 50l.

MUSIC AT MANCHESTER.

(From a Correspondent.)

To borrow a mercantile phrase, musical matters may fairly be termed brisk with us just now. The tempting announcement in our bills, invite us to a couple of concerts, to be given in the course of the ensuing week, by the Glee and Madrigal Union, Messrs. Lockety, Phillips and Co. Prices do not yet transpire, nevertheless, we may anticipate a crowded room on both occasions. At the same place, the Free Trade Hall, the projectors of the usual weekly cheap "Concerts for the People," announce their opening night for Monday next. Miss Deakin, a pupil of Mrs. Alfred Shaw, is spoken of as the soprano, with Mr. Delavanti, already a favourite here, as barytone, and a Mr. Perring for tenor, Mr. D. W. Banks as formerly, as director. A series of "Saturday Evening Concerts" are also to be given by the committee of the Mechanics' Institution. A most excellent array of names are put forth including all the choice of our local artists, and if the scheme be only spiritedly carried out, a musical treat of a high order is in store for us. Mr. Conran is appointed conductor. Ere your readers peruse the present, the Italian Opera Company at our Theatre Royal will have passed from us, at least as far as Madame Clara Novello and Mr. Sims Reeves are concerned. This short but admirable run of opera has been musically speaking highly successful, otherwise we cannot offer an opinion. We hear Miss L. Pyne with Mr. Harrison are to follow in English opera; perhaps, we may say the very soul and spirit of the whole success is centred in that very clever chef of the orchestra and composer, Mr. Loder. A recent musical event of more than ordinary local importance, namely, the performance for the first time of a new oratorio, Emmanuel, by a resident professor, Mr. Glover, we were sorry to find passed over by your usual correspondent here, in a late number, with but few comments, and these perhaps not without some slight inaccuracies. Let us quote him. "It certainly does seem a daring attempt to write an oratorio on the very subject which the colossal Handel has rendered immortal by his Messiah. Who is there of modern times since Beethoven, except the ever to be lamented Mendelssohn, fit to approach such a subject. Yet neither Mendelssohn, nor Beethoven attempted it; they tried and succeeded on other sacred themes, but the Messiah was left to their great predecessor." Surely this writer could not be ignorant of the existence of the Mount of Olives on one hand, and the all but completed Christus on the other; besides if he had only compared the libretto, he would find that the composer of Emmanuel had carefully eschewed coming into collision with any part of the Messiah, doubtless, impressed that the selection of such passages as had been previously set to music by the leviathan Handel would only be likely to bring prejudicious reminiscences to the majority of ordinary listeners, and thereby seriously endanger the success of the work. We happen to have been present on the occasion of the performances of Emmanuel, and although personally almost a stranger to Mr. Glover, we had long ago formed favourable opinions of his musical abilities, and with copy in hand, we wended our way to the Free Trade Hall, and unlike your rather fastidious correspondent, arrived in time to hear the overture. This introduction is short, and different to the general form of overture which is in most cases a disjointed production, portraying briefly a sketch of what follows; the present only gives out the subject of the opening chorus, "Tremble O Earth," in C minor, which is commenced by all in unison, and subsequently changes to the major in the words, "But the Sun of Righteousness shall arise." This chorus is altogether very finely brought out, and by a large mass of voices would be very effective. As the leading points of the first part of the work were briefly touched upon by your usual correspondent, we will pass on to what follows. After a short recitative, which by the way was the most feeble point in the work, we have a chorus, "Who is this that doeth wonders;" this is strikingly original in character with a good flow of melody, and was most loudly encored. A chorale of disciples, unaccompanied, is by many considered the gem of the work. It will bear comparison with some of, perhaps, the best specimens of ecclesiastical music. During this, the orchestra is silent, and the breathless suspense of the auditors is excellently in keeping with the situation of the devout worshippers on the Mount of Olives. A recitative and air for soprano, "Bow down thine ear," is remarkable for the skilful introduction of the bass instruments, which tell on the listener with an almost thrilling effect. Perhaps the most noticeable feature in this part of the work is a lovely contralto air, "Eye hath not seen," this was sung by Mrs. Brook, with considerable fervour and expression, and was universally redemanded. We fear to encroach too far on your space, or would go more into detail on the merits of the work. We must, however, accord the promising author our warmest acknowledgments for the pleasure we experienced at this first performance. Your correspondent is in error when he says the band was "small and select," as a glance at the list of the names would have satisfied him that the whole strength of the concert hall orchestra was present along with other amateurs from the neighbouring towns, numbering together not less than fifty performers, while the chorus mustered an equal number. Mr. William Barlow, a reputed organist of this place, ably fulfilled his duties at the organ, and evidenced how much can be done by a judicious use of this instrument in the orchestra. In summing up, we may honestly declare Emmanuel to be a worthy and a highly meritorious work, and if the author does not reap his reward while earnestly going up the steps of fame, we are firmly convinced posterity will not refuse to assign him a position in the honored pedestal to which his merits so justly entitle him. As another step in the right direction, we are glad to hear it is in contemplation to bring out Horsley's David at the annual choral concert at the gentlemen's concerts here. All success to the scheme.

Dramatic Intelligence.

ST. JAMES'S THEATRE.—The performances of the twin-wonders, the little Bateman Children, will be brought to a termination this week. We earnestly impressed upon those who had not seen them, not to throw away the last opportunity of doing so, and hope they have followed our solicitation; if not, it is very unlikely they will ever witness such another sight as these incomparable infantine representations. It is at their present ages only that the "children" can really be entitled "Phenomenons." Every month and day must subtract from their extreme youth, and by consequence take from their extreme attractions; until at last, and that in no far time, they must cease to be called "juvenile wonders" altogether, and yield up their greatness with their baby names.

For two years more, we learn, Mr. Bateman will continue the performances of "the children," and then withdraw them from the stage entirely. In no place where they have exhibited have the Bateman children received a more cordial welcome, more unbounded praise, or loftier patronage than in London. In fact they may be reckoned among the most attractive and most novel "lions" of the season of the Great Exhibition. Their performances, at first listened to with incredulity, accepted merely as exemplifications of rigid teaching, and criticised with condescension, soon, by repeated seeing and hearing, awakened the spectators to a true sense of their merits, and were set down, not as parroted and time-and-labour-enforced exertations of the mind, but direct instincts and emanations of genius, which no adult intelligence could transmit from one to another, and which to childhood, devoid of inspiration, must have proved a sealed volume, a fountain in the rock not to be reached but with years. The "children" are about to leave London after conquering the hearts of all who have seen them. We wish them well wherever they go, and sincerely hope they will return to their native land in the far West as rich in dollars as they are rich in talent—and if they do, and carry home the money in specie, silver and gold, the captain of the vessel, be it steamer, bark, brig, or schooner, may dispense with ballast for the voyage.

Pretty Kate and tiny Nell!
Here we bid you both "farewell!"
What your fate—where'er you go—
May you naught save pleasures know!
Adieu! by all loved and caress'd,
Ye infant wonders of the West!
Take our wishes kindest, best,
And long within our mem'ry rest!

Before closing this notice of their last performances we wish to lay before our readers a spirited and enthusiastic article which appeared in the Britannia of last month. With the opinions of the writer respecting the performances of "the children" in Shakespere we cannot concur; with every thing else, however, we fully agree, and think there is not the slightest exaggeration in the eulogies bestowed. The Britannia, we believe was the first to discover the real talents of the Bateman children, as it was the first to declare without stint or reservation its candid opinion. And thus the writer wrote:—

"We attended the St. James's Theatre on Thursday evening to witness the performance of the two Batemans in Macbeth. We have no hesitation in characterising this exhibition as something very remarkable. It is very easy to cram one's self up with the common-places of æsthetical exaggeration, and talk of the degradation of filtering the mighty mind of Shakespeare through infantine intellect, &c. We could spin out such phrases by the hour; and if we applied them to the Bateman performances, we might convey to the apprehension of our readers a distinct lie. We do not for one instant assert that the Batemans realize to themselves the conception of the parts allotted to them in the degree in which these conceptions were present to Shakespeare's mind. But we should like to ask who does? If the answer is, the grown-up actors do, we beg to know where these actors are? We know nothing of them; never did know anything of them; never, we confidently believe, shall know anything of them. There never was a more egregious fallacy imposed upon the reading public than one which has the authority of some very great names to back it; to wit, that Shakespeare's plays being written simply with a view to stage representation, can only produce their true effect upon us when presented on the stage. If, amongst our readers, there are any of those happy mortals who have never bowed the knee to the Baal of criticism—never set up in their heart of hearts some pet infallible dictum, by which all art is to be measured—we here make them a present of one maxim, which, at least, is to all intents and purposes, thoroughly true. This theory of stage representation being the test of any dramatist in the world but a melodramatist is an utter lie, and a delusion. No man, of any decent imagination at all, ever saw a play of Shakespeare's acted so well as he has acted it to himself while reading it. In a theatre, you have to fight against a thousand and one opposing influences that persist in thrusting themselves between you and the wonderful whole which is present to your mind as the result of the reading of Shakespeare. The most perfect of actors always falls physically below your idea: his face, his form, his voice, his gesture, have all a coarseness which the picture in your mind was free from, and the full intellectuality is still greater. And if this is true of the chief actors, what shall we say of their assistants—the canaille? If one add to this the materializing of all that is imaginative, by the interposition of clumsy machinery and bad painting, and the best machinery and the best painting, are only approximations towards the truth of the imagination, the utter transparency of the fallacy alluded to will be made manifest enough. Now, apropos of this digression, comes the case of the Batemans. Their Macbeth is no more the Macbeth of the imagination than that of others, whom we will not mention; but this we must say, their Macbeth, as a stage Macbeth, would not be very easily matched, and with still more difficulty surpassed. Their knowledge of the stage traditions is wonderful; their accurate delivery of the text unimpeachable. The strain on the voice which is requisite in the case of children so young, is no greater than that which we have listened to from grown-up tragedians, who have "torn passion to tatters" with less excuse than the children Bateman. The plain, unadorned statement of the matter is this:—the Batemans are in possession of the stage traditions of the characters they represent, in a greater perfection than the majority of their grown-up rivals; and they make use of these with a grace and intelligence, the charm of which is immediately augmented by the consideration of their extreme youth. Any qualification which we attach to the praise of these young actors as tragedians must be abated when they are spoken of as comedians. It is impossible to speak too highly of the perfection of quiet humour exhibited by Kate Bateman, in the character of Henrietta de Vigny, and her sister merits scarcely less praise. Anything so full of geniality, so overflowing with good spirits, it has seldom been our lot to witness. We can heartily recommend the performance to all lovers of the stage."

HAYMARKET.—This theatre closed last Saturday, after a season of great prosperity. At the conclusion of the first piece, the Sonnambula, Mr. Webster made his appearance, and as soon as the hearty applause with which he was greeted had subsided, delivered the following valedictory address:—

"Ladies and Gentlemen,—The closing of the Great Exhibition has brought our little exhibition to a happy issue. There the display of the industry of all nations achieved a success as triumphant as beyond all calculation—here we have attempted to pourtray the characteristics of all time which your approval has stamped with sterling artistic value. Of the great luminary we have been one of the distant satellites, benefitting by its light and warmth, and I can assure you both myself and others of my calling would gladly be again within its attractive circle for many a similar period. As lesser things often owe their value to the greater, our statistics show that upwards of 160,000 persons have paid to see the higher classes of dramatic amusements within this building since the opening in May of the justly-named world's wonder. Therefore I and all connected with me, are bound to earnestly exclaim, to the honoured Prince who conceived the magnificent project, to her gracious Majesty who encouraged it, and to the smaller geniuses who carried it out, be all honour and glory. No terms of thanks, ladies and gentlemen, can embody the deep sense of gratitude I feel for your patronage at all times, and this season especially; and be assured it will be my honest pride and unfeigned pleasure by still upholding the drama, and encouraging the living dramatists, to deserve a continuance of your support.

"Until the 3rd of November next, when the necessary repairs will have been completed, for which alone we close, I most respectfully, ladies and gentlemen, bid you farewell, and wish you all health and happiness."

Although Saturday was nominally the last night of the company's performance, however, the theatre was open on Monday for Mr. F. Webster's benefit, while Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday were announced, after the fashion of the "large house over the way," as "extra nights." Both the benefit and the extra nights attracted large audiences.

OLYMPIC.—It appears that once upon a time, as the story-books say, there was an old law in France, by which if it could be proved by two witnesses that a gentleman had had three private interviews, of a quarter of an hour each, with a lady, then that the lady could, if so disposed, compel the gentleman to marry her. This fact has furnished the author of Caught in his own Trap, an original comedieta produced here last Monday, with matter for a highly agreeable little piece. Francois (Mr. Kinloch) is in love with Agatha (Miss Ellen Turner), but Francois' uncle, Monsieur Vraimont (Mr. Farren) is strongly opposed to the match, and as he is possessed of a handsome fortune and Francois of nothing at all, his opposition is a matter of considerable importance. To help the lovers out of their dilemma, Madame Vonderbushell (Mrs. Alfred Philips) volunteers to induce Monsieur Vraimont to marry himself, as he has previously promised Francois twenty thousand francs if ever he committed so foolish an action. In order to carry out her plan, Madame Vonderbushell, under pretence of consulting Monsieur Vraimont, obtains of him the three interviews required by the law to constitute him her victim, and when he is rejoicing at the idea of having "done" some one else, he finds that his cunning, like the Boomerang of the natives of Australia, has recoiled upon himself—that he is the victim—in a word that he is Caught in his own Trap.

Such is a brief outline of the elegantly written little production, which is distinguished by the wit and humour of its dialogue, and the masterly manner in which the principal characters, M. Vraimont, Madame Vonderbushell and a servant named Jonas (Mr. W. Shalders) are sketched in. Mr. Farren's impersonation of Monsieur Vraimont, the cunning, oily, calculating lawyer, was most true to nature, and full of those artistic touches which Mr. Farren knows so well how to bring in with such telling effect, and which is more towards conveying an idea of the character represented, than pages of the most elaborate writing. Trifling as is, comparatively speaking, the rôle of Monsieur Vraimont, it may take its place with justice among that of Mr. Farren's most finished efforts. Even the "make up," the sombre, professional suit of black, the spare, white hair, thinned by years of thoughtful chicanery, and the peering, and mild, yet treacherously cat-like expression of the face—told the audience what sort of a man it was who stood before them, even before the actor had uttered one word, and proved that Mr. Farren possesses as forcibly as ever that remarkable faculty of embodying an author's ideas, and clothing them in flesh and blood, a faculty for which he was always so celebrated, and which has raised him beyond the possibility of dispute, to the very highest rank in his branch of the profession. The other characters were also, without exception, exceedingly well played, especially that of Jonas, by Mr. Shalders. This gentleman possesses much more than average powers—he is endowed with a very considerable degree of quiet, quaint humour; and if he sometimes disappoints his admirers—and he has many—it is by wishing to do too much. As the prying, gormandising Jonas, half knave half fool, he fairly convulsed the audience with laughter, and contributed greatly to the success of the piece, which passed the ordeal of public criticism—as it now passes our own—in the most triumphant manner.

After the comedietta on the same night, 'was produced also for the first time, "a grand piece of prodigality on the part of the management," as it is entitled in the bills, called Azael, or the Prodigal in London, being a parody on the spectacle of the same name brought out at Drury Lane by Mr. Anderson. The original story is pretty closely adhered to, the fun being obtained by changing Memphis to London, the "Temple of Isis" to the "Temple of Ices," and making Azael (Mr. Compton) go the round of London dissipation, until he at last subsides into the very uncomfortable position of assistant to a donkey-driver on Hampstead Heath, Mr. Compton as Azael—in which, by the way, he bore a most striking likeness to Mr. D'Israeli—provoked the risible faculties of the audience in a manner that was surprising, even for him, and was well supported by every one else engaged in the piece. The dialogue is good, the allusions excellent, and the scenery deserving of great praise. Altogether, we are of opinion that it is the best thing of its kind that has been produced for some time, and will continue to attract large audiences for a very long period. The theatre has been literally crammed every night since its production. It is from the pen of H. Rodwell, Esq.

Foreign.

NEW YORK.—FIRST APPEARANCE OF CATHERINE HAYES. —(From Saroni's Musical Times.)—On Tuesday evening last Catherine Hayes made her first curtsy to the American public. Tripler Hall was crammed and jammed to repletion, and hundreds upon hundreds offered their money at the doors, but were refused admission, simply because there was not room actually for another person to get in and see. Neither at Jenny Lind's concerts, nor at Parodi's concerts, were there as many persons, by several hundreds, present. In short it was the greatest crowd we ever saw inside Tripler Hall, and a thousand times more enthusiastic than all the other audiences put together. There was as much excitement outside as inside; the line of carriages extended a block or two on either side of the Hall; hundreds of people thronged Mercer-street, hoping at least to catch a portion of the warblings of the Irish Nightingale, while the passage way to the very door was so crowded, as to render it a difficult task, even by hard pushing, for ladies to reach it.

Several papers stated in the early part of the week, that there was no excitement in the public mind respecting Catherine Hayes; that the excitement was only upon paper, and written by interested persons. Two morning papers were savagely virtuous; they had, to be sure, toadied Jenny Lind, under Barnum's influence, but they could not consent to commit themselves, even to the extent of an extract, to benefit the stranger lady. Even now that she has come and has gained the most triumphant success, they strive to damn her with faint praise, and idle comparisons with their Swedish idol. This cant about the divine Jenny has become perfectly sickening; no one else can sing, nor be virtuous, nor charitable. Every one else must be sacrificed to a slavish adulation of a talent which the writers never understood. They have translated a mortal artiste into a myth, and no one must come within a hundred miles of its sacred shine. In such a course there is neither justice nor common honesty; it is a mere partisanship, from which the cause of art can reap no benefit, and the individual no honour. The best reply to their assertion that there was no excitement in the public mind, was the overflowing house on Tuesday evening; and as testimony to her superlative skill we appeal to the triumph of that evening.

There was some delay in commencing caused by the unaccountable absence of Mr. Loder. Mr. Lavenue, however, very kindly assumed Mr. Loder's portion of the programme, and we afterwards learnt that Mr. Loder was seized with a sudden sickness which prevented the possibility of his attendance.

The concert commenced with the overture to Guillaume Tell. This beautiful but much hackneyed overture was well played, but we confess that we paid but little attention to it, for we had heard it so frequently at every concert for the past ten years, that we look upon it as an incubus to every concert bill. Is the repertoire of overtures entirely exhausted? Is there nothing new under the sun? or is there nothing old, less hackneyed, and equal in merit to this stop-gap for every want? We trust that our conductors will summon up sufficient courage and independence to leave this inevitable overture out of the programme sometimes.

The popular duet from Belisario, "Quando di sangue tinto," was then sung by Mr. Augustus Braham and Herr Mengis. These gentlemen were well received by the public, who encouraged them by a welcome always awarded by an American audience to strangers. Mr. Braham has a fine tenor voice, sweet in quality, extensive in compass, and of good power. His style is eminently, unmistakeably English; wanting in fire and effect of the Italian manner, but pleasing from its quiet, unpretending method. It is however better suited to the ballad than to the operatic style. However, we shall not speak definitely of Mr. Braham until we have heard him again. Herr Mengis has all the qualities of voice and manner to make him popular. His voice is a rich, mellow, and powerful baritone, which he uses with much skill; his intonation is excellent, his style bold and free, and possesses both passion and expression. The duet by these gentlemen was well sung, and was loudly applauded.

Madame Bertucca Maretzek appeared next, and essayed a solo upon the harp, but the envious strings broke and marred her best efforts. It would be unfair under the circumstances to judge either of the playing or the piece.

Then came the low murmured whisper of expectation which burst into a thunder of shouting and applause, the moment Catherine Hayes showed herself upon the orchestra. The applause lasted so long that we began to fear that, exhausted by her emotion, the fair artiste would be unable to sing at all. She at length essayed to sing, and at the first tones of her voice, the boisterous demonstration ceased, and every ear attentively listened, drinking in the exquisite sounds, as the mariners of old the songs of the Syren. Her first selection was not at all calculated to please the popular taste; "Ah! mon fils," from the Prophete, is the very embodiment of mourning, and broken-heartedness. Sorrow and anguish are in every phrase, and it only rises from abject wretchedness, when it appeals to the throne of grace for mercy on her son. Then the strain rises to a grandeur, almost sublime in its character and movement. The few first sustained notes which Catherine Hayes uttered gave promise of an exquisite voice, but as the song progressed, its full and extraordinary beauties were displayed. Its compass is remarkable, and it has no weak points—it is beautiful throughout. The lower and middle tones are full, rich, and thrilling heart-tones as it were, they seem so full of sympathy—while the higher notes are pure, sweet, and mellifluous as the tones of the truest flute. It is always perfectly in tune, and she controls it without any effort. It is flexible for any purpose that the most brilliant vocalism can demand. Her power of sostenuto is great; her gradation of light and shade, from piano to forte, admirable, and her shake as brilliant, true, and rapid as we ever listened to.

Her singing of "Ah! mon fils" was deeply affecting, so perfectly did she embody the ideas of the poet and musician. Grief spoke out in every tone, the voice trembled as with the beating of the heart, and the whole picture of the heart-broken mother was as apparent to the imagination as though it were aided by all means within the reach of the Opera. It is this surpassing talent which enables Catherine Hayes to embody the character of these operatic scenas, without acting, that renders her singing in a concert room so effective and full of reality. The truly exquisite manner in which this piece was sung, insured it a rapturous encore, and a shower of bouquets such as we rarely see. She sang it better the second time than the first, and gained even heartier applause at its second close, and retired with the pleasing assurance, that she had won a great victory and had established herself in the favour of the people.

Catherine Hayes was dressed in exquisite taste—modestly, elegantly, gracefully, and looked truly beautiful, as her spirit warmed with excitement and desire to excel. Her whole form seemed spiritualized, and fire of genius sparkled in her eyes, and diffused a radiance over every feature. Every one seemed doubly charmed—fascinated with the woman—enchanted by the singer. And thus Catherine Hayes won all hearts.

Herr Mengis sung a roystering soldier's song composed by one Battista. It is a very good composition in its way, and Herr Mengis sung it with much effect. Its range is just within the best portion of his voice, and he gave it out with a power that re-echoed through the Hall. He was vociferously applauded.

Catherine Hayes then came forward amidst reiterated plaudits, and sang a very charming ballad by W. V. Wallace, "Why do I weep for thee?" She sang it delightfully. She used no ornaments, not even the shake, but gave it in all its simplicity, trusting to passion and expression alone to produce the desired effect. It is hardly necessary to say that the effect was produced, and that the ballad was encored, but the lady acknowledged the compliment, gathering up as many of the bouquets as possible, and retired.

The overture, Les Diamans de la Couronne commenced the second part, and was led by Mr. Lavenue. It was ably directed and well performed.

Herr Mengis' pretty song, "The Happy Switzer," tickled the public ear to a marvel and was rapturously encored. It was not a song, perhaps, suited to concerts of a high character, the jodelen which terminates each verse being to a certain extent decidedly vulgar; but the public relished it, and that is law both within and without the concert room.

Catherine Hayes then sang the exquisite Irish ballad, "The Harp that once through Tara's Halls." What was mere beautiful singing in the English ballad, became perfect inspiration, as she poured forth this old and well remembered strain. It is impossible to convey an idea of the manner in which she sang this ballad; we can only say that it was characteristic, and breathed the very soul of the mournful yet passionate words and music. During this song there was a deathlike stillness throughout the vast assemblage, broken now and then by an audible sob, for there were many weeping; the people hung upon the notes with breathless eagerness, and as the last tone died away, there arose a shout of applause such as was rarely if ever heard within the walls of a concert-room. Rounds of applause succeeded each other in rapid succession, and after the repetition of the song, the same tumultuous enthusiasm was displayed. Catherine Hayes had touched the hearts of every one, and the willing hands responded to the feeling of exquisite delight.

The same magical effect was produced by her singing of "Kathleen Mavourneen." Every note was sung as written, no embellishments were added to deceive the ear, and cheat the hearer into forgetfulness of nature, by admirable displays of art. Simple, natural expression, and earnest truthfulness, with the strong impulses of an ardent soul, were the charms that wrung from the hearts and hands of her auditors the noblest testimony that was ever offered to the powers of an artiste.

Madame Bertucca Maretzek played with most admirable skill, and fine taste and expression, Labarre's very charming Rondo Espagnole. Her efforts were well appreciated by the public, and she met with the most cordial applause. As a harpist she is deservedly a popular favourite.

Balfé's very pretty ballad, "In this Old Chair," was sung most sweetly by Mr. Braham, and called forth a most hearty encore.

Catherine Hayes' last vocal triumph, was the finale to Son-nambula, "Ah! non giunge." Every one attempts this brilliant aria, meeting with more or less success. Jenny Lind sang it gloriously. She loaded it with brilliant fioriture, which she executed with unsurpassed excellence, and the effect was electric. Catherine Hayes' version of this aria is in every way as great, but her conception is entirely dissimilar; it is more passionate and energetic, and her ornaments are bolder and more broad in their design. It was in all respects as brilliant a specimen of vocalization as we ever listened to. At every pause she was greeted by a perfect roar of applause which was continued at the close until she came forward and repeated it, and the cheering was more loud and hearty, when she left the orchestra for the last time, than when she first appeared. So great a triumph was never achieved in this city. We cannot conceal from ourselves that there was a vast amount of incredulity as to the positive greatness of Catherine Hayes; such a vast amount of "blowing" had been expended in the case of the great concert giver, such vast resources of humbug had been brought to bear, that the public began to believe that truth and concert-giving could never be connected. Besides, Catherine Hayes was neither Italian, French, Swede, nor German, and consequently could not be much. These prejudices, together with the partizanship before alluded to, Catherine Hayes had to fight against, and gloriously, most gloriously, has she triumphed over them all. She has in one night by the mere force of her splendid genius raised for herself a million of friends throughout this vast country, who will throng around and welcome her wherever she goes. The road is clear and open to her now; partizans may cavil and grumble, and whine out that "she is not and never can be Jenny Lind," which owl-like fact all but transmigrationists will readily acknowledge, but despite all opposition, walking straightforward in the full tide of public favour, Catherine Hayes will triumph over all.

The second concert of Catherine Hayes took place on Thursday evening. There was a great house, not quite as numerous as at her first, but more fashionable and critical. The judgment of the first night was confirmed, and her success was certainly more triumphant, because there was less national feeling displayed, and more critical judgment. Her "Casta Diva" was a wonderful vocal effort, and was unanimously encored, as was every piece she sang. The excitement to hear her will increase daily, for there is no advertisement so effective, as the home circle praise of those who have heard her with delight.

Catherine Hayes will sing in the Messiah, next Wednesday. The choral department will be performed by the Harmonic Society. George Loder, leader.

MADAME ANNA THILLON has proved that an artist can be successful in this country without having recourse to the humbug of the day. We just heard of her coming and she was here, performing at Niblo's. But we say, that only an artiste can be successful, and that she is in the true sense of the word. Her singing, her acting, her features, her motions, all combine to make her an excellent artist. Badly supported as she is in the Crown Diamonds, she succeeds in drawing thousands of admiring listeners around her. And it is well worth while to go to Niblo's, to see her, young and beautiful, first as la Catarina of the bandits, and then as Queen of Portugal, to hear her sing with that perfection of method, that simplicity of style, that mellow quality of voice which speaks at once to the hearts of the audience. Then again that artlessness of manner, that vivacity and animation of her features! Truly she is one of the most captivating artists we have ever heard or seen.

We have not room to say much of the Crown Diamonds or its performance. Mr. Hudson acquits himself most ably, Ferdinand Meyer most stiffly. The chorus is good, the orchestra is bad, though not quite as much so, as at the time when Signor La Manna led the music of La Giselle.

MADAME ANNA BISHOP has returned to the city, and is to be serenaded by the members of her orchestra this evening at her residence, West Twenty-second street; and Mademoiselle C. Parodi is yet in Boston concertizing.

HENRI HERZ—REMINISCENCES OF HIS TRAVELS IN AMERICA.

(Translated from "La France Musicale," by W. Grilliers.)

I wish it were possible for me to forget the motives which induced me to undertake the long and perilous travels I am about to recount. I had been drawn by an irresistible fatality into circumstances which I should for ever have grieved at if they had not resulted in determining me to accomplish a project which had been the dream of my youth and the constant aim of my thoughts amid my numerous professional occupations. To see the New World—to carry to it the fruit of my long labour, to spread to the utmost of my means a taste for the art to which I had devoted my life, has been my incessant idea for more than twenty years. To-day I thank Providence for having made a necessity of what was but the ardent desire and an aspiration of all my life. I must confess that what made me view America through a brilliant prism and almost as a country of predestination, was the numerous propositions—accompanied by the most irresistible offers—made to me by its speculators. During the long years of my teaching I had formed American pupils who had, some as artists, some as amateurs, spread my name and works in all America; so I was certain of meeting with many useful acquaintances and friends. I decided to start in the month of October, 1846, and the 22nd of November following I embarked at Liverpool on board the English steamer "Caledonia," and 18 days afterwards I landed at Boston.

MY PASSAGE AND ARRIVAL AT BOSTON.

During the first few days of passage I was, from sea sickness, completely powerless. I was compelled to remain in my cabin; and an increase of misfortune was my having for companion a gentleman who was as well as well could be, and who, to divert me, would read me letters, 42 pages long, from a young and beautiful creole of New Orleans, to whom he said he was going to be married. These sentimental epistles were, doubtless, very interesting to the party to whom they were addressed, but I must confess that their uninterrupted reading was far from helping me to forget my terrible sufferings. The only way for me to avoid them was to leave my bed and escape on deck. This violent remedy succeeded miraculously; I at once got rid of my sea sickness and my amorous and indefatigable reader.

The English newspapers had made great talk of my intended voyage, and the American press repeated all that had been said, so that on my reaching Boston I found a great number of artists awaiting my arrival. I never shall forget the reception I met with; it was who would invite me first, and who would obtain from me a promise to remain. Not willing to accept any private invitation, I went to an hotel and thither was I followed by those who had awaited my arrival. There they would not quit me till I had promised to give one concert. But I had resolutely promised to make my debut in the "Empire City," and so peremptorily refused to play in Boston. Such pressing demands were addressed to me from different societies that I found it impossible to get away till I had faithfully promised to return immediately after my appearance at New York.

MY ARRIVAL AT NEW YORK.

I had hardly arrived at that large town before I received the visits of the most distinguished professionals; all kinds of engagements were offered to me by the managers of theatres, but I always have had a certain reluctance at associations with managers, and therefore wished from the commencement to run all the risk of the enterprise. I chose in preference the "Tabernacle," to give my first concert in. This building can easily contain 3000 people, and, though not constructed by the rules of acoustic or with irreproachable harmony of proportion, music is heard to a tolerable advantage, and the public is very well satisfied with it.

The day before the first concert a very unfortunate accident, which might have had disastrous consequences, happened to me. I was not aware of the singular manner in which they light the fires; wishing to remove an iron plate placed before the hearth of the chimney in my room, and not knowing that a fire in the inside had heated it, I burnt my right hand so severely, I thought I should be compelled to retard my first concert. My accident in a short time got bruited about the town, and I had hardly had time to place a slight dressing upon the part most injured, when a man, of whose name I was perfectly ignorant, presented himself and offered me a certain and rapid cure. He was the inventor of a compound "to cure all pains," or, as he named it, "pain extractor;" he assured me that if I would use it, all pain would vanish in less than six hours. He required that, in case of success, I should recognize publicly the efficacy of his plaster. One can easily imagine with what pleasure I accepted his offer, but what will not be so easily believed is, that my cure was so prompt and perfect that I was able to give my concert on the day announced. The proprietor of this marvellous paste had monster placards, whereon was announced that owing to his specific the concert of Mr. Henri Herz would take place. His balm had prodigious success, and I have since heard he has realized a fortune of several thousands of Piastres.

FIRST CONCERT IN NEW YORK.

I cannot but see the difficulties I shall meet with at each step in relating my travels through regions the most diversified, and often the least known by the world. In speaking of myself, I shall not be able to escape of a necessity relating the successes I have obtained, and I expose myself to a danger I have always wished to avoid—viz., that of occupying the public about me. For those that know me I have not to guard against this reproach; they are aware that I am as capable of illusion as I am of stating or advancing facts which might in the slightest manner be contested. To those that know me not, I have only one way of carrying conviction to their mind; to give irrefutable proofs in support of my assertions, and I have my hands full of them.

I will, then, venture to say that my first concert in New York bore all the appearances of an unusual circumstance. It had hardly been announced, before crowds hastened to the box-office, and every seat was taken in a few moments. More than 500 people were refused admittance, and the tickets were sold by auction at most exorbitant prices. I was obliged to remain away from my hotel for two days, to avoid the solicitations and requests of which I was the object. I had taken care to place at the head of the programme an overture, to prepare the public in a manner, and to save myself the emotions I feared I should feel from a public quite new to me. But this precaution did not obtain the result I anticipated. The overture was played in the midst of general inattention. No one listened, and I am not certain it was played to the end. At last I was obliged to appear, and what then passed I cannot well say. I was completely stunned by the thunders of applause from every part of the building. The more my embarrassment became visible, the more these demonstrations of sympathy increased, and they continued so long that I completely lost my self-possession. The orchestra, however, came to my help, in commencing, without waiting for my orders, the first tutti of my grand concerto in C minor; and as the moment for my first solo approached, an expective silence almost imperceptively gave way to the astounding noise my appearance had raised. I had hardly drawn a few sounds from the instrument, before I was again interrupted by new manifestations; and at the end of the first solo the encores resounded with so much persistence, that I was compelled to begin the piece over again. If I relate this fact, so flattering to my self-love as an artist, it is that it appeared remarkable, on account of the severity of style which reigns in my concerto, and also on account of the minor key which in general is not privileged to please the Americans.

The first concert only gave more zest to the dilettanti of New York. Those who had heard me once, wished to hear me again, and those who could not obtain tickets for this concert, had some for the second; and I was obliged, to satisfy every one, to give more than twenty concerts in the space of three months.

THE SPEAKER.

At the third concert, a circumstance occurred which I think is of rare occurrence in Europe, and I can assure you was most unexpected by me. After my playing a piece which had produced more effect than the others, the public did me the honour to recall me. On my appearing, I heard the voice of a Stentor in the middle of the room articulating words of which I could not seize the meaning. It was a Frenchman, who, perched on a seat, was delivering a speech in my honour; but emotion, or some other reason, I cannot tell what, all at once cut short his speech, and he suddenly sat down, to the great surprise of the auditory. A lady who was sitting close to him compelled him to rise again, and the docile speaker, obeying the inspirations of his gentle neighbour transformed into a prompter, re-began his speech, which lasted for at least ten minutes. As he expressed himself in the French language, he was not understood by the greater number of the American public, and they demanded vociferously the explanation of his harangue, and to me they addressed themselves. One can easily conceive my embarrassment at such a circumstance; I could not possibly re-echo the praises of myself which the speaker had profusely loaded me with; I bowed, and bowed, but it was of no use, curiosity only seemed to increase, and the public to become more and more exacting. Fortunately, the French Consul was present, and obligingly came to my aid. He rose in his turn; and, amid the most profound silence, said that the speech of which they demanded the translation was only an eulogy in my favour, and a testimony of welcome from the French part of the population of New York to one of their countrymen.

(To be continued.)

Original Correspondence.

NO DOUBTS ABOUT CHERUBINI.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—I have been very much surprised at the article by "Pyrrhus," on the compositions of the late Cherubini, which appeared in your excellent journal of last week.

I cannot for a moment believe, that there exists a musician in England, (in Europe I ought to say,) who holds such sceptical opinions on the works of one of the finest contrapuntists that ever existed, as are enunciated by your correspondent.

Again, I ask myself is he in earnest, or is he provoking enquiry? As to comparison, Cherubini cannot (in my opinion) be compared with any author, dead or living. Pyrrhus acknowledges that the "Les Deux Journées" has some merit; and adds that the overture to Anacreon is a brilliant but an overrated work. This is too bad, and here Mr. Editor I must say a few words. The overture to Anacreon (in my opinion,) is a gem so full of contrast, beauty, and exquisite contrapuntal skill, that its loss, as a lesson to the young tyros in counterpoint, would be irreparable. It also contains one of the finest instrumental crescendos that ever flowed from the pen of a musical author. I would refer Pyrrhus to its commencement, about fifteen bars before the sequence of shakes, the choice of which for the various instruments displays the great knowledge of the composer; and this crescendo rises to a climax most sublimely grand, and is one which has never been surpassed,—so much for this overrated overture.

I lament that the fine compositions of Cherubini have been partially laid aside, but this is not a just criterion, for other great authors works have suffered an unjustly similar fate, and Pyrrhus may remember that it is only a few years ago, that Beethoven's works, except some of his symphonies, were scarcely known, and indeed, had it not been for a few spirited musicians and teachers of his pianoforte works, they might have been shelved also, but now, there is scarcely a publisher of any note who is not bringing out a new edition of his works.

To deal forth eulogy or censure on authors' works or public performances, requires knowledge of the art, liberality, and impartiality; but alas! it too frequently happens, that a very little real knowledge, and much partiality and prejudice is mixed up with musical criticism; the consequence is, that the young student is misled by assuming an unfair elevation to one author's works, and condemning the sterling good of another.

It is hard that men like Cherubini, who have spent their whole lives in the science, and from whose instructions a whole host of musicians have arisen, and some of them to great eminence, should have his well earned fame tarnished so undeservedly.

I hope the inimitable Costa, or the energetic Jullien, will on some occasion conduct this and his other overtures, and allow our friend "Pyrrhus" to hear the overrated music of Cherubini.

I am, Sir,

Yours faithfully,

A SUBSCRIBER.

York, October 18, 1851.

ANDANTE AND ANDANTINO.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

DEAR SIR,—If I recollect rightly, in your number dated April 12th, you partly promised an article on the terms "Andante and Andantino." I feel reluctant to trespass upon your time and space, but I also feel extremely anxious to see something definite on the subject to which I have directed your attention, therefore trust you will excuse the liberty thus taken to remind you of your promise. It has occurred to me that probably Mr. G. A. Macfarren, who is evidently a most profound musician, and to whom we are all so much indebted for his able, interesting, and most valuable critiques, would kindly favour us with his opinion on the subject, which, by the by, would decide the thing at once.

I think it important that the point should be cleared up if possible, as I am convinced we, most of us, have but a confused idea as to the precise difference between the terms, which often give rise to unpleasant quibbling amongst amateurs and even professors.

Believe me, Sir,
Yours very faithfully,
EDWARD THURNAM.

Reigate, Oct. 10th, 1851.

PYRRHUS v. CHERUBINI.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR.—In perusing an article about Cherubini in the last number of the Musical World, I was very much struck with the insertion of an article in a public journal, which shows how it is possible to write such a profound deal of ignorance on the matter, and is, besides, from beginning to end, full of contradictions.

Mr. Pyrrhus begins by saying he knows hardly enough (and that's clear) of Cherubini—Why, then, venture an opinion about him?—all that he has ever heard of him are some overtures; but as Cherubini has written more than a dozen operas, sinfonies, requiems, quartetts, and his chef d'œuvre, the grand Mass in D minor (of which Mr. Pyrrhus does not speak at all), he really would have done better to begin with the end of his article that's to say—"first to endeavour to get a peep (!!) at some of his compositions, and then judge;" but as matters now stand, I am sure your subscribers are not at all anxious to hear any more of Mr. Pyrrhus and his spirited doubts about Cherubini.

What are your German and French readers to say, if they are told by Mr. Pyrrhus that Cherubini is not merely unappreciated, but unknown in their country; what the Italians, when they hear that Mr. Pyrrhus does not care at all for their opinion? Perhaps Mr. P. is not aware that Cherubini himself was Italian, and that a country which has produced men like Palestrina, Marcello, Pergolesi, Jomelli, Guglielmi, Lulli, Caldara, Scarlatti, Paesello, Cimarose, Rossini, &c., stands in no need of advocacy from an Englishman! If Mr. Pyrrhus writes as an amateur, we advise him to be more careful in future about matters of this kind; but if he be a musician, we hardly can explain such an anomaly. Of the many contradictions in Mr. Pyrrhus's article, I give only one;—"He joins others in acknowledging that Cherubini is one of the great masters of the art." Two lines farther, he writes: "The divine fire of the overtures to Faniska and Les deux Journées is hardly sufficient to entitle him to the high position he maintains."

I could say a great deal more about Cherubini, Mr. Pyrrhus, and his doubts; but I am afraid to intrude upon the patience of your readers, and will finally only allude to the relation between Cherubini, Beethoven, and Mendelssohn. That the latter should never have spoken of Cherubini is hard to be believed, as he was a pupil of his, and we know too well the veneration he had, like all the pupils of Cherubini, for his master; and that a man standing so high in the art as Cherubini should not have answered a letter, or never given utterance to one syllable of eulogy in favour of Beethoven, after having styled him "the most gifted living composer," seems literally impossible, it being known that Cherubini's meedat was so remarkable, that when he was induced to dedicate his best opera, Les deux Journées, to Haydn, he said, "No; I have not yet written anything worthy of this great genius!"

I am, Sir,
Yours very faithfully,
A SUBSCRIBER.

October 15th, 1851.

BURNEY'S HISTORY OF MUSIC.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

DEAR SIR,—Will you please inform me where can Dr. Burney's History of Music be purchased? Is it not worthy of re-publication, if some spirited publisher would take it in hand? Perhaps it might be done by subscription or in monthly parts. Will you give it a thought, and oblige an old subscriber,
H. J. T.

Bayswater, September 15th, 1851.]

[Will some of our readers favour our correspondent with an answer?—Ed. M. W.]

Provincial.

BRISTOL.—THE DISTIN CONCERT.—So high is the reputation the Messrs. Distin have obtained that praise bestowed upon them is liable to be classed in the category of superfluities. We cannot, however, refrain from expressing an opinion that in the concert which these gentlemen gave at our theatre on Monday night, their previous performances were surpassed rather than merely equalled. The programme was an excellent one, commencing with a selection from Der Freischütz, and including the celebrated trumpet solo, "The soldier tired," which was performed by Mr. Distin with all his accustomed vigour and expression, and was enthusiastically encoired; a quartette, from the opera of Belisario, on the newly-invented patent "Euphonic" horns—names which the instruments well deserve, for anything more euphonic than the sounds elicited from them we never heard; a terzetto, by the brothers Distin, "Fin dell'éta," from Anna Bolena, was encoired, as was also "The Cuckoo Galop," a new composition, of some merit. Besides the instrumental performances, Mrs. T. Distin sang several solos very pleasingly, and obtained encores; a four part song, entitled "The Miller's Daughter," by Hartel, sung by Mrs. T. Distin and Messrs. H. W. and T. Distin, was received with great applause, and repeated by, we are sure, the unanimous desire of the audience. The concert concluded with the National Anthem.—Bristol Times.

LINCOLN.—(From a Correspondent.)—"A Grand Vocal and Instrumental Concert"—as styled in the bills—was given in this place on Thursday (9th inst.), at the County Assembly Rooms, and attracted a full and somewhat fashionable audience. If not "grand," the concert was undoubtedly good, the programme being far above the average of excellence. It included, in the first part, selections from Mendelssohn's Oratorio, Elijah; and in the second part a miscellany of the popular kind, so that variety was not wanting and all sects and parties might be satisfied. For instance, the churchman and lover of Mendelssohn (the terms, however, are not synonymous), might attend the first part, and decamp at the end, leaving Bellini, Donizetti, Meyerbeer, and Sir Henry Bishop to the patronizers of vocal music; while the followers of the latter, who, if that were possible, eschewed sacred music and Mendelssohn, might bide till the second part commenced, and turn to the strains of their affections. The first part, I said, was devoted to the Elijah—or selections therefrom. There was an exception. A pianoforte solo—andante and capriccio, themes from Mendelssohn's Elijah—was interpolated by Mr. William Wilkinson, Professor of the Royal Academy. The interpolation might obtain extenuation in a selection like the one in the programme, as the subjects of the piece were taken from the same composer to whom the first part was devoted; but the fact of having taken themes from a sacred work to dove-tail them and behash them into a fantasia, or something of the kind, appears to me extremely irreverent, and worthy of stringent reprehension. Mr. William Wilkinson, who is a native of Lincoln, may have conceived that anything would be well received at his hands, and doubtless may have thought he was conferring no small honour on Mendelssohn, by making his glorious airs the groundwork of a capriccio. In the latter Mr. Wilkinson was woefully mistaken. I heard several express their surprise that an acknowledged artist and a professor to boot, should have so far forgot himself. I must own Mr. William Wilkinson is an admirable pianist, and created a marked sensation in the second part. Unfortunately the piano he used was very indifferent, and militated largely against his playing. Mr. William Wilkinson proved himself an excellent-accompanyist in all the songs from Elijah. The selection consisted of the quartet "Cast thy burden on the Lord," sung by Mrs. Alexander Newton, Miss Louisa Nevett, Mr. Bridge Frodsham, and Mr. G. Brook: the air "Hear ye Israel," by Mrs. Alexander Newton; the tenor solo, "If with all your hearts," by Mr. Bridge Frodsham; the trio, "Lift thine eyes," by Mrs. Alexander Newton, Miss Louisa Nevett, and Mr. Bridge Frodsham; the contralto air, "Oh! rest in the Lord," by Miss Louisa Nevett; and the quartet, "Come every one that thirsteth," by Mrs. Alexander Newton, Miss Louisa Nevett, Mr. Bridge Frodsham, and Mr. G. Brook. I need not pause to point out the deficiency felt from want of an orchestra, nor affirm how much Mendelssohn's splendid music suffered thereby, more especially as Mr. Wilkinson presided so ably at the piano as accompanyist; nor need I hint at the substitution in the trio, "Lift thine Eyes," of a tenor for a soprano, more especially as Mr. Bridge Frodsham supplied the absent lady's place so satisfactorily, and left little to be desired. Mrs. Alexander Newton sang "Hear ye Israel," magnificently; and the quartet, "O come every one that thirsteth," was encored. Mrs. Alexander Newton made a decided impression. Her clear, pure, soprano voice, and the ringing quality of the upper tones, carried away the audience. I cannot give praise to the system of cutting oratorios, much less to giving the selections with the mere accompaniment of a piano. It is a mistake, and is unjust to the composer. Of the second part, which was more in favour with the public, I have but little to say. Bishop's glee, "When wearied wretches sink to sleep," sung by Mrs. Alexander Newton, Miss Louisa Nevett, Mr. Bridge Frodsham, and Mr. G. Brook, was encored. It was very nicely sung. Mr. Bridge Frodsham's high tenor notes come out with great effect in compositions of this kind. Mr. Henry Farmer executed in a highly skilful manner Ernst's "Carnaval de Venise," and was loudly applauded. Mrs. Alexander Newton's brilliant version of the scena, "Qui la voce," from I Puritani, was unanimously and urgently encored. A very charming ballad, by Clement White, called, "Ah! why didst thou tell me?" obtained the warmest encore of the evening, Mr. Bridge Frodsham rendering it with remarkable taste and expression. Miss Nevett, Mrs. Alexander's pupil, gave a new song, by one S. New (appropriate name), called "The Greek Slave," and exhibited a very pleasing voice, and a nice musical feeling. I should have wished she had something better to sing. Miss Nevett, I learned after the concert, was labouring under the effects of a recent fright, caught from an accident on her way to the station at King's Cross, by which she was nearly killed. The cab in which she rode was overturned and literally dashed to pieces, and Miss Nevett had to be dragged through the window, almost, as it may easily be imagined, in a state of insensibility. Of course, under such circumstances, great allowance must be made. Nevertheless, Miss Nevett gave indications of no ordinary ability. Among the other noticeable pieces of this part were, "Lo here the gentle Lark," by Mrs. Alexander Newton, vocalised like a bird, with violin obligato, vice flute, by Mr. Henry Farmer. "The Death of Nelson," by Mr. Bridge Frodsham; and the contralto air, "Nobil Signor," from the Huguenots, by Miss Louisa Nevett. The concert terminated with "God save the Queen." Mr. William Wilkinson acted as conductor.

MANCHESTER.—Mr. Charles Pitt, who for some seasons shared the leading tragic parts in our Theatre Royal, has been since that period sojourning in the United States, performing in a large number of theatres with very general success. Returned again to England, he has made his appearance at the Queen's Theatre, and on Thursday evening we were present at a part of his performance of the crooked-backed tyrant, "Richard III." The proverbial plenty of Brother Jonathan appears to have been useful, for he comes back to the land of his fathers considerably increased in substance, which, to a certain extent, detracts from that excellent make-up of his features we have so often had occasion to notice. His voice retains its power, and we thought it more flexible than on many former occasions. Of his acting, surrounded as he was by so little to assist his efforts or to carry out his meaning, it would be unjust to speak lightly; but we may venture to say, that we could not agree with his conception of the scene with Lady Anne; his levity was too apparent, and he lacked that fine delicacy of manner that could "weedle with the devil," or win the woman he had so recently made a widow. His best recommendation is, as it always was, that he plays earnestly, and with energy, whilst his tact and knowledge of stage business are considerable. In better company we can easily imagine him to have been much more effective, for the poetry of the scene was sadly managed, and it required a larger sketch of imagination than we are blessed with to believe the men we saw as soldiers and courtiers were not playing a joke upon us. Mrs. Weston, formerly of the Theatre Royal, played the "Queen" with a considerable degree of talent.—(Manchester Examiner.)

LIVERPOOL MUSICAL UNION.—It is with pleasure we record the successful establishment of this society among us. Mr. Haddock's appeal has been responded to in a mode which leaves no doubt of the existence of genuine musical predisposition in Liverpool. The performance on Friday evening last exhibited a care in the preparation, illustrated by practical excellence, which is not to be excelled in the boasted classical reunions of the metropolis. We noticed many of the leading artistes of the musical profession present, who expressed themselves in the most enthusiastic terms, and hoped, with ourselves, that a new era is dawning upon Liverpool, when true harmony will meet with universal encouragement. Press of matter has compelled us to postpone our notice of the performance till next week.—(Liverpool Mail)

WORCESTER.—(From a Correspondent.)—Miss Hayewood of the Royal Academy, gave an evening concert at the Natural History Room, on Thursday (Oct. 9). The singers were Miss Reeves, Miss Harriet Ward, Miss Hayewood, Mr. J. Jones, and Mr. Poole: instrumentalists, Miss Kate Loder and Miss Rachel Evans (pianists); and Mr. J. H. D'Egville (violin). In addition, the members of the Worcester Philharmonic Society lent their services. The overtures to La Guzza Ladra and Preciosa were played by the band. The singing in general was good, but does not claim our special notice. The only encore of the evening was awarded to Miss Kate Loder, who created quite a furor in Prudent's Lucia di Lammermoor fantasia, and was encored enthusiastically. The fair artist substituted Mendelssohn's "Rondo Capriccioso" in E minor, a still more splendid and far more gratifying display of executancy. In consequence of the badness of the weather, the concert was not so well attended as was expected.

READING—AMATEUR MUSICAL SOCIETY.—We are informed that arrangements are in progress for the re-organisation, and, it is hoped, establishment on a permanent basis, of a musical society in this town, to comprise all the professional musicians who are disposed to aid in an object of the kind, in addition to the amateur vocalists and instrumentalists lately belonging to the musical society, of which Mr. John Taylor was for a long time the secretary, but which was for some reason dissolved at the close of the last season. At the pressing solicitation of the projectors of the new society, the veteran leader of the old Amateur Society, Mr. Venue, has consented again to wield the baton in the character of their conductor; and under such a leadership we are sanguine in our anticipation of the renewal of the almost forgotten triumphs of the amateur society which was once so great an ornament to the town, and which placed Reading in a musical position that but few provincial towns could surpass. Already, the society has the promise of about fifty members, and several professional gentlemen have undertaken to assist at its practices and rehearsals. It will have one strong claim upon the public that we feel assured will be thoroughly appreciated—the proceeds of its concerts, after deducting the necessary expenses, are in every instance to be devoted to some of the charitable and other public institutions in the town. That the proposed society will be generally approved as well as appreciated we can hardly doubt; a present instance of the feeling being given by the Rev. J. C. Grainger having most cheerfully and kindly granted the gratuitous use of the school-rooms in Crown-street, for the society's meetings. A deficiency of wood wind instruments is at present complained of, but we trust this little obstacle will soon be overcome.

BARNET.—Mr. Frank Bodda's Evening Concert came off on Wednesday the 8th. He was assisted by the Misses Messent and Lascelles, and Mr. W. H. Grattan (vocalists), and Kate Loder. The programme was varied and attractive, and included the usual share of popular items. Kate Loder's performances were received with the greatest enthusiasm, and Schulhoff's "Carnaval de Venise" was encored unanimously. We never heard this delightful artist play with more brilliant effect. Miss Lascelles is a pupil of Mr. Frank Bodda, and made her first appearance in public on this occasion. As a debutante she was decidedly successful. Her voice is a mezzo-soprano of nice quality, the lower notes being rich and resonant. Mr. Frank Bodda was encored in several of his favourite songs. The Town Hall, where the concert was given, was very full.

Reviews of Music.

FLEURS EMBLEMATIQUES POUR LE PIANO, PAR JACQUES BLUMENTHAL.

- | | |
|--------------------------|-------------------------|
| No. 1. Primevère. | No. 4. Romarin. |
| " 2. Violette. | " 5. Pensée. |
| " 3. Rose. | " 6. Héliotrope. |

Cramer, Beale and Co.; Paris, Brandus and Cie.

Excepting always those very few whose transcendent merits distinguish them from all others, we may divide musicians into two classes.

The first of these, or at least that which critics have the habit to rank as the higher, consists of such as aim at a very high standard of excellence, but who see not with sufficient clearness the points they would strike; in other words, who rather emulate the beautiful, than appreciate it; who feel that there is something in the productions of the great masters beyond what admits of technical definition; as melodious progression, rhythm, harmonic combination and construction, but who cannot feel what constitutes this distinctive quality, and so vaguely strive to attain it in their own compositions, supposing that forced originality, or redundant elaboration of contrapuntal treatment, or of modulation, will give to their music that character which their intelligence enables them to observe in the works of others, but which their want of musical feeling prevents them from originating in their own.

Composers of this class we may designate artists of circumstance, who enter, we believe, upon the task of composition from design rather than from impulse; and, being men who possess in a greater or less degree an elevated order of intellectual capacity, apply all their powers to the cultivation of an art to which they have no natural vocation, and thus give to the world that very large mass of music which is without interest either for the professor, or for the layman, and which, while it is free from fault, is equally void of beauty.

The second class consists of those who are content to reflect the impressions they receive from those great works of art which their musical organization enables them to appreciate, although not to equal; and who, avoiding plagiarism, without producing anything new, reproduce these impressions in such varied forms and unaccustomed combinations, and so modified by the particular temperament and proficiency of the writer, as to give them, if not a decided originality, certainly a distinctive character, which must always have its amount of interest.

These we will distinguish as artists of nature, and the class comprises many composers whose position is next to that of the very highest; men who write, we may believe, from the love of writing, not from the ambition to distinguish themselves; from the necessity to write, not from the necessity for the profit of their productions, and who are, therefore, satisfied to put down the first thoughts that occur to them as they first occur to them, without torturing them out of their natural forms to force upon them an appearance of originality which they do not possess; or making the subject of such elaborate treatment as, being uncongenial to the ideas themselves, would annul the effect of their spontaneous freshness, and substitute nothing but pedantry and dulness in the place of it.

It is to this second class, though an humble member, that the author of the publications under notice belongs. His writings are characterized by fluency, spontaneous melody, decided feeling for something above commonplace, brilliancy, and a very large amount of effect for the executant, in proportion to the difficulty by means of which it is attained; but they show a want of schooling in their stiffness, and at the same time want of clearness, perspicuity, intention of construction, and in their occasional crudity of detail. Thus we find in them, without any striking originality, many truly charming ideas, and some very elegant passages that display, with good effect, the peculiarities of the instrument for which they are written; but an obvious want of purpose in the plan, which gives to them occasionally a vague wandering effect of lengthiness that approaches tedium, and some examples of harmonic combination or progression that, if not decidedly harsh, are certainly unsatisfactory. Upon the whole they are certainly of a description of music that will improve the taste, and stimulate the feeling of that order of players for whose performance they were designed, persons of that degree of intelligence whose literary appetite is satisfied with the diet of the ephemeral fashionable novels; who can appreciate elegance, who dream of beauty, but who know of sublimity nothing but its place in the dictionary.

"Primevère" is the most pretentious of the pieces before us and for that reason one of the most satisfactory. It contains all the faults we have specified as belonging generally to the writer, which are scarcely balanced by two very graceful melodic phrases. Its effect is certainly lengthy, the modulations are not well judged, and there is a passage in the key of G sharp major, at the bottom of page 5, that we think cannot gratify any ears but those of the author.

"Violette" is much shorter and proportionably better. Except for some curious affectations, peculiar to the author, and, especially an adventurous C sharp in the second bar that seems to have lost itself in a wrong key, and cannot find its way to a resolution, we should like it exceedingly.

"Rose" is a very graceful piece for the drawing-room.

"Romarin" as some resemblance to the funeral march in the Gazza Ladru, and it is written with some of the best things of Dussek; we are not unpleased to be reminded of this great original.

"Pensée" is our favourite of the series. The chief melody is unfortunately like Mr. Linley's ballad of "Constance," but the whole piece is, nevertheless, a most elegant and agreeable trifle.

"Héliotrope" we like the least of all. Even this, however, has quite enough in it to redeem it from inattention. A phrase occurring first in the key of B flat at page 5, which is not unsimilar to a popular subject in Maritana, is very pleasing.

In conclusion, we find more merit, and far more interest in these pieces, and in music of this character, than in the would be classical attempts of those composers who pervert such powers as nature has given them, in straining to produce what they cannot really conceive, and so giving nothing but tedious abortions to the world.

MARCHÉ MILITAIRE—POUR LE PIANO, PAR BLUMENTHAL.—
Cramer, Beale & Co.

All that has been said generally of the preceding pieces applies equally to this. It is brilliant, and comparatively easy; and it is certainly effective.

CANDIDATES FOR THE STAGE.

As war is called "the needy bankrupt's last resort," so is the stage often considered a certain haven of refuge for all who are unfit for anything else, or too idle to learn the rudiments of a laborious calling. It is the only trade which teaches itself, or comes by inspiration without apprenticeship. If Pitt was a "heaven-born minister" without experience, why not a perfect actor without practice? "I think I could do it quite as well, if not better!"

This is a common delusion of the untried theatrical tyro, who from pit or gallery listens to the applause which a Kean or a Kean can only elicit after twenty years' drudgery. It is in vain to paint this out to him. He tells you of Holland, and Powell, and Mossop, and Sheridan, who became actors all at once, and of Spranger Barry, who stepped from behind the counter on the boards, a perfect "Othello," and two years afterwards shook Garrick on his throne. All this was once said to me by a blear-eyed stripling without a voice, and not more than five-feet-one in stature, who wanted to come out in "Hamlet" or "Macbeth." I ventured to remark that Barry was singularly endowed by nature with physical requisites, such as are seldom combined in the same person, and that without some external gifts the case was hopeless. "Oh," said he, "genius could do without those paltry aids. Le Kain, the great French tragedian, was little and deformed, with a cast in his eye, a defective utterance, and an inexpressive face. Henderson spoke as if he had worsted in his mouth, had flat features, and a clumsy figure. Garrick was short and fat, and Edmund Kean was often husky." Heaven knows where he had picked up these rebutting facts, for he seemed to me profoundly uneducated, and spoke with a provincial accent which made my blood curdle.

Not long ago, a young lady wrote to me from the country, requesting to know if I could give her a benefit. She had never acted, and had never studied any particular character, but would undertake any leading part in tragedy I might suggest. She informed me she was engaged to be married, and could hit on no other means of furnishing her trousseau, or of detaining her affianced lord from an impending emigration to America. Another time, an angry candidate told me if I refused to engage him, he would appeal to the public, and publish my correspondence. As I could not for my life recollect that I had ever committed myself by writing to him, I was quite at a loss to guess how he could do this, but I told him calmly, as that was his intention, I would take care he should have very little to publish. The following letter is a specimen, from among the few I have preserved:—

"Sir,—i am a young man is daziroes of actin sheakspeer in youre theter. i hav a gud lddicashun, an am careless of trubl an ixpansis—I luk for no remunnerashong, I am wurthy to cummand, an in the meane time waite yur plaishure. an anser to a B at 3, Boot Lane wil confer obbliggashun. i doe not minshun my name til resalyng a favrite anser.—Youres, &c.

PATTEICK FLYNN.

Here is another, in a different strain, from a fair lady:—

"I have long resolved on a plunge which will determine the colour of my future life. The stage is my passion, and I am well read in the best dramatic authors. I have never acted, but have rehearsed twice before good judges, who assure me that I shall distance all competition. I wish to know what I am to expect for three performances of 'Lady Macbeth,' 'Julia,' in the 'Hunchback,' and 'Ophelia;' the three plays altered and re-written by myself to suit my own conceptions. I am twenty-three, my figure is petite, and has been pronounced faultless. My features are expressive, my eyes and hair dark, and my voice melodious. I do not think much of any actress now on the stage, and have formed ideas of my own, which I shall be happy to communicate, if this letter leads to what I wish—an interview. The bearer waits for your answer."

On this occasion, I felt curious to see my correspondent, and appointed time and place. She came in form, attended by a duenna, and presented to my view a little, fat, swarthy individual, unquestionably on the shady side of thirty-five, and altogether what the French call laide a faire peur. She was equally astonished and indignant that I would not encourage her views, and still more at my refusing to read her improvements on Shakespeare and Knowles. I was once actually challenged by an Amazon, or as I heard her emphatically called, "an Ajax of a woman," who had tormented me through many channels into giving her an appearance, and most unjustly suspected I had some share in a criticism on her performance which appeared in one of the papers, and was anything but flattering. She disguised herself as a naval officer, pretended to arrive suddenly at Gresham's from Kingstown, and wrote to the colonel commanding the garrison for a military second, as being an unprovided stranger. I verily believe she would have shot me if I had given her the opportunity, which I had no intention of doing, but the hoax exploded before there was any necessity to show fight.

I have always set myself stubbornly against the ambitious yearnings of stage-struck heroes or heroines. I have a natural disinclination to encourage young persons of either sex to embark in a profession where the chances of failure far outnumber the probabilities of success. I consider the metropolitan boards as an ineligible arena for these experiments, and, in a commercial point of view, the days have long passed when "the first appearance of a young lady or gentleman on any stage" produced an inflammation of the treasurer's accounts. I have got rid of many troublesome applications, and have spared the public some wearisome hours, by establishing a regular series of charges which the most confident and enthusiastic hesitate to encounter. Every unfledged novice who is burning to smell the lemps, assures you that he has interest to fill the house to suffocation; that his friends and the public are dying to see him; that the garrison will turn out to a man; that he is almost sure of the Lord Lieutenant's patronage; and that you are mad to deliberate. But if you remain deaf to the voice of the charmer, and say, in reply, "then pay me the moderate sum I require in exchange for all these brilliant advantages, and take them to yourself;" he pauses immediately, becomes blind to the alluring prospect, bows himself out, and ceases from further importunity.

Before the late reduction in prices, my regular scale was as follows:—

For an appearance in a five-act play	£70
Ditto in a three-act play	50
Ditto in a two-act farce	30
Ditto in an interlude, in one act	20
For my witnessing either of the above	10 extra.

Always excepting the last item, I should now, as a matter of course, modify all these charges to meet the depression of the times. I never found but one candidate enthusiastic enough to act on these conditions. He compounded for a selection from the "Revenge," in one act, to be considered as an interlude, and for which he paid £25. I "put him up," as the phrase goes, on the benefit night of a favourite comic actor. As he made his exit after the first soliloquy of "Zanga," a gallery wag said, very politely, "Thank'ee, sir, that will do;" which disconcerted the debutant for several minutes.—Leaves from the Portfolio of a Manager.

SCCILLANEOUS.

MELANCHOLY DEATH OF THE SON OF MR. JULIUS BENEDET. —It is with the sincerest regret we have to announce a fatal accident which occurred on the Rhone on the 4th of the present month, to the son of Mr. Benedot, the eminent composer, a fine boy of 12 or 14 years of age, and which has plunged his family in the greatest affliction. The following letter, dated Marseilles, October, 6th, gives all the particulars which have reached us:—"You remember, of course, the old bridge of St. Euprit, the existence of which is a disgrace to the French government. It offers an obstruction to the course of the river, similar to that of old London Bridge when the tide was on the ebb. When there is much water in the Rhone it effects a complete rapid, so that great attention and dexterity are then required 'to shoot' the arch; the passage under which is at all times attended with more or less danger. On the occasion to which I allude (the 4th inst.), the river, swollen by recent rain, was barely practicable, and yet they neglected to lower the chimney of the steamer on passing. One of the crew seeing the danger (for the helmsman was unable to keep us in the centre) ran forward, but he was too late. The chimney struck the arch, broke in the middle, and fell abast amongst a number of passengers, who had assembled at its base for heat and shelter, for the morning was cold and windy. Several English families were among the number, chiefly young girls, whose mothers happened to be at a distant part of the vessel. The confusion caused by the accident was very great, and it was increased by the smoke and soot which enveloped those in the neighbourhood of the funnel. As soon as it cleared away, it appeared that a fine boy, the son of Mr. Benedict, the composer, was dangerously wounded. An English physician, who was on board, gave every assistance, and the unfortunate youth was landed at Avignon, but, spite of every exertion, he expired during the evening from the injuries he received."

AWARD OF PRIZE FOR PIANO FORTES.—It would appear that the jurors, consisting of eminent professors of music, appointed to make the awards for the musical section of the Exhibition, had decreed to Messrs. Collard and Collard, the well-known pianoforte makers, a first class prize, the decision being unanimous. Another jury, called the group jury, consisting mainly of non-musical members, to whom the award had been subsequently submitted, have thought proper to reverse the decision, and to assign Messrs. Collard a secondary prize. Messrs. Collard have, in consequence, addressed a letter to the Royal Commissioners, protesting against such proceeding, and declaring their intention to reject any award but the one decreed to them by the musical jurors, and which decree they assert to be concurred in by a large body of the public, "among whom may be cited the names of some of the most eminent native and foreign professors of the age." They further state that it had never been intimated to them that the number or character of the various improvements introduced by them, and secured by patent right, should be brought into consideration, otherwise they would have been prepared to show that in this respect they were quite on an equality with their competitors. They had relied upon the supposition that the test of merit would be confined to the particular instruments exhibited, and which it will be seen was unanimously recognised by the musical jury in their favour. Messrs. Collard therefore request that the award be reconsidered, or that they be permitted to be heard before any competent tribunal to substantiate their claims. To this letter Mr. E. A. Bowring, acting secretary, replies on behalf of Her Majesty's commissioners, stating that at present (the letter is dated August 13th) they have no official cognisance of the awards of the various juries, and consequently are not in a position to entertain the question raised. In a second letter, Messrs. Collard stated that "No less than three great medals have been awarded among the few organs exhibited; while the pianofortes, one of the staples of our commerce, of which there are nearly 200 specimens, contributed by upwards of 100 exhibitors, the award has been limited to one great medal; an anomaly which we conceive is perfectly irreconcilable with the comparative commercial importance of the two instruments."—(Manchester Times.)

Mrs. ALEXANDER NEWTON and Mr. BRIDGE FRODSHAM have been singing at the Rotunda Room in Dublin with great ecclat. Mr. Levey, of the Theatre Royal, offered a renewal of their engagement to both lady and gentleman, but their services were required at Reading next week and they could not stay.

ALEXANDER LEE.—We regret to have to record the death of this well known and highly talented composer, which occurred last week. Alexander Lee was formerly the lessee of Drury Lane Theatre, and occasionally musical director under Mr. Bunn's management, and was the author of several ballads which obtained great popularity.

THE GREAT ORGAN FOR ST. GEORGE'S HALL, LIVERPOOL.—At the last meeting of the Town-council of Liverpool, Mr. J. B. Lydd stated that after the most mature consideration of the merits of various buildings, and seeing the organ which Mr. Willis had produced for the Great Exhibition, and the novelties introduced into that instrument, the committee had come to the unanimous conclusion that Mr. Willis should be the person to whom the building of the organ for St. George's Hall should be entrusted. The organ in question is intended to be larger than any other in the world, about twice the size of the famous one at Haarlem, and is intended to be furnished with at least 120 stops.

PROFESSOR WILSON.—We regret to learn that in consequence of the present delicate state of health of Professor Wilson, he has been obliged to make arrangements for dispensing with the delivery of his lectures on moral philosophy in the University of Edinburgh, at the ensuing session. Principal Lee is to undertake the duty for the learned professor.

RACHEL.—Such is the success of Mdle. Rachel's representations at Milan, that a mere admission to the theatre costs six Austrian lire, and a seat six more. An Austrian lire is equivalent to a French franc.

AMATEUR ACTORS.—The first performances out of London of the amateur actors playing for the Guild of Literature and Art, are fixed for November the 10th and November the 12th, at Bath and Bristol.

A MUSICAL PRODIGY.—The Constitutionnel of Paris speaks in the highest praise of a prodigy whose name is Paladihi, the very young son of a physician at Montpellier, and whose power and precocity in music are said to be almost without precedent save in the case of Mozart. This is news, as we have a hundred times said, which, however welcome, cannot be received without grave solicitude by those who count up the instances of wreck and waste caused by too eager an acceptance, and too feverish a development of what may be called infant genius.—Athenæum.

MDLLE. RUMMEL.—This fair vocalist was lately married to M. Schott the well known music publisher at Brussels.

MDLLE DUPREZ has been singing with great success at Brussels in the Sonnambula and Le Prophete.

CARL ORBETHUR, the talented harpist and composer, is at Brussels.

ANECDOTE OF PORPORA.—A cardinal being desirous to obtain a good organist for his chapel, requested Porpora to attend the service for the purpose of giving his opinion upon the probationary performance of a candidate, who had been especially recommended to his eminence. In an attempt to extemporise at the opening of the service, Porpora readily discovered the organist's superficial knowledge of the science. The cardinal, after the mass, inquired with much anxiety Porpora's opinion of a person so favourably introduced to his notice, received this reply, "He must needs be a man of unbounded charity." "Well, well, but I want to know your opinion of him as a musician." "I have already given it," said Porpora; "for he letteth not his left hand know what his right doeth."

Advertisements.

HERE IS YOUR REMEDY!

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.—A most miraculous Cure of Bad Legs, after 43 years' suffering.—Extract of a Letter from Mr. William Galpin, of 70, Saint Mary's-street, Weymouth, dated May 15th, 1881. To Professor Holloway, Sir,—At the age of 18 my wife (who is now 61) caught a violent cold, which settled in her legs, and ever since that time they have been more or less sore, and greatly inflamed. Her agonies were distracting, and for months together she was deprived entirely of rest and sleep. Every remedy that medical men advised was tried, but without effect; her health suffered severely, and the state of her legs was terrible. I had often read your Advertisements, and advised her to try your Pills and Ointment; and, as a last resource, after every other remedy had proved useless, she consented to do so. She commenced six weeks ago, and, strange to relate, is now in good health. Her legs are painless, without seam or scar, and her sleep sound and undisturbed. Could you have witnessed the sufferings of my wife during the last 43 years, and contrast them with her present enjoyment of health, you would indeed feel delighted in having been the means of so greatly alleviating the sufferings of a fellow creature. (Signed) WILLIAM GALPIN.

The Pills should be used conjointly with the Ointment in most of the following cases:—

Bad Legs	Coco Bay	Contracted and	Lumbago	Scurvy
Bad Breasts	Chiego-foot	Stiff Joints	Fires	Sore-heads
Burns	Chilblains	E'phantiasis	Rheumatism	Tumours
Bunions	Chapped hands	Fistulas	Scalds	Ulcers
Bite of Mosche.	Corns (Soft)	Gout	Sore Nipples	Wounds
toes and Sand.	Cancers	Glandular Swell-	Sore-throats	Yaws
Flies		ings	Skin-diseases

Sold by the Proprietor, 244, Strand, (near Temple Bar,) London; and by all respectable Vendors of Patent Medicines throughout the Civilised World in Pots and boxes, at 1s. 1d., 2s. 6d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 22s., and 33s. each. There is a very considerable saving in taking the larger sizes.

N. B.—Directions for the guidance of Patients are affixed to each Pot or Box.

EWER & CO.'S NEW MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS

Mendelssohn's	Music to Oedipus (performed at the Courts of St. James's and Berlin). Pianoforte score	15s. 0d.
"	Score and Parts will be published shortly.
"	Allegro brillante, Pianoforte Duet, Op. 92	5s. 0d.
"	Infelice, Scene for a Soprano with English and Italian words, and Pianoforte accents	4s. 0d.
"	On Wings of Music, arranged for Harp Solo by Oberthur ...	2s. 0d.
"	Six Lieder ohne Worte, arranged for Harp and Piano by do.	7s. 0d.
"	Andante from Symphony No. 4, arranged for the Organ by Chipp	3s. 0d.
F. A. Kummer.	Violoncello School, with 92 Studies	15s. 0d.
"	Capriccio for Violoncello and Piano	4s. 6d.
"	Swedish Air and Dance do.	3s. 6d.
"	Romance do. do.	2s. 0d.
"	Fantasia do. do.	2s. 0d.
Panofka.	Two Romances for Violin and Piano	3s. 0d.
W. Kruger.	La Gazelle, Impromptu for Piano solo	2s. 0d.
"	Les Clochettes, Variations for do.	2s. 6d.

Ewer and Co., Newgate-street.

THE ENGLISH GLEE AND MADRIGAL UNION,

(UNDER THE PATRONAGE OF HER MOST GRACIOUS MAJESTY),
 CONSISTING OF Mrs. Endersohn, Miss M. Williams, Mr. Lockett, Mr. Francis, Mr. Land, and Mr. H. Phillips, have the honour to announce the following arrangements:—Tuesday, October 31st, Deser's Assembly Rooms, Birmingham; Wednesday 22nd and Friday 24th, Liverpool Philharmonic Society; Thursday and Saturday, 23rd and 25th, Free Trade Hall, Manchester.—E. Land, Hon. Sec., 5, Foley-place, London.

SCHOTT AND CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.TENOR SOLO WITH ACCOMPANIMENT FOR PIANO.

Bezsens, A.	Souvenirs élégiques	4s. 0d.
--------------------	----------------------------	---------

VIOLONCELLO SOLOS WITH ACCOMPANIMENT FOR PIANO.

Damwisch, F.	Op. 1, Fantaisie and Variations sur des Thèmes Russes	5s. 0d.
Piatth, Alfred.	Op. 10, Amour et Caprice. Fantaisie	4s. 0d.
"	Op. 11, La Suedoise. Caprice sur des airs nationaux	3s. 6d.
"	Op. 12, Divertissement sur un air Napolitain	3s. 6d.
Stainlein, Louis.	Op. 4, Fantaisie caractéristique sur des motifs Hongrois	5s. 0d.
Servais, F.	Op. 9, Fantaisie burlesque ou le Carnaval de Venise	5s. 0d.
"	Op. 10, Souvenir de la Suisse. Caprice	4s. 0d.
"	Op. 10, Souvenirs élégiques par Beszens	4s. 0d.

* May also be had with accompaniment for Orchestra or Quartett.

FLUTE SOLOS WITH ACCOMPANIMENT FOR PIANO.

Briccialdi, G.	Op. 63, Deux Fleurs. Morceaux de Salon: No. 1, La Pensée	2s. 0d.
"	No. 2, La Rose	3s. 0d.
Deneux, I.	Op. 23, Le Carnaval de Venise de Servais	4s. 0d.
Ortner, A.	Piece de Salon. Romance	2s. 6d.
Gabrielaki, I.	Ime. Fantaisie	4s. 0d.

Schott and Co., 89, St. James's street.

FAIRY VISIONS,

Price 2s.

MESSRS. KAUFMAN and SON, of Dresden, who have performed before Her Majesty the Queen by special command at Buckingham Palace, have given concerts at Manchester and Liverpool with the greatest success, and have specially engaged Miss Rebecca Isaacs, who introduced her celebrated song, "Fairy Visions," in which she completely took the audience by surprise, this song being well suited to her refined and beautiful voice; she met with the most enthusiastic encore. The fairy like manner in which the words were expressed will render "Fairy Visions" the most popular song of the season.

LEE & COXHEAD, 48, Albemarle-street, where may be had "We're Messengers from Fairy Land," Duet for two Sopranos, price 2s. 6d.

TEDESCO'S PIANOFORTE WORKS.PUBLISHED BY WESSEL & Co.

Premier Nocturne	2s. 6d.
"The Cottage," { Three German	2s. 6d.
"True Love," { Melodies,	2s. 0d.
"Loreley," {	3s. 0d.
"Les Etolles," { Three Etudes	2s. 6d.
"Le Torrent," { de Concert.	2s. 6d.
"The Curfew," {	5s. 0d.
"Fase," second Nocturne	2s. 0d.
"Scène Russe," Caprice brillant	4s. 0d.
"Farewell," { Three German	2s. 0d.
"Faithlessness," { Melodies,	2s. 6d.
"Adieu," {	2s. 6d.
"L'Adieu de Mozart," {	3s. 6d.

The above are Copyright.
 Wessel & Co., 329, Regent-street, London.

MUSIC FOR THE ORGAN OR HARMONIUM.

THE AMATEUR ORGANIST—a collection of soft and full Voluntaries, arranged in six Books, 3s. each, by EDWARD TRAVIS, and may be had elegantly bound, price 18s. "Mr. Travis has introduced to the musical world a new and interesting work for the Organ or Harmonium, under the title of 'The Amateur Organist.' Mr. Travis has availed himself of an extensive and classical music library, and selected with great taste the most beautiful morceaux of the great masters, Foreign and English. To lovers of classical music this work will be found to be the most superb selection that has ever issued from the musical press."—Vide Musical Review.

THE AMATEUR INTERLUDIST—a collection of short Interludes to play between the Verses of the Psalms, in one Book, price 4s., by EDWARD TRAVIS and J. P. DYER.

THE AMATEUR PRELUDIST—a collection of Preludes, with the Organ Stops carefully marked, in one Book, price 4s., by EDWARD TRAVIS.

SACRED VOCAL MUSIC.

KELLER'S Collection of ANTHEMS, CHURCH SERVICES, CHANTS, &c., arranged for the Voice and Piano, in six Books, price 3s. each, with six beautiful and appropriate designs by Brandard, arranged by ALBERT KELLER. The six Books can be had in one Volume, elegantly bound, price 18s.

THE PSALMODIA BRITANNICA—a selection of Psalms and Hymns for the Voice and Organ, in six Books, price 3s. each, arranged by EDWIN FLOOD, and may be had in one Volume, neatly bound, price 18s.

London: LEE & COXHEAD, 48, Albemarle-street, and can be had of all Book and Musicellers.

N.B.—A New Edition of "Hark, the Sabbath Bells," by Edwin Flood.

JOULE'S DIRECTORIUM CHORI ANGLICANUM.

Second Edition, price 1s., in cloth 1s. 6d.

THE most complete Choral Service book that has yet appeared. Dedicated by permission to the Lord Bishop of Manchester. For highly favourable reviews see "Christian Remembrancer," "Theologian," "Parish Choir," &c. &c. London: J. A. Novello.
 A few copies of the quarto edition, price 15s., still on hand.

BLUMENTHAL'S NEW PIANOFORTE MUSIC.FLEURS EMBLEMATIQUES:

No. 1, Primavera	4s. 0d.
" 2, Violette	3s. 0d.
" 3, Rose	3s. 0d.
" 4, Romarin	3s. 6d.
" 5, Penete	2s. 6d.
" 6, Heliotrope	3s. 6d.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent-street.

THE POPULAR SONG OF THE DAY.

"TALK OF HIM THAT'S FAR AWAY," composed by THOMAS CHANTREY. A new edition of which is just issued, may be had at ADDISON & HOLLIER'S, 210, Regent-street, London. For simplicity, elegance, and originality of melody, it is unrivalled.
 Also, by the same author, "Why wilt thou not love?" and "The dream is past."

GREAT DISCOVERY IN HARMONY.

Now ready, price 5s.

THE PRINCIPLES OF NATURAL HARMONY, being a Perfect System founded upon the discovery of the True Semitonic Scale, by J. H. HAITE. London, Published by the Author, 76, Leadenhall-street. To be had of Messrs. Ewer and Co., Newgate-street, and Messrs. Cocks and Co., New Burlington-street.

THE "CLIPPER," OR REGATTA POLKA.By J. G. CALLCOTT,

AUTHOR of the "Elfin Polka," "Queen of the Night Waltzes," &c., is now ready at Cramer, Beale, and Co.'s, 201, Regent-street, with an illustration of the American schooner. Price 2s.

Printed and Published for the Proprietor by MICHAEL SAMUEL MYERS, of No. 3, Studley Road, Clapham Road Clapham Road, in the parish of Lambeth, at the office of MYERS & Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, in the parish of St. Paul, where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed, post paid To be had of G. PARKES, Dean Street 8.40; Allen, Warwick Lane; Vickers, Holywell Street, and at all Booksellers.—Saturday, October 18, 1851.

The Musical World.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s.; Half year, 8s.; Three Months, 4s.; (Stamped Copies 1s. per Quarter extra, payable in advance, to be forwarded by Money Order, to the Publishers, Myers & Co., 22, Tavistock-st., Covent Garden).

No. 43.—VOL. XXIX.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 25, 1851.

Price Fourpence.
Stamped Fivepence

TO SUBSCRIBERS.

The Publishers of THE MUSICAL WORLD respectfully request that those subscribers who have not paid their overdue subscriptions will do so forthwith. Post office orders to be made payable on the Charing Cross Post Office to "Messrs. Myers & Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden.

THE GREAT EXHIBITION MEDALS.

Our readers will have perused, with no small degree of astonishment, the Protest of the Jurors, Class X a, in the matter of Broadwood and Sons, which appeared in our columns of last Saturday. At the first blush of the facts, it would seem altogether incredulous that in matters respecting the construction, principle, novelty, and excellence of pianofortes, any set of men could be found sufficiently bold and senseless as to set at defiance the matured and well-weighed opinions of Sterndale Bennett, Thalberg, Cipriani Potter, Sir Henry Bishop, Sir George Smart, the Chevalier Neukomm, Hector Berlioz, and others well qualified to adjudicate thereon; and the question would naturally arise, "Who are these great musical and mechanical authorities who have measured and contested the declarations of such able and practical men?" When it is discovered that the dissentients are composed of very amateurs and non-amateurs—men utterly incapable of passing any opinion whatever on the merits of the case—incredulity will be changed to a smile, and astonishment converted into indignation. To a still greater extent will the feelings of our readers be carried, when they learn that the "dissentients," not satisfied with putting their veto on the decision of the appointed jurors, assumed to themselves a power to which they had no possible right, and rescinded the award which, after fair trial and timely deliberation, had been conscientiously bestowed.

In order to afford a clear insight into the whole proceeding, we will lay a full statement of the case before our readers, who will then be enabled to form a true estimate of one of the most extraordinary acts of juridical perversion that ever issued from a body of honourable gentlemen.

In the account of the institution of the juries, read by Lord Canning in the Report before His Royal Highness Prince Albert, in the Great Exhibition, on the 15th inst., it is therein stated, "that they alone (the jurors) possessed the requisite authority on all matters entrusted to them; that the functions of the Council of Chairmen were circumscribed and confined to framing rules to serve as a direction and guidance for the prizes; that under particular circumstances, a power was given them to place a veto on their decisions; but that on no account were they to substitute or originate an award of their own. The first act of the Council of Chairmen was to break through this specification, and to annul the decision of the constituted juries, who, in the case of Messrs. Broadwood and Sons, awarded them the Council Medal.

It must be acknowledged that a gross error was committed at the very outset. The constitution of the three juries was in itself an absurdity. The first was entirely special, or professional. The second, called "Group Jury," consisted of the first, joined to groups taken from other juries. The decisions of the first jury were liable to be reversed by the second—that is, the judgment of the professionals was made amenable to that of the non-professionals—a most untoward, and ridiculous, and contradictory mode of obtaining knowledge on matters connected with art. The Council of Chairmen, composed of the chairmen of all the juries, (containing, therefore, only one specially qualified person for each case) could again control the decision of the second, or Group Jury. So that, the fewer special members a jury contained, the greater its authority.

Candidates had to pass the ordeal of all the three juries before obtaining a prize. The Messrs. Broadwood passed the two first, and were recommended for a Council Medal. According to the declaration of the Commission, as announced in the Report, this was binding on the Council of Chairmen, unless they could allege either irregularity in the previous proceedings, or shew that the award was only for degree of excellence, unaccompanied by novelty.

In the case of the Messrs. Broadwood, there was no charge of irregularity adduced in the proceedings of the two juries. In the face of a professional jury, the Council of Amateurs could hardly have ventured to deny the excellence of Messrs. Broadwood's instruments, while they could have attached no weight to the question of novelty, since they awarded a Council Medal to Messrs. Erard, avowedly for their "action," an invention patented in 1824, twenty-seven years ago.

Let it be understood here, that we are not directly advocating the cause of the Messrs. Broadwood, nor asserting the superiority of their pianos over those of contemporary manufacturers; that is a question entirely foreign to our present purpose. We are upholding the broad principles of justice, and only desire that merit should be given where it is due, and has been duly awarded.

Granting that the excellence of the Messrs. Broadwood's instruments was allowed, and that their "novelty" was called in question, it was known—or should have been—to the Council of Chairmen, that the Messrs. Broadwood sent in a specification of several "important novelties" in the construction of their instruments, introduced within the last three years, and to which they mainly attribute their perfection, and upon which they laid great stress in their description. The honorable members of the council could not be supposed to understand the peculiarities of construction and the utilities contained in these "novelties;" but they must have been aware that such improvements could not have escaped the inspection of the first jury, or professionals, and should have paid peculiar attention to them in consequence.

In the Protest of the first jury it will be seen that allusion is made to a mis-statement—subsequently withdrawn—affecting Messrs. Broadwood's claims as "improvers" of the piano. According to the information conveyed to us, it was stated before the Council of Chairmen that the Messrs. Broadwood admitted the absence of novelty in the construction of their instruments; but this statement being rectified left the Council no loop to hang a doubt upon.

To show in what a vague and blundering manner the constitution of the juries was carried out, we may mention that Dr. Black, an American physician, (!) was nominated as one of the "musical jury." That he did not attend in Committee could not be esteemed a loss; but how he got to be appointed Messrs. the Commissioners alone can answer. Although this gentleman declared his agreement in the award of the jury to Messrs. Broadwood's pianos, he had previously asserted at a meeting of the "Groups" that, as a proof of the superiority of Messrs. Erard's pianos, the greater part of the foreign pianos in the building was copied after their model. This statement he subsequently withdrew, declaring it to be "erroneous."

The whole facts of the case may be thus simplified:—The first jury, or Professionals, awarded the "Great Medal" to Messrs. Broadwood and Sons for "their successful improvements in pianoforte making." This jury, for the greater part, was composed of the most competent judges in the country:—Thalberg and Sterndale Bennett, two of the first pianists of the day; Cipriani Potter, an admirable pianist and thorough musician; Sir Henry Bishop and Sir George Smart, men of renown in their art variously; Hector Berlioz, a great musician and critic, and one of the first authority in musical matters in Europe; the Chevalier Neukomm, an able and popular composer and professor; Dr. Shafthautl, a German musician of fame—all of whom decided that the Messrs. Broadwood were entitled to the Council Medal. The second, or group jury, unanimously ratified their decision. The Council of Chairmen, without cause or reason assigned, annulled the verdict of both and refused the award.

We cannot pretend to fathom the motives of the members of the Council of Chairmen in reversing the decisions of both the professional jury and the group jury. We would not accuse them of partizanship, seeing that they are all honorable men, of positions and incomes; nor of hostility having no clue or line to get at their reasons; nor of being influenced by the hints and opinions of others, knowing that honorable men have wills and determinations of their own. We must therefore—unwillingly, we say—set down their fiat to sheer ignorance and presumption; and in this we but plead in their behalf, since the most ingenious advocate could discover no better extenuation or apology for such unaccountable and unparalleled misapplication of the simplest rules of common justice.

Judicially speaking, the Council of Chairmen were selected to act in the place of judges. They were to receive the verdict of the jury, and pass sentence accordingly. This is the first time we have heard of a judge rescinding the verdict of a jury. What would be said of the Lord Chief Baron, or Chief Justice in a court of law, if, after hearing the decision of twelve constituted men, he were to exclaim, "Gentlemen of the Jury,—It is all very well for you to bring me up such a sentence. I know better. I shall reverse your verdict?" The parallel is not favourable to the Council of Chairmen. In the law case, the jury might haply be entirely ignorant of the technicalities of the matter at issue. The Judge might, peradventure, have the best possible reasons for believing that the conclusion to which the jury arrived was contrary to law and equity. In the other instance, the jury alone was master of the subject—the judges were the ignoramuses.

We may mention here as a significant fact, which we have received from the very best authority, that had there been only one Council Medal to be awarded, it would have been unhesitatingly given to Messrs. Broadwood and Sons by the first jury.

In the case of the Messrs. Collard, the decision was hardly less grievous and vexatious. The professional jury—the only competent tribunal, as every unprejudiced person must allow—unanimously awarded a Council Medal to that celebrated firm. The verdict was rescinded by the Second, or Group Jury.

The Council of Chairmen have won for themselves a by no means enviable renown. They will be long remembered in the annals of the Great Exhibition, as among its rarest and most striking curiosities. The contributors to the Crystal Palace will not soon forget the fusion of the Dogberry and Angelo authority exemplified in some of the constituted officials. But as imbecillity is not always stingless, nor arrogance without its acumen, it were to be wished that the solemn protest of the professional jurors may have its effect in awakening His Royal Highness Prince Albert and the Commissioners to a sense of the insults offered and the injuries inflicted. The Messrs. Broadwood have nothing to apprehend from the obliquitous view taken by their judges. They stand in no need of praise or recommendation from juries on benches, or councillors in chairs. The flats of Councils of Chairmen are to them matters of small moment. Their name is world-wide. They may repose on their laurels, well-won and hard-won. They may look with indifference on decisions and decretals propounded as they were at the Great Exhibition. Neither will the reversal of their judgment affect the honourable body of the Professional jurors. Their names stand too high to be influenced by puny and ignorant antagonism. The celebrity they have gained, and the honours they have won, will still flourish, despite jejune attempts of puerile amateurship to cast a shadow over their brightness. And so a first and last farewell to the Council of Chairmen of the Great Exhibition of 1851.

A VILLAGE ORATORIO.

By GEORGE HOGARTH.

A few years ago, during the Easter holidays, I witnessed a scene, common in the West of Riding Yorkshire and the adjoining districts of Lancashire and Derbyshire, but unknown in any other part of England—the performance of a village oratorio. It was delightful, not merely as gratifying the musical taste, but the feelings derived from the contemplation of innocent happiness. The performance was announced, and a programme published, containing a splendid selection from the works of Handel and Haydn, with all the “pomp and circumstance” of a musical festival. A walk of a mile or two along a pretty road, covered with gay parties of the “beauty and fashion” of the neighbourhood, in their carriages, barouches, and cabriolets, and with equally gay and happy, but humble groups, tripping joyously along in their holiday attire, all animated and enlivened by the bright beams of a vernal sun, led me to a handsome and spacious village church, where, in due time, these various groups were congregated into a numerous audience. The organ loft presented the imposing spectacle of a large and well appointed orchestra and chorus, with the principal male and female performers, names not unknown to fame, that is, a fame extending some twenty miles round, duly ranged in front. I waited with some apprehension for the voice that was to burst from this goodly body, fearing that it might dispel the charm. But the first grand crash of the instruments, and the first swelling peal of the chorus, made me feel that I had nothing to fear. A simple and majestic overture of Handel, followed by a chorus of the same character, disposed every body to earnest attention; and a succession of the most magnificent, complicated, and arduous sacred compositions extant, given in a profusion that would have surfeited the sickly stomachs of our metropolitan dilettanti, were listened to with a depth of silence which I have never witnessed, save in an assembly engaged in devotion. The performers were not unworthy of the audience. I felt little surprise at the correctness of the choruses; for the choristers of this district have long enjoyed unrivalled celebrity in that respect; but I expected to find it accompanied with considerable noise and coarseness. I was, however, agreeably disappointed: and, indeed, a little reflect-tion might have told me that a degree of familiarity with music of the most exalted kind, sufficient to produce ease and accuracy in its performance, must also refine the taste and raise it above vulgarity. Even in the solo singers, this, to a considerable extent, must happen, though, in their case, the standard of refinement is necessarily higher; and, accordingly their style, on the whole, possessed a purity far beyond what might have been expected from their opportunities, and far surpassing what is to be found among country singers of any other class.

Of these singers and players, very few are professional. Most of them are industrious tradespeople, cultivating music from love of the art, and making its practice their dearest recreation. The only professional use they make of it, is their accepting engagements to perform at the great music meetings all over the kingdom, where their services are indispensable; but even this they do on terms which exclude the idea of mercenary views,—their remuneration seldom exceeding what is necessary to defray their expenses. But they see something of the world, they hear their beloved Handel in all his grandeur and beauty, and that is enough for them. The performers belong to the same class with the greatest portion of their audience, among whom are their families, their kindred, their friends and associates; so that the spirit of music pervades the people of this district in a manner unknown and unfelt in the rest of our island. To see anything like it, we must go among the rustics and artisans of several parts of Germany, where we may still meet with those pictures of simple and virtuous happiness which seem to be fast disappearing from the earth. These humble musicians of Yorkshire have many a time reminded me of the pleasing domestic picture of Haydn's family, given by one of his biographers. The father of that great man was a wheelwright in a sequestered Austrian village; and exercised, besides, the functions of sexton and organist to the village church. “He had a fine tenor voice, was fond of his organ, and of music in general. On one of those journeys which the artisans of Germany often undertake, being at Frankfort-on-the-Main, he learned to play a little on the harp: and on holidays, after church, he used to take his instrument while his wife sang. The birth of Joseph did not alter the habits of this peaceful family. The little domestic concert came round every week: and the child, standing before his parents with two pieces of wood in his hands, one of which served him as a violin and the other as a bow, constantly accompanied his mother's voice. Haydn, when loaded with years, and with glory, often recalled the simple airs which he had sung,—so deep and indelible an impression had those first melodies made on his soul.” It would not be difficult to find, in Yorkshire, such families as those of the good wheelwright, and such domestic concerts as those which awoke the genius of his illustrious son. Out of some family of this sort, too, an English Haydn might have sprung, were a musical education as generally accessible in England as it is in Germany.

The district which thus forms the musical focus of England is filled with a dense manufacturing population. Its inhabitants are crowded together in numberless towns and villages; its once romantic streams are made to toil in giving motion to machinery; and its blue skies are lost in clouds of ever enduring smoke. For rustics there are artisans; for solitary shepherdesses, troops of factory girls. There are fluctuations in employment and in wages; transitions from abundance which tempts to reckless and riotous profusion, to grinding penury and its equally baleful train. There are, in short, all those elements of misery and vice which are so fearfully at work among the people of England; and yet it is no less gratifying than true, that some power counteracts their operations. The people, in their manners and usages, retain much of the simplicity of the "olden time;" the spirit of the industrious independence maintains its ground among them in spite of the demoralizing progress of pauperism and poor laws; they are religious in spite of the spread of infidelity; and they love their families and firesides, in spite of the attractions of the beer-shop. All this, of course, is not universally the case; but its general truth, to a remarkable extent, will be doubted by no one who has lived among and known the people of this neighbourhood. The power to which these effects are, in a very considerable degree, to be ascribed, we hesitate not to affirm, is Sacred Music.

Music has been given us, by our bountiful Creator, to assist in smoothing the path of human life. The same Being who has covered the face of nature with bright and beautiful colors, has filled the air with sweet and expressive sounds. He has taught us to listen to the melody of the birds, the sighs of the passing breeze, and the accents of the human voice, with feelings akin to those with which we gaze on the glorious heavens, the verdure of the woods, and the meadows enamelled with a thousand flowers. And he has taught us too, to make our sense of the beauties of nature, derived from the eye or the ear, the foundation of two exquisite arts, by which not only our perceptions of these beauties are quickened and enhanced, but our intellectual and moral qualities are called into action. Painting and Music perform much higher parts than that of merely ministering to human pleasure. They are great moral agents; and (according as they are used or abused) powerful instruments of good or ill. Painting has been but too successfully prostituted to purposes of grossness and depravity; but a mind must be gross indeed, that is incapable of deriving purity and elevation from the divine conceptions of Raphael; and hopelessly depraved, to be unable to profit by the fearful warnings of Hogarth. As a moral agent, however, the influence of Music is more powerful than that of Painting. To look at pictures a calm and contemplative pastime, generally resorted to at seasons when the mind is not predisposed to excitement. Music most frequently exerts its power in heightening an excitement that already exists. In the one case, (to draw an illustration from physics,) the vis inertiae of the mind requires a very strong impulse to put it in motion; in the other, rapidity is given to a previous movement by an accelerating force. To the sensualist, the blandishments of luxurious indulgence are rendered more alluring by the addition of voluptuous music; while, on the other hand, courage is raised to heroism by the sound of the trumpet, and devotion kindled into rapture by the peal of the organ, and the solemn swell of choral voices, joining in songs of thanksgiving and praise. How beautifully does Milton describe the effect of Sacred Music in exalting religious feeling!

"But let my due feet never fail
To walk the cloister's studious pale,
And love the high embower'd roof,
With antique pillars massy proof,
And storied windows richly dight,
Shedding a dim religious light.
There let the pealing organ blow
To the full voiced choir below,
In service high and anthem clear,
As may with sweetness, through mine ear,
Dissolve me into ecstasies,
And bring all heaven before mine eyes."

The highest and noblest musical compositions,—even if we consider them merely as productions of art—are those consecrated to the service of religion. They are the work of those who have reached the very summit of excellence—of those in whose bosoms the fire of genius has burned with the most transcendent brightness. It is impossible to be conversant with such works without being in some degree imbued with the spirit which gave them birth. There are persons who affect to despise the moral and religious influence of music and tell us that people resort to our churches to hear The Messiah for the same reason that they go to the theatre to see Macbeth or Othello,—that is, for the sake of amusement. Granted that they go with that view, is amusement all they obtain? Even from Macbeth and Othello much moral good may be drawn, and much more might be drawn were it not for the sources of evil contained, not in those matchless pieces themselves, but in the places where they are represented. Our very churches, even when employed in the rites of religion, are sometimes resorted to for unhallowed sport. But "fools, that come to scoff, remain to pray;" and something similar I believe to be the case with many who go to hear The Messiah of Handel. With whatever levity of spirit they may enter the church, few leave it without feeling themselves, for a time at least, both "sadder and wiser." Look at the altered demeanor of the departing audience. Observe the slow step, the suppressed speech, the stillness of feature which indicates the subsidence of strong emotion; and then judge whether persons bearing marks of so subdued a spirit have been engaged in a mere amusement.

If such is the case with those who listen only occasionally to the most sublime and hearty touching passages of Holy Writ, conveyed through the medium of the noblest and most pathetic strains ever imagined by human genius, how much deeper and more abiding must be their impression on those who find in them the sweetest relaxation from their daily toil, and the most pleasing occupation of their hours of ease and happiness! When, therefore, the favored pastime of the artisans and mechanics of Yorkshire is of so sober and chastened a character, can we wonder that their moral and social condition should be such as I have already described? To encourage and promote among them so salutary a recreation ought to be the care of their employers; and the example given by a very eminent member of their body well worthy of general imitation.

"Mr. Strutt, of Belper," says a writer in a musical journal, "encourages music from a much higher view than that of ministering to his own gratification. He is one of the greatest manufacturers in the kingdom, and his immense establishments give employment and support to a numerous population, to whose comfort and welfare he pays unwearied attention. It is in pursuit of this benevolent object that he promotes the cultivation of music among them. At a great sacrifice, both of time and money, he encourages its practice among his male and female work-people who show a disposition for it; and engages a music master from Derby, twice or thrice a week, to give them lessons. Among these people he truly finds that music 'emollit mores, nec sinit esse ferus;' and it is earnestly to be wished that such an example were generally followed in establishments where great numbers of people are employed. Wherever the working classes are taught to prefer the pleasures of intellect, and even of taste, to the gratification of sense, a great and favourable change takes place in their character and manners. They are no longer driven by mere vacuity of mind to the beer-shops; and a pastime which opens their minds to the impressions produced by the strains of Handel and Haydn, combined with the inspired poetry of the Scriptures, becomes something infinitely better than the amusement of an idle hour. Sentiments are awakened which make them love their families and their home; their wages are not squandered in intemperance and they become happier as well as better."

HENRI HERZ—REMINISCENCES OF HIS TRAVELS IN AMERICA.

(Translated from "La France Musicale," by W. Grilliers.)

(Continued from page 666.)

A "CONCERT MONSTRE."

In New York, as in all large towns of commerce it is very difficult for an artist (no matter how renowned he may be) to keep public attention awake for any length of time. The North American is passionately attached to business, partakes moderately of amusements, and holds the arts but in moderate esteem; in regard to the latter, one is compelled to employ the most extraordinary devices, to have, as it were, his attention continually on the "qui vive;" and these artful stratagems must be renewed as frequently as possible. Knowing this, and not wishing to lose any of my popularity, I (at my seventeenth concert) announced by large bills and in all the newspapers, my "Last Concert but Three," then "but Two," and then my last one. This latter was re-demanded, and then it was my "Farewell Concert;" the number of persons in no way diminished, the room was as full and as crowded as on the first day. I could not reasonably abandon so successful a vein, and determined to announce a "Concert Monstre" for which I had arranged a piece for eight pianos and sixteen pianists. This project had hardly got whispered about (the newspapers had not even mentioned it) before every seat was retained. One might be puzzled to explain this eagerness were I not to add that, never before in New York a reunion of so many pianists had taken place, and that many imagined there would be a struggle for superiority on the part of each. This announcement had the effect of putting all the town in commotion; my concert was spoken of as a thing without a precedent; each artist had his champion and adversary, which was the occasion of numerous bets, both in drawing-room and club, so that to some this concert bore all the importance of a stock jobbing investment. At last the eventful evening arrived, and as soon as the doors were opened the concert-room was taken completely by storm; everybody wished to be in front to be as close as possible to the opponents; it appeared as if the public had come to witness a horse race and not a concert. I will then let it be imagined, how, at the onset, they were disappointed when the first phrases of the introduction were played with such perfection of "ensemble" that, had one's eyes been closed, it could have been believed that there was but one player. However, their amazement, in a short time, gave way to unbounded enthusiasm, not a shade or intention escaped the wondering crowd; it was not the struggle they had foreseen, but a pacific and glorious reunion of talent, each appearing to give way to one another—to wish to be forgotten individually; it was in the end a reciprocal struggle of abnegation, and so great was the effect of the piece that thrice I had to repeat my "Concert Monstre."

ARTISTS AND AMATEURS.

It is with the greatest satisfaction I take this opportunity of rendering homage to the artists who assisted me on this occasion with a kindness and good will I shall long remember. Several of them, M. M. Scharfenberg, Timm, Thibout, and Etienne, are already known by reputation in Europe: there are others of the greatest merit amongst them, and even in Paris would occupy a position that might be envied by many.

The taste for music, and the piano in particular, is so general in New York that an innumerable number of artists, both men and women, live very comfortably by the lessons they give, which, I must add, are very well paid. I have known several who, in a remarkable short space of time, gained an independence. The first time I stopped in New York there was a young person whose parents, some years before, had quitted France and settled in this capital. Mdlle. Chouquet, brought up at Havre and Paris, had been instructed by the best masters. On arriving at New York she had devoted herself to teaching the pianoforte with an ardour that had been crowned by complete success. Owing to her noble and generous efforts and admirable talent, happiness had returned to the bosom of her estimable family. The time she could spare from teaching was devoted (and most successfully) to composition. Her works were just beginning to be favourably received when cruel death put an end to her successful and enviable career. Mdlle. Chouquet was only aged 22, and I am certain that in a few years she would have realised a handsome fortune.

Though commercial interest predominates in the "Empire City," music has become an indispensable part of education. Every young Miss, genteely brought up, is taught the piano, and if she should only get as far as to be able to play the famous "Yankee Doodle," or "Hail Columbia," her parents are perfectly satisfied: their daughter is a musician and they demand no more. Still there is in New York (as in Paris) to be found lady-amateurs who sing and play as true artists. I remember hearing the wife of the French Consul, Mdlle. de Laforetôt, sing some of Schubert's melodies and some operatic airs with a taste and facility that many artists would be happy to equal: nor can I forget the astonishment and admiration I experienced through another young person, Mdlle. Thibout, who unites to the three-fold talent of pianist, harpist, and singer, literary talent of the greatest variety and profoundness. She writes with rare elegance, and converses with the most wonderful vivacity, tempered by an adorable sweetness of disposition; and whether she sings or plays the harp or piano, her superiority is betokened by an expression of unmistakable originality.

PIANOFORTE MAKERS AND MUSIC PUBLISHERS.

It cannot but be noticed that instrumental manufacture in New York has not equalled the teaching of music; very few grand pianos are made; the upright pianos are not liked on account of their contributing so little towards furnishing a drawing-room, and the square pianos leave much to be desired in regard to their mechanism. Still there are pianos to be found which might, without disadvantage to the quality of tone, be placed by the side of those of our best makers; but there are exceptions, and I have great pleasure in mentioning M. Stodart, Messrs. Nunn and Clark who are making the greatest efforts to uphold American manufacture from a bad and unfortunate routine which, fortunately, is yet in its infancy. I shall, in the course of this narrative, find an opportunity of mentioning an excellent manufacturer of Boston, M. Chickering, who occupies the first place in instrumental manufacture in the north of America.

There is in New York a great number of music sellers; the most important, and those who correspond with those of Europe, are Messrs. Firth, Pond & Co., Messrs. Kersieg and Breussing, and Messrs. Scharfenberg and Luis. They publish a few works by resident composers, but their principal commerce is in the sale of French and German editions and the reprinting of the works which have the greatest success in Europe. In New York, as in Belgium, reprinting has become nearly the sole staple of music publishers. This leper of art and intelligence is so deeply rooted that without some international treaty, based upon the most rigorous penalties, it will be found incurable. To give a sample of audacity and to show the extent to which this kind of business is carried I will cite one circumstance—a personal one.

SINGULAR AUDACITY OF AN AMERICAN MUSIC PUBLISHER.

In one of my concerts, for the first time I had played a fantasia, of which the themes were some Negro songs, well known in New York. This composition, doubtless on account of its rhythm and the popularity of the airs, was received with great favour. We may say, attracted some notice from the musical portion of the community. My concert had taken place on Thursday; when after I was not a little surprised, in reading a newspaper, (wherein was a notice of my concert) to see my piece advertised to be published on the Monday following at —, in the Broadway. My manuscript had not left my portfolio. I was certain no one had it in hand; and I was still more convinced that I had not disposed of it to any music publisher. I imagined that this advertisement could only be an error committed by some journalist desirous of showing me his kindness, and thought nothing would be easier than to rectify it. The next day I called upon the publisher, who, in the advertisement, was announced as the possessor of my piece, and, without saying who I was, I asked him what sort of a piece it was that Henri Herz had played the Tuesday before in his concert. Without answering categorically my question, Mr. — began outrageously to praise the fantasia I thought myself better acquainted with than he could possibly be. To render, said he (with emphatic ridicule), the edition worthy the merit of the work and reputation of the author, he had published it with such luxury, in regard to paper and engraving, that was quite unprecedented in New York, and at the same time he went and took a copy from the most conspicuous part of his shop. He presented it to me with a self-satisfied smile, somewhat indicating he held in his hand a Californian mine. On the outside cover the name of Herz was printed in large letters; I cast my eye on the first notes, and immediately discovered it was an abominable compound of the same themes to be found in my fantasia. I queried of Mr. — if he knew me, and if it was from M. Henri Herz himself he had received the manuscript. "Certainly," answered he, with the greatest coolness, "and I can assure you it cost very dear." "Are you certain," I rejoined, "that it is the same Henri Herz now, at the present moment, in New York, and are you quite certain of its being identical with the piece he played in his concert last Thursday?"

To this question, which I had asked with ill-concealed irony, my self-styled publisher stammered an evasive answer. I persisted still more, and he, seeing himself driven into a corner, said, not without visible embarrassment, that the piece was by M. Herz. Surprised at so much audacity, I could no longer contain my indignation, and cried, that as he had had personal interviews with M. Henri Herz he must recognize him, for he was present. "Well, yes," answered he, in a most barefaced manner, "it is a piece by M. Herz," wishing to make it appear, and thinking I would believe there was another composer in New York bearing the same name as myself. Not being able to do myself justice, I addressed myself to the public through the press, and to a tribunal through my lawyer. Can you guess in what manner ended the publicity I gave this base cheat? The result was that, instead of my stopping the sale of the piece so grossly travestied, I contributed, in despite of myself, to augment its sale, and in a short time Mr. — sold more than fifteen thousand copies. My edition, whose authenticity could not be disputed by any one, had come later and could not sustain the opposition this unworthy publisher had put forth; it had gained too much ground by the publicity I invested it with, and I was vanquished in this unequal struggle.

(To be continued.)

Braniatic.

BURNEY THEATRE—On Monday, a new drama was produced entitled Dreaming and Waking, written by Mr. Morris Barnett and Mr. Angus Reach. The dialogue is pointed and neat—the characters artistically opposed, and the construction clear, natural, and thoroughly effective. We have rarely seen a piece with less surplusage. The scene is laid in France, and the incident upon which the drama turns, has occurred ten years before the rising of the curtain. A young lieutenant, Edward de Sauval (Mr. T. Mead), during a visit to a disordered district, falls in love with a country girl, Louise Jane Coveney. The attachment is unhappy; she is wronged, gives birth to a son, and the betrayer dies for Africa. He there wins honours and a colonel's rank, and the girl, however, excites the sympathy of a lady, who soothes her sorrows and superintends her education. Ten years elapse, and the Colonel returns, laden with honours, to the village where Louise resides, and there, in saving her child from drowning, is himself all but lost in the river. Louise discovers in the saviour of her child her betrayer. She has him conveyed to her house, and tends him till his health is reinstated. She watches by his pillow, ministers to his wants, and determines to regain his affections, awaken his principles of honour, and force him to acknowledge his error and repair the injustice. For this purpose she takes advantage of his recovery and arranges the apartment so as to restore the appearance of all around him to what it was at the moment he departed for Africa. She assumes the peasant's dress, and by her manner and conversation leads him to believe that every subsequent circumstance is the effect of a dream. The Colonel is mystified, and Louise is about to succeed, when the entire fabric is cast down by the entrance of Joquinot (Mr. H. Widdicomb) the waiter of the neighbouring inn, who accosts him as Colonel. Louise is then fain to essay a new plot. She presents herself as a lady of fortune, a moiety of which she is anxious to bestow on him. The Colonel is struck by her resemblance to Louise, the grace of her manner, and the refinement of her language, but speedily discovering the ruse, he determines to punish her for her want of faith in his honour, and pretends to be married, and a father. Louise is overwhelmed with despair; but the Colonel presenting her with a portrait of the child, which she finds to be that of her own, the happy mother rushes into his arms, and he acknowledges her as his wife. We must mention that in the Colonel's regiment is Jean, a sergeant of dragoons (Mr. Shepherd), the brother of Louise, who, indignant at the seduction of his sister, determines to leave the service and seek satisfaction of his Colonel. The scene in which the interview takes place between the two is strongly wrought, and elicited the enthusiastic plaudits of the house.

The action commences with the return of Jean to his village, his meeting with his sister, and the saving from drowning of his own child by the Colonel. The piece was played with great care, and perfect ensemble of effect. Miss Coveney, a natural and graceful actress, gave the part of Louise with pathos and perfect consistency of idea. We have not often seen a more quiet and womanly personation. Mr. Shepherd rendered the blunt and honest Sergeant with truthful heartiness, and Mr. Mead's Colonel was artistic and impressive. The scenes of his bewilderment and mystification were given with a quiet intensity worthy the Parisian stage. The two minor parts of Joquinot and Clarette were pleasantly filled up by Mr. Widdicomb and Miss H. Coveney.

The drama was completely successful, and Mr. Mead and Miss Coveney were loudly summoned before the curtain.

Original Correspondence.

BURNEY'S HISTORY OF MUSIC.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—Your correspondent "H. J. T.," asks a question rather difficult to answer, for Burney's History has become very scarce. It is, however, sometimes to be met with at the music and book sales of Messrs Puttick and Simpson of Piccadilly. With regard to "H. J. T.'s" second question; Mr. Bohn, two, three, four, or more years since, announced that he thought of publishing a new edition, in, I believe, his Standard Library, continued up to the present time. He seems to have thought better of it, much to the regret of a great many like "H. J. T.," unable to get the old edition. Qy: Is it not rather remarkable that none of our great music houses have re-printed? Your obedient Servant, 20th Oct. 1851. G. R. CERVELLO.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—Having of late been in quest of a copy of Burney's History of Music, I am enabled to answer your correspondent's query. The only copy, I believe, now in the market, is one in the possession of Mr. Bohn, the publisher, which he will not part with under a very considerable price.

That gentleman had some intention of republishing the work, in one of his Libraries, and sincerely is it to be wished that this project may still be carried out. I could only suggest as an improvement on so excellent a plan, that it should be made to assume a larger form, more adapted to a book of reference; and I cannot help remarking that were your correspondent's suggestion adopted, and the book republished, (in a handsome quarto edition,) there would be no lack of persons ready and willing to subscribe to the undertaking.

I am, Sir,

Yours Obediently,

BELFAST.

Brighton, Oct., 1851.

DISTRIBUTION OF PRIZES AT THE GREAT EXHIBITION.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

DEAR SIR,—Can you give me any explanation on some points relating to the distribution of Prizes by the authorities of the Great Exhibition, which, I confess, have fairly puzzled me?

In the list of those who obtained Prize Medals, published in your last week's number, I find the names of Messrs Broadwood, and of Messrs Collard; but by whom was this distinction awarded to them? not, it would seem, by the Juries—the protest of six Jurors, and another document, previously published by Messrs Collard, sufficiently prove this. Yet it follows from Lord Canning's account of the constitution of the Juries, that they alone possessed the requisite authority, and that the functions of the Council of Chairmen were limited, they being authorized to frame rules for the guidance of the Jury: under certain circumstances, to place a veto on its decisions: but in no case to substitute, or originate, an award of their own.

Now, the Council Medal, proposed by the Jury for both Messrs Collard and Messrs Broadwood, constitutes an award, different both in degree and in kind from the Prize Medal which they receive!

With regard to the Council Medal, the practice of the Commissioners is equally at variance with their professions. They declare novelty of construction, to be a main and essential qualification; and yet award to M. Erard a Council Medal, for an invention patented (by his own account) twenty-seven years ago!

It must not be inferred from the foregoing remarks, that I wish to decry either Messrs Broadwood, Erard, or Collard, as manufacturers. All, and each, have their several and particular merits, which are too well known to be affected by the awards to which I have adverted: but it is very important that the public should understand clearly on what grounds the decisions are founded; otherwise all distinctions conferred on Exhibitors, be they Council Medals, or Prize Medals, will alike lose their value.

I am, Dear Sir,

Yours respectfully,

A CONSTANT READER.

NO DOUBTS ABOUT CHERUBINI.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—I have been greatly astonished at the doubts expressed by your correspondent Pyrrhus, as to the genius and merit of the compositions of Cherubini. It is a pity he did not peep at more of his works before giving his doubts to the world, for I think any person having a moderate musical knowledge, would, after hearing Cherubini's magnificent masses and overtures, agree in placing him amongst the greatest composers that have ever existed.

If Pyrrhus continues sceptical, I beg to refer him to the Grand

Mass in F, particularly to the "Gloria," the "Credo," and the "Benedictus," which, for united grandeur, learning, expression, and melody, I consider unrivalled; the second Mass, in D minor, the third, in A, the fourth in C, and the Requiems in C minor, and F, may also be consulted with great advantage.

Let us hope that some of these days the Sacred Harmonic Society may perform these Masses, and give the public an opportunity of hearing these superb compositions, which have too long been kept in the background.

I enclose my card, and am,

Sir, Your Obedient Servant,

AN OCCASIONAL READER.

London, 22nd Oct., 1851

Reviews of Music.

"DIRECTORIUM CHORI ANGLICANUM"—The Choral Service of the United Kingdom of England and Ireland, compiled from authentic sources by BENJAMIN S. JOHN BAPTIST JOULE. London: J. A. Novello, 1849.

DITTO DITTO, Second Edition, 1850.

The purport of this publication is to enforce the performance of the Gregorian Chant or plain song in the divine service of the church of England, and this enforcement is made upon the authority, most particularly, of Archbishop Cranmer, who first adapted the canto fermo to the translation of the Litany, and who, the editor assumes, probably directed John Merbecke to set the rest of the prayer-book in strict accordance with the rules which regulated the composition of the Gregorian melody; all this being in opposition to the practice of Martin Bucer, or more properly Kuhnorn, the Dominican of Alsace, who, when Charles the Fifth compelled the temporary adoption of that equivocal form of worship called the Interim, accepted the English prelate's invitation to fix his residence in this country. This man, our editor tells us, was urged on by Calvin to promulgate that ultra-reform, the object of which was not to correct the abuses of the Roman church, but to set aside all the rites and forms of that venerable establishment, and, Mr. Joule gives us to understand, the Gregorian Chant amongst the number.

The editor's preface is enriched by a most simple and eloquent quotation from the "elaborate and seasonable works of the famous and prudent Mr. Richard Hooker," to the effect that music elevates and purifies the human mind, and is therefore an appropriate and desirable medium for addressing the Deity, and this now universally accepted principle which was inculcated by David, adopted by the fathers of the Christian church, and preserved with the most zealous care by Luther, is further supported in the present work by copious extracts from other writers.

We have then the Litany, set to the plain chant of Pope Gregory, which our editor professes to have purified upon the best authorities from many corruptions which have crept into it in the different uses of various cathedrals, and accompanied with harmony which he ascribes to Tallis, or at least declares that he has derived from ancient sources, "from versions which are attributed to Tallis, with how much correctness he does not pretend to say."

We have first to speak of the propriety of Mr. Joule's enforcement of the employment of St. Gregory's chant, and next of the manner in which he brings the same before the world for general acceptance. We are upon principle entirely opposed to the restoration of the Gregorian mode, since we find this to be without beauty, and therefore not desirable for the sake of its effect upon the hearers, who with modern education and consequently with modern taste in music, must receive entirely different impressions from the performance of the Gregorian chant, from those which it made upon the minds of men when it was first composed, or even when it was adopted in the reformed church, at which time the art was still in a very primitive condition. We are far from advocating the application of light or even florid music to the service of the church, but we protest that now, when the world is familiar with the sublimity of Handel's sacred music, not to speak of the beautiful compositions of Gibbons, Purcell, and the many other musicians who have devoted their genius to writing for the English church, the Gregorian plain chant, so far from elevating and purifying the mind, so far from inspiring it with feelings of devotion, can only produce upon it the effect of dull and dreary monotony.

The propriety of its preservation upon the ground of its antiquity we utterly deny, since the Gregorian chant itself was an innovation upon the still more simple chant of St. Ambrose, in which the four authentic modes only were employed to the rejection of the plagal, and which prevailed for some two hundred years until Pope Gregory found it necessary to modify the music of the church to the then prevailing taste of the age.

Why therefore the congregations of the present day should be denied the advantage which the author of the Cantus Gregorianus found it necessary to give to his flock, namely, of having church music congenial to their musical taste and education, there is no principle in precedent to justify, and we therefore advance these objections in the confidence that the purposes of church music are greatly obstructed, if not entirely frustrated, by the obstinate adherence to an obsolete style of composition.

We will take it for granted however, that it is necessary to preserve the Gregorian chant in the church of England. In this case it is surely no less necessary that the parts for the alto tenor and bass should be written in the Gregorian modes than that the cantus or plain song should be; and we look upon it as imperative that the cantus itself should be written in some one or other of the Gregorian modes, and not transposed into a convenient key, with the modern innovation of flats and sharps, which entirely violates the principle of the old ecclesiastical modes, and gives to this very Gregorian music an effect which, at the time it was composed, could never have been conceived. The harmony of the present edition however, whether it be of Tallis or of whom else we care not, is so far as the simplicity of the plain song will admit, completely modern in character, abounding in unprepared dominant sevenths and other licences of the free style, which are not only incompatible with the ecclesiastical modes, but as here applied decidedly trivial in effect.

We have also to object to an important alteration of the practice of the early reformed church, which our editor has made in his arrangements, and this is the transplanting the plain song from the tenor part, in which it was the custom, in early times, to write it, into the treble; Mr. Joule's arguments in defence of this are, it is true, not without reason, but it is manifestly absurd to make a profession of retaining the harmony of Tallis, and at the same time to pervert it completely by the inversion of the parts. At any rate, if we are to have this ancient style of music forced upon us, let us have it with all its characteristic peculiarities, and not with such a miscellaneous and unmusicianly modification as is here presented. Besides the monotony of the plain song, besides the modern style of the harmony, besides the entire want of interest in the general effect, we have to complain of the continual alternation of the keys of C major and D major, a course of modulation so irrelative as to be at all times unsatisfactory, and from its very frequent repetition becomes absolutely offensive.

It is the great error of a certain church party in the present day to spend an immense deal of argument and still more paper and printing in endeavouring to restore the utmost possible barbarism in ecclesiastical music. Whatever may be the motives or the policy of the heads of this party for such an endeavour, it is not here to discuss; but when we see a purpose which we so much deprecate enforced with great pretensions, propped upon numerous authorities, and supported by a merely superficial musical knowledge, we feel it to be within our province to urge our strongest objections to what we consider the technical improprieties that show not only the inadequacy of the editor to treat the subject, but the very questionable fitness of the subject itself for treatment in these days when no intelligent person can remain unembued with the colour that music has received from the works of the great masters.

ALBUM LYRIQUE; Quatre Mélodies Italiennes avec Accompagnement de Piano; Composées par Alfr. Piatti.—Londres: Chez Schott et Cie.

These songs, which, besides being printed in London, have the advantage of being also published, according to the title-page, in Mayence, in Brussels, in Leipzig, in Vienna, and in Rotterdam, have, from this unusually extensive distribution, an equally unusual chance of becoming generally known. And we congratulate Signor Piatti, with whose talents as a composer we now for the first time become acquainted, not only upon his having obtained so wide a circulation for his productions, but also upon his having produced a series of songs that would be likely to find their way into considerable popularity, had they not the agency of this almost universal copyright to diffuse them over the world. Our pre-eminent violoncellist shews himself in these compositions a decided disciple of the Italian school, and the songs are favourable specimens of the style to which they belong.

"Di me Sovvengati" is our favourite of the set. It possesses much originality, and is, we think, very effective.

"La Fidanzata" is a graceful Tyrolienne, abounding in brilliant, and at the same time perfectly vocal passages.

Next in order we must rank "Il Mendico," which is more ambitious than its sisterhood, and which we should like without qualification, if it were not for a passage of modulation towards the end, which is not very satisfactory in itself, and not quite in keeping with the rest of the song.

"Un Addio" is not very attractive, but still forms an agreeable vocal exercise.

Beside the original Italian texts, Signor Piatti's "Mélodies" are accompanied by a German translation, which is fluently written, and well adapted to the music, by Mr. Carl Gollmick.

"RENDS MOI TON CŒUR."—Musique de ALFRED PIATTI.—Schott et Cie.

This single song, for a tenor voice, which has the same extensive list of publishers as the preceding work, is really a very charming piece of vocal writing. We prefer it to any of the pieces in the above series, and we have professed to like them considerably. It is admirably calculated for effect, and cannot fail to please whenever it is adequately rendered.

"THE PIANOFORTE PLAYER;" Third Series. A collection of pleasing and instructive pieces for the Pianoforte Solo.—Ewer and Co.

"Gazelle," impromptu for the piano, by W. Kruger, is the title of the present number. As for its being "pleasing," the publishers evidently think it so, for we cannot suppose them so Jesuitic as to attempt to persuade their purchasers to a way of thinking on the subject which themselves entertain not, and the publishers must be good judges in the matter. As for its being "instructive," why it is in the key of G flat, a circumstance which alone is highly instructive; and it abounds in passages that are to be accomplished at first glance by but very few players; and this necessitates considerable practice for the attainment of a perfect performance, and this naturally carries instruction along with it. As for ourselves, however, we find it one of the least interesting productions that Messrs. Ewer and Co. have laid before the public; and we turn from it with pleasure to the examination of the very much more important matter that these enterprising publishers have also sent us for review.

"ZULEIKA"—ROMANCE FOR THE PIANOFORTE—BY ARABELLA GODDARD. Cramer, Beale and Co.

A most acceptable present from the youthful and charming pianist. The characteristics of the "Romance" are neatness, elegance, and a sweet flow of tune. Miss Arabella Goddard has not taken a flight beyond her powers. "Zuleika" exhibits no attempt at fine writing, but what is aimed at is skilfully and satisfactorily attained. Nevertheless, musical feeling and musical acquirement are predominant, and we have seldom indeed seen a piece of the kind, of such slight and airy structure, written by one of Miss Arabella Goddard's years, in which the hand of inexperience is more artfully kept out of view, and a higher promise of better things held out. Mr. Macfarren's teaching has certainly not been thrown away, and we congratulate him on having obtained so talented and hopeful a pupil as Miss Arabella Goddard.

"FAIRY VISIONS."—BALLAD—SUNG BY MISS REBECA ISAACS—COMPOSED BY W. LOVELL PHILLIPS. Leoni Lee and Coxhead.

A very pleasing ballad in B flat, 3-8 time Mr. Lovell Phillips's vocal compositions have always the merit of being tuneful and singable. The present song constitutes no exception. The accompaniments are smooth and satisfactory, and without exceedingly simple. We can recommend "Fairy Visions," without hesitation as an agreeable and characteristic ballad. The verses are not despicable, but they are sadly wanting in euphony. We have rarely found a harsher line intended for music than "Thoughts breath'd by angels to mortals on earth."

The poet must be informed that there is melody in words as well as in notes.

"FANTASIA ON AIRS OF ALL NATIONS"—FOR THE PIANOFORTE.—WELLINGTON GUERNSEY. T. Boosey & Co.

In a Fantasia of All Nations we cannot perceive why Mr. Wellington Guernsey should have omitted Ireland—one of the most musical of countries—from his introduced airs. We have "Rule Britannia" for England; "L'Estrella" for Spain; "Cracovienne" for Poland; "The Bonnie House o' Airlie" for Scotland; the "Rhine Song" for Germany; an air from Lucrezia Borgia for Italy; and the "National Hymn" for Russia. The introduction is well written, and the different airs are skilfully worked in. Although the themes chosen might have been better, the fantasia has decided merit, and will make a good practice piece.

"THE CLIPPER; OR REGATTA POLKA."—J. G. CALLCOTT. Cramer, Beale & Co.

A capital polka—an exciting polka—a characteristic polka—a well-written polka. The name is a good one, too; and although the tune does not smack of the sea, nor of Yankeeland, or Yankee-water, nor, of a verity, of regattas in general, yet the dance has such a capital go-a-head melody, and is so brisk, lively, rattling, and bold, that it may be decidedly styled "a clipper." Altogether the "Clipper" is one of the very best and most original polkas which has come to our knowledge for some time, and we hang out in its behalf a very large flag of recommendation.

TALK OF HIM THAT'S FAR AWAY.—SONG—WORDS BY ROBERT BURNS—MUSIC BY THOMAS CHANTREY. Addison and Hollier.

Burns' exquisite lyric has found a by no means uncongenial musical illustrator in Mr. Thomas Chantrey. The melody has nothing of the national character, but the feeling of the words are well considered; and the song altogether is tuneful and vocal. We do not particularly admire the persistence of the notes B—E—B—E—B—E— on the words "Yielding late to Nature's Law." It has too much of the "see-saw" in it, and is more original than satisfactory. The ballad, however, has sufficient merit to entitle it to our recommendation.

Foreign.

PARIS.—(From our own Correspondent)—The Theatre Italien opened on Tuesday week with Lucrezia Borgia, Madame Barbieri Nini making her debut as the heroine. A new tenor, Graziani, and a new basso, Fortini, also appeared. The house was most brilliantly attended. All interest seemed concentrated in the Barbieri Nini, of whom so much had been talked about lately, and various were the anticipations concerning her success. I need not tell you how cautious the Parisians are of trusting to the fiat of a London public, or to the opinions of the London press. The success of a prima donna in England goes for nothing with the audiences in the French Capital. You may remember with what distrust Alboni was received here, after her enormous success at Covent Garden. Alboni came to Paris with only a London reputation. On the other hand, Mdme. Barbieri Nini came with a great Italian reputation, consequently she was received with more favour and warmth. There was, however, no enthusiasm. The first air was applauded partially, and the curtain fell on the first act without any evident demonstration. The second act was received coldly throughout. There was a want of power and largeness in this act which the habitués remembered in Grisi, and the new prima donna fell back in the impression she made. In the third act, Madame Barbieri Nini recovered all her laurels. The largo, "M'odi, m'odi," was magnificently sung, displaying voice, style, and the most pathetic expression. The whole house was suddenly raised to the highest pitch of enthusiasm, and Madame Barbieri Nini was recalled amid a state of excitement I have rarely witnessed at the Bouffes. Still I must pause before I call hers a great success. She did not, for instance, produce one half the legitimate sensation Sophie Cruvelli did last year. This is the general feeling. Madame Barbieri Nini, however, has many strenuous supporters, and among them some of the best judges. Graziani is a nice singer and has an agreeable voice. Nothing more can be predicated of him yet. Fortini had a severe cold, so of him I can say nothing. As far as I was enabled to judge, the band went admirably under the new direction of M. Ferdinand Hiller, whose place in the Orchestra is hailed as a decided acquisition to the theatre by all the musical dilettanti of Paris. Mr. Lumley has put his shoulder to the wheel in earnest. The company is powerful and the prospectus interesting. Among the novelties to be brought out are Paesello's Barbiere—which has already excited great curiosity among the lovers of Rossini—a new posthumous opera by Donizetti, and one or two of Verdi's latest operas for the new tenor Guasco, from whom very great things are expected. I trust he will not belie Rumor. Mr. Lumley is sadly in want of a first rate tenor to complete his corps. Mdle. Wertheimer, the distinguished pupil of the Conservatoire, is engaged as prima donna at the Opera Comique. This young lady has already made a great stir in the musical salons of Paris. After a course of two years study under Bordogni, Mdle. Wertheimer carried off the first prizes at the Academy. A new opera, I am told, is being written expressly for her by Messrs. Grisar and De Saint Georges.

NEW YORK, (Oct. 4).—The Third Grand Concert of Catherine Hayes took place at Tripler Hall last Saturday. There was a brilliant and crowded audience, numbering over 4000 people. The programme was the same as the first concert, and as the result was the same, we shall not go into details of Concert No. 3, merely stating that the enthusiasm was fully equal to the first demonstration.

The Fourth Concert contained several new features; the programme was as follows:—

PART I.

Overture—Zampa..... Herold
Duet—"Un tenero core" (Roberto Devereux)..... Donizetti
Signor Lorini and Miss Virginia Whiting.

- Cantata—"Adelaide" Beethoven
Mr. A. Braham.
- Grand Scene and Aria "Before mine eyes behold him" (Der Freyschutz) } Weber.
Miss Catherine Hayes.
- Song—"Die Fahnenwacht" (The Standard Bearer) } Lindpaintner
Herr Mengis.
- "Auld Robin Gray" A Scotch Ballad
Miss Catherine Hayes.
- PART II.
- Overture—Anne of Gierstein Lavenu
- Scene and Aria—"Casta Diva" (Norma) Bellini
Miss Catherine Hayes.
- Duet—"Quanto Amore" (L'Elisir d'Amore) Donizetti
Herr Mengis and Miss V. Whiting.
- Solo on the Violin Herr Griebel
- Ballad—"My Dreams are now no more of Thee" Lavenu
Mr. Braham.
- Scotch Ballad—"Dinna think, bonnie Lassie" Dunn
Miss Catherine Hayes.
- Song—"Yes, let me like a soldier fall" (Maritana)... Wallace
Mr. A. Braham (by particular request).
- "The Harp that once through Tara's Halls" Irish Ballad
Miss Catherine Hayes.
- Grand March—"Prophete" Meyerbeer

It will be perceived at a glance that this programme possessed attractive elements, and that it attracted an overflowing house cannot be a matter of surprise. The audience was, in fact, nearly as numerous as on the first night, and as rapturous and earnest in their applause as ever.

The first piece that Catherine Hayes sang, was the Grand Scene from Der Freyschutz. This is an aria to test the very highest capacities of any artist. It is descriptive from the beginning to the end, and is, in truth, strictly an acting song. Catherine Hayes conceived the aria in the true dramatic style; the strong gradations of feeling and passion, from the profoundest sadness to the most ecstatic joy, which the aria so vividly describes, were painted by her with wonderful fidelity. The sweet and flowing andante displayed her power of pathos in a high degree, and the joyous and rapturous allegro fairly burst from her as by some strong impulse. This was singing of the highest order; it was thoughtful, intellectual—perfection of execution with grandeur of conception. We heard Sontag, years and years ago, sing this grand scena, also Malibran and Mrs. Wood, but its rendering by Miss Catherine Hayes loses nothing of its excellence when tested by the memory of these great artists.

The old Scotch ballad so familiar to every one who speaks the English language, was Miss Hayes's second song; but although it was sung with all that purity of pathos for which her style is so remarkable, it pleased us less than any ballad that we have heard her sing. It is difficult to point out in what it was deficient, but we felt that there was a want of the strong character, and a departure from the "traditional style," which seemed to argue that the artiste had not entered thoroughly into its meaning. But the public thought not with us.

Great as was the triumph of Catherine Hayes in the "Casta Diva" last week, it was, if possible, exceeded on this occasion. She was evidently more at home than on the first occasion, and flung her dazzling and beautiful ornaments around with the lavish hand of one who knows that the resource is inexhaustible. The slow movement was more grave and emphatic, and the last movement incalculably more brilliant and effective. Rarely has an artiste been greeted by such a torrent of applause as followed this splendid vocal effort, it was literally overwhelming. The charming ballads which followed were deliciously sung, and elicited the most enthusiastic encores.

Catherine Hayes seems to gain in the esteem and admiration of the audience every time she appears; she is, in point of fact, the most popular singer, personally as well as artistically, that ever came amongst us; and there is so much natural goodness and kindness in her character, and her genius is so high and undoubted, that we can see no chance of a falling off in her popularity, but rather a continual increase.

Miss V. Whiting and Signor Lorini were added to the programme and were well received. They sang well, and made a pleasing variety to the concert. Mr. Braham's "Adelaide" was not a great effort; but in his ballad, "My dreams are now no more of thee," he was very successful, singing it charmingly, and gaining an unanimous encore. Herr Mengis, too, sang the "Standard Bearer" and the duo from Elisir d'Amore with Miss Whiting, very well.

The band began to work together much better; but why waste their excellence in the last piece at the backs of the audience? It would be infinitely better to end the concert with the peerless Catherine; for when she has finished, the attraction ceases, and all that follows is mere "leather and prunella."

The Messiah was given at the fifth concert. The announcement of the performance of this great oratorio of Handel, and the fact that, Catherine Hayes was to sing the principal part, drew together a most brilliant audience, which crowded the Hall in every part. The orchestra was quite a sight to behold; there must have been nearly three hundred vocal and instrumental performers present, and the sight was quite imposing. There was a feeling to repress applause at this sacred concert, so that when the principal artistes appeared and took their seats upon the stage, the burst of applause was hushed down. When the overture commenced, unfortunately the horns made a mistake, which was not rectified for some dozen bars, thereby making most hideous discord.

Mr. Braham sang "Comfort ye my people" exceedingly well: he sang it in the good old oratorio school, plain, simple, and straightforward. We have not heard it sung as well for many years. There was a difference in regard to the tempo of the commencement of the aria between the conductor, Mr. Lavenu, and the orchestra, but they came to an understanding very soon. The chorus, "And the glory of God," was taken too slow, and was sung without spirit; the points were all taken up, but listlessly.

Miss Maria Leach would have sung the recitative and aria, "O, thou that tellest," very excellently, could she have controlled her nerves, but she was unfortunately so timid that her voice was unsteady, and the many good points of her singing almost obscured. The chorus which follows was well sung.

Herr Mengis sang the great recitative and aria, "For behold darkness shall cover the earth," in excellent style. We were pleased at his good pronunciation; it betrayed scarcely any foreign accent, and every word could be understood in the Hall. The glorious aria, "The people that walked in darkness," was so hurried by the conductor that its effect was entirely spoiled, and Herr Mengis' singing robbed of half its effect. The accompaniment alone, independent of the meaning of the words, should have suggested a slower tempo. Herr Mengis was warmly applauded at the close of the aria.

The chorus, "For unto us a child is born," was well sung, although there was not that proper understanding between the conductor and the performers that there should have been. The chorus was encored.

The attention of all was attracted by the coming solo by Catherine Hayes. The famous recitative, "There were Shepherds," was sung with that clearness of enunciation and that purity of emphasis so necessary to true vocal elocution. Every word was uttered with distinctness, and the musical reading was admirable. The bravura song, "Rejoice greatly," was brilliantly and beautifully executed; in fact, as far as related to execution, not a fault could be found, although a little more of the spirit of triumph and rejoicing infused into it would, to our mind, be the more appropriate and the better reading.

She sang the air, "Come unto Him," most exquisitely; it was perfect in every respect, so that any improvement seemed to be unimaginable. The same eulogistic remarks would apply to all the rest of Catherine Hayes's performance. The lovely airs, "But thou didst not leave," "How beautiful are the feet," and "I know that my Redeemer liveth," were rendered in a manner of unapproachable excellence. We make no reservation in favour of any living singer when we assert that Catherine Hayes's singing in the Messiah is unapproachable. The Oratorio is a musical domain in which she walks alone, nor fears to meet a rival. She embodies the music with unmistakable fidelity—the spirit of a holy inspiration, and a pure and beautiful human sentiment breathe forth in every song, and oppress the heart with the depth of its pathos. The propriety of the audience was insufficient to restrain their enthusiasm, which ran so high that had Catherine Hayes complied with its demands she would have had to repeat every thing she sang.

We look upon her success in sacred music as fully triumphant as in music of a secular character. Although of a higher class and appealing less to the uncultivated ear than secular music, Catherine Hayes makes sacred music understood and appreciated by the heart and the ear also. It is a power only given to the highest genius, and only then in rare instances. Catherine Hayes has this glorious gift, and long may she live to use it for the improvement and delight of the public.

Miss Maria Leach gained confidence as the oratorio progressed, and did herself great credit in "He was despised." Messrs. Braham and Mengis exerted themselves successfully throughout, and although we cannot say that their performance was all that could be wished, we are bound in justice to say that that their music in the Messiah has not been as well performed in New York for several years. Herr Mengis learned all his music in three days, he having never heard or seen the oratorio before this week. He merits high praise under the circumstances, and will doubtless give a better account of himself on a repetition of the performance.

The choruses of the second and third acts were in every way superior to those of the first act. These were conducted by Mr. Loder, who having rehearsed with the singers, had their whole confidence. There was no more hesitancy or holding back after he took the baton, and we believe that New York never heard such chorus singing as was evidenced in "Behold the Lamb of God," "He trusteth in God," "Lift up your heads," the "Hallelujah," and "Worthy is the Lamb." These were all splendidly sung, and reflected the highest credit upon the members of the Harmonic Society and upon the conductor.

The trumpet obligato to the great bass song, "The trumpet shall sound," was admirably played by Mr. Haas. The instrumental accompaniment to "I know that my Redeemer liveth" was the most chaste, subdued, and beautiful accompaniment we have heard from a New York orchestra. With such care always exercised, to what a state of perfection our orchestra could be brought! There are materials to form one of the best orchestras in the world, but it does not now present even half the perfection that it might attain by a judicious subordination and care.

Miss Hayes will be unable to remain in New York after next week, but with her troupe, and Mr. J. H. Wardwell, will be in Boston about the 18th inst. The First Concert in Boston will be, in all probability, about the 14th of the present month.

MADAME ANNA THILLON.—We have just returned from one of her charming performances, and have been so delighted that we feel like congratulating every body—those who have heard her, for the pleasure they have had—those who have not, for the pleasure that is in store for them. She came very quietly, with only here and there an announcement, yet, despite the overshadowing greatness of Catherine Hayes, she finds most hearty appreciation, and shines, a fixed star of the first magnitude, amid the cluster gathered at Niblo's. Beautiful exceedingly, with rare dramatic talent, a voice with no touch of reediness, and no weak point, but brilliant and ringing as the laugh of a child, we do not wonder that she is popular, but that she is not more so.

MADAME ANNA BISHOP and her musical director, Mr. Bochsa, arrived in town last week, and were serenaded by the members of their orchestra. The tour just concluded has been so brilliant and profitable, that Madame Anna Bishop proposes to start again as soon as the necessary preparations can be made. Mr. Bochsa is but just recovering from long and severe indisposition, but he cannot rest, he "must be working," and our country friends may expect to hear from him soon. The proposed volume "Incident of a Tour in Mexico," announced some time ago as in process of preparation for publication, has been delayed by the press of other business, and Mr. Bochsa's indisposition, but will now be resumed, and completed as soon as possible. It is said that Madame Bishop is to leave the United States in the Spring to fill an engagement at Paris.

MARINI, the basso of the Italian Opera, was married last Saturday week to Miss Rose Maretzek, sister of the manager, Mdle. Borghese, the beautiful French vocalist, was also recently married to Mr. Hardtmuth, a New York merchant.

CASSEL.—Dr. Louis Spohr applied to his government for permission to travel to St. Petersburg, but was refused. Nevertheless, the great composer has left for the East. (Note.—The latter statement is incorrect, inasmuch as Spohr was still at Cassel on the 5th instant.)

HANOVER.—About 400 members of the North German Liedertafel, assembled here from Brewen, Bielefeld, Celle, Minden, Hildesheim, &c., and performed a variety of pieces under direction of Chapelmaster Marschner.

PASSAU.—At the great Musical Liedertafel Festival on the 6th July last, about 1500 singers assembled from Linz, Munich, Ratisbon, Vienna, &c. The Viennese carried off the palm. In the evening all met at dinner, on which occasion the toasts were drank from a goblet holding three quarts of nectar. The goblet is the same size as the little finger of the "Munich Bavaria."

DR. LISZT has returned to Weimer from Eilsen (Buckeburg). In the latter place a niece of Louis Spohr gave a concert, in which she proved herself a harpist of the first order. She delighted the audience with some very brilliant composition by Charles Oberthur and Parish Alvars.

HAGUE.—Martin Lazare has gained a prize medal, in value 2000 francs, for the composition of the comic opera "Le Roi de Boheme." The opera has been performed here with great success.

It was proposed by the Director Magedle, to give the "Freyschutz" in the arena with living wolves and all sorts of diablerie.

ST. PETERSBURG.—The Hanoverian flautist, Heinemeager, lately gave a concert at St. Petersburg, and executed a concertino by Furstenau and two of his own compositions. His sweet tone, purity of intonation, and brilliant delivery, were generally admired and appreciated.

ERFURT—(From a Correspondent)—Miss Sophia and Miss Isabella Dulcken gave two concerts here with very good success. At one of them (October 3) we were present, and were highly pleased with the performances of these young ladies. The younger lady displayed considerable talent on the concertina, an instrument never before heard in these parts. The composition, by Regondi, was entitled "Les Oiseaux." It was very effective and brilliant; as was also another by Blagrove, on airs from an opera of Donizetti's. Miss Sophie Dulcken gave equal pleasure by her excellent and tasteful execution of several well known pianoforte pieces by Mendelssohn, Chopin, Leopold de Meyer, and Gottschalk. The Misses Dulcken intend to proceed to Berlin, where, no doubt, they will be received with much favour.

DR. BEXFIELD'S ORATORIO—"ISRAEL RESTORED."

(Abridged from the Norwich Gazette.)

Ever since the announcement of the new oratorio the greatest interest was excited. Dr. Bexfield being a native of this city, and well-known to our local musicians, added greatly to the interest.

On Thursday evening the performance of this oratorio realized all expectations, and was completely successful. The spacious hall was crowded in every part. We have seldom seen such an audience on any similar occasion, 1815 persons were present, among whom we observed the Lord Bishop, the Hon. and Very Rev. the Dean, both with large parties, the Mayor (H. Woodcock, Esq.), and the Sheriff (E. Blakley, Esq.), E. Wodehouse, Esq., M.P., and most of the leading families of the city and its immediate neighbourhood. A number of visitors came from a distance, amongst them Mr. Serle, the conductor of the Exeter Hall Concerts. We also observed present Miss Agnes Strickland, the celebrated authoress. Dr. Bexfield must have been highly gratified by the signal triumph achieved: and the performance, though it might have been more perfect, was creditable to the society.

As principal vocalists, the committee secured the services of Miss Birch, Miss Williams, Mr. Benson, and Mr. H. Phillips, assisted by the Cathedral Choir. The London instrumentalists were Mr. Wheatley, violin; Kielbach, horn; Grimshaw, double bass; Lazarus, principal clarinet; Hausmann, principal violoncello. The chief local instrumentalists were, Mr. R. Bray, leader; Mr. Harcourt, organist and instrumental conductor.

The opening of the overture represents God's anger at the unbelief of the Israelites. The trombones and drums are made to form a conspicuous part. The fugue describes the scattering of the Israelites. The last part is a characteristic march, giving the idea of restoration in peace and glory. The band executed this overture with great precision.

The recitative tenor, "He that sitteth in the heavens," has considerable ease of modulation, and was given with great purity by Mr. Benson.

The opening chorus in A minor, Alla Capella, "Then shall He speak," is a solemn and striking fugue led off by the basses, and is accompanied by nearly all the wind instruments and double basses. This chorus was ably performed, and is certainly one of the finest pieces of part writing in the oratorio.

The chorus, "Happy shall he be," is written in plain harmonies; the general subject of the oratorio being kept in view. This chorus is terminated by a crescendo and in long notes, including the introduction of trombones and drums, with full strength on the words, "served us." The cadence is very uncommon, viz., G sharp in the bass, accompanied in the other parts by B, D, and F sharp, and resolving into the major chord of A. This chorus was well received.

Chorus, "Blow the trumpet in Zion," is written in what some musicians call the "effective" style. The trumpets, of course, are used; and the union of all the voices and instruments on the words, "Call a solemn assembly," is, perhaps, a poetical idea. The trombones are used in the words, "Assemble the elders," as an accompaniment to the tenors and basses; which arrangement is followed by the trebles and contraltos singing the words, "Gather the children," producing the poetical contrast. The sentence, "Spare Thy people," led off by the basses, and answered by the tenors, is chromatic. We could have wished that the author had avoided having three choruses together. The song, "O Jerusalem," was encored, we believe, at the wish of Miss Strickland, the authoress of the Queens of England, and was a compliment richly merited.

The recitative, accompanied, "How doth the city sit solitary!" is a kind of sacred nocturne. There is a great combination of flutes, clarionets, oboes, and bassoons.

The air, "O Lord, behold my affliction," is a sombre melody, with the combination of clarionets and bassoons, produces a very melancholy effect, which is evidently the author's intention. Miss Birch sang this song with great feeling. Though a beautiful composition, we think it the least original of any part of the work.

The recitative, bass, "Arise O God," was rendered very effectively by Mr. Kielbach.

The solo, bass, is here made to paint the stubbornness of the Jewish character. The song is carried to the end with scarcely one decided cadence, being full of unexpected terminations.

The accompaniments are very important in this air. Mr. Phillips sang with great ability, but from some accident he was a bar before the band.

"Lead me, O Lord," is a verse in which great pains have evidently been taken to blend the freeness of modern melody with the severity of ancient fugue. Towards the end the theme is taken up in canon (pia). This verse, which is quite unaccompanied, shows a perfect knowledge of part-writing, and of vocal effects. The words, "Lead me," are peculiarly well chosen for a fugue and canon. This lovely quartet was most charmingly sung. It was sung at the Cathedral on Sunday morning, and we hope soon to have it repeated.

The prayer, "O Lord, be gracious," is the style of music so much gloried in by the Germans, viz., the broad chorale. The theme is first taken in solo; then in modern canon; and afterwards by the full force of the orchestra, and closed the first part amidst expressions of approbation from the audience.

Part Two opens with the Bass Recit, "Many oxen are come about me" has imitations of the noises made by cattle, and the roaring of lions, whilst the harsh discords represent "the blaspheming of the multitude." Mr. Phillips sang this Recit, in the finest style.

"Hear O Lord," (Bass Solo). Contains a long symphony, in which there are several points. Melody is the general object in this song, and the orchestral accompaniments consist of flute, clarinet, bassoon, and the stringed quartett. This air was sung with the greatest pathos.

Chorus "There is none like the God of Jeshurun," the use of the trumpets and drums appeared to be intended to bring to mind, in contrast, the heathen gods. To the words, "rideth upon the heavens," the instrumental bass has a triplet accompaniment which gives a forcible description of the idea.

The Chorus, "The eternal God is thy refuge," is struck off, with determined energy; a subdued martial effect is given to the words, "Underneath are the everlasting arms." There are some grand points in this chorus. The words "destroy them," are given with the full power of the orchestra, first on the chord of the 6th, and directly after on the diminished 7th. A great contrast is intended on the words "Israel then shall dwell in safety alone," (which is written in 6-8 time), and a charming flowing passage is heard from the violins on the words "the fountain of Jacob."

"O Lord God of my salvation," is a quartette and was composed by the author at the age of 17, and is frequently sung in the responses to the Communion Service to our Cathedral. The subject is most ingeniously treated in this arrangement.

"Fear not thou," has a flowing easy accompaniment, and terminates with perfect quietude, expressive of perfect faith in the words, "Jacob shall return."

The Pastoral Chorus—"He that scattered Israel," contains the style of melodies of the shepherd's pipe, introduced by the hautboys. Simplicity is successfully aimed at, and great use is made of the horn, an instrument closely connected with pastoral life. The flutes interpret the singing of birds. This highly descriptive chorus delighted all who heard it.

Song—"O, be favourable," is accompanied by seven obligatos. The accompaniments of clarinet and bassoon pleased us extremely. Miss Williams sung this charming song with great care and expression, and it certainly was one of the best pieces of singing during the evening.

The Recit. "God himself," is followed by "God shall wipe all tears," (song). The tenor or viola has very important parts. This is a most lovely and taking melody, and we feel satisfied that it would become very popular if it were published separately. Mr. Benson sang it with great effect.

Hebrew Chorus—"God called and said," is given in unison by the tenors and basses (forte).

"I am the God of thy father" (chorus). The soprano part of this is an actual Hebrew melody, written, perhaps many centuries ago; and, we understand, was introduced into this work as being connected with the Israelitish race. The accompaniments, harmony, effect, &c., are quite new. This chorus was repeated, and the wind instruments were more successful the second time.

"Have they not heard?" This bass recit. is remarkable for its declamatory character.

Chorus—"Hath God cast away his people?" is conveyed between the first and second parts of this chorus. The words, "the mountains," are given forte, and "shall depart," by voices alone, piano; thus expressing the miracle of mountains suddenly vanishing. This chorus was finely sung and with great precision.

Recit.—"Who are these?" The instrumental passages here are intended to prepare the ear for the following chorus, "They gather themselves together."

"Lift up thine eyes," a fugue from St. Ann's tune (Dr. Croft), already used by Seb. Bach. As much effect has been here given as a fugue allows. The last part has the closest replies that the subject admits of; and by augmentation, which is in strict canon. The effect of the parts with the pedal bass is very grand. We seldom witnessed more attention in an audience than on this occasion.

Part Three commenced with March and Chorus, "Blessed is he that cometh," which is supposed to represent the approach of the Messiah's coming, and in which the peculiar strains of Hebrew melodies have been consulted, is most happily arranged, and it deservedly obtained unqualified admiration.

The recitative, "The Lord has chosen Israel," with organ accompaniments, which we preferred in this recitative to the usual accompaniments of violoncello and double bass.

The quartet and chorus, "Bless the Lord, O house of Israel," in which there are twelve different voice parts, each choir representing, as it were, the different houses; viz., of Israel, Aaron, and Levi. The brass instruments have important parts at the end, and they were well delivered.

The recitative, "Doubtless, O God." The words, "We are thine," are effective through the medium of the wind instruments.

Chorus, "Thou, O Lord," is written in a firm and bold style. The passages at the end of this chorus, on the words, "From everlasting," are syncopated diminished sevenths, and are intended to convey the idea of infinity.

Song, "Thy sun shall no more go down," has horn obligato, accompanied by viola, violoncello, and double bass. All the parts were ably rendered.

Chorus, "The waves of the sea." The bass effectively represents the rolling of waves. The word "horribly" occurs on a discord, strengthened by the trumpets, drums, &c., and, in two cases, with the whole orchestra, on a fourth. A more sacred style seems intended on the words, commencing, "But the Lord, who dwelleth on high, is mightier." By all those around us, this chorus seemed to be highly valued, and it is one of great force and character.

Song, "Thy way, God," is chastened and pure, and in the hands of Miss Birch delighted the most fastidious ear.

Interlude.—This represents a calm, in which are introduced the notes of the nightingale, and other birds, also the gathering of clouds, distant thunder, &c. &c.

The Storm Chorus begins by representing the bursting of clouds, the noise that birds make before a storm, heavy drops of rain, thunder, &c. In the midst of this storm the melody of the Hebrew chorale is introduced. At the conclusion of the chorus a supposed new chord is used, with great effect, the notes being B flat, E flat, F sharp, and C. This chord occurs at the F Fmo. The storm then dies away, and Israel's people are led like sheep by a pastorelle in four-crotchet time, ending PP, with an elegant flute accompaniment.—The precision and point with which this Chorus was performed reflects the highest credit on all concerned.

Chorus—"Awake, put on thy strength." The sentence, "Put on thy beautiful garments," is a charming piece of harmony. "Thy watchman shall lift up the voice," is accompanied by horns, in plain melody, and of ancient movement. The glorious words, "He hath redeemed Jerusalem," is given with the entire force of the band and choir.—We were delighted with this Chorus.

Recit.—"Come, ye blessed," is a correct interpretation of the words; as is the chorus, "Happy art thou," which follows. There are four horns to this Chorus, producing a rich effect.

Recit.—"Now if the fall of them." Remarkable for a cultivated style of recitative.

Quartet.—"Praise the Lord." The organ obligato is freely written, and is followed by the last Grand Chorus, "Marvellous are thy works,"—which is a fugue, showing great contrapuntal skill, and filled with ingenious canons. At the end there are passages of imitation, cleverly managed. The conclusion is filled up with all the force obtainable; the principal singers having a separate part, and a broad cadence marked "Molto Grosso," closes this effort of youthful genius.

The greatest praise is due to Mr. Hill, the Chorus Master; Mr. Harcourt, the Instrumental Conductor; and Mr. Bray, the Leader.

At the conclusion of the performance, the whole audience rose, and heartily cheered the composer for several minutes; the band and performers joined in the general applause. Dr. Bexfield, who seemed to be greatly excited, gracefully bowed his acknowledgments, and retired.

Provincial.

HALIFAX.—(From a Correspondent.)—The second concert of the Halifax Philharmonic Society for the season, was given on Tuesday, the 14th October. The selection was good, and the performance showed considerable improvement in the band; nor do we remember to have heard the instrumental performers to better advantage. The music performed by the band, was the adagio and allegro movements of Mozart's symphony in E flat, overtures to Cherubini's Anacreon, Weber's Preciosa, Auber's Masaniello, Beethoven's Men of Prometheus, and Beethoven's trio in E flat (op. 20), for the pianoforte, violin, and violoncello. This last was the gem of the evening, and was remarkable for the playing of the two stringed instruments, by Messrs. Whitaker and Baxendale. Mr. Frobisher played the pianoforte with more than his accustomed taste and spirit. In the accompaniments to the glees and songs, Mr. Frobisher also manifested ability and skill. The vocal performances were all entrusted to native talent. Miss Tankard was encored in Hobb's song, "The Captive Greek Girl;" in Malibran's duet, "The Meeting;" and in Calcott's glee, "In the lonely Vale of Streams;" the clear ringing tones of Miss Bancroft's voice took the audience by surprise. Mr. Stadden's voice promises to supply a part which has lately been deficient; Mr. Townend took the tenor parts with all his accustomed precision; Mr. John Carter subdued his voice to harmonise effectively with the other singers; but in his solos gave rein to its fullest power; he was encored in Spörle's song, "The Altar, the Cottage, and the Throne."

MACCLESFIELD.—Miss Goddard has been playing here, during the last week to crowded houses. She appeared at Wrexham for the race nights, the performance being under the patronage of Lord Seaham and Sir Watkin Wynn.

MANCHESTER—(From a Correspondent.)—The fourth series of Free Trade Hall weekly "Concerts for the People" opened on Monday evening last, when, notwithstanding the powerful counter attractions at the Theatre Royal and elsewhere, we were glad to find the large hall filled in every part, there being not fewer than fifteen hundred persons present. These popular gatherings have commenced under very favourable auspices, and in many respects bid fair to eclipse all former campaigns. Too much praise cannot be awarded to the enterprising projector of the scheme, Mr. H. Peacock, for having, no doubt at considerable expense, engaged in addition to the regular local artists, M. Delevanti and Mr. Perring, the former a very clever barytone in the buffo school, we believe from Liverpool—the latter a tenor of really high merit, and the author of the popular song, "Oh the Maids of Merry England." It would be difficult to describe the uproarious reception with which these gentlemen were greeted on Monday last; suffice it that they were most enthusiastically encored in all they had to do. It was by some considered a daring attempt for Mr. Perring to select the somewhat arduous and well known scena, "All is lost" for his first effort, especially as our popular English tenor, Mr. Sims Reeves, was singing it at the very next door, the Theatre Royal, the same evening; we were fortunate enough, however, to hear both—and only re-echo the universal feeling here, when we assert that the former does not suffer one whit by comparison with the latter. We can only say, Mr. Perring's reception must have been gratifying to him, and in our estimation, one of the purest specimens of modern ballad singing is found in that touching air of Balfe's "In this Old Chair," as given by the gentleman before named. We are dull folks here, generally speaking, but this gentleman has set the town quite in a blaze. Of Mr. Delevanti we must be brief; he possesses a somewhat pleasing voice, and has, withal, a fund of rich quaint humour which tells wonderfully on his auditors. He is already quite a card with the concert-going folks here, and will maintain a prominent position in our local societies. Of the merits of the other principals—Miss Shaw, the soprano and Mrs. Thomas, the contralto—we must confess to some disappointment; we were sorry to find the former lady manifest no improvement after an absence of some months' rest, and the latter appeared to us to be looking worse and sang with less animation and expression than when last we heard her. We would also caution this lady against a habit, which seems to be growing, of exaggerating her points—they occasionally border on the ridiculous—we may mention the passage in Bishop's glee, "Blow Gentle Gales" 'Deep as our Despair!' which is only effective when given with a feminine grace and delicacy, and not sung in that masculine bold manner of forcing the lowest notes of the voice, serving merely to call forth the approbation of the vulgar. Of the choir, which has obtained a high reputation in past seasons, we cannot say we were favourably impressed with their efforts on the opening night, but may reasonably expect an improvement as the season advances—at present, the trebles and tenors lack force—the clever chef of the orchestra, Mr. D. W. Banks, will soon, no doubt, however, remedy this defect. This gentleman's duties in connexion with these concerts, are certainly most arduous, having respectively, each evening, to occupy his position as conductor, pianist, and organist. We cannot now enter on the programme of Monday evening last, but may name that out of fifteen pieces five were encored. The directors of the Mechanics' Institution have given the first of their series of "Saturday Evening Concerts" with very indifferent success. We shall probably notice them in your next. The Glee and Madrigal Union, who have been singing at Willis's rooms during the past months, open here for two concerts to-morrow (Thursday). The result shall be sent you in time for your next issue. Albert Smith has also looked in upon us, which makes us quite full of amusements, at present, to wile away the tedious hours between eight and eleven p.m.

BATH.—MR. AND MRS. MILLAR'S SOIREE MUSICALES.—The first of these concerts took place at 13, Old Sydney-place, on Monday evening. The attendance was numerous and fashionable. The vocalists were Mr. and Mrs. Millar, Mr. Henry Phillips, and Mr. Bianchi Taylor; pianist, Mr. Walter Gibbs. Sir Henry Bishop had been announced to conduct, but was, we regret to state, prevented attending by severe indisposition; the distinguished composer, however, in a letter to Mr. Millar, expressed a hope that he should be able to attend the second soirée a fortnight hence. The programme presented a tasteful selection of choice music, which was admirably executed, from beginning to end. The imperishable glee, "The Chough and Crow," though so familiar, is deserving mention for the great delicacy and taste with which Mrs. Millar and Mr. Phillips sang the solos and for the neatness with which the ensemble was maintained in the chorus. Mrs. Millar sang throughout with her accustomed purity of style and facility of vocalism, being especially effective in the duet from Donizetti's L'Elisir d'Amore, "Quanto amore," in which Mr. B. Taylor sustained the part of Dulcamara with much humour; in Sir H. Bishop's Canzonet, "There is an hour;" and in Rossini's duetto "Mira la bianca luna" in which she was supported by Mr. Millar. Mr. Millar sang Sir H. R. Bishop's recitative and air "Orynthia my beloved," and the ballad "Believe me if all those endearing young charms," with his usual ease, feeling, and finish, and rendered important service in the concerted piece, especially in the quartett from Lucia, "Chi mi frena in tal momento," in which his voice "told" admirably. Mr. H. Phillips displayed his voice and execution to great advantage in the scena "Is this the region?" by Sir H. R. Bishop, and also in a song of his own called "Morning." Mr. Bianchi Taylor took part in the concerted pieces and in a couple of duets with the ability which always characterises his efforts. Mr. Walter Gibbs played Leopold de Meyer's Marche D'Isley, and one of Weber's choicest Rondos with neatness and finish, accomplishing the difficult passages which abound in the two compositions with an ease and mastery of finger and a correctness of reading which promise well for the future position of the young professor. One of the most interesting features of the concert was the appearance of two youthful débütantes, Miss Louisa and Miss Annette Millar, who sang Keller's pretty duet, "Slumber, my darling." Notwithstanding the timidity consequent upon a first appearance, the performance afforded evidence of careful training, and much musician-like feeling, warranting the anticipation of a valuable addition to the corps of the beneficiaires at no very distant period.—(Bath Journal.)

BOSTON.—The first concert of the Philharmonic Society took place at the Assembly Room on Wednesday evening last, and was numerously and fashionably attended. The first part commenced with the overture to Sampson, well executed, followed by a selection from The Creation. The choruses were well given, particularly "The Marvellous Works," (the solo beautifully sung by Mrs. Turner); "By thee with Bliss," and "The Heavens are telling." Mr. Turner sang "In native worth" with great taste. The recitatives were but indifferently rendered, especially that grand piece of declamation "And God made the Firmament." Allowance must be made for this deficiency. This class of music requires generally a degree of vocal eloquence which is long and difficult of attainment. The second part consisted of secular music, and of course gave greater satisfaction; it comprised two Overtures, Rossini's Barbiere, (taken too fast, and sadly lacking in precision), and Beethoven's Men of Prometheus executed in far better style. The "Surprise" symphony was given very effectively. The instrumental gem of the evening was, however, a trio for flute, violoncello, and piano, (by Messrs. Keller, Briggs, and Thirtle), comprising the "Glorno d'orrore" and other operatic airs of Rossini. Its length alone prevented an encore. Mr. Keller produces a pure and fine tone on his instrument, and executes with great fluency. Mr. Briggs and Mr. Thirtle, as usual, left us nothing to desire! The last named gentleman is a master of the piano, and general regret was expressed that he did not perform a solo. The vocal pieces in this part consisted of the charming madrigal "Down in a Flowery Vale," which was crisply given and encored; a similar compliment was also paid to Mrs. Turner's "Where the Bee sucks," rendered in chaste style. Mr. Turner sang "Poney waft me," (an adaptation of Verdi's popular chorus, Va pensiero) sweetly; and with Mrs. Turner, the duet "As it fell upon a day." The National Anthem of course concluded the concert, and was much better given than is usually the case. Mr. Thirtle conducted with ability; and Mr. Jewson led. The concert was highly creditable to all concerned.

LIVERPOOL.—A choral concert, given by the Philharmonic Society on Tuesday evening, went off rather flatly. The audience was by no means numerous, and those who were present did not appear either to understand or appreciate the performances, which consisted of selections from Mozart, S. Bach, Handel, &c. The next extra concerts, which take place on Friday and Tuesday week promise to be more successful. Some of our best English singers will give a performance, consisting of English glees, madrigals, catches, &c., which were very popular in the metropolis, where her Majesty patronised them. The glee party—Mrs. Enderssohn, Miss M. Williams, Mr. Lookay, Mr. Francis, Mr. Hobbs, Mr. Land, and Mr. H. Phillips, it is said, intend commencing a provincial tour in the autumn, and will pay us a visit.

The first performance of the Liverpool Musical Union Society took place on Friday evening, the 3rd instant, in Mrs. Elliston's Rooms, Nelson Street, Great George Square. Mendelssohn's trio for pianoforte, violin, violoncello, was played by Mrs. Beale, Signor Sivori, and Mr. Haddock, in a manner we had not before heard equalled. Mrs. Beale possesses qualities of a high order; her execution was certain and brilliant. We were particularly pleased with the light and delicate commencement of the scherzo, molto allegro, so highly characteristic of Mendelssohn's style. Beethoven's Quartet for two violins, viola and violoncello, performed by Messrs. Sivori, Lawson, Baetens, and Haddock, was the gem of the evening, but, judging from the enthusiastic applause, the audience were of the same opinion. Sivori proved himself worthy of the fame he has of late acquired as an exponent of classical music. The solo for violin which followed was in his most admirable and finished style. The composition was Prume's somewhat celebrated Melancholico. Beethoven's beautiful Sonata, in F, was finely rendered by Mrs. Beale and Sivori. Our estimation of Mrs. Beale, as a pianist, increases with each successive hearing. A Quartet, by Haydn, for two violins, viola, and violoncello, executed by Messrs. Sivori, Lawson, Baetens, and Haddock, terminated a concert which gave unalloyed gratification. Moliere and Willy are announced for the succeeding concerts.

The crowded state of the Royal Amphitheatre during the past week testifies to the popularity of Mr. Buckstone and Mrs. Fitzwilliam, who have been playing several of their most popular characters. Some of these are entirely new to a Liverpool audience, viz., Grimshaw, Bradshaw, and Bagshaw, Mr. Buckstone's dramas, Good for Nothing and Grandmother Grizzle, and Douglas Jerrold's comedy of Retired from Business. Each piece has been successful, but by far the best is Mr. Buckstone's Good for Nothing—one of the most pleasing, suggestive, and apropos pieces ever written. This little farce is very creditable to Mr. Buckstone's literary powers. It is exceedingly well acted by himself and Mrs. Fitzwilliam, and has achieved, both here and in London, well-merited success. The comedy of Retired from Business, played for the benefit of Mrs. Fitzwilliam, is one which will attract considerable attention in Liverpool at the present time, when all sensible people are filled with disgust at the recent doings at the Town Hall—for the snobbery of mercantile parvenues is here treated and lashed in Douglas Jerrold's most caustic style. In conclusion, we may state that all the pieces were carefully put on the stage, and very creditably acted by the stock company.

Miscellaneous.

EXHIBITION PRIZES.—We find that although the Council Medal has been awarded to the celebrated Boehm of Munich, the English firm of Rudall, Rose, & Co., are to have a Prize Medal for certain patented improvements upon Boehm's Flute, contrived by Mr. Carte.

MR. BAKER.—We regret to have to record the death of this gentleman, who was secretary to the Society of British Musicians for many years. Mr. Baker took great interest in the Society in whose cause he was indefatigable; his loss will not easily be repaired.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS.—We understand the secretaryship of this Society will shortly be "in the market," the present holder finding the duties too much for the present state of his health.

DRAMATIC MEMS.—A new comic piece, to be called Circumstantial Evidence, written by Morris Barnett, will be produced on Monday, at Punch's Playhouse, Strand Theatre. The principal characters by Mr. Belton (late of the Princesses Theatre), Mr. J. Rogers, and Miss Marshall.

A new serious drama, by the same successful author, has been accepted by Mr. Charles Kean, with which we understand the ensuing season at the Princesses will be inaugurated.

The Haymarket will re-open on Monday week with Macfarren's comic opera, King Charles the Second. Mr. Webster has spared no expense to give this fine work in a complete state. The principals will be Harrison, Weiss, Durante, Miss Pyne, Miss Louisa Pyne, and Madame Macfarren.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT AT MANCHESTER sent his communication too late for insertion this week.—The same to our correspondent at Sunderland.—In future we would request all letters to be transmitted by Thursday morning.

AN OLD AMATEUR AND PHILO-MUSICA in our next.

Advertisements.

THE POPULAR SONG OF THE DAY.

"TALK OF HIM THAT'S FAR AWAY," composed by THOMAS CHANTREY. A new edition of which is just issued, may be had at ADDISON & HOLLIER'S, 210, Regent-street, London. For simplicity, elegance, and originality of melody, it is unrivalled.

Also, by the same author, "Why wilt thou not love?" and "The dream is past."

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS!

THE ROAD TO HEALTH,

CURE of a disordered Liver and Bad digestion. Copy of a Letter from Mr. R. W. Kirkus, Chemist, 7, Prescott-street, Liverpool, dated 6th June, 1851. To Professor HOLLOWAY, Sir,—Your Pills and Ointment have stood the highest on our sale list of Proprietary Medicines for some years. A customer, to whom I can refer for any enquiries, desires me to let you know the particulars of her case. She had been troubled for years with a disordered liver and bad digestion. On the last occasion, however, the virulence of the attack was so alarming, and the inflammation set in so severely, that doubts were entertained of her not being able to bear up under it; fortunately she was induced to try your Pills, and she informs me that after the first, and each succeeding dose, she had great relief. She continued to take them, and although she only used three boxes, she is now in the enjoyment of perfect health. I could have sent you many more cases, but the above, from the severity of the attack, and the speedy cure, I think speaks much in favour of your astonishing Pills.

(Signed)

R. W. KIRKUS.

These celebrated Pills are wonderfully efficacious in the following complaints:—

Ague	Constipation of the Bowels	Lumbago	Tic Douloureux
Asthma	the Bowels	Piles	Tumours
Bilious Complaints	Consumption	Rheumatism	Ulcers
Debility	Head-ache	Retention of Urine	Worms of all kinds
Blotches on the Face	Dysentery	Scrofula or King's Evil	Weakness, from whatever cause
Skin Complaints	Erysipelas	Inflammation of the Liver	Stomach &c., &c.
Colic	Female Irregularities	Jaundice	Sore Throats
	Leucorrhoea	Liver complaints	Stones & Gravel

Sold at the Establishment of Professor HOLLOWAY, 244, Strand (near Temple Bar), London, and by all respectable Druggists and Dealers in Medicines throughout the Civilized World, at the following prices—1s. 1d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 21s., and 33s. each Box. There is a considerable saving by taking the larger sizes.

N.B.—Directions for the guidance of Patients in every Disorder are affixed to each Box.

ORCHESTRAL SOCIETY.

THE ORCHESTRAL SOCIETY is formed for the Public Performance of works in the highest class of Orchestral Music, with special reference to new untried, or comparatively unknown compositions.

SEASON 1851-2.

COUNCIL.

HENRY BLACKROVE.
JAMES HOWELL, Hon. Secretary.
JOHN HULLAN.

CHARLES LUCAS.
ALFRED NICHOLSON, Hon. Secretary.

The First Series of Concerts will be given at St. Martin's Hall on the following Monday evenings:—

November 17th, 1851.

December 1st, —

December 15th, —

December 29th, —

January 12th, 1852.

January 26th, —

February 9th, —

February 23rd, —

Terms:—Subscription to the Series, £2 2s.; Single Ticket, 10s. 6d.; Double Ticket, 15s.; Stalls for the Series, £3 3s.; Single Tickets, 15s. The seats will be numbered, and reserved throughout the evening. Tickets are now ready for delivery at Messrs. Addison and Hollier's, 210, Regent-street.—Conductor, Mr. HULLAN.

LA PERLE DE L'EXPOSITION.

THE new Polka composed by Magnus, and performed by him nearly 500 times on Erard's Grand Piano (in the main east avenue of the Crystal Palace), is now published, price 2s. 6d. Also, the new ballad, "The Greek Slave," beautifully illustrated in chromo-lithography, price 2s. 6d. Jewell and Jetchford, 17, Soho Square.

Just Published.

NEW MUSIC BY BRINLEY RICHARDS.

RECOLLECTIONS OF WALES, Welsh airs elegantly arranged. No. 1, Poor Mary Anne; No. 2, The Ash Grove; No. 3, The Rising of the Lark; and No. 4, March of the Men of Harlech. (To be continued.)

"In the arrangement of the Welsh melodies it is universally acknowledged that Mr. Brinley Richards has far excelled all his competitors; doubtless from the fact of his being a native of Wales, and consequently imbued with the spirit of its music."

Also, The Sturm Marsch Galop, 3s.; The Angel's Song, 2s.; and The Vision, 2s. The Vision, a romance.

NEW PIANOFORTE MUSIC BY THEODORE OESTEN.

Strongly recommended.

WHEN the Swallows hasten Home; Die fustigen Weiber von Windsor, by Nicolini, 3s. 6d. Three Legend Fantasias: No. 1, Legends of Gipsies; No. 2, Legends of Love; No. 3, Legends of Fairies; each 3s. Variations on Weber's Preciosa, 2s. 6d.; Der Wildschütz, by Lortzing, 3s.; Fantasia on the Freischütz, 3s.; Fantasia on Norma, 3s.; L'Elève Avancé, two instructive Rondos, each 2s. 6d.; Perles de l'Opera, twelve elegant pieces on favourite operatic themes, each 2s.; Perles Allemandes, six elegant fantasias on favourite German airs, each 2s. 6d.; Temple of Flowers, six pleasing and instructive sonatas for small hands, each 2s. 6d.

The Best Pianoforte Tutor. Twenty-fourth edition, large folio, price 4s.

HAMILTON'S MODERN INSTRUCTIONS

FOR THE PIANOFORTE. Fingered by CHARLES CZERNY.

"A work which has already passed through more than a score of editions needs, we think, little beyond a mere reference to the fact stated in its commendation. This unbounded popularity at once demonstrates that in the opinions of those most competent to judge, it is unapproachably superior to any other extant. That, in short, the instructions are communicated with a clearness and simplicity, and the gradations from the simple to the more complex styles of music, are effected with an ease that no teacher who values the pleasure of the pupil in the study, or his rapid advancement in it, should fail to take Mr. Hamilton's work as his text book." Vide Caledonian Mercury, Oct. 16.—N.B. Pianos for sale or hire.

London: Published only by ROBERT COCKS and Co., New Burlington street, and to be had on order of all Musicellers.

NEW PIANOFORTE MUSIC BY THEODORE OESTEN.

Souvenir de Belisario	3s. 6d.
Der Mulatte	3s. 6d.
Le Prophète	3s. 6d.
Sonatina	3s. 6d.
Lucresia Borgia	3s. 6d.
Perles de l'Opera, 1 to 6	3s. 6d.
Morceaux Elegantes, 1 to 6	3s. 6d.
Perles Allemandes, 1 to 4	3s. 6d.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent-street, and 67, Conduit street.

NEW AND FAVOURITE SONGS

PUBLISHED BY CRAMER, BEALE, AND CO.

The Tears of Love	W. Maynard.
My Home in the Valley	Frank Mori.
Softly ye Night Winds	W. V. Wallace.
Astoria	G. Linley.
O thou, whose beauty shines	Kalliwoda.
Came smile again	W. V. Wallace.
The Rhine Girl	G. Linley.
Farewell	Frank Mori.

201, Regent-street, and 67, Conduit street.

SCHOTT AND CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

TENOR SOLO WITH ACCOMPANIMENT FOR PIANO.

Bessens, A.	Souvenirs élégiques	4s. 6d.
VIOLONCELLO SOLOS WITH ACCOMPANIMENT FOR PIANO.
Demach, F.	Op. 1, Fantaisie and Variations sur des Thèmes Russes	5s. 6d.
Platti, Alfred.	Op. 10, Amour et Caprice. Fantaisie	4s. 6d.
"	Op. 11, La Suedoise. Caprice sur des airs nationaux	3s. 6d.
"	Op. 12, Divertissement sur un air Napolitain	3s. 6d.
Stainstein, Louis.	Op. 4, Fantaisie caractéristique sur des motifs Hongrois	5s. 6d.
Servais, F.	Op. 9, Fantaisie burlesque ou le Carnaval de Venise	5s. 6d.
"	Op. 10, Souvenir de la Suisse. Caprice	4s. 6d.
"	Op. Souvenirs élégiques par Bessens	4s. 6d.

* May also be had with accompaniment for Orchestra or Quartett.

FLUTE SOLOS WITH ACCOMPANIMENT FOR PIANO.

Briccialdi, G.	Op. 63, Deux Fleurs. Morceaux de Salon:
	No. 1, La Pensée	2s. 6d.
	No. 2, La Rose	3s. 6d.
Domeux, I.	Op. 28, Le Carnaval de Venise de Servais	4s. 6d.
Ortner, A.	Piece de Salon. Romance	2s. 6d.
Gabrielaki, I.	1me. Fantaisie	4s. 6d.

Schott and Co., 89, St. James's street.

FAIRY VISIONS,

Price 2s.

MESSRS. KAUFMAN and SON, of Dresden, who have performed before Her Majesty the Queen by special command at Buckingham Palace, have given concerts at Manchester and Liverpool with the greatest success, and have specially engaged Miss Rebecca Isaacs, who introduced her celebrated song, "Fairy Visions," in which she completely took the audience by surprise, this song being well suited to her refined and beautiful voice; she met with the most enthusiastic encore. The fairy like manner in which the words were expressed will render "Fairy Visions" the most popular song of the season.

LEE & COXHEAD, 48, Albemarle-street, where may be had "We're Messengers from Fairy Land," Duet for two Sopranos, price 2s. 6d.

MUSIC FOR THE ORGAN OR HARMONIUM.

THE AMATEUR ORGANIST—a collection of soft and full Voluntaries, arranged in six Books, 3s. each, by EDWARD TRAVIS, and may be had elegantly bound, price 18s. "Mr. Travis has introduced to the musical world a new and interesting work for the Organ or Harmonium, under the title of 'The Amateur Organist.' Mr. Travis has availed himself of an extensive and classical music library, and selected with great taste the most beautiful morceaux of the great masters, Foreign and English. To lovers of classical music this work will be found to be the most superb selection that has ever issued from the musical press."—Vide Musical Review.

THE AMATEUR INTERLUDIST—a collection of short Interludes to play between the Verses of the Psalms, in one Book, price 4s., by EDWARD TRAVIS and J. P. DYER.

THE AMATEUR PRELUDIST—a collection of Preludes, with the Organ Stops carefully marked, in one Book, price 4s., by E. TRAVIS.

SACRED VOCAL MUSIC.

KELLER'S Collection of ANTHEMS, CHURCH SERVICES, CHANTS, &c., arranged for the Voice and Piano, in six Books, price 3s. each, with six beautiful and appropriate designs by Brandari, arranged by ALBERT KELLER. The six Books can be had in one Volume, elegantly bound, price 18s.

THE PSALMODIA BRITANNICA—a selection of Psalms and Hymns for the Voice and Organ, in six Books, price 3s. each, arranged by EDWIN FLOOD, and may be had in one Volume, neatly bound, price 18s.

London: LEE & COXHEAD, 48, Albemarle-street, and can be had of all Book and Musicellers.

N.B.—A New Edition of "Hark, the Sabbath Bells," by Edwin Flood.

JOULE'S DIRECTORIUM CHORI ANGLICANUM.

Second Edition, price 1s., in cloth 1s. 6d.

THE most complete Choral Service book that has yet appeared. Dedicated by permission to the Lord Bishop of Manchester. For highly favourable reviews see "Christian Remembrancer," "Theologian," "Parish Choir," &c. &c. London: J. A. Novello.

A few copies of the quarto edition, price 15s., still on hand.

GREAT DISCOVERY IN HARMONY.

Now ready, price 5s.

THE PRINCIPLES OF NATURAL HARMONY, being a Perfect System founded upon the discovery of the True Semitonic Scale, by J. J. HAITE. London, Published by the Author, 76, Leadenhall-street. To be had of Messrs. Ewer and Co., Newgate-street, and Messrs. Cocks and Co., New Burlington-street.

Printed and Published for the Proprietor by MICHAEL SAMUEL MYERS, of No. 2, Sudley Road, Clapham Road Clapham Road, in the parish of Lambeth, at the office of MYERS & Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, in the parish of St. Paul, where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed, post paid To be had of G. Purkess, Dean Street, Soho; Allen, Warwick Lane; Vickers, Holywell Street, and at all Booksellers.—Saturday, October 25, 1851.

The Musical World.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s.; Half year, 8s.; Three Months, 4s.; (Stamped Copies 1s. per Quarter extra, payable in advance, to be forwarded by Money Order, to the Publishers, Meyers & Co., 22, Tavistock-st., Covent Garden).

No. 44.—VOL. XXIX.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 1, 1851.

Price Fourpence.
Stamped Fivepence.

THE WINTER SEASON.

To those interested in musical matters—and their name is legion—the question must have frequently suggested itself, “what are we to have in the shape of entertainment during the winter campaign?” Upon this subject, we are sorry to say, we cannot proffer any enlightenment. We are certified as to several facts, but are profoundly in the dark as to many circumstances upon which we should like to be informed. For instance, we know that Macfarren’s King Charles the Second will be produced on Monday week at the Haymarket, and that Jullien begins his concerts on the same night at Drury Lane. We know that Mr. Webster intends to produce the opera in a style of great efficiency and completeness; and that Jullien is puzzling his brain—if that were possible—to provide startling novelties for his visitors; but we know not what other musical attraction or attractions the enterprising manager of the Haymarket has in store for his patrons; and all we can glean of Jullien is, that he is about to surprise the London world, for the hundredth time, with something entirely unanticipated.

Again, of Mr. Bunn and his operatic management at Drury Lane we are entirely innocent. That he is in treaty for the theatre we believe; but that he can procure a thoroughly good and useful company, notwithstanding his endeavours and exertions, we take leave to doubt. It was rumoured that Mr. Bunn had made offers of an engagement to the celebrated Mademoiselle Wagner—at least so our correspondent at Berlin informed us—and that the fair vocalist refused, on the grounds that she could not learn the language in sufficient time. The endeavour to procure so distinguished an artist as Mademoiselle Wagner for his theatre shows the indefatigable zeal with which Mr. Bunn labours in the cause; but surely he might procure a good company without going as far as Berlin. It would no doubt be difficult, if not impossible, to obtain an English singer who would shine in the grand tragic line; but this is the very thing we do not want in English Opera. It is not required in the Siege of Rochelle, The Bohemian Girl, The Mountain Sylph, Giselle, Murilana, King Charles the Second, or indeed any English opera we happen to know. Unfortunately, our native songstresses, ignorant of their own powers and specialties, affect Normas, Lucrezias, Aminas, and Semiramides, and despise your trifling Maritanas, Æolias, Matildas, and heroines of minor force and extravagance. Singing is to them of secondary consideration. They must act and show their propensities to sound and fury. Vocalism is a good thing, but histrionism is better. Would Grisi and Cruvelli obtain half the applause they do, if they confined their efforts to love smatterings, and ballads in two verses with a coda and a plain tune? Would bouquets be thrown on the stage to artists, and recalls administered after every act, if no opportunity were afforded them of “screaming like a bad curlew round a crooked mountain”—to borrow the suggestive and energetic expression of a friend of ours who deals largely in the style called “the metaphorical burlesque”—of twisting their arms like a Pythoness agonized, and full of inspiration gathered from distress, delivering her oracles from her three-legged stool; of poisoning their enemies; killing their husbands; or going raving mad over disappointed marriages? Certainly not! An admirable reason why English vocalists should not be content to rest upon the laurels to be acquired by their achievements in English opera. We will not say—it would be ungallant, even if true—that we possess at present no Pastas or Grisis to carry off the tragic bays, but we insist that our singers would be listened to with more pleasure by our audiences in comic, domestic, or semi-serious opera, than in the purely tragic or grand opera. An English audience must have their quantum of ballads. That is their look out in opera; and if that be wanting, the attractive power is lost.

Now, we have no doubt but that Mr. Bunn could assemble together a very admirable vocal troop, provided they were held aloof from Meyerbeer and the tragedies of Bellini and Donizetti. We shall mention no names, but merely bid Mr. Bunn keep his eyes open, and he cannot choose but see.

What Jullien is about to do in his forthcoming concerts at Drury Lane we can only gather from what he has done in seasons past. Something original and striking may be confidently anticipated. We knew that Jullien made liberal offers for the splendid collection of musical instruments in the Indian department at the Great Exhibition—including drums, gongs, bells, tomtoms, trumpets, cymbals, half-moons, &c. &c.—but we know not whether Jullien has succeeded in obtaining them. If he have obtained “these dumb warriors of noise”—our metaphorical friend again—it may be depended upon that Jullien will create a greater row than ever at Drury Lane, and make a greater noise in the musical world; if not, it may be depended upon that Jullien will do very well without them, and create a sensation despite the want of drums and gongs and bells and tomtoms and trumpets and cymbals and half-moons, &c. &c., from spicy Ind.

Mr. Stammers is, we understand, about to re-undertake the London Wednesday Concerts at Exeter Hall.

Of the intentions of the Sacred Harmonic Society we know nothing as yet. Of the London Sacred Harmonic Society we know that it commences its fourth season with Handel's oratorio Belshazzar, early in November. And so, from our very ignorance we have coined as pretty a specimen of a musical leader as could be desired in the pages of an art journal. Where we cannot command news, we must suggest it, and make amends by counsel and advice; whereupon, instead of loss there will accrue much gain.

CORBARI.

The charming, interesting, and talented Amalia Corbari has reappeared in the musical horizon to gladden the eyes of all beholders—to delight the ears of all listeners. Not that her light had been previously extinguished, nor that her radiance had not been illuminating other spheres; but that, in our musical microcosm there being no empyrean save that which spans the two capitals of France and England, Corbari could not be said by us to have reappeared on the musical horizon unless she had made her debut, or rentrée in Paris, or London.

In Paris, then, the capital city of France—at the Theatre Italien—the Salle Ventadour—the Bouffes—or by what other alias Mr. Lumley's Italian Opera may be denominated, Amalia Corbari made her rentrée in Donizetti's Lucia di Lammermoor, as the love-torn Lucy, and, need we say; with distinguished success. Never did character suit artist better. The delicate, feminine traits of Lucy, her grace, delicacy, susceptibility and devotion, were represented to the life by the charming Amalia, who appeared to have caught the inspiration of her part from the glowing pages of Sir Walter Scott. Nor was the singing of the fair cantatrice less worthy of praise. Corbari, while retaining the freshness and purity of her voice, appears to have gained for it strength and volume. She sings, too, with more confidence and abandon, and is altogether a more accomplished and perfected vocalist than when she was last in London. She was warmly greeted by the fashionables of Mr. Lumley's Theatre, and was received with unusual approbation throughout her performance. Mr. Lumley could not have insured for his opera a more welcome acquisition, or one more desirable in every point of view.

We are delighted to add that Mr. Lumley has secured Amalia Corbari for the next season in London. The most delightful of Elviras and Adelgisas will be received with open arms by the audiences of Her Majesty's Theatre, before whom she first established her claims as a favourite with the London public.

Mademoiselle Corbari's next part at the Theatre Italien will be Adelgisas in Norma, in which she will appear for the first time with Sophie Cruvelli. Such a Norma and such an Adelgisas have not appeared together since Bellini's Cléopâtre was first produced, when Pasta and Grisi supported the several characters.

MUSIC IN CONVENTS.

(From Mainzer's Musical Times.)

Castles that date from the middle ages tower upon the hills that command the lovely valleys on the banks of the Rhine, whilst those on the borders of the Danube are crowned by religious establishments. The latter, for the most part of very early date, are in many particulars well deserving of the traveller's attention; for whatever may be the peculiar branch of the arts and sciences that he has made his study, he will there meet with individuals who, remote from the rest of mankind, have devoted their lives to every species of learning. In each convent are found great mathematicians, men whose days and nights are passed in the contemplation of the heavenly bodies, and who only appear at their convent at the hours of prayer or repast. Others, again, seclude themselves in the museums of natural history, where they unweariedly prosecute their researches, or make experiments in natural philosophy; whilst the incalculable collection of ecclesiastical documents, memoirs, and chronicles, that the various libraries contain, sufficiently establish the fact that history forms no mean portion of their studies. Besides those who have devoted their time to the sciences of botany and numismatics, there are many to be found deeply versed in the dead languages. The fine arts, more especially music, are also much cultivated by the monks. Where else are artists so welcomed as amongst them? and when any one of these knocks at the convent door he has barely time to inform the master of the ceremonies (Zeremonienmeister) of the object of his journey ere he is overwhelmed with offers of service from every member of the community—from those who have grown grey beneath its walls to the novice of yesterday and the lay brethren. Words would fail us in describing the courtesy and kindness of his reception. As soon as he has been introduced to the room set apart for strangers, generally the one commanding the best and most extensive view, they proceed to show him every object most likely to interest him, and hasten to put him in communication with those individuals most capable of aiding him in his particular branch. The traveller's every wish is anticipated, and if the resources of the convent fail to satisfy his curiosity, or if a neighbouring abbey be richer in materials to assist him in his inquiries, whether it boast a better furnished library, or more curiously constructed organ, or if a more eminent organist preside at another chapter, the convent carriage is at his entire disposal; and that no part of the country or establishment he is about to visit may escape his observation, he is accompanied by the master of the ceremonies, and very frequently by the abbot in person. The same cordial welcome awaits him at the neighbouring convent; nor does he ever leave it without being entreated to renew his visit, and spend, not merely a few days, but weeks and months with its inmates.

Such as I have above described was the manner of my welcome at the Austrian convents. Thus was I conducted from one to another, although, with but few exceptions, my wish to become acquainted with them, and at the same time to prosecute my musical researches, was the only claim I possessed on their attention, so that any one else would have been entitled to a similar reception. Since, then, the convents still practise, as in days of yore, their hospitality on so noble a scale; and as in all probability religious establishments will shortly die away in Austria, as they have in France and the Rhenish provinces, our readers will not object to a detailed account of some of these institutions.

In Germany, the school of Austrian composers and organists holds a conspicuous place in the annals of the art of music; and it is for the most part in the cloisters on the banks of the Danube that these distinguished men dwelt and prosecuted the study of their art. There, too, were the works of the composers of Southern Germany planned and executed; and had it not been for the noble hospitality afforded to artists by these monasteries, many a rising genius would have been nipped in the bud, for lack of the sheer necessities of life. Their works once completed, the convent itself took care to bring them forward; for the choristers, scholars, heads of the chapter, and musicians attached to the establishment amply sufficed for this, without it being necessary to have recourse to extraneous resources.

To the convents of St. Florian, Krems-Münster, Seitensteden, Lerchenfeld, Melk and Neuburg, the Fuchs, Albrechtsbergers, Schneiders, Stadlers, Haydns, and Mozarts, were indebted for a generous welcome, organ, orchestra, and choirs.

In the schools attached to the convents music is cultivated equally with the classics and foreign languages; it is followed up in all its branches, both of composition and execution; the latter includes the practice of all instruments for the organ downwards.

There are some abbeys where, besides the usual choristers, their choir is aided by the students, novices, and professors. A military band, including *janissary instruments, is often united to their instrumental music.

In a life uniform and monotonous such as theirs, where the bell and the dial regulate their every act, music may well be termed the poetic side. The toll of the abbey bell now summons its inmates to study and now to exercise, now to prayer and now to meals; they may not lie down at night, nor quit their pillows in the morning, except at its brazen tones. But few incidents glide athwart the unruffled surface of their stagnating career, unless perchance a stranger seek their gates, and, during his stay, causes some change in their usual habits; then the most casual remark from him, the most hackneyed story of the day, the slightest account of the slightest adventure he may have met with, is eagerly caught up and circulated from mouth to mouth, from the father-abbot to the kitchen-drudge. He can at will give the tone to the next four-and-twenty hours, and bid them be cheerful or gloomy; he is for the time the ruling spirit of the place.

In the convents on the Danube every species of music is cultivated. Haydn's and Mozart's instrumental works are performed there with a degree of accuracy not to be surpassed in the drawing-room of Vienna. The brothers meet together several times a week for the purpose of executing these works; nor do they confine themselves exclusively to Haydn and Mozart, for their repertory is diversified with Beethoven, Spohr, Weber, Hummel, Romberg, Mayseder, Ries, and Fesca. They are well acquainted with, and execute with the greatest skill, foreign productions, such as the inspirations of Bocherini, Viotti, Kreutzer, Rode, Baillot, and Clementi.

Some of these musical reunions take a still more extensive range; overtures, symphonies, and concertos, have their turn. The vocal powers of their establishment are put in requisition, and aided by amateurs and ecclesiastics from neighbouring chapters, they perform the motetts, cantatas, and oratorios of Bach, Handel, Graun, Caldara, Jomelli, and a host of others. Dramatic music is not so little heard in these pious establishments as one would be led to suppose: operettas founded on scriptural subjects are performed there, such, for instance, as the lyric drama of Rebecca or Isaac's Bride; and even Gluck's, Spontini's, Weber's, and Rossini's finales and concerted pieces. During Passion Week the abbey walls resound with mournful strains of penitence and prayer, furnished by Allegri, Pergolesi, Schict, Fasch, and others.

After quitting the Tyrol, and visiting the surrounding convents, I embarked on the Danube for Vienna. At Linz we passed the famous whirlpool (Wirbel) formed by rocks that rise in the middle of the stream, and leave but a narrow passage for navigation, which is rendered more dangerous by the foaming waters that threaten to cast the vessels on the shoals. The roar of this whirlpool, which is heard miles off, filled my fellow passengers with apprehension; and though we were still at some distance from it, they all congregated on the deck, now turning their scared looks towards a cross fixed on the steep bank, now to the tall spare old man, who, calm and collected, was guiding the helm. We were hardly aware that we were in the midst of this hazardous passage ere our vessel shot far beyond it. The aged pilot then held out his hat to the passengers, who, as well may be imagined, were not remiss in testifying their gratitude. This fearful and all-absorbing sight once passed, every thing seems to wear another aspect. The banks of the Danube, hitherto undiversified, and without any interesting features, now become more varied and attractive. On the left hand is seen Maria Tafern, so celebrated throughout Germany as a place of pilgrimage; many hundred thousands each year repair to it, with hearts full of pious confidence, to implore the Holy Virgin's aid in their time of tribulation or day of sickness. The situation is most magnificent; the church and adjoining edifices commanding a view of many miles around.

The banks of the river now become bolder and higher, and gradually assume somewhat of the character of the banks of the Rhine. As on the latter, they are beginning to plant vines on the slope of the rocks that are washed by the river, and whose summits towering aloft seem to claim dominion over the whole district surrounding Vienna. From afar may be discerned the towers of a gigantic monument reared with consummate and almost incredible boldness on the topmost heights of a stupendous cliff; this is the magnificent abbey of Melk. It would be difficult to meet with an object more calculated to excite admiration; neither in the capital of Austria nor elsewhere is aught more imposing, more astounding to be seen, both on account of the vastness of its dimensions, and the bold sublimity of its position.

Melk, that dates as far back as the ninth century, was at that period the residence of the ancient Margraves of Austria, who fortified it against the incursions of the Turcomans. The high and massy walls that surround it, its imposing turrets, which rise above the abbey spire, forcibly call to mind the old castles and frowning citadels of the middle ages; and it is difficult to associate the ideas of prayer and peace with a building bearing such evidences of war and destruction. The strangers can scarcely repress the feeling of awe which arises within him as he gazes on this dark and haughty edifice, seeming to brave alike the hand of time and the skill of man.

Melk, in common with all the other Austrian convents, is a spot devoted to music; many a man of note has passed his days within its walls in the cultivation of his noble calling. My welcome was most cordial, and every one vied in satisfying my slightest wish. From my chamber windows I watched the meanderings of the mighty stream beneath me, and traced it in its course athwart the rocks and meadows as it rolled onward to Austria's fair metropolis. The loftiest imagination would fail to conceive aught more varied, aught grander or more imposing, than the sight of the rich pastures and towns and convents that the eminence on which I stood enabled me to discover. Amongst other ancient monuments there observable, is the tower in which, according to popular tradition, Richard Cœur-de-Lion was detained captive. At a considerable distance, vessels may be discerned, but they quickly disappear, hurried away by the rapid course of the Danube, which lacks variety, as it is not possible to navigate against the very strong and rapid stream of the river. According to recent statistical returns 8,000 craft pass down it every year towards the Black Sea, always following the same track. How different from the Rhine! where to and fro the most splendid vessels—perfect floating palaces—are ever wending their way; whilst the Danube is navigated by huge unsightly barks that are broken up and sold at the end of their voyage for as much as they cost, although they fetch merely the price of old timber. Fishermen and sportsmen, swimmers and loungers of every degree, are ever skimming athwart the waters of the Rhine, in graceful skiffs that bend beneath the pressure of their snowy sails. There is little communication between the opposite banks of the Danube; and if a few wretched boats do succeed, after unheard of efforts, in approaching you, they merely contain mendicants, bearing the figure of their patron, St. Nicholas, as the Neapolitans their St. Januarius, which tends to render the Danube far less animated than the Rhine, and moreover, far less hospitable.

But to return to the convents of Melk; it is when the moon is on the waters, when her pale beams kiss the valley, that this spot assumes a mystic air. There lurks a spell around it as the deep-toned chords of the organ, blending with the psalms and spiritual songs, so fervently, with so much holy unction chanted forth by the monks, are borne athwart the stillness of night, and keep time with the river's roar. Albrechtsberger, who listened with the greatest delight to the sacred music of the brotherhood, would frequently leave his room, and gliding behind the church pillars, ensconce himself in some corner, and there, touched to the

* This appellation is given in Germany to all instruments of percussion, such as the timbal, double drum, cymbal, trimbal, &c. These may be looked on as an expedient to keep the pious congregation from indulging in an occasional nap.

quick by these sublime melodies of olden times, weep unrestrainedly. "O Maximilian," he observed on one occasion to Stadler, "how paltry are our works, how paltry are even those of the first masters, compared with the simple strains of the fathers of the church! How happy am I when, under favor of the temple's gloom, I can shed tears as I hearken to this simple touching ancient psalmody!"

Towards the middle of the fifteenth century, the famous Benedictine, Conrad, lived in the convent of Melk; he was equally skilled in the art of music, in medicine, and in mathematics. This convent has at all times boasted the greatest composers of the Austrian school.

Korzinger, celebrated alike for his skill as a composer and as a virtuoso, inhabited Melk, whence he was summoned to receive the appointment of Kapellmeister at St. Stephen's cathedral at Vienna, where he died in 1630.

Baumgartner lived there in 1690, and Marianus Gurtner in 1750; both have left behind them very valuable compositions.

It was at the convent of Melk that Bachschmidt, about the year 1709, studied composition; he wrote both for the church and theatre; it was there that he acquired his skill on the violin and trombone, and attained sufficient proficiency to hold a respectable rank amongst the performers in the different European capitals.

Amongst the celebrated organists reared in this nursery of great artists, are Freitag and Weiss, whose compositions may serve as models in the serious and elevated style of organ playing.

It was during the latter portion of the eighteenth century that Melk had attained its acme of musical glory. Kimmerling, Helm, Albrechtsberger, Abbe Stadler, Francis Schneider and Paradeiser, flourished at this epoch within its walls. Such an assemblage of talent as this, of men whom Germany glories in ranking among the foremost of her sons, sufficiently testifies the influence exercised by convents over the science of music, and well worthy of our attention are these peaceful abodes, if we look at them in no other light than that of foster-mothers of music.

Robert Kimmerling was born at Vienna, in 1737—he entered the order of Benedictines in 1759. During the time he prosecuted his studies in divinity at this city, he acquired the primary elements of composition from one who had already begun to attract attention amongst the celebrated musicians of the period, and who became in the sequel an object of universal admiration,—I speak of the author of The Creation—Joseph Haydn. Thanks to his master and his unremitting attention to the works of Handel, Haase, and Bach, it was not long ere Kimmerling became the first composer and greatest organist of his day. He wrote several trios, quatuors, cantatas, offertories, litanies, vespers, and Te Deums, besides masses, wherein he showed himself a thorough master of counterpoint. Haydn evinced considerable admiration for his disciple's works, and was so much struck with a mass for eight voices of his composition, that he always spoke of it afterwards as a master-piece.

Kimmerling exercised upwards of sixteen years the functions of Professor and Regius Chori at the Abbey of Melk, with the greatest credit. His method of teaching, and his encouraging manner towards his scholars, contributed in no small degree to raise the musical performances in this monastery to the greatest height of perfection; so that, besides instrumentalists who possessed first-rate talent, the choristers brought up and instructed free of expense were as remarkable for their amount of musical knowledge as for their fine and well cultivated voices, they being competent to undertake at once the execution of the most complicated works.

It was with several monks, no mean proficient, and these youths, whose capabilities had been so fully developed, that Kimmerling, when Joseph II. and his sister Marie Antoinette visited this convent, in 1770, performed the operetta of Rebecca, or Isaac's Bride, the music of which he had himself composed. This piece was executed by a full orchestra and choir with great precision, and produced much effect on all present, especially on Marie Antoinette. She presented to the composer a large gold medal in remembrance of the occasion, and to each monk who had borne a part in the drama a similar medal of silver. Joseph II. was so highly pleased with the music, that he requested a copy of the score, that he might be able at a future period to renew the satisfaction it had afforded him.

Kimmerling died in 1799.

Amongst his numerous scholars, the principal were, Marian Paradeiser, Cajetan Andorfer, Gregor Mayer, and Müller.

Marian Paradeiser was born at Reichenenthal, in the year 1774. He was brought up as a chorister in the Abbey of Melk. At an early age he evinced a most decided turn for music, and in his fourteenth year wrote quatuors as remarkable for their graceful melody as for the science they displayed. Whilst still a student in philosophy only, he wrote Caladon, an operetta, a work which was estimated as being of the first order. His trios and quatuors were of the few compositions that the Emperor Joseph at all cared to hear. Paradeiser was likewise a very tolerable performer on the violin, and moreover a good poet. Unhappily his career was but of brief duration, for he perished in his twenty-eighth year. But few of his compositions have been preserved. The extreme confusion consequent upon the decree of secularisation and sequestration of the property of religious establishments caused the irreparable loss of many treasures of art and science.

Albrechtsberger was a native of Neuberg, in the neighbourhood of the convent of that name. In 1736 he came to the Abbey College at Melk, as a chorister. There he first learnt the rudiments of composition, and was initiated into the mysteries of organ playing, in which ere long he had no rival. He became organist in the convent of Raab, thence he went to Maria Taferl, and at length returned to the monastery of Melk to assume the functions of organist. His favourite studies were Handel's and Caldara's works. He subsequently returned to Vienna, where he obtained a scanty livelihood by giving lessons in composition. His scholars fully proved the justice of the opinion which Haydn entertained of him. He said, that, of all masters of composition, Albrechtsberger was the greatest and most profound. Never did master boast so noble a list of names as his scholars furnish forth: Beethoven, Ries, Seyfried, Schneider, Eibler, Preindl, Hummel, Weigl and others, who, although not equal to these in reputation, still became composers, professors, and organists of no mean distinction.

Albrechtsberger was indebted for a very considerable portion of the high perfection he attained in composition and skill on the organ, to the serious and effective turn imparted to his studies by his preceptor Kimmerling. Even during his life time, Albrechtsberger enjoyed that meed of admiration so well his due, as was testified by the tributes he received from the first masters.

On one occasion, Michael Haydn chanced to arrive at the convent during divine service, and, on entering the chapel, he was so struck with the powerful style of playing exhibited by the master who directed the Abbey's colossal instrument, that he ascended the flight of stairs leading to the organ-loft in order to gratify himself with a sight of him who had acquired so great a mastery over his instrument. What was his astonishment at recognizing Albrechtsberger, his old fellow-collegian, with whom he had prosecuted his classical studies at Vienna. In raptures at his execution, he clasped him in his arms, affirming that none could brook comparison, none venture to contest with him the palm of first organist.

On another occasion, whilst he was at Vienna, Abbe Vogler visited that city. The friends of the latter, who had opportunities of hearing him during his former tours, flocked to renew their admiration one day that he was to play the organ. He was accompanied by Haydn, Albrechtsberger, Stadler, and several others; amongst the number Mozart, holding little Ignatius Seyfried by the hand. Vogler could always rely upon the suffrages of the mass; for his style exhibited as much clap-trap as ability, as much straining after false effect as real depth; but in presence of those by whom he was on this occasion surrounded, he was careful to abstain from such an exhibition.

The theme he selected was a solemn one, and he was grand, although occasionally led away by his over lively imagination.

Albrechtsberger was next called upon to take his seat at the organ. The scientific manner in which he handled the theme he chose was marvellous; under his fingers it grew into a fugue, his pallid cheeks gradually became flushed, and when his audience imagined they had heard every possible variety in the working of the theme, the pedal as it repeated it rendered the effect yet more powerful and more exciting. Mozart observed to Seyfried directing his attention to Albrechtsberger: "That's the man to teach you composition, Nazerl (Ignatius): none ever yet came up to him!" He died in the year 1909.

(To be continued.)

HENRI HERZ—REMINISCENCES OF HIS TRAVELS IN AMERICA.

(Translated from "La France Musicale," by W. Grüllers.)

Continued from page 678.

THEATRES, INSTITUTIONS, AND MUSICAL SOCIETIES.

Before my arrival at New York, I was far from supposing I should there find musical institutions perfectly identical with those established in all the principal capitals of Europe. I had been for the last twenty years one of the most faithful frequenters of the Italian Opera in Paris, and had imagined that beyond the ocean I should meet with nothing more than national theatres, presenting no interest to a stranger, and of no utility to art. I had been told that the puritanism of the North-American in no way permitted his partaking of our intellectual enjoyments, so that I was equally surprised and pleased to learn that New York was in possession of a perfectly organized Italian Opera, and, owing to the activity, intelligence, and energy of its Director, Mr. Maretzek, was as prosperous as he could wish. I have known few impresarij able to combine the musical and managerial knowledge of this gentleman. I have since learnt that before going to the United States Mr. Maretzek had been vocal director of Her Majesty's Theatre in London. At the Italian Opera of Astor Place I have heard some of the operas which have the greatest popularity in Italy, viz., Norma, I Puritani, Don Pasquale, Ernani, I Due Foscari, L'Elisir D'Amore, Otello, La Figlia del Reggimento, &c. &c. They were played in a very satisfactory manner; the orchestra was led by Mr. Maretzek with an irreproachable maestria; the singers, most willing to obey such a conductor, exerted their utmost to obtain the applause of an enthusiastic public. I have often been present at the performances of Astor Place, and more than once have I fancied myself at the Italian Opera of Paris.

But it was not the Italian Opera of New York alone that brought back to me London and Paris. I was still more astonished to see societies resembling our Conservatoire, and others in the style of the "Ancient Concerts" of London.

The Philharmonic Society owes its foundation and continuance to the devotedness of a few musicians, the greater number of them having been instructed in the academies of Europe. They have been fortunate enough to obtain the financial help of a few rich amateurs. At their meetings the symphonies of the greatest German masters are performed, but principally those of Beethoven; these are played with the love of art, and with remarkable intelligence. I, however, observed that the conductor, Mr. Loder, (a studious and indefatigable musician,) in general took the movements more rapidly than Habeneck, of the Parisian Conservatoire.

Another society, founded upon the same basis as the "Ancient Concerts" of London, is exclusively devoted to the performance of works by the old masters. I think that Mozart and Beethoven are regarded as authors of yesterday, who have not yet had time to get through purgatory. Illustrious dead! before you can attain this terrestrial paradise, several generations must have passed away; and when nearly forgotten by the living, it is there, in that sanctum of ancient-ism, you receive shelter, that you are regenerated! The artist who directs these concerts is Mr. Hill. He is one of those men whose character is as sanguine as their zeal is indefatigable. The legacies of the old masters, instead of relaxing his courage, only seems to add fresh energy to his untiring and indomitable perseverance. It could be said without exaggeration that, in case of need, he could almost bring the dead to life.

By the side of these institutions, which are deeply rooted in the musical feeling of the country, several have been formed under various names, such as the Ethiopians, the Minstrels, &c. These consist of six, eight, or ten singers, who blacken their faces and hands with soot, so as to give themselves the appearance of negroes. Every evening crowds assemble to hear their barbarous songs, sometimes for one, sometimes for several voices. The principal aim of these singular performances—if one can judge by the boisterous hilarity which greets the end of each verse—is evidently to try the risible faculties of the audience. Sometimes, however, these strange songs are characterized by a delightful simplicity and naïveté; and what tends to increase the interest they occasionally present to an European, is the strange manner in which they are accompanied. Guitars of the most extraordinary shape, violins almost in pieces, and a tambourine, are in general the instruments most in requisition. But the one to which the greatest preference is given and which consequently is the most frequently employed, consists of the jaw bones of a horse; these struck against each other with the most astonishing rapidity produce an extraordinary—and not to say barbarous—effect.* The analogy of this instrument assuredly cannot be traced to any of our orchestras. Oftentimes these artists are in possession of various other talents: some of them after singing will dance, and then astonish by feats of strength and dexterity. I have seen them on a kind of table exhibit "pas" and figures not advisable for any of even our most accomplished dancers to practise in presence of the municipal guard instructed with the moral conduct of the frequenters of "Mabile or the Chaumiere." What is worthy of a passing notice is, that these concerts are the most patronized, and several individuals have been cited to me, who had made considerable sums by the undertaking of these buffoon entertainments.

THE THOUSAND LIGHTS.

I return to my concerts and thereby gain an opportunity of relating an adventure which occurred to me a few days previous to my departure from New York. Seeing the public still respond to my numerous calls, I thought to profit by the ascendant I seemed to have obtained over the more enlightened part of the population, and took the opportunity of giving some classical works, something of a higher standard than fantasias or simple variations. I then announced for performance some of the symphonies of Beethoven and Mozart, some of the works of Mendelssohn and Berlioz, and a few quartetts by Onslow, and various other classic pieces, all tending to elevate and instruct. I must here observe that in New York it is not—as in Europe—the upper classes alone who frequent and patronize concerts, every one there is desirous of hearing and listening to every artist who brings with him the least reputation from our continent, individuals of every grade, clerks, artisans, workmen, workwomen, from high to low, each class is mixed and amalgamated at these public reunions, and I may add that musical sentiment is found as equally developed in these intermediate, as in the highest sphere of society, there is equality of intelligence as there is equality of rights, this perhaps in a great measure explains how I was able to give the number of concerts I did to continually increasing audiences.

Still the fear of perceiving any decrease in the public curiosity kept me incessantly on the look out for something new. My imagination began to tire at this delicate and difficult task. I had completely exhausted my inventive faculty, my powers of imagination were undisguisedly at a stand still, but fortunately I had a secretary who would have undertaken to fan an expiring flame into the most dazzling brightness. He was one of those agents who seem to spring on American land. I do not doubt but what there must have been a few of such among the companions of Amerigo Vespucci and Columbus, I however can affirm that it would be with the greatest amount of difficulty we should be able to find in Europe such men as Barnum or Ullman, and if I was not acquainted with Mr. Belloni, the friend and secretary of Listz, I would assert they were undiscoverable. One day then, I was somewhat troubled to give an additional interest to my programme. I enquired of my secretary if he could forge anything from his inexhaustible store of imagination, something that would startle and arouse public curiosity to the utmost. To this question he for a few moments is silent, he leans his head upon his two hands apparently plunged in deep reverie, all at once he rises and with a nervous agitation impossible to describe and the enthusiasm of an inspired, cries:

* This is nothing more than our well known "bones," the indispensable accompaniment of all rightly constituted nigger companies, or Ethiopian serenaders. There must be some mistake when Mr. Herz mentions the jaw bones of a horse.—Translator.

"I have found it! I have found it!" in a tone as if he had absolutely discovered a new world.

"But what?" said I, astonished at so much confidence and assurance.

"Well then, what say you? a thousand lights."

"What mean you? how a thousand lights."

"Never mind; we have found it; I will answer for the rest."

"But still I must comprehend; it is me and not you, who gives the concert."

Without answering my question he only adds,

"I will forthwith go and announce there will be a thousand lights."

"But what analogy can there be between my concert and a thousand lights?"

"Cannot you perceive?"

"By my faith no, that I cannot, and I beg you will explain the enigma."

"You shall see, you shall see, all New York will rush to your concert. I'll say no more."

Our conversation at this point came to a complete stand still from the impossibility of my obtaining another word from my obstinate interlocutor. I had almost forgotten the circumstance, when two days after in walking down the Broadway I perceived a gigantic bill, upon which appeared in tremendous sized letters my name, illuminated by the foregoing thousand lights. I could for a moment hardly believe my eyes, but there were bill, letters, and the thousand lights staring me full in the face, quite impossible to doubt their reality. I was very vexed, and intended to let my secretary know it. At that moment I perceived him advancing towards me with a face beaming with joy, and to all appearances in expectation of receiving the warmest congratulations.

"Have those bills immediately torn down," said I impatiently and somewhat irritated; "I cannot and will not countenance such a proceeding."

"You might as well order me to throw three thousand piastres into the sea."

And he was right, for so it would have been; all the tickets for the concert had been bought up in one day, and many were sold at advanced prices by auction. By five o'clock on the day of the concert crowds were already besieging the doors, and when they were opened the building was immediately invaded by an unceasing and endless tide of people. I am unwillingly obliged to confess, the thousand lights met with greater success than myself. It was to no purpose I played my Rondo Russe, every one seemed preoccupied with something beyond the music, all eyes were fixed upon another point, each face was upturned; I for my own part was completely mystified. All at once in the middle of the most important piece, a gentleman requests the honour of a word with me, I of course grant it, and he, approaching me with the most perfect simplicity and immovable seriousness, said,

"But sir, there is not a thousand."

"Eh! What?"

"Did you not announce a thousand lights?"

It was only at that moment I was able to explain the inattention which had taken possession of the audience. The Americans are above all calculating the positive to a degree, the public had been intent upon counting the number of lights, and my querist who had interrupted me in so sudden and inopportune a manner had made certain there required about twenty more lights to arrive at a thousand.

The next morning the newspapers did not fail to relate this incident, which to them did not at all appear remarkable or surprising.* While upon this subject it affords me great satisfaction to give a few details I gathered with care, about the press of New York: they appear to me of a nature alike interesting to artist and public.

THE NEWSPAPERS OF NEW YORK.

There is in New York about a dozen political daily papers, of which eight are published in the morning and four in the afternoon. There are besides three or four weekly papers published on Saturday, and four on Sunday morning; one or two monthly or half-monthly reviews. All these publications are written in English; there are, in addition to the above, two or three German newspapers, and one French.

The American press in general is devoted almost exclusively to commerce and politics. Theatres, music, and the fine arts have not that corner reserved for them, which by us is named the "feuilleton." Certain papers, more bigotted than others, entirely prescribe from their columns all notices, reviews, or analysis of concerts and theatres as things too futile and unreligious. But this excess of Puritanism is becoming more and more scarce; the press in general is full of sympathy, good-will, and hospitableness for artists. The American press has been accused of being venal, and of pursuing a kind of conduct far from honest or loyal, viz.:—that of levying a tax, or, as the Americans have named it (doubtless from the Scotch), Black-mail or Black-tax, and to a certainty, were such the case, no more appropriate name could be found. But I have been able to judge and see by my own experience that in this accusation there entered a good deal of slander and calumny.

The journal which has incurred the greatest number of these insinuations has been the Herald; it has the largest circulation, and it directs influences and establishes public opinion more than any other newspaper. Its proprietor, James Gordon Bennett, gains, by his manner of pursuing journalism, lots of dollars, but at the same time numerous enemies; but the possession of the first of these consoles him for the second; he sells 30,000 copies of his daily, and 40,000 of his weekly edition. The Herald devotes more attention to arts and artists than any other political newspaper; it is as devoted an adherent and friend as it is an implacable and inexorable enemy. I am not able to say if it is the most appreciated, but, most undoubtedly, it is the most feared; the managers of theatres seek before everything to conciliate this powerful and fearful organ of the press of New York. Mr. Bennett, its editor, is a Scotchman by birth; he has taken for a fellow-labourer Mrs. Bennet, whose department is the noticing of concerts and theatricals. This fair (in regard to personal appearance) critic is of Irish origin. Between the two they combine wit enough for four.

The newspapers which have the largest circulation after the Herald is the Tribune, it has for its editor Mr. Horace Greeley, a man of astonishing originality; he combines a mixture of Fourier and Whig-ism, he is an Utopist, which however is counterbalanced by the practical man. He is backed by Messrs Taylor and Snow, two talented writers. The Sun is conducted by Mr. Beech, father and son, who humbug and journalize at the same time. Their Sun which is sold at a halfpenny a number, shines mostly upon the people who patronize it to the extent of 40,000 a-day. This however did not prevent some jealous workmen abandoning it (under the pretext of its dazzling with a false brightness, and raising an opponent and competitor under the name of the True Sun. No one has yet thought of publishing the Moon.

The Courier and Enquirer has less subscribers than the Herald or Sun, but it is one of the most influential papers of the Union. If the Herald is somewhat the Presse of New York, the Courier and Enquirer is the Journal des Débats. It has for editors and proprietors Colonel Webb and Messrs. Charles King and Raymond.

* We do not at all feel inclined to prostrate ourselves before the imaginative genius of Mr. Horz's secretary. Had he imagined "the thousand and one lights," we possibly might have been less sparing of our admiration, because he would then have established some sort of analogy between "the thousand and one American lights, and the thousand and one Arabian nights."—Translator.

The musical department is entrusted to Mr. White, who has more than once given proofs of unflinching independence, and remarkable perspicuity of judgment. The Journal of Commerce is exclusively devoted to matter commercial and religious; its proprietors have at the same time a building called the Tabernacle for song, either profane or religious, which they let to artists in return for money. This is all they are able to do for them. The Home Journal is personified by Mr. Willis, the elegant author of some travels through Europe. He is the favourite writer of the ladies, and his journal is more frequently to be found in the drawing-room of Union Square than in the counting-houses of Pearl Street. He appreciates artists as an artist.

The Express, of which the political department is conducted by Mr. James Brooks and the musical by Mr. Otis, is both a morning and evening paper; it publishes two editions a day. It has for afternoon companion the Evening Post, edited by the celebrated and admired American poet Bryant. The Commercial Advertiser is written by Tunann; he has an elegant and uncorrupted pen. The Mirror will be found a satisfactory account of fashionable taste for manners and customs by Mr. Fuller.

Foreign artists will always find in the Sunday papers as well as in the German a sympathetic support. The English journal Albion has for proprietor Doctor Bartlett, and for editor Mr. Watson, who unites in the highest degree the double talent of writer and musician.

There is besides these the French newspaper of New York called Le Courier des Etats-Unis, it owes its reputation and influence to Frédéric Gaillardet, the author of the Tour de Nesle, who has rendered a mutual service to French and American in being interpreter and giving to each the means of knowing and appreciating each other. The French artists have always received at his hands a kind and brotherly help. As a public man he has left no unpopular name in the New World, and moreover he has made his fortune. The Courier of the United States has now for editor Mr. Paul Arpin, a writer of some talent, and Mr. M. F. Gaillardet, who has become the Paris correspondent, so that nothing remarkable either in French art or politics is left unnoticed or unrecorded in its pages.

(To be continued.)

THE LONDON SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

This society has just issued its Report for the Third Season, from which it appears that during the past fifteen months, the Society has given twelve public performances in the following order:—1850, April 19th, Handel's Judas Maccabeus; May 6th, Haydn's Creation; May 31st, Creation repeated; Dec. 5th, Handel's Israel in Egypt; Dec. 27, Handel's Messiah; 1851, Jan. 31st, Haydn's Creation, and Dr. Elvey's new anthem, "In that day;" Feb. 21st, Creation, and Dr. Elvey's anthem repeated; Feb. 28th, Handel's Messiah; March 28th, Handel's Jephtha; April 14th, Mendelssohn's Elijah; May 7, a Selection of Cathedral Music, including the works of living composers; May 19th, Handel's Messiah. For each of these performances the subscribers have received two tickets, except for the Creation May 31st, and February 21st, and the Messiah February 28th and May 19th, which were considered repetitions, or extra performances; but for each of these one ticket was also sent to the subscribers, making together twenty admissions since the annual meeting in April, 1850. The following principal vocal performers have been engaged during the past season:—Miss Birch, Miss Catherine Hayes. Mrs. Sunderland, Miss Louisa Pyne, Miss Williams, Mrs. Temple, Miss Thornton, Miss Stewart, Miss Henderson, Miss Byers, Miss Dolby, Miss M. Williams, Miss Kent, Mr. T. Young, Mr. Turner, Mr. Lockey, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Donald King, Mr. T. Williams, Mr. Cooper, Mr. Phillips, Mr. Lawler, Mr. Leffler, Mr. Whitehouse, Mr. Bodda, &c. Of the above list some were first introduced to the public at the concerts of this society. The Committee state they would most willingly produce new oratorios in quicker succession if they were equally attractive as those usually performed; this matter is constantly upon their minds, and having most valuable works at their command, they will not fail to bring them before their subscribers and the public when practicable. In presenting the cash account, the Committee refer with much pleasure to the amount of subscriptions, which presents an aggregate not to be equalled by any other musical society in the metropolis. Mr. H. Blagrove, formerly first violin with Mr. Francois Grumer at the Ancient Concerts, is the leader of the band. Mr. Jolly officiates as organist, and Mr. Surman, who has conducted the oratorios at Exeter Hall from the commencement, wields the baton as conductor both at rehearsals and performances.

Original Correspondence.

NATIONAL ENGLISH OPERA.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—In your leading article of No. 42, you alluded to the various schemes which have been afloat for the establishment of a "NATIONAL" ENGLISH OPERA, with reference to which, I beg leave to conclude the series of letters bearing my signature by addressing to you and your numerous readers the following explanation of the part I have taken in this affair.

It had long been obvious to the public that the national reproach of our being a non-musical people was a fictitious blot, rather than a real stain, caused by some mismanagement or other, whereby the true form of our musical power was not enabled to manifest itself. Competent executants were known to exist, highly talented composers have been abundantly acknowledged. English artistes have been called in to give additional lustre to the mighty effulgence of an Italian geology, and even continental exclusiveness has been thankful to accept the aid of British talent at Naples, Milan, Paris, &c., &c.; yet withal, we, as a nation, have never been able to support the existence of a single theatre exclusively devoted to the Lyric Muse, without entailing upon its proprietors such pecuniary loss as rendered it advisable to discontinue a policy which threatened universal ruin to all, except a fortunate (and cunning) few.

With a view to change, if not amend the system of operatic tactics, several schemes have set their wits to work, some advocate monopoly—others commonwealth principles, but most of them exhibiting selfishness either in an open or a concealed, that is to say disguised form—whereby their intentions have been frustrated. Under the class of schemers I must rank myself—disclaiming merely but emphatically any comminglement of selfishness—and taking rather, if you please, the onus of any ridicule which may be flung upon me for honesty of intention. My scheme has had this ending; it has fallen through the cowardice of its supporters, through a lack of confidence, through a want of esprit de corps, and partly through treachery in a quarter whence the greatest amount of assistance had been anticipated. The sum of £2,000 had been guaranteed in certain quarters for the purposes of cementing a musical league, and would have been forthcoming at the slightest evidence of a concordant association; yet all this has been forfeited, and probably all future patronage rendered more than doubtful through a feeling of all others the most unlooked for—namely a lack of union. In short, musicians seem universally to distrust EACH OTHER, and why!—let some bolder man than myself give answer—for my part, I neither desire to bring myself under opprobrium nor seek to bruise others, let therefore the feelings to which I have been witness lie buried in obscurity, I shall tell no tales.

Mr. Bunn is now lessee of Drury Lane Theatre and will perhaps benefit by the notoriety which former short-comings have attained. He will have much in his power, but human nature is "sui generis," and he will serve his friends of course, without which failing he would be an ingrate; he will also, of course, serve the public, long before he will serve himself. He will doubtless seek diligently after rising genius, encourage it or lead it gently on, he will choose disinterestedly amidst the piles of MSS., which will be showered down upon him, for the very best, showing no favor, and will merit the plaudits of an admiring public by catering for its amusement in the true "Soyer" style, by supplying it with tit-bits ad libitum.

In the hope that some one—perhaps the public—will derive some ultimate benefit from the discussions which have arisen out of this question, I respectfully take my leave as the advocate of a NATIONAL ENGLISH OPERA.

And have the honor to be, Sir,
Yours Obediently,
PHILO-MUSICA.

ANDANTE AND ANDANTINO.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—I observe that a correspondent of yours calls upon you, in your number of the 18th inst., to remind you of a promise which he attributes to you—to express your opinion on the meaning of the relative terms of Andante and Andantino, suggesting to you that you might procure the decision of a certain distinguished musician, and "so settle the matter at once."

Unfortunately, the matter cannot be settled quite so easily as your correspondent supposes; since there is a very widely diffused difference of understanding on the subject, but I will with your permission offer you such information on the question as lies within my reach.

To begin with the words themselves, Andante is from the Italian word "ambulo," (to walk,) and the Latin equivalents for it given in the Vocabolario (Della Crusca) are ieus, proficiscens. We must, upon this, take Andante to mean a certain degree of onward movement, but of no great rapidity. Of Andantino, the Vocabolario makes no mention; but as all agree that it is only an Italian diminutive of Andante, it follows that it must mean some diminution of that onward movement—in other words, a slower time than Andante. In the same manner, Allegro, which marks a quick time, has its quickness diminished by its diminutive Allegretto, and vice-versa. Largo, which means a slow time has its slowness diminished by its diminutive Larghetto. The language of itself, then, seems to decide the question. Nor are authorities wanting for the use of Andantino as a musical form. First and foremost, I would put the authority of the late Muzio Clementi, a native of Rome, who in his "Gradus ad Parnassum," expressly gives Andantino as slower than Andante. Both the supplements to the "Dictionnaire de l'Academie," (one of them by the Academie itself,) and Monsieur Laveaux, in his Dictionnaire, (one in great esteem) concur in this meaning; nor is it, I think, immaterial to direct your attention to the slow movement, E in flat, in Mozart's fourth Sonata, pianoforte and violin (Pleyel's edition), which is marked Andantino Sostenuito Cantabile, and which it seems impossible, from the depth and fullness of its sentiment, to doubt to slower been intended by that great composer to be played in a have time than Andante. One would say, then, that the case is now decided; but the lawyers step in and say, "Audi alteram partem," and we will indulge them.

First let us hear the stoutest champions of the opposite opinion. Messrs Chorán and Lafage, in their most elaborate work, "Manuel Complet de Musique," part first, page 72, have the following note—"Beaucoup de compositeurs ont employé ce mot 'Andantino' pour indiquer un mouvement plus lent que l'Andante. C'est évidemment une erreur." But, unfortunately, these gentlemen, while they declare that many composers entertain this opinion, have not condescended to tell us how it comes to be so evident that this opinion is an error. The next, and better authority I would mention, is that of Alberti de Villeneuve, who in his French and Italian Dictionary, one of the highest repute, says, "Andantino—Diminuet di Andante, ed esprime un poco piu di vivacita della musica." In the Dizionario della Musica of Lichtenthal, a German by birth, but who lived twenty years in Italy, and wrote his Dizionario in Italian, we have "Andantino—Dimin di Andante è della stessa esecuzione, ma d'un movimento un po' vivo." Finally, I find in the "Dizionario della lingua Italiana," of the date of 1829, the same account, verbatim, as is given by Alberti.

In this conflict of opinion what is to be done? We can, I fear, only exercise our judgment in each particular case, as I have presumed to do in the case of Mozart's movement above spoken of. But I cannot doubt that the proper meaning of the word itself, backed, too, by such authorities as we have seen, marks a slower time than Andante. If I am asked how the error could have got into Italian dictionaries, I can only say that Andante movements, standing almost always in the place of slow movements, the diminutive word has been hastily taken as a diminution of slowness, and not in its proper sense, and so passed from one to another, in a matter not seeming of any great importance to dictionary makers.

I am, sir, yours obediently,
Oct. 22nd, 1851. AN OLD AMATEUR.

THE LATE MADAME DULCKEN.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

Dear Sir,—I shall feel greatly obliged if you will please to inform me where it was the late Madam Dulcken intended to have given a concert the same week she died. It was at some town about 40 or 50 miles from London. If you can inform me the name of the town I shall feel obliged.

I am, dear Sir, yours truly,
A CONSTANT SUBSCRIBER.

[Can any of our readers supply our Correspondent with the required information?—Ed. M. W.]

BURNEY'S HISTORY OF MUSIC.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—In your number of the 18th instant, H. J. T. enquires where Burney's History of Music can be obtained. It has been recently published by Mr. Bohn of York Street, and forms part of his Standard Library.

I have not at present seen your subsequent number, and am therefore in ignorance whether the information sought by your correspondent is already given him. B.

Wisbech, 28th October, 1851.

Poetry.

THE CHILD'S SONG.

O pretty Robin, gentle Robin!
Tell me where ye sleep at night,
When the wintry wind is blowing,
And the snow is falling white.
Have ye got like me a dwelling
That is fond, and kind, and warm,
When the angry wind is swelling,
To protect you from all harm.
"Ah, no, no," replied the Robin
I have got no home like thee;
All the lone night I sit nodding
On a cold and thorny tree.
Long and dreary hours I number,
And enjoy but transient rest;
Sitting half-benum'd, I slumber,
With my bill upon my breast."
Come then, Robin, every morning
I will give thee drink and food,
When the sun is not adorning
Garden-flowers and leafy wood.
Thus the pretty bird said fondly,
"I will sing sweet songs to thee,
If you treat me thus so kindly,
When the blossom's on the tree."

ANDREW PARK.

Foreign.

PARIS.—(From a Correspondent.)—After three representations of Lucrezia Borgia, in the last two of which Madame Barbieri Nini followed up her success of the first night—it may be said, triumphantly—Mademoiselle Corbari and Signor Calzolari made their rentrée in Lucia di Lammermoor. Since Mademoiselle Corbari's first visit to Paris, some four or five years since, her time has been principally expended in England and Russia, where she obtained equal favour and patronage. Mademoiselle Corbari was engaged by Mr. Lumley as comprimaria at Her Majesty's Theatre—this was her first appearance in London. She was next engaged at Covent Garden, where she played Elvira in Don Giovanni, the Princess in Roberto il Diavolo, Adelgisa in Norma, &c., &c. She subsequently went to St. Petersburg, where for two or three seasons, she was a great favourite with the audiences of the Imperial Theatre. Mademoiselle Corbari appeared for the first time before a Parisian audience as prima donna. The Lucia of the fair cantatrice, both in singing and acting, was an excellent performance. Mademoiselle Corbari, with her charming face and figure, her graceful and picturesque attitudes, natural always, her beautiful voice, so fresh and sympathetic, and the true feminine feeling which lends so much interest to all she does, could not fail to prove highly successful in such a part as the heroine of Donizetti's opera. Accordingly, Mademoiselle Corbari was listened to throughout with delight, and received at the end with genuine warmth. There was certainly no furor—no great enthusiastic demonstration—but the Parisians have been long since ennuyed with the Lucia, and, musically speaking, consider it a bore. Calzolari sang well, occasionally very finely. The new barytone, Fortini, made no advance. I fear he is no acquisition to Mr. Lumley's corps. Susini promises better. He has a fine deep bass voice, and sings well. I learn that the Italiana in Algeri is in rehearsal; but for whom, or to what purpose is beyond my fathom to reach. There are many other operas of Rossini much worthier of revival than this. For instance, the Turco in Italia, Armida, or some of the earlier works of the master. Meanwhile Paris is awaiting the rentrée of la Cruvelli, who, I understand, will make her first appearance this season in Norma. Subsequently will be produced for her Fidelio, Sonnambula, Semiramide, &c., &c. Guasco, it is said, will make his début in Ernani with Cruvelli. I am most anxious to hear this tenor, for whom everybody has a strong word of praise.

At the Académie Royale they are rehearsing La Reine de Chypre for the rentrée of Roger and Massol, and the début of Madame Tedesco. The last named lady is a myth. She is a Spaniard, brought up in Italy, who has been singing at the Havanna and in some of the American States for several years, as I am told, with immense success. I read all the American papers, and I confess I do not remember ever reading her name. A person who heard her in America not long ago told me she is a splendid singer, but rather fanciful. Whether her style will please the Parisians or not remains to be seen. She may be a second Malibran. Alboni's engagement is drawing to a close. I heard her lately in the Prophete, the Favorite, and the Corbeille d'Oranges, and I really think she sings better than ever. A new candidate for Terpsichorean honor, in the person of Mademoiselle Bagdanoff, pupil of St. Leon, made her début in the Vivandiere, with success.

BERLIN.—(From our Correspondent.)—Spontini's Olympia has been produced here with great success. The composer's widow assisted at the representation, and altogether the performance was one of great interest. Of the music I am hardly enabled to judge from one hearing. As far as my judgment goes, Spontini seems to be the very antithesis to Rossini. His music appears always laboured, and I find little or no flow of tune, like that which pervades the compositions of the immortal author of the immortal Barbiere. But Spontini, on the other hand possesses that conscientiousness and determination which Rossini required. Every piece betrays the hand of the anxious and painstaking workman; and sometimes, no doubt, from the over-laboured brain and long consideration proceeds that which may take its place alongside the efforts of inspiration and genius. It were hard upon humanity if it were not so. But of the music more another time. Mademoiselle Wagner appeared with immense eclat in the character of Statira. Her great height here was an advantage in place of a drawback; and her powerful and grand voice, and large style told with unprecedented effect. Indeed, I must say, I never admired Mdlle. Wagner so much. She made a great impression on all who heard her, and was received throughout with tremendous bursts of applause. Madame Kœster, as Olympia, also came in for her share of the enthusiasm. She sang very charmingly, and was not snuffed out by so huge an extinguisher as Mdlle. Wagner. Of the gentlemen I cannot report much that is favourable. The piece was put upon the stage in the most costly and magnificent manner.

NEW YORK.—(From Saroni's Musical Times.)—Miss Catherine Hayes has had no ordinary opposition to contend with, no common-place battle to fight, to attain the position to which she is justly entitled among us, as the truest, purest, and most distinguished vocal genius we have ever heard here. For five or six years past, more or less justly celebrated vocal artists have preceded her—one after another, by fair means or foul, creating some sort of enthusiasm. Every one possessed peculiar merits of his or her own, but not all succeeded exactly in proportion to those merits.

It is almost impossible for us to draw comparisons between Miss Hayes and any other Prima Donna we have ever heard. She is "herself alone;" her power is equal throughout the entire register of her voice. Her articulation both in English and Italian is perfectly distinct and unobstructed in the most difficult chromatic or diatonic passages. The Italian will understand the words of her "Ah! non giunge," as well as the Frenchmen her "Ah, mon fils;" the Scotchman will be equally delighted with her "Oh dinna think, bonnie lassie," as the Irishman with her "Savourneen Deelish."

Her perfection and power of sostenuto have seldom been equalled, for what would appear almost insurmountable to many seems to come natural to her. Her invocation to the Virgin Goddess, "Casta Diva," was one continued outgushing of prayer to the Deity, whilst Agatha's great scena from Der Freischütz, was by her rendered a picture of the most impressive and serene beauty, subdued in the foreground, but with so effective a distribution of light and shade, clouds and sunshine over the canvass, that for the first time we began to appreciate and fully understand the meaning of that expressive word, "Tongemälde" (tone picture).

The ballads of a nation are the original expression of the nation's spirit, and more even than acts and deeds, popular songs show in words and melodies the peculiar characteristics of the people. Single individuals, however, are the speakers, the interpreters for all—and the lyrical form of these national expressions, is the only one that remains for untold ages. Catherine Hayes is par excellence the interpreter of her own country's ballads. Her characteristic, mellow, and soulful expression, her feeling, pure and impressive enunciation tell the story of her ballad better than music and poetry united, ever told it before. All this we said and thought when we were enraptured with her Irish ballads alone, but great was our pleasure and astonishment, when we found her equally great, equally impressive in Scotch and English ballads. She is the ballad singer of our age, and none other that we know of can we compare to her.

We shall take a future opportunity of noticing her performance of sacred music, in which, as in ballads, she excels, by the subdued intensity of her style. For the present, we will no longer dwell upon a subject with which we are so strongly impressed, so truly delighted, that we could write on for pages more, but for the fear of abusing our readers' (we only mean those who have not heard her) patience.

MADAME ANNA THILLON.—Niblo's Theatre was crowded in all parts, on Tuesday evening, to witness Madame Thillon's performance of Marie, in La Fille du Regiment. Her conception and execution were alike true and brilliant, and caused a tempest of applause, and frequent demands for repetition, with only two of which she complied. We should like to hear Madame Thillon in a serious opera. In the Crown Diamonds and the Child of the Regiment, the gay, light-hearted girl, has but one occasional shade of deeper feeling, gone ere it is noted. We should like the opportunity of seeing and hearing her when a loftier idea pervades her representations, and she seems to be fighting the battle of life in sad earnest, and with other weapons than a garland and a smile. Shall we have this pleasure, Mr. Niblo?

JENNY LIND denies that she has any intention of appearing on the stage, and in a letter to Mr. Jay, her counsel, in New York, thus decides the question:

"I have not the most remote idea of ever again returning to the stage; and although I usually treat with perfect indifference the reports and sayings of writers in newspapers, or otherwise, yet I should feel really thankful to you to state that no inducement whatever can tend to make me change my mind in reference to the resolution I have adopted to quit the stage."

Jenny Lind will sing in Buffalo on the 15th instant, and thence proceed to Toronto, Detroit, Chicago, Milwaukee, Cincinnati, Cleveland, and New York, arriving here about the middle of December, to give a few farewell concerts here and in Boston.

DEATH OF LADY LOUISA STUART.—In London, on the 4th, died Lady Louisa Stuart, aged nearly ninety-four; the youngest daughter of the Minister, Earl of Bute, and grand-daughter of Lady Mary Wortley Montague; the lady to whom we owe the charming "Introductory Anecdotes" prefixed to the late Lord Wharnccliffe's edition of Lady Mary's Works. Lady Louisa remembered to have seen her grandmother, Lady Mary, when at old Wortley's death that celebrated woman returned to London after her long and still unexplained exile from England. Lady Louisa herself was a charming letter-writer.—Athenæum.

DEATH OF MISS HARRIET LEE.—At Clifton, on Friday, the 1st instant, died Miss Harriet Lee, at the advanced age of ninety-five. Miss Lee is best known as having in her "German's Tale" of the "Canterbury Tales" (a miscellany of little romances by herself and her sister), furnished Lord Byron with the plot of his play of Werner. Mere old-fashioned novel-readers, who are given to weary at the philanthropy, philosophy, and preaching, which threaten to turn our thousand-and-one tales into something more like "Evening Services" than "Arabian Nights," will find in her vigour and clearness of invention a merit which of itself deserves to keep the name of the novelist alive. The "Canterbury Tales" evidences vigour and clearness of invention, and invariably an elegant and neat style. Miss Lee wrote a few plays, but they met with little success. In her youth she joined her sister in keeping a school at Bath.

Dramatic.

SADLERS WELLS.—The engagement of Miss Fanny Vining at this theatre is politic in the management and fortunate for herself. This lady first attracted public notice two years ago at the Marylebone Theatre, where, among other things, she played Romeo to Mrs. Mowatt's Juliet. She joined Mr. Anderson last Christmas at Drury Lane, but was allowed little opportunity for exertion. At Sadlers Wells she will have abundant room for displaying her resources and maturing the promise of her dramatic nonage. Miss Vining's personal attractions are considerable. To a handsome and expressive countenance she unites a form at once elegant and striking. As this is her first engagement to perform regularly in the higher walks of the drama, it would be hazardous, as yet, to speak with confidence of her powers. Her performance of Beatrice in Much ado about Nothing, possesses both truthfulness of conception and felicity of execution. The passages of wit and raillery are her best; but the latter scenes are not wanting in the same vivacity of conception, for example.—

Beat.—You have staid me in a happy hour; I was about to protest I loved you.

Bene.—Then do it with all thy heart.

Beat.—I love you with so much of my heart that there is none left to protest.

The natural grace and simplicity with which she delivered the last words—spreading out her arms and letting her hands fall gently on her lover's shoulders, was her best point, and well deserved the applause it obtained. She should not after this have missed other opportunities of the same kind. Her performance in Katherine and Petruchio was not so clever, owing probably to the fewer opportunities the part affords. Should this lady attain the reputation of which she has already given sign, it will not be the first time that the genial atmosphere of Sadlers Wells has nurtured latent talent to a fair maturity.

SURREY.—When Mr. Barnett produced the Mountain Sylph, some fifteen years ago at the Lyceum, Mr. Arnold, the then manager, was compelled to withdraw the opera soon after its production from its want of attraction. The work, however, thus rejected with indifference, soon became popular and is even now drawing nightly crowds to the Surrey Theatre; and it must be gratifying to the author, who never stooped to propitiate "the many-headed beast," to find the products of his muse gradually taking their proper stand in public esteem. The Mountain Sylph is well played at the Surrey, wanting only a somewhat stronger chorus, and a little more clearness and precision in the concerted pieces. In the part of Eolia, the histrionic as well as vocal powers of Miss Poole are brought into full requisition, and she looks, acts, and moves as charmingly as she sings—stooping from trees and gliding through walls with the very footfall of a fairy; the grace and simplicity of her motions being aided by her light and elegant form. We would recommend, however, a simple rose in place of the double wreath of small flowers which encircle her brows. It is to be regretted that the fairy-heroine of the piece has not a larger share of the music allotted to her. Ernani was produced on Monday, and La Gazza Ladra will be the next novelty. Of Ernani more next week.

PUNCH'S PLAYHOUSE, STRAND THEATRE.—A new piece entitled Circumstantial Evidence, from the prolific brain of Morris Barnett, was produced on Monday night. It possesses all the elements of genuine comedy, and has the advantage of being not only admirably written, but the characters are artistically grouped. If at moments it grazes the confines of broad farce, it never overleaps the boundaries of probability. Hence the extravagance never offends, and the peals of laughter which the oddity of the situations elicit, are the natural result of the opposition of the characters and the dilemmas in which they are placed. Mr. Comfit, a retired pastry-cook (Mr. R. Romer), has a lovely daughter, named Sacharissa Comfit (Miss Maskell), and is anxious to bestow her in marriage on a literary gentleman, and contributor to the Ladies Magazine, named Byron Jenkins Scraps, Esq. (Mr. Belton). The lady, however, prefers a person of her own choice, a Mr. Charles Callimanco, a linendraper's gentleman (Mr. Moreland), but old Comfit will hear of nothing else but a union with his favourite Scraps, in whose head he believes all the learning and acquirements of the age are concentrated. Mr. Scraps, however, unluckily for himself, was more intimate with another person, a certain Polly Pearlsh, a clear-starcher and getter-up of fine linen (Miss Marshall) than the old pastry-cook would approve of, and to add to his difficulties, this said Polly, in a fit of jealousy, stabbed herself with a scissors, and to his horror and alarm fell dead—as he believed—at his feet, from the effects of the wound. In making from the house to avoid detection, and dreading that a charge of murder would have been preferred against him, he encounters honest Joey Snubbs, the pot-boy, and, imagining he will name what had been done, contrives to purchase his silence by various presents of money. The most amusing, and indeed the principal portion of the piece, consists in the ludicrous scenes which ensue between them. Scraps has not a moment's peace lest he should be detected; he fears the approach of a policeman in every gust of wind that blows—while on the other hand the pot-boy haunts him as if he were his shadow, receives money on all occasions without knowing why it is so, attributing his unlooked-for good fortune to the generosity of his new friend, whom he believes to be a real banker. Mr. Rogers not only played the pot-boy with his usual power, but he looked one, even without the assistance of the "pots" that accompanied him in all his wanderings. The Scraps of Mr. Belton was everything that could be desired from a man who contributed to a Ladies' Magazine, a poet, and one over whose head was suspended, as he conceived, the sword of the executioner. It turned out, however, that Polly did not stab herself, and that "Joey," therefore, knew nothing of the act which Scraps conceived had been committed, and that all he did was to raise her from the ground on which she had fallen. The piece terminates of course, with the removal of the agony of Scraps, and the marriage of Sacharissa to Mr. Callimanco. The applause at the fall of the curtain was enthusiastic, and Mr. Bolton and Miss Marshall were called before the curtain. "Circumstantial Evidence," has been the great hit of the season.

Provincial.

MANCHESTER—(From our own Correspondent)—We are glad to see that any short comings in our reports, from time to time, are likely to be made up to you from one source or other; and we feel much obliged to "A Correspondent from Manchester" in last week's Musical World for eking out our very imperfect, and avowedly inadequate, notice of Mr. Glover's Emanuel.

His strictures on our "slight inaccuracies," as he terms them, we think are hardly deserved. Who that has listened to it can ever forget for a moment Beethoven's Mount of Olives, which, in our idea, differs essentially from the subject of Handel's Messiah. It is one passage the most exalted in the Redeemer's career on earth, not his gracious advent; and does not tread on the same ground nearly as much as Mr. Glover's libretto. However, we, unlike your unknown correspondent, do know Mr. Glover personally, and are not "almost a stranger to him," consequently we do not wish to stickle or to be fastidious as to the amount of his daring. Emanuel is doubtless a work of no little talent, and reflects great credit on its author. We should be very glad to see its merits reviewed by some clever and honest musician; we use the word honest advisedly,—for it is unfortunately but too notorious, that in the musical profession there is more jealousy than in any other. Mr. Macfarren is a glorious exception; and it is really grateful to read his eloquent analyses of Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c. &c., and to find a composer not only giving a glowing eulogium on the works of a recently departed competitor, but so justly appreciating all his beauties of execution and intention, as he did the gifted Mendelssohn. It was not until Friday the 17th that we had an opportunity of going to any one of our short series of Italian Operas. What with the Queen's visit, and one thing or other, Lucrezia Borgia was the only opera we could get to. To tell the truth, the operas prior to that did not hold out much inducement, although we were very desirous to see and hear Madame Clara Novello on the stage. La Sonnambula, I Puritani, L'Elisir D'Amore, Il Barbiere (the best of the lot, but imperfectly cast and given), and Lucia di Lammermoor, have all been done a good deal here, and with higher talent; so, at the risk of again being called "fastidious," we did not go to the Opera here until Madame Clara Novello's benefit—the aforesaid Friday—when we were most agreeably surprised and delighted by a very well got up and respectable performance of Donizetti's chef d'œuvre (in our opinion). Madame Clara Novello pleased us much by her conception of the character of Lucrezia and her rendering of the music. She failed in impersonating the vengeful poisoner, from her want of physique. She looked too young to be the mother of Gennaro (Sims Reeves); and her figure is too petite to give us the idea of the Lucrezia. Her voice, too, wants fulness and volume for such a part, but her execution and intonation were faultless. She gave all the favourite pieces, "Come e bello" and the celebrated "M'odi ah! m'odi!" with exquisite feeling and finish, and was equally good in the angry duet with the Duke, and the impassioned one with Gennaro, as well as in the beautiful trio with the two. Sims Reeves pleased us more in Gennaro than any character we have yet seen him in: his voice we always liked, not his style; and the reason for our liking him in Gennaro was that he shouted less and whispered seldomer; consequently his delivery of the music was more natural and more equal. He wore a splendid dress. Whitworth made an excellent Duke Alfonso; he dressed the part very becomingly indeed. It consisted of an easy-fitting simple dark myrtle silk velvet tunic, with a gold cord and tassel at the waist, and a collar (like the order of the garter), with white silk tights. He sang the music like a careful artist, and his fine bass voice told well in the vengeance song, and the trio "Guai se ti sfugge," which last was most rapturously and deservedly encored. Miss Rebecca Isaacs looked a plump and pretty page as Orsini, and gained an encore for her spirited version of the "Brindisi," repeating only the last strain. The dead Gennaro and no less lifeless Lucrezia were both recalled; and not satisfied with that, the audience would make them retire to bring on the Duke and Orsini. Such is the prevailing fashion of showing delight at a clever performance! It wants reforming altogether. Lucrezia was repeated on Saturday week, being Madame Clara Novello's last night. Since then English versions have been given of Sonnambula, Norma, and Don Giovanni, a Madame Oswald being added to the company.

Hallé's Classical Chamber Concerts begin this evening at the Town Hall, a series of eight, to end in February next. We hope to be present (and to report them) at the greater portion, if not the whole, of them. This evening, too, the Glee and Madrigal Union give their first concert in Manchester. Such a party as Mrs. Enderssohn, Miss Williams, Messrs. Francis, Land, Lockey Whitehouse and H. Phillips is not to be matched in the kingdom, much less surpassed; and we are sorry we cannot be at the Free Trade Hall and the Town Hall at the same time. There now is a fine opportunity for your last new contributor 'A Correspondent'; there is 'ample room and verge enough' for one writer or three writers to contribute articles on "Musie at Man chester" at present, besides our brief and often hasty lucubrations.

An undress concert took place at the Concert Hall, last week, but "your own correspondent" not being a subscriber, is not admissible, as we have before said—are any of your other contributors more privileged? Mr. Knowles, of the Theatre Royal, too, has forgotten the Musical World, and does not continue to be as liberal as Mr. H. B. Peacock, or Mr. Charles Hallé, or Mr. Glover; however, when there is talent at the Theatre Royal in opera, combined with novelty, we are pretty sure to be there, and to let you hear of it.

Mr. Thomas Chantry is added to the list of artistes engaged to give a series of concerts at the Mechanics' Institution. Last season he played a pianoforte solo at three of their concerts, and received a double encore every time.

Mr. Charles Hallé's first Classical Chamber Concert took place at the Town Hall on Thursday, the 23rd inst. The following was the programme:—

PART FIRST.

Grand Quintet, pianoforte, violin, tenor, violoncello, and contrabasso, in D minor, Op. 74.....	Hummel.
Song, "Adelaide,".....	Beethoven.
Grand Sonata, Pianoforte, in C, Op. 24.....	Weber.

PART SECOND.

Grand Trio, pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, in C minor, Op. 1.....	Beethoven.
Ballad, "In this old Chair,".....	Balfe
Miscellaneous Selection, pianoforte, Nocturne, in F minor, Op. 55; Grand Polonaise, in A flat, Op. 53	Chopin.

The present season is the fifth of Mr. Charles Hallé's Chamber Concerts. The Manchester Town Hall is by no means well adapted for Chamber music—being too lofty, and having a large dome in the centre, which is anything but favourable for acoustic effects. The Hall seemed large, gloomy, and at first cheerless and cold; nothing like the air of comfort and social ease about it that give all the charm of a private drawing room to the old locales in the departed Assembly Rooms. By degrees, however, as the room filled, and the light was increased, by the simple coup du theatre of turning on more gas, the hall assumed a more lively aspect; and at eight o'clock Mr. Charles Hallé made his bow and took his place at a magnificent new pianoforte of Erards', whilst his four able string coadjutors took theirs to give us Hummel's fine quintet. We very soon were so charmed as to forget all about the room, except that we were in it and listening to a very masterly performance of a tasteful and clever composition. Since we last heard him Hallé seems to have increased his command over the resources of the pianoforte (or is it that all we have heard in the interval causes us to think more highly of him by comparison?); he seemed like a giant refreshed—not with wine—but with renewed inspiration and genius. The opening allegro very soon gave Hallé an opportunity of shewing his powers. The pianoforte is almost obligato all through the quartet; but in the first movement there are some very florid passages for the pianoforte, whilst the four stringed instruments are carrying on an independent or sustained harmony; the effect of the contra-basso in the hands of Mr. Ward was at times very fine, a couple of notes merely given out to lend a theme or subject being quite electrical. Messrs. Seymour, Baetens, and Lidel are equally deserving of praise on their respective instruments, and we thought a more auspicious opening could not have been made. The second movement, the Scherzo, was very charming; an easy flowing subject, reminding one of Mozart, with some splendid harmonies for the five instruments. The andante with variations, and the lively finale did not please us so much, although admirably calculated to display the powers of each and all the executants in turn. In some of the variations and solo bits for the violoncello, Lidel gave us his sweetness of tone most delightfully; Baetens too, with his tenor, was heard at times to great advantage; whilst Hallé, all through like the presiding genius of this feast of sweet sounds, was great and grand on the pianoforte. The quintet was much applauded. Weber's Sonata in C we do not remember to have heard before; it is of a wild yet bustling character, and afforded Hallé the opportunity of again displaying his wondrous power of memory and execution—being given without copy—and with his usual mastery over his subject. Such power and largeness of style we have seldom heard on the pianoforte, yet how far removed from mere hammering and noise! and combined too with so much delicacy and ease. Beethoven's grand trio (in C minor, op. 1), is a work we have heard frequently with delight, and were glad to hear again from such executants as Hallé, Seymour, and Lidel. The allegro with its quaint subject so admirably worked out; the andante with its lovely variations; the short but lively minuet—and the stirring finale prestissimo, were all most perfectly given, and relished by the audience. As a musical wind up to this excellent instrumental treat, Hallé gave a selection of pieces, too greatly contrasted as usual, both by Chopin; the first a nocturne, in F minor—mournful and dreamy; the second, one of the most brilliant and joyous pieces it has been our lot to hear for some time—a grand polonaise in A flat—and grand it is in Hallé's hand in every sense of the word. Such a crescendo—such majesty—and withal such joyousness that makes your heart dance—not your feet; elevates the soul—not the limbs, or the body—sending every one home satisfied that Chopin, besides doing some extraordinary things, must have possessed great talent to produce such music, and that few can give to it such grandeur of expression as Charles Hallé. The vocal portion at these concerts we always leave to the last, although on this occasion, it was of a character quite in good keeping with the concert. Mr. Perring, a new tenor, who made his appearance at the concerts for the people, at the Free Trade Hall, on Monday last—was the only vocalist; he pleased the audience very much in two widely different songs—Beethoven's "Adelaide," accompanied by Hallé, and Balfe's "In this old chair," accompanied by himself; he gave both in excellent good taste, the first with varied feeling and expression as required; the second simply as a ballad. His voice is a high tenor, and he possesses a sweet falsetto—which he uses sparingly and judiciously. He will be a great acquisition to Manchester if he remains amongst us, as we have not before had so finished a tenor singer resident here, although we may have had some possessing naturally more power and depth of voice; he has both taste and judgment evidently, and has been educated in a good school. We shall gladly hear Mr. Perring again. Altogether we may congratulate Mr. Hallé on a most successful opening of his winter campaign of classical chamber concerts.

We were sorry to be too late with the article written for last week's number, in future will post them on Wednesday evening. We were also very sorry to have missed the second concert of the Glee and Madrigal Union on Saturday night last, which like the one on Thursday, we understand was exceedingly fine—only far better attended than the first concert. We had unluckily a prior engagement of a fortnight's standing, which we were compelled to fulfil. We hope that the Glee and Madrigal Union had such a reception on Saturday night, that the party may be induced to return to Manchester during their tour—as we should (and no doubt hundreds besides would), like to hear the most perfect glee singing ever heard in Manchester.

THE GLEE AND MADRIGAL UNION, &c &c.—(From a Correspondent.)—The most gratifying treat to the musical amateur enjoyed here for a long time past, was that afforded by the highly talented troupe of artists known as the "Glee and Madrigal Union," who have favoured us with a couple of Concerts during the past week. The title they have assumed is indeed a happy one, for certainly such an Union of human voices was never before heard in this part of the kingdom, and in all probability may be never again. Although the good citizens of this locality had long plumed themselves on their possessing one of the best Societies now existing for the encouragement of this class of music, and where certainly, in days gone by, the pure glee might be listened to with feelings of the highest pleasure, we are still bound to confess that it was not until now we could believe this branch of art was susceptible of all that powerful colouring of expression and sentiment which is so powerfully developed by the intelligent company of vocalists forming the "Madrigal Union." There all idea of individual display is abandoned. All seem to appreciate fully the sentiment they are called upon to express; in short, they may each be considered as little less than kindred spirits with the poet, than the blending of the voices. It is matchless! and so completely do they carry away the hearts of their auditors, that even in the immense Free Trade Hall, with not less than fifteen hundred persons present, all was perfect stillness, that you might almost have heard a pin drop. Every one seemed forewarned by this very silence to breathe more and more softly. So intense indeed was the interest, that the programme was nothing more or less than a succession of musical pictures, sometimes reminding one of a delicious retreat, where flowers, verdure, and streamlet all combine to render the landscape one of surpassing beauty; we can only say to those of our readers who may not have been privileged as we, that in order fully to understand all we wish here to describe, it would be necessary that they be transplanted to the place in which we sat, and to feel the warm enthusiasm which such a moment inspires; but they are fled; a few brief hours enjoyment, and we are again emerged in the bustle, din, and smoke of the world; truly pleasure is a thing of glass; when it begins to shine the brightest, it is sure to meet with a fracture; but good Mr. Phillips and Mr. Loekey, you will come again to us ere long?

The cheap "Concerts for the People," gave their second night on Monday last, when upwards of three thousand people, a majority belonging to the operative classes, were present. The tenor, Mr. Perring, was again received with hearty and continuous applause; he sang Beethoven's "Adelaide" with much fervour of expression and purity of voice, but the subject was perhaps a little too classical for the place; hence he was more successful in Balfe's "In this Old Chair," which met with a most rapturous encore: this compliment was also accorded to a buffo duet from Elisir d'Amore, in which M. Delevanti took part; the latter gentleman was also encored in a humorous song by Hatton, "Mary the Milk Maid;" the other parts of the Concert call for no particular remark.

The series of Saturday Evening Concerts, at the Mechanics' Institution, are but indifferently supported, although the bill of fare is above the average. It has occurred to us at times that the directors of our Educational Institutions did not devote sufficient attention to the provision of entertainments which are calculated to cultivate a love of art, and refine the taste of those who enjoy them; we are now glad, however, to be able to congratulate the members of our Mechanics' Institution on the opportunity thus afforded them of hearing the best specimens of music, and would remind those who fail to embrace the privilege thus afforded them, that "He who will not when he may—" leaving the remainder of the proverb to be supplied by themselves.

The Distin family are announced to appear here next week, and droll Albert Smith with his Overland Mail will be here on Saturday. The Free Trade Hall is capable of seating some 4000 persons, and the spirited proprietor, Mr. H. B. Peacock, anxious to aid the scheme now being carried on by Charles Dickens and his friends on behalf of their brother authors, has generously placed this most commodious and suitable building at the free disposal of these gentlemen, provided the magistrates of the place would license it for stage plays: and strange, with all that want of charity which we least expect to find in officials like these, they have refused the application. The imitable pen of Charles ought to dash at this.

GRAVESEND.—Mrs. Augustus Eames (late Miss Greenwood), from London, has been singing between the pieces at the Theatre. This lady has created quite a sensation in Bishop's "Should he upbraid," and Frank Eames's Scotch song of "I'm a Lassie," which have been nightly encored.—From a Correspondent.

READING.—(From a Correspondent.)—Two Concerts—one Morning, and one Evening—were given at the Town Hall, on Monday last. The vocalists and instrumentalists were all from the Metropolis. The former comprised Mrs. Alexander Newton, Miss Ward, Miss Louisa Nevett (pupil of Mrs. Alexander Newton), Mr. H. Barnby, and Mr. Bridge Frodsham. The instrumentalists were—pianoforte—Miss Eliza Ward; Concertina—Master J. Ward; and trumpet—Mr. R. Ward. The morning performances included selections from Mendelssohn's Eljah, and a popular semi-sacred miscellany. The evening concert was entirely miscellaneous and non-ecclesiastic. In the morning concert the selections from Eljah were:—Quartette—"Cast thy burden upon the Lord"—(Mrs. Newton, Miss Nevett, and Messrs. Frodsham and Barnby); Recitative—"Ye people" and Air—"If with all your hearts" (Mr. Bridge Frodsham); Aria—"Hear ye Israel" (Mrs. A. Newton); Solo—"It is enough" (Mr. Henry Barnby); Trio—"Lift up thine eyes"—Mrs. Alexander Newton, and Misses Nevett and Ward; and the contralto Air—"O rest in the Lord"—(Miss Louisa Nevett). From the second, or miscellaneous part, I would select "Let the Bright Seraphim," and "Angels ever bright and fair," by Mrs. A. Newton, as being particularly worthy of mention. They were both very finely rendered, and with the chastest and most appropriate feeling. Mr. Ward's trumpet obligato to the first named song was excellent. Mr. Bridge Frodsham's "In Native Worth," (Creation), was also to be admired for its purity and religious expression. The evening concert being, so to speak, of a more profane character, appeared to afford more gratification than the morning. The applause was much greater and several encores were awarded, not one being tendered at the anteprandial exhibition. Your readers must hesitate ere they draw conclusions from these premises. On my own authority I can speak for the devotional tendencies of the Reading folk. No people are fonder of going to church on a dry Sunday. The specimen of holy music they hear there, it must be owned, is not adapted to awaken their sympathies towards heavenly strains. Let this stand for their excuse. The encores were given to Mrs. Alexander Newton, in the Cavatina "Qui la voce," Puritani; in the Irish ballad "Robin Adair" (mis-named "Scotch" in the programme. The old air is called "Eileen Aroon"—Robin Adair was a county Limerick man—vide Bunting and Moore's "Melodies") for which the fair vocalist substituted "Bonnie Prince Charlie" (a veritable Hielandman); and "Lo here the gentle lark," which, out of all comparison, was the crowning rose of the two performances. I never heard this glorious song given more brilliantly, or with more facility of execution. Mrs. Alexander Newton has made a great sensation in Reading, and will be always received here with open arms. Mr. Bridge Frodsham pleased very much in two songs—especially the first, Clement White's very sweet ballad, "Ah! why did'st thou tell me." Miss Louisa Nevett is a very promising singer, and will no doubt make rapid progress under the admirable instructions of Mrs. Alexander Newton. Miss Eliza Ward performed solos on the piano, and Master John Ward ditto on the concertina, with excellent effect. The Shakespeare readings of Mrs. Fanny Kemble, given recently here, appear to have absorbed all the attention for out of door recreations.

GUILDFORD CHORAL SOCIETY.—(From a Correspondent.)—A numerous and highly respectable assembly attended the opening of the concert season of this society in the Public Hall on Tuesday 21st October. A two-part programme was issued, half being sacred, and half secular music. The former comprised favourite solos from Handel, Calcott, &c, which were worthily intrusted to Miss Cubitt, Mr. Purday, and Miss Edwards, whose name we introduce thus not from any order of her merit, but on account of its being entirely new, a circumstance, however, which the fair débütante did not betray; her person, voice, and style of singing being as firm as we could desire. Her range of notes does not include the higher soprano, but there has evidently been great culture in her scale, through which it is rendered generally acceptable. Her principal features of art are clearness of expression, by such a distinct rendering of the words as gives them palpably and musically. Both in solo and concerted music Miss Edwards was successful. We do not know the precise routine of her musical education, but it has evidently been that of sound and experienced teaching. Miss Cubitt and Mr. Purday were all that could be desired, the former carrying the audience away with her as usual, in the deep pathos in which she wraps up the subject she so mentally fathoms. "Friend of the brave," and "Tom Bowling," by Mr. Purday, cannot be passed unnoticed; the audience recorded them with heartfelt approval. All the concerted pieces were treats, among which a production of Mrs. Lemare's, the conductor of the society, called "The Christian's Trust," and a glee, "The weaver's song," by Mrs. Purday, met with general encomium. The Choral Society gave two of Handel's most favourite choruses, and have promised other cheerful meetings to charm away the forthcoming winter.

SUNDERLAND.—(From a Correspondent.)—The Annual Concert of Mr. Loder, which is always anticipated here as one of the events of the year, came off, last week, at the Athenaeum, when a numerous attendance testified their appreciation of the selection, which was sacred, and comprised gems from the Messiah, Elijah, and Creation. The vocalists were Miss M. B. Marsh (her first appearance here), Misses Loder and Brown, Mr. Robson (of Newcastle), Messrs. Ferry, De Lacy, &c. The choruses from the Messiah, "And the Glory of the Lord," "For unto us," "Glory to God," went remarkably well. Miss Loder gave the recitatives "There were Shepherds," "And to the Angel," &c., expressively; as well as "But thou didst not leave." Miss M. B. Marsh sang "Rejoice greatly," which is peculiarly adapted for the display of her flexible voice, as well as "How beautiful are the feet," very chastely. Mr. Ferry's bass voice was heard to advantage in "The people." Mr. Robson (by desire) gave "Waft her Angels," from Jephtha. The splendid "Hallelujah chorus," from the same Oratorio was given. The second part opened with the difficult aria, "Hear ye, Israel," Miss Marsh's reading of which displayed excellent taste and judgment. Miss Brown rendered "Oh rest in the Lord," from Elijah effectively. The beautiful trio "Lift thine eyes," was given by Mesdames Marsh, Brown, and Loder, in admirable style. The choruses from the Creation were, "And to the etherial vaults," (Solo, "The Marvellous works," Miss Marsh), "Achieved is the glorious work," and "The Heavens are telling." The trio "On thee each living soul," was given by Miss Marsh, Messrs. Robson and Ferry. Miss Loder's singing of "With verdure clad," was very good. She has a beautiful organ. The concert went off well. Messrs. Loder and Vincent conducted with their usual efficiency.

WOLVERHAMPTON.—On Monday evening, October, 22, the celebrated Distin family paid a passing visit to Wolverhampton, and much to the delectation of a large and respectable auditory, gave a selection from their famous repertoire on their sax-horns. It would be superfluous to criticise a performance which has been justly praised and lauded by Meyerbeer and other composers, and therefore we content ourselves with observing that we never heard Donizetti's music more faithfully and beautifully rendered. The harmonies elicited by the extraordinary family are only surpassed by the wonderful precision, accuracy, and effect of the performance of their melodies. Especially does "The Soldier tired," by the eldest Distin, call loudly for the most enthusiastic commendation. In our opinion it is unsurpassed and unsurpassable. The "Cuckoo's Galop" is a charming novelty, and was brilliantly executed.—(Wolverhampton Herald.)

Reviews of Music.

"CHANTS FOR FOUR VOICES, WITH ORGAN ACCOMPANIMENT.
Edited by W. T. BEST. J. A. Novello.

Another addition to the countless collections of chants, without any special purpose or peculiar design in the publication, appears to us to be an entirely useless expenditure of paper and printing. The present volume contains a considerable number of the old approved specimens of this, the very smallest form of musical composition, the productions of the manifold musicians and clergymen who have from time to time limited or extended the expression of their ideas, as the case may be, to four chords in the first part and six in the second. It presents us also with several new chants by the editor, Dr. Wesley, Mr. Turle, Rev. W. H. Havergal, and some others. These are of various merit; but there is one thing that we esteem a fault which prevails generally amongst them, and in those of Mr. Best most particularly; this is the decidedly modern character of the harmony, which we consider incompatible with the solemnity of church music, inappropriate to compositions of this simple construction, and ineffective in any circumstances where chants are likely to be performed. We object without qualification to the restoring of the ecclesiastical modes and to the enforced preservation of the Gregorian Chant in any form for the purposes of church music, because this style of music is obsolete and uncongenial to the taste, and even to the comprehension of the present public. We object also to the employment of unprepared discords and extreme chromatic combinations in music which is designed for performance by large multitudes in large echoing buildings, as being in the first place uncertain of execution, and in the second place, if perfectly executed of very questionable effect. That music may be written, of simplicity equal to that of the earliest times, but with also the purity that modern art has given to music we have happily met many examples, and it is this style of composition which we approve as best suited to the purposes of the Protestant cathedral service.

"ON WINGS OF MUSIC," (AUF FLUGELN DES GESANGES).—By MENDELSSOHN, transcribed for the Harp solo, and dedicated to his pupil, Miss Ellen Roe, by CHARLES OBERTHÜR. Op. 83. Ewer and Co.

The eighty-third work of Herr Oberthür consists of an arrangement for his instruments of a very well known and equally beautiful song of Mendelssohn. It is, as the title-page describes it, a transcription, or a compression of the voice part and the accompaniment into two lines, with only this exception, that for the second verse Herr Oberthür has substituted a variation which is graceful and pleasing.

"SIX LIEDER OHNE WORTE"—By MENDELSSOHN, transcribed for Harp and Piano, and dedicated to his pupils, the Misses Emilie and Josephine Lamb, by CHARLES OBERTHÜR, Harpist to H. S. H. the Duchess of Nassau. Op. 81. Ewer and Co.

In the eighty-first work of this composer we find even less that belongs to Herr Oberthür than in the eighty-third, since here we have not even a variation to ascribe to him, and candidly speaking we like his composition all the better for it. The songs here selected are—the one in A flat from the fourth book, the one in G minor from the same; the one in E minor from the fifth book, which was arranged by Moscheles for a military band, and performed at the funeral of the lamented composer; the one in E flat from the sixth book; and the one in F and the one in B flat from the seventh and last, of the posthumous series. The original pianoforte part is divided between the two instruments, and we look upon this arrangement as a medium to interest amateurs of the harp in some very beautiful music not otherwise accessible to them.

"THE CARLOTTA BLOOMER POLKA." Lee and Coxhead.

The music of this polka is more than pretty, being above the ordinary standard of dance composition. It differs entirely from polka music generally, and the long step requisite to be taken by the lady who may dance this polka will have the effect of showing off the figure and dress of the danceuse to advantage. Altogether this polka is worthy of the beautiful illustration, by Brandard, of the Bloomer on the title page.

Miscellaneous.

AN ELEGANT SILVER SNUFF BOX has lately been presented to J. G. Waetzig, Esq., bearing the following gratifying inscription:—"Presented to J. G. Waetzig, Esq., by the members of the band of Her Majesty's 2nd Regiment of Life Guards as a token of admiration of his musical talents, esteem for his uniform urbanity and kindness, and regret for his retirement, 1851."

FINE AMERICAN WRITING.—The New York Journal of Fine Arts aims at becoming also the journal of superfine writing. Welcoming Mrs. Mowatt back to her native country, the journal says:—"Her first bound upon the stage gives the same childlike joy that we feel in finding a dove's nest in the woods, and the meaning of the whole play stands revealed at once; even as to the poet's eye the soul of nature hangs incarnate in a humming bird on the dewy corolla of a cactus!"

MRS. ANDERSON.—We are happy to inform our readers that this accomplished pianiste, is rapidly recovering from her late severe accident.

THE CARLOTTA BLOOMER POLKA.—We understand that the "veritable Bloomer" has arrived in England from Melrose, near Boston, United States. If this be the genuine fair Bloomer (blooming?) revolutionist in the cause of reform in female attire, our fancy balls will produce a novel and comic, as well as fanciful effect, judging from the striking and gay colours apparent in Middle. Bloomer's costume.

PALTONI.—Our correspondents from Manchester in their communications have failed to notice the engagement of this clever and popular barytone, in the list of stars in the Italian opera at the Theatre Royal. Signor Paltoni, in fact, was one of the principal vocalists, and with Miss Clara Novello, and Mr. Sims Reeves, helped to give the performances all their eclat. This gentleman is an excellent buffo, and a good general artist, being an experienced hand in Italian opera, and perfectly alive to the business of the stage. His principal characters in Manchester were Figaro in the Barbiere; Ricardo, in Puritani; and Dulcamara, in Elisir d'Amore. We are glad to be enabled to make Signor Paltoni some amends for the remissness or oversight of our correspondents.

THE TYROLESE VOCALISTS.—On Tuesday week, the Tyrolean singer, Halaus, with his company of five persons, had the honour of singing before the Queen, Prince Albert, the Duchess of Kent, and a distinguished dinner party at Windsor Castle.

MRS. FANNY KEMBLE, whilst riding on the Grand Parade, Brighton, last week, was thrown from her horse with great violence, and had a narrow escape of a very serious injury. She was conveyed to her hotel, but after a few hours Mrs. Kemble quite rallied, and gave the reading which was announced for that evening.

FRASCHINI.—Rossini's well-known "tenore di maledizione," or "cursed tenor"—so called by the silent swan of Pesaro for his powerful singing of the "malediction," in the second act of Lucia di Lammermoor—though killed with three poignant stabs in the heart by all the journals, excepting the MUSICAL WORLD who sniffed the joke, is, we are happy to say, alive and tuneful as ever, and will, in all probability, before he dies, utter many more forcible and remunerative curses on numerous Lucys in patent Theatres. Fraschini will be remembered as having been at Her Majesty's Theatre a few years ago, when he failed to ingratiate himself largely with the habitués. His voice had tremendous power, and in Verdi's music was singularly telling. Fraschini was originally an honest shoe maker and rose from the last. Collini, his reputed slayer, has not lost all his voice.

A FLOATING THEATRE.—Spaulding, the circus proprietor is about building in Cincinnati, a monster floating palace for theatrical, circus, and menagerie performances. It is to be 400 feet long, with 60 feet beam, and is to accommodate 4,000 spectators. It is to be towed by two steam tenders to the various towns upon the Mississippi and its tributaries in summer, and to be moored at the Levee, in New Orleans, in the winter. It is estimated to cost 40,000 dollars, and will be completed next spring.—Montreal Courier.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A. HOLDEN.—Your letter can only be inserted as an advertisement.

Advertisements.

NEW MUSIC BY BRINLEY RICHARDS.

BEAUTIES OF CAMBRIA, a Series of Welsh Melodies, arranged for the pianoforte. The Live Long Night; Margaret's Daughter; The Ash Grove; Sweet Richard; Lady Owen's Delight; March of the Men of Harlech. Price 2s. each. These beautiful national melodies of Wales are arranged in a most masterly style, worthy of Mr. Brinley Richards' great reputation as a King's Scholar of the Royal Academy of Music. Lee and Coxbhead, 48, Albemarle-street, where may be had, The Prince of Cambria's Band March, 2s.; The Prince of Cambria's Quadrille, price 3s.; The celebrated Chinese Band March, price 2s. 6d.

JOULE'S DIRECTORIUM CHORI ANGLICANUM.

Second Edition, price 1s., in cloth 1s. 6d.

THE most complete Choral Service book that has yet appeared. Dedicated by permission to the Lord Bishop of Manchester. For highly favourable reviews see "Christian Remembrancer," "Theologian," "Parish Choir," &c &c. London: J. A. Novello. A few copies of the quarto edition, price 15s., still on hand.

GREAT DISCOVERY IN HARMONY.

Now ready, price 6s.

THE PRINCIPLES OF NATURAL HARMONY, being a Perfect System founded upon the discovery of the True Semitonic Scale, by J. J. Haite. London, Published by the Author, 76, Leadenhall-street. To be had of Messrs. Ewer and Co., Newgate-street, and Messrs. Cocks and Co., New Burlington-street.

THE POPULAR SONG OF THE DAY.

'TALK OF HIM THAT'S FAR AWA,' composed by THOMAS CHANTREY. A new edition of which is just issued, may be had at ADDISON & HOLLEN'S, 210, Regent-street, London. For simplicity, elegance, and originality of melody, it is unrivalled. Also, by the same author, "Why wilt thou not love?" and "The dream is past."

LA PERLE DE L'EXPOSITION.

THE new Polka composed by Magnus, and performed by him nearly 500 times on Erard's Grand Piano (in the main east avenue of the Crystal Palace), is now published, price 2s. 6d. Also, the new ballad, "The Greek Slave," beautifully illustrated in chromo-lithography, price 2s. 6d. Jewell and Jetchford, 17, Soho Square.

NEW AND FAVOURITE SONGS

PUBLISHED BY CRAMER, BEALE, AND CO.

The Tears of Love	W. Maynard.
My Home in the Valley	Frank Mori.
Softly ye Night Winds	W. V. Wallace.
Astoria	G. Linley.
O thou, whose beauty shapies	Kalliwoda.
Came smile again	W. V. Wallace.
The Rhine Girl	G. Linley.
Farewell	Frank Mori.

301, Regent-street, and 67, Conduit-street.

CARLOTTA BLOOMER POLKA.

MADLLE. CARLOTTA BLOOMER, from Melrose, United States, begs leave to inform the Nobility, Gentry, and the English Public that she has just arrived in this country, and will give her FIRST GRAND CARLOTTA BLOOMER BALL at WILLIS'S ROOMS. For particulars enquire at Lee and Coxbhead's, 48, Albemarle-street.

HERE IS YOUR REMEDY!

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.—A most miraculous Cure of Bad Legs, after 43 years' suffering.—Extract of a Letter from Mr. William Galpin, of 70, Saint Mary's-street, Weymouth, dated May 15th, 1861. To Professor Holloway, Sir,—At the age of 18 my wife (who is now 61) caught a violent cold, which settled in her legs, and ever since that time they have been more or less sore, and greatly inflamed. Her agonies were distracting, and for months together she was deprived entirely of rest and sleep. Every remedy that medical men advised was tried, but without effect; her health suffered severely, and the state of her legs was terrible. I had often read your Advertisements, and advised her to try your Pills and Ointment; and, as a last resource, after every other remedy had proved useless, she consented to do so. She commenced six weeks ago, and, strange to relate, is now in good health. Her legs are painless, without seam or scar, and her sleep sound and undisturbed. Could you have witnessed the sufferings of my wife during the last 43 years, and contrast them with her present enjoyment of health, you would indeed feel delighted in having been the means of so greatly alleviating the sufferings of a fellow creature. (Signed) WILLIAM GALPIN.

The Pills should be used conjointly with the Ointment in most of the following cases:—

Bad Legs	Coco Bay	Contracted and	Lumbago	Scurvy
Bad Breasts	Chiego-foot	Stiff Joints	Piles	Sore-heads
Burns	Chilblains	Elophantiasis	Rheumatism	Tumours
Bunions	Chapped hands	Fistulas	Scalds	Ulcers
Bite of Mosche.	Corns (Soft)	Gout	Sore Nipples	Wounds
toes and Sand.	Cancers	Glandular Swellings	Sore-throats	Yaws
Flies			Skin-diseases

Sold by the Proprietor, 944, Strand, (near Temple Bar,) London; and by all respectable Vendors of Patent Medicines throughout the Civilized World, in Pots and boxes, at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 22s., and 32s. each. There is a very considerable saving in taking the larger sizes.

N. B.—Directions for the guidance of Patients are affixed to each Pot or Box.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

M. JULLIEN'S ANNUAL SERIES OF CONCERTS.

M. JULLIEN has the honour to announce that his Annual Series of Concerts will commence on Monday, November 10th, 1851. Full Particulars will be duly announced.

Just Published.

RECOLLECTIONS OF WALES.

Welsh Melodies elegantly arranged for the Piano, By BRINLEY RICHARDS.

- | | |
|------------------------|-----------------------------------|
| No. 1, Poor Mary Anne, | No. 3, The Rising of the Lark, |
| " 2, The Ash Grove, | " 4, March of the Men of Harlech. |

(To be continued.)

"In the arrangement of the Welsh melodies it is universally acknowledged that Mr. Brinley Richards has far excelled all his competitors; doubtless from the fact of his being a native of Wales, and consequently imbued with the spirit of its music."

ALSO, BY THE SAME COMPOSER.

The Angel's Song, and the Vision, two romances for the piano, each 2s.; The Sturm March Galop, 3s.; and "Far from all I love," adapted from Kücken's beautiful Canonet, 2s.

CAUTION—OESTEN'S PIANO WORKS.

THE MUSIC TRADE is hereby cautioned against printing or importing any of the following Pianoforte Works by THEODORE OESTEN, they being the exclusive COPYRIGHT of Messrs. ROBERT COCKS and Co.; and the Music Trade, Profession, and Public are warned against purchasing or selling any other editions than those issued by the above firm. Parties of the Opera, books 1 to 12; Blumenstempel, books 1 to 6; Hahlmilchen, books 1 to 3; Perles Allemandes, books 1 to 6; La Promenade au clair de la lune; Der Mulatier; Belle Masque Valse; Un Bouquet de Roses Valse; Salon-Fantaisie on Flotow's Die Grossfürstin; Fantasia on La Dame Blanche; Blumenpfad, or Pathway of Flowers, books 1 to 4; Fantasia on Norma; Fantasia on Freischütz; three Marchen Fantasias, books 1 to 3; Fantasia on Preciosa; Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor; Fantasia on Wildschütz; L'Étoile Avancé, books 1 and 2; Galop de Braosa; Valse Elegante; and Duet, "Martha"—Flotow.

No further notice will be issued, and the slightest disregard thereto will be treated according to law. ROBERT COCKS and Co., Publishers to Her Majesty.—London, Oct. 25, 1851, 6, New Burlington-street.

BLUMENTHAL'S NEW PIANOFORTE MUSIC.FLORUS EMBLEMATIQUE:

No. 1, Primavera	4s. 0d.
" 2, Violet's	3s. 0d.
" 3, Rose	3s. 0d.
" 4, Bomarin	3s. 6d.
" 5, Pensée	2s. 0d.
" 6, Heliotrope	3s. 6d.

Cramer, Beale and Co., 301, Regent-street.

BLACKWOOD & CO.'S REGISTERED MUSIC FILE.

THIS new and useful invention is designed to supersede the old portfolio. It will be found the most convenient article yet introduced for holding and preserving from dust unbound music.

To be had of all Musicians, and Wholesale at the Manufactory, 26, Long Acre, London.

MUSIC FOR THE ORGAN OR HARMONIUM.

THE AMATEUR ORGANIST—a collection of soft and full Voluntaries, arranged in six Books, 3s. each, by EDWARD TRAVIS, and may be had elegantly bound, price 18s. "Mr. Travis has introduced to the musical world a new and interesting work for the Organ or Harmonium, under the title of 'The Amateur Organist.' Mr. Travis has availed himself of an extensive and classical music library, and selected with great taste the most beautiful morceaux of the great masters, Foreign and English. To lovers of classical music this work will be found to be the most superb selection that has ever issued from the musical press."—Vide Musical Review.

THE AMATEUR INTERLUDIST—a collection of short Interludes to play between the Verses of the Psalms, in one Book, price 4s., by EDWARD TRAVIS and J. P. DYER

THE AMATEUR PRELUDIST—a collection of Preludes, with the Organ Stops carefully marked, in one Book, price 4s., by E. TRAVIS.

SACRED VOCAL MUSIC.

KELLER'S Collection of ANTHEMS, CHURCH SERVICES, CHANTS, &c., arranged for the Voice and Piano, in six Books, price 3s. each, with six beautiful and appropriate designs by Brandard, arranged by ALBERT KELLER. The six Books can be had in one Volume, elegantly bound, price 18s.

THE PSALMODIA BRITANNICA—a selection of Psalms and Hymns for the Voice and Organ, in six Books, price 3s. each, arranged by EDWIN FLOOD, and may be had in one Volume, neatly bound, price 18s. London: LEE & COXHEAD, 48, Albemarle-street, and can be had of all Book and Musicians.

N.B.—A New Edition of "Hark, the Sabbath Bells," by Edwin Flood.

LONDON SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY,
EXETER HALL.

COMMENCEMENT OF THE FOURTH SEASON.

ON FRIDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER the 14th, will be performed, for the first time by this Society, Handel's Oratorio, BALSHAZZAR. Vocalists:—Miss Birch, Miss Dolby, Mr. Lockey, Mr. T. Williams, Mr. R. F. Smith, and Mr. Lawler. The Band and Chorus will be on an extensive scale, consisting of Eight Hundred Performers. Conductor, Mr. Surman, Founder of the Exeter Hall Oratorios. The Subscription to the Society is £1 ls. per annum, or for Reserved Seats, £2 2s.; each Subscriber is entitled to Two Transferable Tickets to each Subscription Concert. Office, No. 9, Exeter Hall.

THE ENGLISH GLEE AND MADRIGAL UNION,

(UNDER THE PATRONAGE OF HER MOST GRACIOUS MAJESTY)

CONSISTING of Mrs. Enderssohn, Miss M. Williams, Mr. Lockey, Mr. Francis, Mr. Land, and Mr. H. Phillips, will (in compliance with numerous solicitations) give a SECOND CONCERT on MONDAY EVENING, November 3rd, at NOTTINGHAM. They will also sing at Newcastle-under-Lyne (Mr. Mason, Jun.'s Concert), Tuesday, 4th; at Shrewsbury (Messrs. Hay and Adams' Concert), Wednesday, 5th; and Chester, 6th Nov.—E. Land, Hon. Sec., 5, Foley-place, London.

PIANOFORTES FOR HIRE AT REDUCED PRICES.

ECONOMY being at all times commendable, Messrs. ROUSSELOT and Co. have established a new system for Hiring Pianofortes, including the tuning once a month, which presents not only a great saving, but also the advantage of having the instrument regularly kept in tune. Pianofortes exchanged. For particulars apply to Rousselot and Co., 66, Conduit-street, Regent-street.

NOW PUBLISHING, BY SUBSCRIPTION, HANDEL'S ORATORIO,*BELSHAZZAR,

ARRANGED for the Organ or Pianoforte with Vocal Score), folio, price 21s. Single Pieces Now Ready—Overture, 1s.; Recit and Air, Thou God Most High, 2s.; Chorus, Reheild, by Persia's Hero, 2s.; Recit. and Air, Orest with never ceasing Grief, 1s. 6d.; Air O Sacred Oracles, 1s. 6d.; Recit. and Air, Thus saith the Lord, 1s. 6d.; Chorus, Sing, O ye Heavens, 2s. 6d.; Air, O God of Truth, 2s. Orchestral Accompaniments and Single Chorus Parts—Principal Violino Primo, 10s. 6d.; Ripieno ditto ditto, 5s.; Principal Violino Secondo, 10s. 6d.; Ripieno ditto ditto, 5s.; Principal Viola, 10s. 6d.; Ripieno ditto, 5s.; Principal Violoncello e Basso, 13s. 6d.; Ripieno ditto, 5s. Wind Parts Printing. Vocal Parts—Treble, 5s.; Alto, 4s. 6d.; Tenor, 5s.; Bass, 4s. 6d.

Now Publishing, THE LONDON PSALMIST, on a new and improved principle; containing a collection of the best Psalmody harmonised for Four Voices, with an arrangement for the Organ or Pianoforte, by A. J. S. MOXLEY, Organist of St. Paul, Covent Garden (edited by JOSEPH SURMAN, Founder of the Exeter Hall Oratorios, and Conductor of the London Sacred Harmonic Society), with the words of Thirty-three Psalms and Hymns. The Rev. W. J. Hall's selection. The work to be complete in Sixteen Parts, One Shilling each. Parts 1 to 14 are now ready.

London: 9, Exeter Hall, Strand, and Sold by Messrs. Longman and Co., Paternoster Row, and all Music and Booksellers. Persons wishing to have the Music as performed by the London Sacred Harmonic Society should order Surman's Exeter Hall Edition. Office, No. 9, in Exeter Hall.

SAX MILITARY BAND INSTRUMENTS.

COUNCIL MEDAL, July 10th, 1725. Messrs. ROUSSELOT & Co. beg to announce that being the representatives of the eminent inventor of the Sax Horns, who has gained the sole Council Medal for the Military Band Instruments, they are able to provide purchasers with genuine Sax Horns, French Horns, Trombones, Cornets with or without the patent slides, &c., at moderate prices. The admired Instruments from the Exhibition are now on view at 66, Conduit-street. List of prices forwarded on application. London, Rousselot and Co., 66, Conduit-street, Regent-street.

TO CHOIR MASTERS AND ORGANISTS.

A YOUNG MAN, with a decided Bass Voice, would be willing to sing in a Church in London (full choral service is preferred), for six months, gratuitously, for a few lessons on Solo singing from one of the above gentlemen. Address to Mr. Alexander, No. 6, Upper Dorset-street, Vauxhall Bridge Road, or to the Library, 24, Old Cavendish-street, Oxford-street.

Printed and Published for the Proprietor by MICHAEL SAMUEL MYERS, of No. 2, Sudley Road, Clapham Road (Clapham Road), in the parish of Lambeth, at the office of MYERS & Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, in the parish of St. Paul, where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed, post paid. To be had of G. PARKES, Dean Street 8 ho; Allen, Warwick Lane; Vickers, Holywell Street, and at all Booksellers.—Saturday, November 1, 1851.

The Musical World.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s.; Half year, 8s.; Three Months, 4s.; (Stamped Copies 1s. per Quarter extra, payable in advance, to be forwarded by Money Order, to the Publishers, Myers & Co., 22, Tavistock-st., Covent Garden).

No. 45.—VOL. XXIX.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1851.

Price Fourpence.
Stamped Fivepence.

POETRY FOR MUSIC.

A few days since, upon looking over a number of ballad lyrics sent us for publication, and carefully noted as "copyright words," we were led into a train of speculation concerning the comparative merits of song writers of the present day and those that have gone by. The verses transmitted to us were nearly all of the same character; abstractions and sentimentalities being their principal groundwork, and all eschewing detail and the simplicities of narrative. Generally speaking, no story was aimed at, no tale was told. A youth at a ball-room saw a pale lady with a wreath on her brow, and made a remark—this was the basis of one ballad. Another youth beheld a florid maiden weeping beside a fountain, her tears a mystery—this constituted the materials of a second. A third youth saw nothing; she was gone from his eyes, and he bemoaned his fate in sixteen lines. One lover was under a tree; another stood beside a hill, or a rill, rawly ruminating; another was on the vessel's deck, looking leeward—all disemboguing their griefs and sorrows into the thin air. Occasionally a young lady asked a young gentleman why he forsook her? or she called him back from the dividing main, and described her feelings in varied couplets. A few of the compositions stood up stoutly for originality, and several were traceable to a source not very remote. All were, however, of the genus sentimental, didactic and melancholy. Not one merry lay did we discover among some dozens, nor one which entered into simple detail. In short, the tune to the "Light of other days is faded," or "Then you'll remember me," would have admirably suited all our poetical contributions, so similar were they in feeling and construction.

We began to consider why songs of the present day, almost invariably, should take this saddening tone? Were the poets of our time more melancholy than their predecessors, or did they copy Lord Byron in his dark hours? Were young ladies in seminaries—those juvenile areopogites of ballad music—taught to believe that mirth was out of fashion, and that plaintive sadness was the feeling most recognisable in certain circles, and, consequently, to be encouraged? In fine, were the publishers more serious than of old, and had the public become more morose and saturnine? To none of these self-propounded queries could we return satisfactory response; and we were almost moved to the conclusion that this serious tendency in our ballad writers must be entirely owing to some change in the obliquity of the ecliptic, the precession of the equinoxes, or the increase of population, which would fully account for so much sighing and moaning. Some of the consequences might, perhaps, be laid to the account of Mr. Bunn, who, from the moment he undertook writing librettos for operas, had so serious a calling, that his study, with infinite propriety, might be said, never to have smiled more. Mr. Bunn's melancholy lucubrations have had a decided weight with certain ballad writers, and have influenced the age to an extent impossible to be ascertained.

In reading over the contributions above named, one fact particularly struck our notice; namely, the felicity of the name of each ballad, and the aptitude of the verses to afford illustration. Indeed most of the songs appeared to have been written with little or no other aim than to offer a striking title, and to suggest a picture. The poet seemed satisfied with the inspiration of his first line, and filled up the thought merely for the sake of the music. One song, we remember, was entitled, "She leaned against the topmost rail!" The title of this is singularly happy, and announces at once a lithograph by Brandard, or Hannart, or him, the clever stone-man whom Thomas Prowse, surnamed of Hanway Street, employs. We are authorised—to save the price of advertisement, the poet being poor—to sell the words of this ballad for two guineas, to the first applicant. We know some of the music publishers, judging from their customary poetical commodities, whom they would suit to a T.

Of the poetical merit of these ballad verses it would be difficult to speak. Having just pronounced that the writers appeared to have little or no other intention than that of providing a good name and furnishing a pleasing vignette, we have said all that is favourable. In almost every instance the poem—if we may call it so—was inconsequential, disintegrated, irrelative. Logic there was none; harmony was outraged; the language was vulgar and idiomatic; rhyme was sacrificed and grammar not preserved. To show the reader to what a depth of bathos the modern ballad has sunk we shall offer him a specimen from those sent us, and not choose the worst either to make our case better. The song we select is as follows:—

"I am left all alone,
Which she cannot deny;
And now that she's gone,
I must sit down and cry.
But she heeds not my tears,
Nor the sighs that I moan,
And no hope reappears—
I am left all alone!

"When I looked in her face
For the last time on earth,
And I thought I could trace
Her true virtues and worth !
They beamed not for me,
So I turn'd with a groan,
For I plainly did see
I was left all alone ! " *

We are perfectly satisfied that the verses we quote are equal in point of feeling and writing to one-half the ballads of the present day, reckoning the most popular among them. Read as above, in their nude form, they may elicit a smile even from those who would admire them when arranged and embellished in musical garments. But take, with few exceptions, any modern lyric composition, and set it as above on a plain white sheet—the effect it will produce in reading will be precisely the same as the one we have printed.

As a set off to "I am left all alone," we would present our readers with the words of a ballad, called simply "Mary," which presents an honourable exception to the mass of rubbish we waded through when perusing our heap of poetics; but the verses are unequally written, the first stanza alone being satisfactory. We shall, however, transcribe the first verse, and offer it as a specimen of a simple ballad written as it should be.

"'Twas in the season when the buds were blowing,
And the skies of April dainty show'rs did weep;
In the pleasant day time when the sun was going,
And the breeze of ev'ning rock'd the rose asleep.
Down by yon river's side whose waters vary,
As calm or dimpling on through fields they rove,
In life's glad op'ning there I met my Mary,
And there she listened to my vows of love!"

Here we have extreme harmony of lines, almost melodiously rhythmical in their flow, a very pleasing sentiment expressed in simple and felicitous terms, and clearness and spontaneity in the thought. Had the second and third stanzas been equal to the one we present, we should have pronounced "Mary" as one of the very best ballads of the day. We are, nevertheless, inclined to think that its plain form of composition and the natural sentiment it contains are not suited to our go-ahead age. Fast people require fast lines, and the quietude and simplicity inherent in "Mary" would not do for publishers and their customers. We have little doubt but that for one publisher who would purchase "Mary," there would be found ten who would treat for "I am left all alone."

We shall pursue this subject in another paper. We have much yet to say about ballads, poets, and publishers; and may be able, perhaps, to throw a light on the cause why the public are inundated with such a flood of puerilities and bombast as would have disgraced any epoch of our literature. The greatest poets have written the finest lyrics, and time was when song writing was confined to the proficient and the experienced. Now, every puny rhymster whines his verses and swears to their poetry. "I had rather be a kitten and cry 'mew' than one of these same metre ballad-mongers." But the public are not of Hotspur's thinking. They like "mewing," and are amused (no pun) thereby. So enough for the present.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

In our last publication we owned ourselves at fault in respect to the arrangements of the Sacred Harmonic Society, but we have since received the prospectus of the forthcoming season, by which we perceive that the Seasons of Haydn is announced for the opening night. The public will therefore have an opportunity of hearing this magnificent work performed by the great resources of this society in a manner not hitherto attempted. Other novelties are announced, not the least attractive of which is Spohr's Calvary. This work, reckoned among the greatest of Spohr's efforts, was first produced in London in 1836; it was then performed at Norwich, under the composer's direction in 1842; and subsequently at the same place in 1845, under Mr. Benedict's conducting. Since that time we are not aware that it has been produced in its entire state, and we are therefore glad to perceive that the society have taken it up. In addition to these two great novelties, we believe it is contemplated to produce some of Mendelssohn's Psalms, treasures hitherto unknown to the public generally. The rehearsals for the Seasons are proceeding most satisfactorily under Mr. Costa's superintendence. The committee conclude their prospectus by venturing to express their opinion, that under the continued able conductorship of Mr. Costa, and with the same zeal and energy on the part of the members and assistants as in the past seasons, the society's performances will, in the coming season, attain a still higher degree of excellence than that already reached. The first performance of the Seasons is announced to take place towards the end of this month.

MUSIC IN CONVENTS.

(From Mainzer's Musical Times.)

(Concluded from our last.)

The pupil who succeeded Albrechtsberger upon the organ was Schneider; he was, according to Stadler, one of the first organists that ever appeared. Abbé Vogler, who undertook a journey for the express purpose of hearing him, one day gave him alternately with Forkel a very difficult chromatic theme, from which he improvised a fugue indicative of the full powers of this colossal instrument with thirty-two feet pedal registers. Such was their admiration of his performance, that they pronounced him king of all living organists.

Franz Schneider was born at Polkau in 1737; he was the son of a poor carpenter. The village schoolmaster undertook his education; and so early did he display his aptitude at acquiring knowledge, that, independently of the regular course of scholastic studies, he taught him singing and playing upon the violin, piano, organ, and several wind instruments. He was twenty years of age when Albrechtsberger summoned him to Melk, where he so formed himself under this master's guidance, that on Albrechtsberger quitting for Vienna, he proposed Schneider as his successor, who proved well worthy such a master, both by his talent in composition and execution on the organ.

In the convent library are to be found the following autograph compositions of his, which furnish ample testimony of the pitch to which he had carried the knowledge of his art; fifty masses, thirty-three motetts, thirty-four gradualia and offertories, fourteen requiems, &c. His works are imbued throughout with clearness and depth, science and inspiration. He departed this life in 1812.

* We are authorised to sell the above work. -Apply to Ed. M. W.

Stadler, one of the proudest boasts of the Vienna school, passed twenty years in the convent at Melk. He devoted all his time to the study of music and theology. His old companions were full of anecdotes, descriptive of his ardent love of labour. This remarkable man, although Professor of Moral Philosophy, Ecclesiastical History, and Canon Law, still found time in the midst of his pursuits and historical resources, to study the great composers' works, and to write masses, litanies, vespers, hymns, trios, quartetts, and melodramas; besides practising on the organ so successfully as to become no unworthy rival of Albrechtsberger and Schneider. Frederick Nicolai, in the narrative he gives of his travels in Switzerland and Germany (a work in eight volumes), makes mention of a visit he paid to the convent at Melk, on which occasion he heard Abbé Stadler play on the organ, and speaks of him as one of the most distinguished professors of that instrument. In his compositions, Stadler blends science with inspiration: and the deep feeling, the unassuming spirit, which, aided by all that consummate skill can effect, are conspicuous throughout his works, render them of double value. During Joseph II's stay at the convent of Melk, Stadler performed one of his own compositions, with the assistance of the singers and musicians of the establishment, and so powerfully affected was the Emperor by his performance, that the very next day he invited Stadler to accompany him to Vienna, observing that talent such as his demanded a more extended sphere. In the capital of Austria he became intimate with Haydn and Mozart; and while there he wrote the choruses for Polizène, a tragedy by Colin, which was eminently successful. After Joseph II's death, he resumed his clerical functions, and officiated as curé at Lerchenfeld, from 1803 to 1815, at which period he returned to Vienna.

He was in his 60th year when he wrote his Jerusalem Delivered, a grand Oratorio, which was performed in that capital by 500 musicians in a style unusually splendid and effective. This work and his great Requiem secured him the admiration of the musical world, and a place side by side with his friends Haydn and Mozart.

This brilliant era was succeeded by the year 1780, which proved fatal to the palmy days of the religious establishments we have been treating of, and reduced them to a state of absolute insignificance. When the Emperor Joseph rendered the monastic orders mere secular bodies, he deprived them of the jurisdiction they had hitherto exercised over the colleges and seminaries that now by the imperial edict were removed from their immediate vicinity; nor would he suffer divine worship to be performed elsewhere than in the parish churches: this led to the dispersion of the professors, and as a natural consequence to that of the novices, while the choristers returned to their families.

After a brief period of resignation to their sovereign's decrees, the war with France broke out, and the religious establishments were dispossessed of their remaining privileges and rights under the French army. Melk in particular could not hope to escape the notice of Napoleon, for he was thence enabled to command the shores of the Danube, and thus intercept all communication with Vienna. After the battle of Ebersberg, he fortified this convent by surrounding it with trenches and mining the rocks; he planted cannon on all the platforms, and his guns frowned from a thousand loopholes over the adjacent country. The smiling gardens, with their fair walks and shady groves, where the pious Benedictines were wont to stray, were laid waste; field-pieces supplanted the insignia of religion; and from the windows, where in more peaceful times the monastic cowl alone was to be seen, peered forth the soldier's plume. The roll of the drum or clang of the trumpet succeeded the bell that tolled for matins or vespers; the spots once fragrant with incense, now reeked with the fumes of gun-powder; the aisles and cloisters no longer echoed with pious thanksgiving, but repeated the loud ribaldry of the rude soldier, to which the superior quality of the convent wine conduced in no small degree.

But the monks have had their turn again, and have destroyed even the faintest trace of those military fortifications, that seemed as though they would have endured for ever.

The fifty-eighth abbot who had presided over the convent lost no time in recalling the professors and men devoted to the arts and sciences, and music again found a home within the abbey walls, and flourished more than ever. Each Sabbath day the church resounded with solemn masses, accompanied with vocal music, and on days of festival sacred compositions were performed by the whole force of the orchestra.

The work set on foot by the abbot above alluded to was carried out by his successor in 1827. His splendid apartments were thrown open for music di camera, trios, quartets, and quintetts; vocal music was not forgotten, and the long winter evenings were devoted to one and the other alternately. It was by the constant habit of hearing, practising, and playing the master-pieces in each respective branch, that amateurs and composers were alike formed.

A short time prior to my arrival at the convent of Melk, the son of a celebrated composer at Vienna, my friend and master, Seyfried, entered into the Benedictine order. Some years later, when the young man took priest's orders, Seyfried composed a grand orchestra mass in honour of what he termed the most solemn day in his whole life, and he attended in person at this beautiful abbey, led thither by devotion as fervent as it was sincere, to assist at this twofold solemnity.

Deep was my regret at leaving this noble convent. I could not refrain from lingering at my window to enjoy once more the splendid panorama I thence beheld. I wished to rivet in my memory the loveliest spot, the most varied and extensive view which human eye ever surveyed; and as I passed through the valley I turned many a time to catch a last glimpse of this imposing monastery, until the mountains shut out its turrets from my gaze.

The abbeys of Marin Tafern, Heiligen Kruez, (Holy Cross,) Seitensteden and St. Florian offer the same general features which are observable at Melk. Music is everywhere pursued with the same ardor and the same success; the only difference consisting in the number of those who meet together for its performance, and in the style of that performance. The libraries also are furnished according as the reigning abbot's taste inclines more or less to music; for all depends upon his supreme will and pleasure. Many of these abbots have peculiar tastes to gratify; some, who are by no means averse to secular pomps and vanities, bestow considerable pains on the decorations of their convents, and the lordly mansions appurtenant thereto, which serve them for abode during their stay at Vienna; others are constantly pulling down and reconstructing their places of residence; whilst many of them have carried their habits of extravagance to such an extent as seriously to affect the abbey revenues, and render long years of economy necessary to repair its shattered finances. We could mention more than one abbot divested, on this account, of power and dignity, by a decree of the chapter. Several abbeys have experienced severe losses by dreadful fires, the ravages of which have occasioned irreparable damage, more particularly as regards the libraries.

Music has not yet regained in these abbeys the pitch of glory to which she had attained, ere she was hurled from her pride of place by the act of secularization and the long years of war, during which the contributions levied, not by Napoleon, but by the Emperor Francis, were almost equivalent to total sequestration; nor were other obstacles wanting to its progress, such as the national bankruptcy, when all persons of property, and religious establishments in particular, only received fourteen per cent of the capital they had advanced to meet the emergencies of the state. Yet, spite of these draw-backs, music began again to be cultivated, as well as the French language, and in many colleges attached to the convents, Italian was also taught. Here and there men of talent were to be found who had survived the period fraught with such mischievous consequences to the convents; but those of the new school were as yet insufficient to restore instrumental execution to its former glory.

The musician could, however, still find in many libraries ample means for prosecuting his studies; such, for instance, as the works of Palestrina, Orlando Lasso, Monteverde, Kerl, Murschhauser, Freacobaldi; in short, a rich collection of the ancient and modern scores of the two renowned schools of Italy and Germany. Nor was that of France excluded, for the practical and theoretical works of the French composers, Lully, Rameau, Monsigny, J. J. Rousseau, Philidor, and Grétry, were to be found amongst them.

The courtesy of the abbot of Seitensteden, still a young man, considering the dignified station he filled, was not confined to introducing me to the master of the ceremonies, but he conducted me in person over the church, library, and entire establishment, accompanying me in my visits to the environs, and insisting upon my taking up my quarters at the convent. He, moreover, offered to be my companion at a later period as far as Vienna, whither he was bound, in order to attend the Diet as representative of the religious orders.

But as I did not find in the convent wherewith to occupy me for any extended space of time, and as I was desirous of profiting by the instructions of those great men of whom Vienna boasts, I was compelled to decline his friendly offer. "At any rate," said the abbot, as I took leave of him, "promise me a visit at Vienna, and don't omit calling on me at Klosterneuburg, in the neighbourhood of the town; it is the most remarkable abbey in the whole empire. I shall be there on the day of St. Leopold, our patron saint; there I can show you much which is deserving of your attention; and you will meet with persons better qualified than I to give you useful information." I gladly gave him the promise he exacted.

One of the best endowed and most spacious abbeys in Austria is Kremsmünster. So imposing, so noble-looking is this edifice, that one is almost tempted to believe it the proud abode of some all-swaying autocrat. The entire monastery is built on a gigantic scale. Although the palmy days of music were then gone by, still the noble collection of works it could yet display, bore ample testimony to the bright days it had once known. An erudite German musician who had stayed at Kremsmünster longer than I, gave me at Vienna some biographical notices of the composers who had lived in this abbey, which I here transcribe in due course.

Franz Sparry, born 1715, at Gratz, in Styria, studied the classics at the convent of Admond, and attracted much notice, from the beauty of his voice.

In the year 1737, he entered into the order of Benedictines at Kremsmünster, and was ordained seven years after.

The convent dignitaries remarked and encouraged his taste for music, and in order to facilitate his opportunities of applying himself exclusively to this art, they granted him permission to visit the great Italian masters. To use his biographer's expression, fortune and misfortune were his alternate companions at Venice, Rome and Naples. Chance brought Pergolesi on board the same vessel on which he had embarked on the Adriatic; he lost no time in becoming on terms of intimacy with the young Italian, and they communicated to each other their ideas concerning the art to which they were both devoted. During a storm their vessel was assailed by a Tripolitan pirate, when, at the very moment that the Corsair was throwing out his grapple-irons, his main-mast was struck by lightning, and to this well-timed accident did the two artists and the whole crew owe their escape from slavery or death. Whilst at Rome, Sparry studied with unremitting energy the vigorous style which characterizes the works of the great masters of Italy, and he made a valuable collection of them. The bark in which he returned home was again endangered by a storm, and he was deprived of a greater part of his acquisitions, the fruits of so much exertion and so many sacrifices, by the dishonest conduct of one of his companions. All that remained to him were some theoretical works, a few songs and Italian operas, a Miserere by Bigaglia, and Pergolesi's Stabat Mater, which had then but just appeared.

Counterpoint was his favourite study. His Pange lingua, and several other of his sacred compositions were quickly disseminated throughout Germany, and excited the greatest interest.

The severity of his studies had so impaired his health as to bring to a premature end that career already so triumphant. He departed this life in 1767.

George de Pastewitz was born in 1730, at Burhlitten, near Passau. Whilst yet a mere boy he was sent to the Bavarian convent at Nlederalteich, where he sedulously applied himself to Latin and music. In 1744 he continued his studies at Kremsmünster, and became alike distinguished as a scholar and musician. In the year 1750 he entered into the order of Benedictines, and was sent to Salzburg for the purpose of completing his theological studies. He took the opportunity of his stay at this town to perfect himself in composition, under Eberlin; and he studied his master's works, and those of Fuchs and Matheson, as earnestly and successfully as he did canon law, exegesis, and doctrine.

He became professor of philosophy about the year 1759, at the academy annexed to the abbey of Kremsmünster, and officiated with great distinction during a period of nearly twelve years. In the year 1772 he was appointed to the professor's chair of political economy for financial and police administration. The few leisure moments he could spare from functions of such overwhelming importance were devoted to music. At Sparry's decease he was burdened with the additional duty of regens chori.

During the fifteen years that he held these various offices, he composed three masses, fifty antiphonies, four Te Deums, hymns, vespers, and oratorios, Samson and Joseph. These compositions were favourably received, and insured his reputation. Although unceasingly occupied in teaching the science of politics, he contrived to find time for the instruction of chorus and solo singers, both for the church and theatre of the convent, where, besides various biblical works, such as Kimmerling's Bride of Isaac, his own operettas were performed. He did not confine his attention merely to instructing them how to attain the greatest pitch of perfection in the dramatic style by practising them in singing airs and recitative, but he likewise exercised them in declamation and acting. His frequent journeys to Trieste and Venice accounted for his preferring the taste then prevalent in Italy.

In the year 1785, he was sent to Vienna as the abbey's representative and charge d'affaires. He there became acquainted with Joseph Haydn, Abbé Stadler, and Salieri.

During his stay at Venice, he composed two masses and a Requiem that were performed at St. Stephen's cathedral. Upon his recall to the monastery in 1795, he was appointed rector of the Lyceum, but this accession of dignity did not prevent him from pursuing his favourite art; he wrote a new mass, a graduale, and an offertory, in honour of the fifteenth anniversary of his taking orders, and these were the last things he composed. He died of dropsy, on the 26th of January, 1803, at the age of seventy-three.

The pupil who reflects the greatest credit on him is Süßmayer, who, on his arrival at Kremsmünster, was a chorister. He was indebted to Pasterwitz for his first notions of music, and whilst still under his pupilage, he tried his powers of composition by masses and symphonies.

When he became music master at the Kärnthner-Thor theatre, Süßmayer took up his abode at Vienna, where he came to be on terms of intimacy with Haydn, Salieri, and Mozart; the latter in particular was his inseparable friend and confidant; he even assisted him in his labour. Besides taking a share in the Clemenza di Tito, Süßmayer put the finishing stroke to Mozart's Requiem, with so much talent, with so great a display of powers of the highest order, that it is almost matter of doubt where the great master's work ends, and at what point it was taken up by his friend. Süßmayer wrote the whole of the Benedictus in the Requiem, and this alone bears ample testimony to his powers of conception, and loftiness of style. Süßmayer, in addition to all this, gained so much renown by many of his works, that his merits are beyond dispute. His most striking characteristics are the simplicity and grace of his harmony. His productions of a scientific nature are not entirely free from faults; not that they lack the requisite degree of knowledge, but he worked too much and too rapidly to comply with all the demands of his art.

He wrote a vast number of masses, cantatas, and operas.

Süßmayer died at Vienna in 1803.

GEMINIANI.

FRANCESCO GEMINIANI, a native of Lucca, was born about the year 1680. He received his first instruction in music from Alessandro Scarlatti, and afterwards became a pupil of Carlo Ambrosio Anonati, surnamed Il Gobbo, a celebrated performer on the violin. His studies were completed under Corelli.

In the year 1714, he arrived in England, where in a short time, his exquisite performance rendered him celebrated; and, amongst the nobility, several laid claim to the honour of being his patrons. The person, however, to whom he was most attached was the Baron Kilmansegge, chamberlain to King George the First, as Elector of Hanover.

In 1716, Geminiani published and dedicated to this nobleman, "Twelve sonatas, à Violino, Violone, e Cembalo." These had such an effect that the public were at a loss to determine whether Geminiani's greater excellence lay in his performance, or in his skill in composition. The Baron had ventured to speak of this work to the king in such terms of approbation, as induced him to direct that some of the compositions contained in it should be performed in his presence by the author. Handel was desired to accompany him on the harpsichord, and Geminiani acquitted himself in a manner worthy of the expectations that had been formed of him.

Geminiani was an enthusiast in painting; and, to gratify this propensity, he not only suspended his studies, and neglected his profession, but often involved himself in pecuniary embarrassments, which a little prudence and foresight would have enabled him to avoid. To gratify his taste he bought pictures, and to supply his wants he sold them. The consequence of this kind of traffic was loss, and its concomitant, necessity.

In the distress which, by such imprudent conduct, he had drawn upon himself, he was compelled, for the security of his person, to avail himself of that protection from arrest which the English nobility had then the power of extending to their servants. The Earl of Essex was prevailed upon, for this purpose, to enrol Geminiani's name in the list of his domestics.

The place of master and composer of the state music in Ireland became vacant in the year 1727, and the Earl obtained from Sir Robert Walpole a promise of it. He then told Geminiani that his difficulties were at an end, as he had provided for him a place suited to his profession, which would afford him an ample provision for life. On inquiry into the conditions of the office, Geminiani found that it was not tenable by a member of the Romish communion. He therefore declined accepting it, assigning this as a reason, and at the same time observing that, although he had never made any great pretensions to religion, yet to renounce for the sake of temporal advantages, that faith in which he had been first baptized, he could not answer to his conscience. The place was given to Mr. Matthew Dubourg, a young man of great merit, who had been his pupil.

Some years having elapsed after the publication of his solos Geminiani resolved to turn into concertos the first six solos of Corelli. These he completed and published, in 1726, by subscription. Their success was fully answerable to his expectations, and a short time afterwards, he altered in the same manner the remaining six. These, however, having no fugues, and consisting altogether of airs, afforded but little scope for the exercise of his abilities, and met with an indifferent reception.

He likewise arranged as concertos six of Corelli's sonatas, that is the ninth in the First Opera, and the first, third, fourth, ninth, and tenth of the Third. This seems to have been a hasty production, and is now scarcely remembered. In the year 1732, he printed what he called his Opera Seconda; or, VI. Concerti grossi con due Violini, Violoncello, e Viola di Concertino obbligati, e due altri Violini e Basso di Concerto grosso ad arbitrio. The first of these is celebrated for the fine minuet with which it closes. The publication of this work was soon followed by another of the same kind, his Opera Terza, consisting of six concertos for violins, the last of which is esteemed one of the finest compositions in the world.

Geminiani now enjoyed a high degree of reputation as a composer for instruments; yet his circumstances were not much improved by the profits resulting from his publications. The manuscript of his Opera Seconda had been surreptitiously obtained by Walsh, who was about to print it; but thinking it would be benefitted by the corrections of the author, he gave him the alternative, either of correcting it, or submitting it to appear with its faults before the world. Geminiani rejected the insulting offer with the contempt it deserved, and instituted a process in Chancery for an injunction against the sale of the work. Walsh compounded the matter with him, and the work was published under the inspection of the author.

The Opera Terza he sold to Walsh, who in his advertisements gave the public to understand he came honestly by the copy. In the year 1739, he published the Opera Quarta, consisting of Twelve sonatas for a Violin and Bass; and also a new edition of the Opera Prima, with considerable additions and improvements. Soon afterwards appeared a tract by Geminiani, entitled, A Treatise on Good Taste, and another, denominated Rules for Playing in Taste. These two publications contained, besides examples of such graces as Geminiani had adopted himself on the violin, variations on several well known airs and some select Scotch tunes. About this time also he printed The Art of Playing on the Violin, a work which contains most minute directions for holding the instruments used with the bow; as well as the grace demanded for the various shifts of the hand, and examples adapted to the rules.

About the year 1740, he published, and dedicated to the Academy of Ancient Music, his Opera Settima consisting of six concertos for violins; and, in the month of April, 1742, came forth his long expected work, Guida Armonica o Dizionario Armonico. In this work, after giving due commendation to Lully, Corelli, and Buononcini, as the first improvers of instrumental music, he successfully controverts an opinion that the vast foundation of universal harmony can be established upon the narrow and confined modulation of these authors; and makes many remarks on the uniformity of modulation apparent in the compositions that had appeared in different parts of Europe for several years back. The publication of the Guida was attended with circumstances that seemed to promise but little success. The old musicians stood aghast at the licenses which it allowed, and declared that, if well received, it would tend to the entire destruction of the science of music. They consequently determined to prejudice the public against it. Many persons believed it to be only an attempt to get money from the novelty of its contents, and these on all occasions ridiculed it. There were, indeed, very few, who were able to comprehend either the motives of the writer, or the tendency of his work.

In one of those excursions, which, after Geminiani had settled in England, he made to Italy, France, and other parts of the Continent, he visited at Paris, Pére Castel, a learned and ingenious Jesuit, and a man well skilled in music. To this person he shewed his manuscript, and explained its nature and design. Castel, with a view to remove the prejudices that had been entertained against it, printed, in the Journal des Sçavans, a dissertation on the Guida, and a strong recommendation of it, which Geminiani, on his return to London, got translated into English, and published in a small pamphlet of about thirty pages.

In a life so unsteady as that of Geminiani, spent in different countries, and employed in pursuits that had no connection with his art, and only served to divert his attention from it, we must suppose, in order to account for the means of his support, that he received very considerable pecuniary assistance from his patrons and friends. The emoluments arising from his publications were not in general such as in any degree to compensate for the many years of study and labour which they had occupied. Towards the conclusion of his life, he had recourse to an expedient for raising money which had never before been attempted: in the year 1748, he issued advertisements announcing that a concerto spirituale, would be performed for his benefit at Drury Lane Theatre, to consist chiefly of the music of Italian masters of eminence, but whose names were scarcely known in England. Geminiani, an entire stranger to the business of the orchestra, had no idea of the trouble and labour that were required to prepare singers for the performance of music which they had not before seen, or of the frequent rehearsals that were necessary for all the parties engaged. The consequence was, that the vocal department not being perfect, the performance miscarried. The audience were sufficiently numerous to constitute what is called a good house, and the performance commenced with one of Geminiani's concertos, which was succeeded by a grand chorus. Both these pieces had justice done them; but the first of the women, to whom a solo air had been given, was unable to execute it, and the whole band, after playing a few bars, were compelled to stop. The audience, instead of expressing resentment, seemed to pity the distress into which Geminiani was thrown. An apology was received by them; and they sat silent till the books were changed for those which contained Geminiani's own compositions.

The profits arising from this entertainment, enabled him once more to gratify that inclination for rambling which was so inherent in his disposition. He went to France, and took up his residence for some time at Paris. As the engraving of music was then much more neatly executed in that city than in any other part of the world, and as his concertos had never been printed in such a manner as he wished, he was now determined to publish them himself in score. Accordingly he revised, for this purpose, his Second and Third Operas; but such was his desire for making improvements, and his passion for refinement, that he not only betrayed himself into numerous errors, but likewise was led to the insertion of many new and ill-constructed passages.

He staid long enough in Paris to get engraved the plates both for the score and the parts of the above-mentioned two sets of concertos; and about the year 1756, he returned to England, and advertised them for sale. About the same time he published what he called The Enchanted Forest, an instrumental composition, grounded on a singular notion which he had long entertained, that betwixt music and conversation there is a very near and natural resemblance. This he used to illustrate, in conversation, by a comparison between those musical compositions in which a certain point is assumed in one part, and answered in the other with frequent repetition, and the form and manner of conversation. With the design of reducing this notion to practice, Geminiani endeavoured to represent to the imagination of his hearers the succession of events in that beautiful episode contained in the 13th Canto of Tasso's Jerusalem, where, by the order of Iameno, a Pagan magician, a forest is enchanted, and each tree informed with a living spirit, to prevent its being cut down for the purpose of making battering rams and other military engines for carrying on the siege of Jerusalem.

The Enchanted Forest was succeeded by the publication of two numbers of a work entitled, The Harmonical Miscellany, containing sundry Modulations on a Bass, calculated for the Improvement of Students in Music, and the practice of the Violin and Harpsichord. Geminiani intended to continue this work by periodical publication; but as it did not receive much encouragement, he desisted from his intention.

In the year 1761, he went over to Ireland, where he was kindly received and entertained by Dubourg, at that time master of the King's band there. Geminiani had spent many years in compiling an elaborate treatise on music, which he intended for publication; but soon after his arrival in Dublin, by the treachery of a female servant (who, it has been said, was recommended to him for no other purpose than that she might steal it), the manuscript was purloined out of his chamber, and could never afterwards be recovered. The magnitude of this loss, and his inability to repair it, made a deep impression on his mind, and had such an effect upon his spirits as to hasten fast his dissolution. He died at Dublin on the 17th of September, 1762, in the eighty-third year of his age.

It is observable from the works of Geminiani, not only that his modulations are original, but that his harmonies consist of such combinations as were never introduced into music till his time. His melodies are in the highest degree elegant; and in their general cast, most of his compositions are exquisitely tender and pathetic. Of his execution on the violin, it may be stated, that he had none of the fire and spirit of modern performers; but he possessed an abundance of grace and feeling; nearly all the powers that engage the attention of the hearer, and render it subservient to the will of the artist, were united in him.

RETIREMENT OF MR. MURRAY FROM THE STAGE.

The Morning Chronicle, referring to this event, says—We perceive that Mr. Murray, the celebrated actor, and many years manager of the Theatre Royal, Edinburgh, has taken his farewell benefit, and has finally bid adieu to the stage. By his retirement the northern public loses one of the most active and enlightened managers who ever opened a theatre, and one of the most artistic and delicately refined actors who ever trod a stage. Mr. Murray took leave of his friends as Sir Anthony Absolute. His favourite line of parts, like that of Mr. Farren, whom in many respects he resembled, was the "old men." Mr. Murray's personation had all the delicate play of light and shade, the variety of suggestive by-play, and the easy and off-hand finish which distinguishes French acting. His "makes up" were very famous, managed with the most consummate artistic skill, and great taste and fancy. The identity of the manager was as perfectly sunk as that of any man could be in that strange, listless mass of slovenliness and tipsiness. Although possessing great and piquant comic powers, and principally delighting in their development, Mr. Murray could give both pathos and passion with great, yet always delicately and finely-toned effect. Few actors had less mannerism, or sank themselves more completely for the time in the character undertaken. Mr. Murray, besides being a consummate artist, and a manager of great tact, enterprise, and resource, is a scholar and a gentleman. He has always mixed in literary society, and the esteem in which he was held by Sir Walter Scott, and his circle may be gathered from many a letter published by Lockhart. Mr. Murray now retires to enjoy the produce of a life of honourable exertion; and we wish him a long and prosperous evening to his days.

COMPOSER AND PUBLISHER,

(Translated from "La France Musicale," by W. Grülliers.)

A musician is (and it is most indispensable that he should be) one of those men of deep cunning and knowledge, viz. a philosopher. The singer is not in this predicament; he can dispense with all learning whatever (and many avail themselves of the privilege), provided nature has kindly bestowed upon him a la, a si, or an ut, or more or less lungs. He has no future trouble; the present to him is all "coulour de rose," and the future (when he for an instant casts his thoughts in advance of old time) seems only to reflect back the luxurious ease and plenty of to-day. It is not he who is weak or silly enough to devote his time to the learning of music. No, no, he is gifted with too much good sense in this respect, to attempt such an inconsiderate rashness. Says he, exultingly to himself, "What's all this to me; of what necessity? None; as the earth is made to cover the blunders of doctors and physicians, is not the orchestra there to do the same by those of singers?" Immediately upon his appearance, he is in receipt of as much worldly wealth as would support ten of our families.

There is a class of musicians who demand a much greater share of our pity than instrumental performers; this unfortunate among the most unfortunate is a composer. I call all the powers of time and chance, which in this world make and mar the destinies of men; I appeal to them to witness that it is better to be a bricklayer, a shoemaker, a porter, a sweep, or any other vile occupation or calling that you can imagine, than to be a composer. If you wish to exist by your work or labour, beware of searching for it in the depths of musical science!

A young painter, has he talent or genius, few difficulties lie in his way. He paints a picture, a connoisseur passes, praises and recognizes its merit; the crowd immediately presses forward; the name of the artist is uttered; the newspapers re-echo it, and his genius is recognized, his talent is publicly appreciated, and no further fear has he. But a musician, were he possessed of the genius and talent of a Mozart, he would not be able to escape one, no not one of the thorns and humiliations which await a young composer on his "début."

When he has laboriously terminated the score of any serious work, his labour is hardly half completed. Should he (which is not unfrequently the case) happen to be poor he must turn copyist, and waste a valuable and precious time in extracting parts sometimes doubled, sometimes threefold or fourfold, and all this as an indispensable step towards its performance. But this performance, how will they obtain it? He addresses his friends, his brother artists, every one and everybody; at the end of a world of time and trouble he occasionally is fortunate enough to meet with some sympathizing artists who promise their help, and keep their word. Then long and laborious rehearsals take place each week, and the work is studied and learnt by long and frequent repetition. At last it is heard, and the author receives the applause of the public and the congratulations of his friends. He returns home light of heart, and brimful of joy: an hour afterwards, when his enthusiasm has a little cooled down, he soliloquizes to himself, "Alas! thou art, and ever will be, a fine and beautiful thing; you satisfy the cravings of the soul, but those of the body—I must go and call upon a publisher." The unhappy man! a publisher!! No matter, he enters the first one's shop he comes to, then to another, and another. To the first one he obsequiously says, "Sir, I have come to propose to you to purchase a quartett for two violins, alto and bass." He is met by a bolsterous hilarity, "Ah! ah! ah! sir, where do you come from? We don't keep those sort of things here." To the second he offers a sonata. "Sonata, what will it thou with me," and they turn their back upon him. To a third he offers a mass from a requiem, for three voices. "You are mad," cries this one, "were it for thirty voices, how could I find in a mass for the dead material for a Schottische or a Polka? Pshaw." At last he exhibits some quintetts; the publisher first examines the title, "Sir," says he, "I will not hide from you that your name is totally unknown to me; but were you named Beethoven, what you show me would not sell, it would go no further than among your own friends. Have you many friends?" "Yes, I am somewhat fortunate that way." "Oh! in that case we may be able to do something together." On hearing this, a gleam of hope beams upon our composer. "Will you permit me," pursues the publisher, "to cast my eye over the details and arrangement of your work." "Come," thinks the artist to himself, "he is a connoisseur," and then the following dialogue ensues:—

Composer—"These quintetts have lately been played by some of the best artists of our capital."

Publisher (looking over the leaves of the score)—"Ah! ah! (in an under tone) four hundred and forty-two."

Composer—"What think you of the plan?"

Publisher—"The plan? (in an under tone) five hundred and eighty-three, 584—"

Composer—"Does the harmony please you?"

Publisher—"Military harmony?"

Composer—"No, no, I am speaking of the science of harmony, of the harmonical combinations you are at present analyzing with so much care."

Publisher (still analyzing)—"I find nothing objectionable; it appears tolerably good, (in an under tone) 1213. (aloud) the flats and sharps apart, they terribly encumber the engraving. Could you not suppress a few; for instance, those that would be least missed?"

Composer—"And the ideas?"

Publisher (in the attitude of a learned man meditating most profoundly)—"Oh, as to the ideas—(in an under tone) 1550—every one has his own, and the one which occupies me most at the present moment, is to find how I can be useful to you."

Composer (gratefully)—"I am sure you are very kind."

Publisher (after a long pause)—"Listen! I have just studied the first part of your work most minutely. I know all its points and stops; nothing has escaped me, and I will almost venture to say I am better acquainted with your work than you are. You smile! Well, well, I will wager that you are not aware that this first quintett contains 2575 bars, neither one more or less!"

Composer—"Really—yes,—I was unaware of it."

Publisher—"Ah! you see—this is how I was intently occupied when you spoke to me a moment ago: then you will fully comprehend that in consenting to publish your work, I incur a great and enormous sacrifice. If I consent to engrave it, I invest funds which, less fortunate than Epimionides of old, may never return to me; still, as it is a good office to be the protector, the mentor of a young composer on his first appearance, here is what I propose. I will engrave your work (as a matter of course, the copyright will belong to me); and as soon as it is published you will purchase fifty copies, at the marked price, for your friends—you understand me—for your friends."

Composer—"Fifty copies—at marked price?"

Publisher—"Yes, at the marked price."

Composer—"And then—?"

Publisher—"Then!—that's all!"

Composer—"Sir, I am extremely obliged to you: I will reflect." And the composer retires heart-broken, carrying with him, however, his beloved work.

On getting to his sometimes miserable home, the poor composer, discouraged and completely broken down, thinks if it be not better to throw all his manuscripts into the fire, and rises with the fatal intention, at the moment a friend enters.

"Well, how have you got on? What success have you had?"

"Cannot you see, I am preparing for an auto-da-fé, all that your friendship is good enough to call my chefs d'œuvre."

"Nonsense, you are joking?"

"Yes, joking, as the wretched one who is about to blow out his brains."

"And the publishers?"

"I have seen them."

"Well?"

"Repulsed."

"Have you seen them all?"

"Nearly."

"It is not possible! you have not been to—?" and the friend, utters the name of a publisher who had not received the visit of our unfortunate composer.

"I was sure of it," pursued he. "Here is his address; go to him in my name, and in the name of all the friendly artists who have protected your work. He is a man of talent; he understands business in the pure sense of the term; and he is both a sincere and devoted friend to our art. You will not be dazzled by the appearance of his shop, it almost escapes the observation of the passers by, neither will you see festoons nor ornaments, nor Bohemian glass upon which polkas, mazurkas, or quadrilles appear in all their resplendent beauty; nor will you perceive gilt and magnificent albums, or the overtures of Guillaume Tell or Jeune Henry arranged for flageolet solo. You will ascend a staircase tolerably wide but badly lighted; you will enter an apartment of which the greatest luxury consists in a considerable quantity of packages, whereon are inscribed the names of those most celebrated in the musical art. Each illustrious composer has his place: to the vulgar it is a large and magnificent warehouse: to the artist it is a sanctuary of genius and science! There you will see a man with an eagle eye, and silvery hair, sitting before a desk, with pen in hand, or behind his ear. He is either writing or meditating. He is not surrounded by numerous officious or impertinent clerks: alone, alone he suffices for all; and this desk, covered with papers, plates, and proofs, has been ten, ay twenty times the stepping-stone of many an unknown and neglected artist to glory and renown."

The advice is followed; our composer presents himself, and receives an affable and gracious greeting. He explains and shows his work; and a few days afterwards, he is able to tell his friends of the success of his exertion. These suddenly and enthusiastically form a project, viz. that of offering to the good and honest publisher a proof of their respect; and surrounding him in a modest but bountiful banquet, they all drink, with the utmost enthusiasm and good-will, to the health and prosperity of that man of intelligence and feeling, the publisher-artist, their friend Simon Richault.

J. MURRAY.

Dramatic.

OLYMPIC.—On Thursday week, on the occasion of Mr. H. Warren's benefit, a new aspirant for public favour was introduced for the first time in a prominent position to the notice of a London audience. The name of the débutante is Miss Laura Keene, who has been playing lately with considerable success at the Richmond Theatre during the period that it was open under the management of Mrs. Brougham. The play selected was the The Lady of Lyons, Mr. H. Farren being the Claude Melnotte, and Miss Laura Keene, Pauline Deschapelles. Miss Laura Keene possesses a great many of the qualifications necessary to form a good actress; she is above the middle height, her figure is slim, elegant and well proportioned, her face pleasing and very expressive, and her voice, which struck us forcibly as bearing a great resemblance to that of Miss Laura Addison, full-toned, rich, and flexible. From what we could judge from seeing her only once, she is endowed also with considerable intelligence; her conception, at least of the character of the merchant's haughty daughter, was, as a whole, just and natural; there were, without a doubt, certain portions of the play which might have been given differently by her, and which, in our opinion, would have gained by the alteration, but, as we have said, the general result was satisfactory. Miss Laura Keene's great defect, at present, is a want of energy where it is most needed; she is too emphatic during the entire piece, and in order to produce any great effects she must either be more forcible in her passionate scenes or less so in the others. Miss Laura Keene is also, at times, too artificial, as for instance in the cottage of Claude Melnotte's mother, where she learns the deceit that has been practised on her. In this scene, which in many respects, however, was played in a highly satisfactory manner, the violent heaving up and down of the body, when she buries her face in her hands and is supposed to be weeping, was very extravagant and anything but in accordance with nature; such tremendous and convulsive sobbing as Miss Laura Keene's could never last so long and be so violent—it must either cease altogether, and end hysterically—no person could, to use a vulgar phrase, “take on so” for five or six minutes and then rise up as calm and collected as Miss Laura Keene. Her last act was decidedly her best, and quite surprised the audience by its tenderness and pathos, but even these qualities would lose none of their effect by having a little more vigour infused in them.

Our opinion of this lady may be briefly summed up as follows. We think that with care, study, and perseverance she may take a very high position on the London stage, and it is precisely because we do think so, and, what is more, because we hope so—because we really desire to see some one able to take the leading juvenile parts in Tragedy and Drama, for which there is at present no adequate representative since the accomplished Miss Helen Faucit and the great and sublime Cushman have, so to say, deserted us—it is because we wish well to Miss Laura Keene that we thus point out what strike us as her defects, judging her by the standard of excellence and not by that of mediocrity. If she had come forward merely in a third or second rate character, we should have said she was all that could be desired, but when she appears as an aspirant to the first rank in her profession, we think it no more than our duty to tell her that she is as yet not duly qualified for the position, though we believe that care, attention, and experience of the stage will, perhaps, some day enable her to occupy it.

The applause at the fall of the curtain was unanimous and enthusiastic. Such applause, however, emanating as it does from the temporary excitement of an audience whose feelings have been worked upon by an interesting and well written play, should be viewed by distrust by all sensible young artists and not be taken as an unerring test of success, but be looked on rather merely as an incentive to future exertions, and in this light or trait it will be viewed by the fair débutante of Tuesday last.

Original Correspondence.

THE GREGORIAN CHANT.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

DEAR SIR,—In two recent reviews in the MUSICAL WORLD there appeared some observations on the subject of the Gregorian Chant. These observations are so seasonable, so true, and so just, that those who really wish to see music as an art fostered and encouraged in the bosom of the English Church can, I think, scarcely do other than feel highly indebted to you for the candid and logical judgment you have pronounced on that question.

It is to be feared that the sanction of professional musicians has occasionally been given to a certain movement without its being sufficiently considered, or, perhaps, even suspected what might be the animus and ultimate aim of those who have been conducting the agitation in derogation of artistic music, and it is for the purpose of putting those on their guard who would not willingly lend their aid to the degradation of the music of the church, that I have thrown the following “notes” together.

In olden times the monasteries were the nurseries of all the arts and sciences—music among the number,—and all the old treatises which have come down to us on the subject of music (then only a dry science) emanated from such establishments. The ecclesiastics were, in a word, in those days the “chief musicians.” Nor could it be otherwise, since there were then no facilities for the laity becoming acquainted with more concerning music than the monks chose to teach them. But while the latter were the greatest cultivators of music, so far as it then went, they were also the greatest enemies to its progress. They were, in fact, simply schoolmen, not philosophers, and attached far greater importance to the laws concerning the ancient gamuts than to the evidence of their ears. Under such influence as the above did music labour from the time of Gregory up to the date of the Reformation—nearly a thousand years—during which lengthened period music made infinitely less progress than it has in any hundred years since. Judging therefore of effects from their causes, music has progressed and flourished far better without the assistance of a priesthood than with, and dates its development from a dull science into an intellectual and divine art only from the time of its complete release from such bondage. This brings me nearer to the main object of this letter.

In early times it was customary for the duties of Precentor, or “chief musician,” to be vested in an ecclesiastic. This arrangement was a most judicious one; for as the musical “learning” was, as we have just seen, chiefly confined to the clerical inmates of the monasteries, it followed that the duties of that office then devolved on one who was most likely to be able to discharge them efficiently. Now among the other attempted “revivals” of the present day is included a claim for the clergyman to the supreme directorship in musical matters, because this was the mediæval arrangement. Those who are endeavouring to enforce this return will not see what everyone else must—that the very circumstance that rendered such a plan advisable in olden times renders it not so now. The comparative knowledge of music possessed by the clergy on the one hand and the laity on the other is now reversed; and to place its control in the hands of the former is to trust its management to those who understand not the most but the least about it. The advocates of such a proceeding are grasping at the form and missing the spirit of the old arrangement; but this they will not perceive.

Music is no longer a matter of school-boy calculation, a mere question of quaint scales and strange progressions of common chords. It has grown into a beautiful language, and, like most languages, demands years of daily toil, pains, and congenial aptitude to thoroughly master, and after that constant practice to keep up. For “the advocates” to master music in its present advanced state, then, is almost a forlorn hope; and this being the case, the adoption of one of two courses seems at first sight to be unavoidable. Either the management of the music can be reposed in the hands of one who understands the most about it (the organist), and so the "spirit" of the old arrangement be preserved and the dead form be foregone, or the priest can assert his irresponsible power and right to rule everything in the church, and so preserve the dead form and outrage its spirit. The former course, although graceful, would involve the relinquishment of a little power; and openly to exercise the latter would, perhaps, be impolitic just as present.

A third course therefore has been discovered, which is to degrade church music and reduce it to so primitive a state that any clergyman may master it—there being little or nothing left to master. Music must be found so simple that it would be difficult to make a mistake in talking about it; so simple that the most uncultivated voice can sing it; and a congregation so simple that it will believe anything, when "the authority" can forthwith indulge in all the pomp and consequence of a—medieval "church musician." Such music has been found,—(such music!)—also the uncultivated voices; the simple congregations; and the consequence—particularly the latter. Here and there also an unwary organist has been caught, and under these manifold auspices a march accordingly started to carry music backwards twelve hundred years.

Whether this crusade—headed by men the veriest middle-age schoolmen in the state of their musical knowledge—is ever to succeed depends, in a great measure, on the energy or indifference exhibited by those who must be the most interested in the progress of music as an art.

But the Gregorian Chant movement is not the end, but the commencement of the state of musical affairs that is being attempted to be brought about. It is but the narrow end of the wedge. Further particulars, however, I must defer till next week. In the meantime I beg to remain,

Dear Sir,
Yours very truly,
AN OLD CORRESPONDENT.

November 5th, 1851.

ENGLISH GLEE AND MADRIGAL UNION.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—Having for some time past taken a leading part in the efforts which have been made in Leeds, to resuscitate and spread a taste for vocal concerted music, especially of that class of glees and madrigals, the creation and perfection of which belong exclusively to our native composers, I trust you will allow me a little space in your columns for the purpose of making some remarks on the visit of the members of the Glee and Madrigal Union to this place on Tuesday last, and on the peculiar claims of that music, which they principally interpreted on that occasion.

Before venturing an opinion, however, on the music of which I am speaking, I will premise, to prevent any mistake, that I am by no means prejudiced in favour of glee and madrigal compositions to the exclusion of any other species of good music, foreign or native; I merely desire to see these works take their former and proper position in our musical doings—social and public, (which from their intrinsic value, as well as from the fact of their being of purely indigenous growth), they are justly and fairly entitled to.

In the introduction to a "Lecture on English Glees and Glee Writers," which I had the honour to deliver before the members of the Leeds and other Literary and Mechanics' Institutions a few months ago, I made the following remarks on the claims of our national glee and part music:—

"It has been too much the fashion among our countrymen (not in general subject to an excess of humility) to be content to assert their superiority in the workshop, or the tented field, and to yield the artistic supremacy to Germany, Italy, France, or either of them, according to the caprice of the hour.

"Now, it is the foremost, if not the principal design of this lecture, to restore to the brow of our modest friend, John Bull, some of those well-earned laurels which he has with characteristic indifference allowed the minstrelsy of Italy to parade unchallenged.

"We deplore the low condition of music in England, and we submit without a murmur to every criticism which asserts our incapacity. Now, my friends well know that if a boy at school is invariably pronounced a dunce, and childish tasks and occupations are given him on the assumption of his stupidity, he will soon verify the unhappy epithet by becoming dulness personified. 'Give a dog a bad name and then hang him,' is a just though commonplace aphorism, and the treatment of John Bull in things musical justifies it to the letter. It will be my business to show you that he is not really such a booby as he suspects himself; to reclaim the honours unjustly conceded to the Italian lyre, and to maintain that my countrymen may boast of being the originators of one of the most delightful forms of musical composition. I wish then to enlist, in some measure, your patriotism in behalf of a whole succession of composers in the purely English style of glee and part music. The opera, and many other forms of composition, may be of exotic growth, but I claim the glee as our own, originating on our shores, and matured and perfected, I am proud to say, at our firesides. And, if it has been supplanted in this its natural abiding place, I hope one fruit of this humble effusion will be, to reinstate it as one of the purest and most delightful of recreations that can gladden, endear, and refine the Englishman's home."

It was in this strain, likewise, that I appealed to my fellow townsmen in April, 1850, with a view to the establishment of the Leeds Madrigal and Motet Society; an appeal which, I rejoice to say, was liberally and generally responded to, though, as might be expected, there were not wanting many who endeavoured to depreciate the value and importance of that class of music which it was the object of the society to patronise and support, and which latterly, but especially since the successful efforts of Mrs. Endersohn, Miss Williams, Messrs. Lockey, Land, Francis, and Henry Phillips, in their performance of glees and madrigals, the critics have hardly found language to extol too highly!

Doubtless, the too often monotonous and inexpressive performance of these charming vocal gems by inferior singers at public concerts, is a chief cause of the omission in modern programmes as well as of the indifference with which they are so frequently received by an audience accustomed to hear foreign music so carefully and artistically rendered. But mark the difference: as soon as a band of first-class singers appears—such as those already mentioned—fully competent and resolved to do justice to that beautiful music which in the palmy days of Bartleman, Vaughan and Incedon, was wont to delight the frequenters of the concert room, the tables are completely turned, and apathy is transformed into enthusiasm: for, it is a fact, that notwithstanding the performances of glees and madrigals which Phillips, Lockey, and party lately gave at Willis's Rooms, in the height of the London season, were repeated again and again, they never failed to draw, not only crowded, but delighted audiences, and this, too, with a programme confined exclusively to English part music.

It is true, the programme for the provinces is agreeably diversified with solos by each of the party, who thereby, as was well remarked by one of your contemporaries "give us a taste of their quality, as well as cater for all tastes," but the main object of this musical union is, by correct and tasteful execution, to disseminate throughout the length and breadth of the land a taste for the best of that numerous class of musical works which come under the title of glees and madrigals.

In conclusion, I will only express my best wishes for the continued success of the Glee and Madrigal Union, and trust that this charming performance—than which, according to a leading London paper, "nothing so complete or beautiful, and approaching perfection, has been attempted,"—will be elsewhere, as it has been in Leeds, attended by a numerous and a delighted audience.

Apologising for having occupied so much of your valuable space,

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
W. SPARK.

Park Square, Leeds, October 30th, 1851.

NATIONAL ENGLISH OPERA.

In the letter of "Philo Musica," inserted in our last week's number, the word form, in paragraph 2, line 4, should have been force; and in line 7, Italian geology should have been Italian galaxy.

Memories of Music.

THE VISION, Romance for the pianoforte, composed and dedicated to Miss GROSVENOR by BRINLEY RICHARDS. Cocks and Co.

THE ANGEL'S SONG, Romance for the pianoforte, composed and dedicated to Z. BUCK, Esq., by BRINLEY RICHARDS. Cocks and Co.

The name of Mr. Brinley Richards has of late been brought a great deal before the public as a composer for his instrument, and this leads us to preface our remarks upon his present publications with a hearty acknowledgment of our respect for those gentlemen of the music trade, who have set aside the prejudices of the age in doing justice to a musician of our own country, whose writings are, to say the least, equal to any of those of their class upon which, until now, foreign authors have been almost exclusively engaged for our market, and it is a very poor compliment to add that they are far superior to a large average of the productions to which we refer. Independently of original invention, there is certainly a very great merit in writing so as to produce the maximum of effect with the minimum of difficulty, in constructing graceful and brilliant passages for an instrument that lies well under the hand, and so well repay the small amount of pains required for their competent execution. This is the chief, if not the only merits of the composers to whom we have alluded; but we hesitate not to say that in the pieces now before us, there is combined with this a much higher order of musical excellence, namely, considerable originality of invention, and much elegance of idea. Let this assure the publishers that their experiment has been well judged, that musical merit is not incompatible with Anglican ancestry, and that a prophet is not of necessity a loss in his own country, provided they take the proper means to turn his true value to its right account.

Thus much for generalities. To speak particularly of the two graceful morceaux under present consideration, we opine that they fulfil all that is required of music for the drawing-room, and much more than a moderate experience of the majority of music for young lady amateurs gives us any right to expect. Our decided predilection for the classical may probably have been inferred from the general tenor of our remarks; but let not our fair readers suppose that we are insusceptible of satisfaction, imperturbable by pleasure from any music but that which is cast in the model of the great masters—to eschew the worn-out parable of the nourishing diet and the dessert after dinner, we beg to affirm that in music, no less than in literature, there is a "light reading" which affords a very necessary relaxation to the mind from the severity of more arduous studies; and this, when it is good of its kind, cannot be without interest to such as have taste without prejudice, among whom we hope to be considered.

Of the two, we prefer the "Vision," which illustrates the following passage of the American poet, Longfellow;—

"The dreams of youth came back again;
Low lisping of the summer rain
Dropping upon the ripened grain,
As once upon the flower.
Visions of childhood, stay!—O stay!
Ye were so sweet and wild!
And distant voices seemed to say,
'It cannot be!' They pass away!"

An episode in the key of A, which, we suppose, embodies the second portion of the stanza, pleases us especially.

The "Angels' Song" has also been suggested by a passage from the same favourite poet, and though we rank it second, we decidedly think it possesses all the elements of extensive popularity.

We shall always be happy to welcome such charming trifles a lease from the same or from any other source.

"THE STURM MARSCH GALOP"—Arranged for the Pianoforte by BRINLEY RICHARDS. Cocks and Co.

A brilliant and easy version of the popular galop.

"RECOLLECTIONS OF WALES"

No. 1.	...	"Poor Mary Ann."
" 2.	...	"The Ash Grove." (Llwyn on.)
" 3.	...	"The rising of the lark."

Arranged for the pianoforte by BRINLEY RICHARDS. Cocks & Co.

Mr. Richards has here given three of the most beautiful melodies of his native mountains (for be it known Mr. Richards is an ancient Briton), free from the many corruptions which the "uses" of our successive Saxon songsters have introduced into them.

He has made these melodies so acceptable by the manner in which he has treated them, that we should not wonder at their superseding the modified versions of the same airs, with which we are more familiar.

Mr. Richards' variations are pleasing and well written for the instrument.

G. A. M.

"INFELICE!"—Scena for a Soprano, with an Accompaniment for the Pianoforte; the English version by W. BARTHOLOMEW, the Music by F. MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLODY. OP. 94. Posthumous Works No. 23. Ewer and Co.

This is a singularly interesting work, as being the only composition of the kind that has come to us from the great composer, who has written in almost every class of music, and enriched every class to which he has contributed. It is composed upon the model of the classical Italian aria, of which Mozart and Beethoven have left us such great examples in "Non piu di fiori," "Non temer," "Resta o cara," "Ah perfido," the grand scena for Leonora in Fidelio, and many others that if less known are scarcely less beautiful. These songs consist all of a grand recitative, an adagio of considerable length, and an allegro, which last movement generally comprises the expression of several distinctly different feelings, and thus they give scope for the display of the highest attributes of a singer, namely, declamation, cantabile, and various passion.

In this respect they must be regarded as fulfilling the noblest purposes of the lyrical dramatic art, but the exigencies of stage effects have led to their being now supplanted in the theatre by the rather melodramatic scena which Weber, we believe, originated, and certainly perfected; a form of composition that, although certainly more pertinent to the continuous action of the scene, and so more congenial to modern taste, and perhaps in one sense more in accordance with nature, is of a less elevated style than that which it has superseded, in so far as it gives no opportunity for the extensive development of a musical idea or the exercise of continuity, which is one of the highest attainments of the composer's art.

The scena of Mendelssohn embodies the often-told tale of deserted love. In the recitative we have the complaint of the unhappy one, and the vain effort to stifle her feelings of fondness with the recital of her wrongs. The adagio is a recollection of the happiness of her hours of union with her beloved. The allegro interrupts this with the sad conviction that happiness in love is blent with torments, the cruel reality that dispels all her fond imaginings. The poetry is, for Italian poetry, singularly deficient in passionate expression, and though written in the form of the songs with which this classifies itself, it contains not the matter that in those songs calls forth the greatest power of the musician, that wonderfully eloquent simplicity wherein Metastasio so eminently excels, which may be called rather the diction of feelings than of words, and is of all poetry the best suited to the purposes of dramatic music, as suggesting to the composer all of which his art is capable in expression, and leaving to him the fulfilment of this expression instead of fettering him with metaphor and other figures which are as the music to poetry that is intended to be complete in itself, and not a vehicle, or framework, or medium for the exercise of another art. This song is not, as is the case with some of the greatest compositions of its class, an address to the faithless lover, but a course of reflection and self-communion, and it is therefore more of a didactic than a declamatory, more of a reasoning than of a passionate character. Such being the style of subject he has chosen, we are not to expect from Mendelssohn in this scena a composition of so highly excited colouring, and of such consequent powerful effect as some of those we have named of Mozart and Beethoven, and, if it be that sublimity consists in the truthful rendering of the greatest passions of the human heart, we must look in the song before us rather for beauty which gives expression to the tenderer feelings.

The recitative pleases us perhaps more than either of the other portions of the composition; one passage in particular, where the words admit of more musical expression than all the rest of the poem, is given with the most touching pathos; we allude to the gradual transition, equally novel and beautiful, from the key of E flat minor, in which the words are given with energy, to the dominant of C minor as the momentary resolution of self esteem melts into the gentle softness of personal regret for the loss of that which love has made so much a part of self, that no abstract love of self can compensate for it.

"Riaveglia tua virtù!
Scordati l'empio traditore!"

"Amante—sventurata—e l'amo pur!" The opening phrase of the slow movement is made very prominent by the somewhat unusual employment of a fundamental tonic seventh in the second bar, and this stands out as a feature wherever the passage recurs. There is another phrase of even more beauty, which may be described as an episode or dominant subject occurring in the key of F, when the poem enumerates the scenes which memory makes dear by their association with the presence of the betrayer. The last allegro is introduced with new and excellent effect by the interruption, with a change of key, of the concluding cadence of the previous movement. This finale is especially fraught with the peculiar feeling of Mendelssohn's music; one passage in particular, commencing on the words "E pur la memoria," recalls even the notes of the overture to Alhambra, and yet, with all our admiration, with all our love of this peculiar feeling in music, we find the movement rather lengthy, and though containing many highly effective points and not a few beauties, we cannot consider it so effective for performance as the previous portions of the song. There is, towards the end, an ingenious recurrence to the opening phrase of the slow movement which here derives new interest from the inversion of the harmony with which it was previously accompanied, but this is introduced so late, and with so long a preparatory symphony as to lengthen more than relieve the general effect. The conclusion is broad and clear, and the whole is admirably vocal.

Upon mature consideration, we are disposed to regard this scena as an early production of the composer, for we find in it a want of that power of concentration which is so eminently the characteristic of the practised musician, and the ideas seem more like the anticipation of a style that later became perfected, than specimens of that style when it had become fully developed. All this is advanced without a knowledge of the orchestral score, which, although it could not change our opinion of the music, might considerably qualify our ideas of the effect it will produce.

Such as it is, we sincerely recommend this only dramatic aria of Mendelssohn to the attention of the first class vocalist, since its novelty and the name of its composer are all-sufficient to excite the interest of an audience, and there is quite enough in it for the advantageous display of a singer to repay any effort its performance may cost and to satisfy any reasonable expectations of the hearers, and we hope before long to hear it with all its proper effect, since it is fully worthy of the best endeavours to do it justice.

G. A. M.

"THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE." By BROTHER JONATHAN. Edited by HENRY HOWARD PAUL.

The second part of the above, for this month, is, we think, an improvement on the first. The papers are better contrasted and more generally readable. The contributors to this number reckon, among others, the names of Longfellow, G. P. Morris, Edgar A. Poe, Neal, Howard Paul, N. P. Willis, Sam Slick, Jun., Mrs. Osgood, Mrs. Kirkland, and Mrs. Mowatt. The reader cannot fail to find infinite pleasure in perusing Edgar Poe's charming poem, called "Bells;" while the various stories and essays will afford both amusement and gratification. The illustrations to the number, are—a view of the Park and City Hall, New York, very finely executed on steel, from a design by Bartlett, and a wood engraving of James Fenimore Cooper, taken from a daguerreotype likeness.

Provincial.

LEEDS.—(From a Correspondent.)—THE GLEE AND MADRIGAL UNION.—The visit of divers members of this popular union of justly celebrated English artistes to Leeds, and several other towns in the West Riding during the past week, has caused a veritable sensation, not only among folks musical, but with numbers of those, who, in common parlance are said to be "very fond of music, but don't understand much about it." "Never before," is the ordinary acclamation of those who had the good fortune to hear this charming performance of our national vocal part music, "never before have we heard such an exquisite union of exquisite voices!" The entire satisfaction, however, which the performance of Glee and Madrigals by Mrs. Enderssohn, Miss M. Williams, Messrs. Lockey, Francis, Land, and Henry Phillips, appears to have given our towns-people, is certainly no more than was to be expected when we remember the sensation which their singing produced in London during the just concluded season of this memorable year. Surely, that music, which at once elicited the warm commendation of the Metropolitan press, and drew the lovers of vocal harmony in crowds to the concert room, would not fail in the Provinces to "draw" not only large, but enthusiastic audiences. I have often thought, in the midst of so much clap-trap and insane running after foreign art and artistes, the unusual success which attended the performances of this party at Willis's Rooms in the very height of the London season, was a glorious triumph, achieved by the legitimate force of talent, judgment, spirit, and good taste, on the part of the vocalists, and by a candid and hearty appreciation of their efforts by the public. It is almost unnecessary to say that it is most rare to hear this style of music with effect in the concert room; because it is either consigned to the vulgar, spiritless, and unmeaning performance of inferior singers, whose highest merit is that they keep time like an eight-day clock, and utter their notes as monotonously as its click-clack, or, if executed by artistes of superior merit, these pieces are notoriously stuffed into a concert to eke out the programme, sung at sight without care or consideration, and thus they become a sort of necessary evil to the vocalist,—a bore to the audience—and instead of lending the charm of sustained vocal harmony to diversify the sameness of solo singing, &c., they stand as a foil to it,—a series of dry, sterile tracks, whose only apparent purpose is to make the songs and duets sound quite ravishing by comparison. This is a crying evil, but we hope and believe that the very successful efforts of the eminent singers who have taken the matter in hand will "reform it altogether."

CONCERT OF THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—The concerts of this society, which have been, according to custom, discontinued during the summer months, were resumed on Friday week, under the conductorship of Mr. Spark, when a very agreeable programme of vocal music was catered for a large assemblage of the members and subscribers. The following notice of the performance appeared in last week's Leeds Intelligencer:—"Although the selection had much of that miscellaneous air which always more or less characterises vocal concerts, when the singers usually select their own songs, &c., it had one point of difference in the introduction of four pieces from Mendelssohn's juvenile operatta, The Son and Stranger. We have seldom heard the richness of Miss Atkinson's voice to more advantage than in the romance, "There sat in the grey times of old." The duet, "Now here, now there," gave Mrs. Sunderland an opportunity for pouring out her silvery tones with sweetness and expression, and in the tertetto both ladies acquitted themselves most creditably in concert with Mr. Winn. Of this gentleman, who evidently has the qualities to make a good sterling singer, we may here observe that the audience called for a repetition of his humorous pedlar's song, "I am a roamer bold and gay," in which, at any rate, he manifested every disposition to realize the character. There was an evident inclination to encore Blockley's so-called national song, "The sea is merry England's," but we suspect the loyalty of our countrymen is now a little more reasonable and substantial than to be stirred into uproarious ecstasy by such sorry effusions as this. We must not omit to mention that Bishop's plaintive glee, "Beautiful are the fields of day," sung with a beautiful blending of the voices by Mrs. Sunderland, Miss Brown, and Miss Atkinson, was deservedly encored, as was a ballad very richly sung by Miss Atkinson; and a bit of musical pleasantry executed with charming naïveté, by Miss Brown, most deservedly set the company on the qui vive for its repetition, which, of course, the lady vouchsafed most courteously. Mr. Spark (piano), performed a piece by Mendelssohn, of a smooth cantabile character, in a style of execution which bespoke full acquaintance with its subject, and without any effort to substitute finger gymnastics for music; at the conclusion of this piece he played his own clever, sprightly, and imaginative composition, "Ariel." Upon the whole, we think this concert is one upon which the directors have just cause to congratulate themselves.

CLASSICAL CHAMBER CONCERTS.—Messrs. Hird and Haddock—the former a pianist of good local fame, the latter a clever violinist, and brother to Mr. Haddock, of Liverpool—are endeavouring to get up a series of three concerts for the performances of classical music, similar to those given by Mrs. Beale and Mr. Haddock at Liverpool. They have the best wishes and support of the musical dilettanti of Leeds; but as these are comparatively few, we fear, from the small subscription list which has just come under our notice, that, in a pecuniary point of view, the well-meant efforts of these gentlemen will not be successful. The majority of concert goers in Leeds are by no means, we regret to say, prepared at present to support the "classical, the whole classical, and nothing but the classical."

LEEDS MADRIGAL AND MOTET SOCIETY.—This flourishing society has announced its intention of giving three grand concerts during the forthcoming season, at the Music Hall. You shall receive a due report of the performances as they take place.

EDINBURGH.—THE BATEMAN CHILDREN. (Oct. 30).—The Adelphi Theatre was re-opened on Tuesday evening, to exhibit the performances of the Bateman children. The fame of these infant actors, having preceded their arrival here, attracted a crowded assemblage, whose enthusiasm during the evening was quite exuberant. Having no prepossessions in favour of the display of youthful precocity of talent on the stage, we were scarcely prepared for the numerous proofs of natural ability afforded by these gifted children. Undoubtedly there was ample evidence of very skilful training; but the arch humour and quick intelligence of the young aspirants showed that the excellence of the performance was not the result of instruction alone. In truth, they evinced throughout a lively sympathy with the parts they had to sustain. They made their first appearance in the trial scene from the Merchant of Venice—Ellen as Shylock, and Kate as Portia. The representation of the inexorable Jew, in his gaberdine and black beard, was in strict conformity with the stage traditions of the art; but it is not too much to say—however ludicrous it may appear—that it was, except as being somewhat too declamatory, a vigorous and expressive performance of the part, keeping in view the age and sex of the actor. Kate, the elder girl, played the character of Portia with taste and discretion, and excited hearty applause by her excellent delivery of the speech on mercy. The performance, as a whole, had less of a mechanical aspect than might have been anticipated, and was in reality quite a triumph over a very natural prejudice. The comedy of the Young Couple, an adaptation of Scribe's Le Mariage Enfantin, and thoroughly French in idea and style, was the next part of the children's performances. It is better adapted for the display of their powers than tragedy. The characters are of their own age, and being more congenial to their tastes, are far more favourable for original action. The elder girl showed an entire comprehension of her part. She was a perfect woman in miniature, and played with an intelligence and grace worthy of the highest ornaments of the profession. The entire absence of artifice imparted to her performance the truth of nature, and the finish of elegant comedy. Ellen also evinced considerable aptitude for her part. Her genial and overflowing humour enabled her to embody the character with irresistible effect. The versatility of her powers was equally conspicuous in the lover, the husband, and the master—realizing an amusing picture of youthful vivacity. It is to be hoped that they may fulfil the promise of their early years, though similar precocity of talent has too often ended in disappointment. It is almost needless to say that the children were called before the curtain to receive the acknowledgments of the crowded auditory, which were awarded in no sparing measure.

Last night the little vaudeville of the Swiss Cottage was performed, enabling them to exhibit, in their style of acting, singular freshness and variety. The performances of the Bateman children have been nightly preceded by a comédietta or vaudeville piece, in which Miss Villars, a popular favourite from the Princess's, St. James's, and other London theatres, appeared in the principal character. We saw this lady in Perfection, or the Lady of Munster, and were greatly pleased with her easy, natural style, and her genuine feeling for comedy. She is both elegant and graceful, and has studied in the best school. Miss Villars is also a good musician and sings tastefully, and occasionally with unusual effect, as was exemplified by a double encore of "Rory O'More," which she introduced into Perfection. It is a pity that any favouritism or prejudice should keep back such talents as those possessed by Miss Villars.—(From a Correspondent).

CAMBRIDGE.—On Tuesday week an exercise for the degree of Doctor of Music, was performed in Trinity College Chapel. The composer was Mr. Steggall, of London, a pupil of Sterndale Bennett's; and his work was far above the average of such academical exercises, and did great credit to his own genius and the instructions of his master. It commenced with a chorus in eight parts, followed by a duett for two soprani, recit., and air tenore, double chorus, chorale, double quartett for eight voices, another duett for two soprani, aria basso, double chorus and fugue. The duetts for the soprani exhibited a happy vein of melody, and the quartett for eight voices and the final chorus and fugue displayed a learned acquaintance with the art of counterpoint. Altogether, Dr. Steggall may be congratulated on a work which gives him rank among English composers. His music was ably performed by the Cambridge choirs, assisted by some talented youths from the choirs of St. Paul's Cathedral and the Temple Church; Professor Walmisley conducting, and the composer presiding at the organ. The tenor and bass solos were admirably executed by Messrs. Redfearn and Gray, of London. Among the audience was Mr. Sterndale Bennett himself, and he must have been gratified at the evident pleasure which his pupil's compositions gave to a large and attentive assemblage of musical amateurs. The exercise was considered by many competent judges to be the best that had been performed here for many years.—Cambridge Journal.

CHESTERFIELD.—The distinguished musicians and vocalists, the Distin family, gave a concert in the Assembly Room, Angel Inn, last Wednesday evening, under distinguished patronage. The arrangements, conducted by Mr. Trimmell, were comprehensive and complete, and gave satisfaction to a large and highly respectable audience, comprising the principal families of the town and neighbourhood. Mr. Distin and his three sons received a most hearty welcome. The first piece a quartett from Der Freischütz, played on the Sax horns with that precision, perfect blending of the parts, purity and unison of tone, which have earned for the performers a widely spread fame. It was succeeded by Mrs. Theodore Distin singing with much ease and feeling Voss's Romanze "Oh stay with me." This was followed by a four part song, "The Red, Red Rose," which was encored, and Mrs. and Messrs. H. W. and T. Distin substituted for it "Trust her not, she is fooling thee,"—a merry, amusing glee, which in its turn narrowly escaped an encore. Then followed the aria "Meco tu Vieni," from Bellini's Straniera, performed on the Sax tuba by Mr. H. Distin, a song the "Basque Muleteer," by Mr. Theodore Distin, "Where the Bee Sucks," by Mrs. T. Distin, and a quartett, "The Miller's Daughter,' all of which were loudly cheered. A Madrigal, "Down in a flowery dale," was here introduced by desire, and met with an enthusiastic encore. The first part of the programme concluded by Mr. Distin, senior, playing "The soldier tired;"—the execution of this difficult piece elicited repeated plaudits. In the second part the instrumental portions most admired were Costa's "Vanne a colei," a trio played on the Sax horns by the brothers Distin, a selection from Lucia and La Figlia del Reggimento, "The Cuckoo Gallop" (encored), and "God save the Queen," by Messrs. Distin. In the vocal department "The Tear" (a new German ballad by Kucken, with Sax horn obligato, by Mr. T. Distin), given by Mrs. Distin, and "The Village Choristers" were most applauded, the latter being encored. Mr. R. A. Brown presided at the pianoforte.—Derbyshire Courier.

DUMFRIES.—THE MISSES SMITH'S CONCERT.—We were delighted to hear our old friends, the Misses Smith, once more in our Assembly Room in George Street, on Saturday evening, the 11th October. They were in the finest voice; they are very greatly improved in singing, and a more delightful concert was never heard here. Their performance in duet singing is perfect, evincing at once immense practice and extraordinary talent. The Italian pieces were sung with that firm and decided precision which is so seldom attained by our singers in executing foreign music. "Oh! Nannie wilt thou gang wi' me," was most beautifully sung. This is not a Scottish song, the elaborate and beautiful air being composed by Carter, an Englishman. The song, "Oh! Nancy wilt thou go with me," was written by Dr. Percy, Bishop of Drumore, and is an English song. It was barbarized into its present form for Vauxhall Gardens. Burns writing to Mr. Thomson pronounces Percy's song to be "perhaps the most beautiful ballad in the English language." It may be found in Mr. Thomson's work. The duet, "The Birks of Aberfeldy," was delightfully sung. To look at the air it would seem absolutely impracticable to arrange such a tune as a duet. The difficulty, however, is most successfully got over. The Irish ballad, "Aileen ma vourneen a cushla ma chree," was sung with genuine feeling. Those words properly written are "ma mhuruin, my darling, 'cushla ma chirdhe," artery of my heart. The tune of "Wha'll be King but Charlie" is almost as difficult to harmonize as "The Birks of Aberfeldy." The effect on the audience was absolutely electric. It is probable that the really pretty duet "Caller Herring" was never so well sung before. It almost surpasses our imagination to conceive that beautiful music should be associated with the idea of fresh herrings. Scott wrote a most spirited song to the tune of Caller Herring. It was written after a foot ball match at Carterhaugh, no very promising subject for a poet. But the banner of the House of Buccleuch was brought out and raised on the occasion, and the minstrel is inspired in a moment:—

"Then up with the banner, let forest winds fan her,
She has blazed over Etrick eight ages and more,
In peace we'll attend her, in battle defend her,
Or die at her foot like our fathers of yore."

The song may be found in Mr. Thomson's smaller work. "Of a' the airts the win' can blaw" was most charmingly sung. The first two stanzas only were written by Burns. All attempts to eke out his songs are miserable failures. It reminds one of the great image of the Babylonian monarch. The gold and silver beginning only makes the brass more palpable. The graceful air, "This is no my ain lassie," with Burns's pretty words, and arranged as a duet, was most beautifully given. The air is introduced by J. B. Cramer, under the title of "Aria Scozzese," into his instruction book for the piano forte. Perhaps the finest performance of the evening was "Tam Glen." Miss Smith's singing of it could not possibly be surpassed. The concert concluded with the well known song "The Lass o' Gowrie." The true text of the second verse (the only good verse in the song) is:—

"The rosebud tinged wi' morning shower
Blooms fair within its thorny bower,
But Katy was a fairer flower
Than ever bloomed in Gowrie."

This beautiful and graceful melody is one of Neil Gow's happiest efforts. Its very name is poetical, "Loch Earraich," the Lake of Spring.—[The above criticism is from the Dumfries Courier, and was written by Robert Burns, eldest son of the Poet.—Ed. M. W.]

WOOLWICH.—A vocal and instrumental concert was given at the Town Hall on Monday. The Philharmonic band assisted. The gems of the evening were Mrs. Alexander Newton's singing "Let the Bright Seraphim," and "Casta Diva." Mrs. Newton is immensely improved since we last heard her. Her voice is fuller, rounder, and more powerful, and she exhibits more style and finish. She made a powerful impression on the audience. Mr. Bridge Frodsham was encored in Clement White's "Ah! why didst thou tell me," and was much applauded in a new song, "The last bugle." The other singers were Miss Louisa Nevett (pupil of Mrs. Newton), Miss Ward, and Mr. H. Barnsby. Miss Eliza Ward (piano), Master John Ward (concertina), and Mr. Richard Ward (trumpet), were the instrumentalists; Mr. Bowman led the band.—(Abridged from a Correspondent.)

Foreign.

NEW YORK.—MADAME ANNA THILLON.—The engagement of this distinguished dramatic vocalist at Niblo's, draws to a close. To-morrow evening she makes her final appearance for the present, and performs in the admired operetta entitled The Pride of the Harem, taking the role of Roxalana, in which she will sing "Woman rules you still," and a scene from Auber. She will also perform in the second act of The Daughter of the Regiment, in which she has already produced such a sensation. That opera was written expressly for her; she is the original fille du regiment, and perhaps, take her all in all, has never been surpassed in that character. Her Catarina, however, in Crown Diamonds, has been equally popular here, and by some even preferred to her performance of the Daughter of the Regiment. In the latter she has sung three times; in the former, six times, in New York. Never has any operatic singer of her class met with a more enthusiastic reception, or been so successful as she has been, for her brief but splendid career at Niblo's. She has charmed all by the fascinations of her beautiful style—so graceful, so natural, so expressive, and yet so powerful. Her delicious voice is music itself, and is only in harmony with the radiant intelligence that beams from her syren face, and speaks more forcibly to the heart than any form of words of which human language is susceptible. The beauty of her countenance, not voluptuous, but indicative of passionate love—her piquant naiveté of manner—her exquisite tones—her captivating gestures—her beautiful attitudes, and the indescribable charm of nature that plays around her like a halo of light, beguiling the audience into the momentary belief that their senses are delighted with a reality, and not a mere dramatic representation on the stage, have been the theme of every tongue, and have won for this gifted lady an immense popularity in the great metropolis of the States.—New York Herald.

Miscellaneous.

JULLIEN'S CONCERTS.—Jullien commences operations on Monday night next at Drury Lane. Among the attractions provided we may mention the engagement of Mrs. John Macfarren as pianiste, a highly talented lady, and an excellent performer, whose playing, we have no doubt, will be received with infinite gratification by Jullien's patrons.

MR. FRANK MORI has been selected as conductor and musical director in the operatic company about to commence a series of performances at Birmingham, on the 15th instant, which will be repeated at Glasgow and elsewhere. The principal section of the company is composed of Mr. and Mrs. Sims Reeves, Mr. Frank Bodda, and Mr. Delevanti. The operas projected are Fra Diavolo, Lucia di Lammermoor, Sonnambula, Puritani, and The Bohemian Girl.

HERR STIGELLI, the popular tenor, has returned to London, having fulfilled his Manchester engagement at the Theatre Royal. Herr Stigelli appeared with great success as Almaviva in the Barbieri, Nemorino in L'Elisir d'Amore, and Edgardo in Lucia, in the Italian operas; and as Pollio in Norma, and Ottavio in Don Giovanni, in the English operas. Having to appear at some concerts in the course of the month, Herr Stigelli will remain in London until the first or second week in December.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 The Reminiscences of Henri Herz will be continued next week.

Advertisements.

CAUTION.

SEVERAL notices relative to the Bloomer Polkas having appeared, Henry Distin, in justice to himself, begs to inform the Music Trade, Profession, and Public in general that DISTIN'S BLOOMER POLKA, by Wellington Guernsey, price 2s. 6d., was the original one published, the title of the said Bloomer Polkas having been surreptitiously obtained by other parties in the first instance. Distin's Bloomer Polkas are nightly performed at the Public Balls, Concerts, Theatres, &c., and also at Distin and Sons' Concerts throughout the kingdom, and the various military bands of the army. Published by Henry Distin, at his Depot for Military Musical Instruments, 31, Crambourn-street, Leicester-square, London, where also may be had by the same popular author,

The Court Beauty Polkas (as performed at Her Majesty's State Balls)	2s. 6d.
The Angelina do. do. do.	2s. 6d.
The Belvidere Galop do. do. do.	2s. 6d.
The Cuckoo Galop do. do. do.	2s. 6d.

All with Cornet accompaniments.

PIANOFORTES FOR HIRE AT REDUCED PRICES.

ECONOMY being at all times commendable, Messrs. ROUSSELOT and Co. have established a new system for Hiring Pianofortes, including the tuning once a month, which presents not only a great saving, but also the advantage of having the instrument regularly kept in tune. Pianofortes exchanged. For particulars apply to RousseLOT and Co., 66, Conduit-street, Regent-street.

SAX MILITARY BAND INSTRUMENTS.

COUNCIL MEDAL, Jury 10a, 1725. Messrs. ROUSSELOT & Co. beg to announce that being the representatives of the eminent inventor of the Sax Horns, who has gained the sole Council Medal for the Military Band Instruments, they are able to provide purchasers with genuine Sax Horns, French Horns, Trombones, Cornets with or without the patent slides, &c., at moderate prices. The admired instruments from the Exhibition are now on view at 66, Conduit-street. List of prices forwarded on application. London, RousseLOT and Co., 66, Conduit-street, Regent-street.

NEW AND FAVOURITE SONGS

PUBLISHED BY CRAMER, BEALE, AND CO.

The Tears of Love	W. Maynard.
My Home in the Valley	Frank Mori.
Softly ye Night Winds	W. V. Wallace.
Astoria	G. Linley.
O thou, whose beauty shines	Kalliwoda.
Came smile again	W. V. Wallace.
The Rhine Girl	G. Linley.
Farewell	Frank Mori.

201, Regent-street, and 67, Conduit-street.

BLUMENTHAL'S NEW PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

FLURS EMBLEMATIQUE:—

No. 1, Primavera	4s. 0d.
2, Violette	3s. 0d.
3, Rose	3s. 0d.
4, Bomarin	3s. 6d.
5, Pensée	2s. 0d.
6, Heliotrope	3s. 6d.

Cramer, Beale and Co., 201, Regent-street.

THE POPULAR SONG OF THE DAY.

"TALK OF HIM THAT'S FAR AWAY," composed by THOMAS CHANTREY. A new edition of which is just issued, may be had at ADDISON & HOELLER, 210, Regent-street, London. For simplicity, elegance, and originality of melody, it is unrivalled.

Also, by the same author, "Why wilt thou not love?" and "The dream is past."

RECOLLECTIONS OF WALES.

Welsh Airs newly arranged for the Piano, By

BRINLEY RICHARDS.

No. 1, Poor Mary Ann,
" 2, The Ash Grove,

No. 3, The Rising of the Lord,
" 4, March of the Men of Harlech.

(To be continued.)

"It is not too much to say that Mr. Richards has succeeded in throwing a new charm around each of the specimens of Cambrian song that he has selected for his purpose, and at the same time made them most useful as 'teaching pieces.'"—Vide Dramatic and Musical Review, No. 365.

(Copy.)

"6, Somerset-street, Portman-square, Nov. 1, 1851.

"Dear Sir,—I regret to see by the advertisements headed 'New Music by Brinley Richards,' to which you have directed my attention, that an attempt is therein made to mislead the public, and to induce a belief that the 'Beauties of Cambria' is a recent work of mine. Having entered into an engagement with you to confine my labours connected with the Welsh melodies to those published by your firm, allow me to state that the 'Beauties of Cambria,' advertised by another house, so far from being 'new,' or even recent works of mine, were written and published many years since, while I was a student; and I beg distinctly to assure you that with the exception of the 'Recollections of Wales,' now in course of publication by you, I have not edited, nor entered into any engagement to edit, any works connected with the music of the principality since the period already alluded to.

"I remain very truly yours,

(Signed)

"BRINLEY RICHARDS.

"To Robert Cocks, Esq., Music Publisher to Her Majesty, New Burlington-street, London."

ALSO, BY THE SAME COMPOSER.

THE STUDENT'S PRACTICE, a collection of compositions of a moderate degree of difficulty, intended as an introduction to

THE CLASSICAL PIANIST, a selection of movements from the works of the great masters. Both works in books at various prices. N.B. Indexes thématiques to be had of the two preceding works upon application.

THE ANGEL'S SONG, and THE VISION, two romances for the piano, each 2s. The Sturm March Galop, 3s.; and "Far from all I love," adapted from Kücken's admired Canzonet, 2s.

NEW PIANOFORTE MUSIC BY THEODORE OESTEN.

Strongly recommended.

WHEN the Swallows Hasten Home; Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor, by Nicolini, 2s. 6d. Three Legend Fantaisies: No. 1, Legends of Gipsies; No. 2, Legends of Love; No. 3, Legends of Fairies, each 2s. Variations on Weber's Preciosa, 2s. 6d.; Der Wildschütz, by Lortzing, 3s.; Fantasia on the Freischütz, 3s.; Fantasia on Norma, 3s.; L'Elève Avancé, two instructive Rondes, each 2s. 6d.; Perles de l'Opéra, twelve elegant pieces on favourite operatic themes, each 2s.; Perles Allemandes, six elegant fantasias on favourite German airs, each 2s. 6d.; Temple of Flowers, six pleasing and instructive sonatas for small hands, each 2s. 6d., &c.

CAUTION.—The musical profession, trade, and public are cautioned against purchasing, selling, printing, or importing any of Oesten's works, excepting those that are on themes of Operas that are copyrights in the country. All his other works are the exclusive copyright of Messrs. R. Cocks and Co.

GRATIS AND POSTAGE FREE.

A Catalogue of the Original Works of Louis von BEETHOVEN, including various arrangements of the same.

London: ROBERT COCKS and Co., New Burlington-street, Music Publishers to Her Majesty.

THE ROAD TO HEALTH.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS!

CURE of a disordered Liver and Bad digestion. Copy of a Letter from Mr. R. W. Kirkus, Chemist, 7, Prescott-street, Liverpool, dated 6th June, 1851. To Professor HOLLOWAY, Sir,—Your Pills and Ointment have stood the highest on our sale list of Proprietary Medicines for some years. A customer, to whom I can refer for any enquiries, desires me to let you know the particulars of her case. She had been troubled for years with a disordered liver and bad digestion. On the last occasion, however, the virulence of the attack was so alarming, and the inflammation set in so severely, that doubts were entertained of her not being able to bear up under it; fortunately she was induced to try your Pills, and she informs me that after the first, and each succeeding dose, she had great relief. She continued to take them, and although she only used three boxes, she is now in the enjoyment of perfect health. I could have sent you many more cases, but the above, from the severity of the attack, and the speedy cure, I think speaks much in favour of your astonishing Pills.

(Signed)

R. W. KIRKUS.

These celebrated Pills are wonderfully efficacious in the following complaints:—Ague, Constipation of the Bowels, Bilious Complaints, Fits, Head-ache, Diarrhoea, Debility, Gout, Retention of Urine, Dropsies on the Prostate, Indigestion, Scrophulous or King's Weakness, Skin, Dysentery, Inflammation of the Bowels, Complaints of the Liver, Jaundice, Sore Throats, Colic, Female Irregularities, Lardaceous Liver complaints, Stone & Gravel, &c., &c.

Sold at the Establishment of Professor HOLLOWAY, 244, Strand (near Temple Bar), London, and by all respectable Druggists and Dealers in Medicines throughout the Civilized World, at the following prices:—1s. 1d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 22s., and 3s. each Box. There is a considerable saving by taking the larger sizes.

N.B.—Directions for the guidance of Patients in every Disorder are affixed to each Box.

Just Published,

PROSPER SAINTON'S STANDARD BEARER.

SOLO FOR THE VIOLIN.

With Accompaniment for Piano 4s. 6d.
 " " " Orchestra 10s. 6d.
 Schott and Co., 89, St. James's-street.

SOCIETY OF BRITISH MUSICIANS.

THE Committee beg to announce FOUR CHAMBER CONCERTS, to take place at ST. JAMES'S HALL, ALOON, 28, BAKER'S STREET, ON MONDAY EVENINGS, Nov. 10th, 24th, Dec. 1st and 8th, commencing at Eight o'clock. Tickets for the Series, One Guinea each, or for a Single Concert, Seven Shillings; to be had of the Committee, of the principal Musicians, and of James Erat, Esq., Honorary Treasurer, 28, BERNERS-STREET.

PIANOFORTES FROM THE GREAT EXHIBITION.

MR. KELLY, MUSICAL INSTRUMENT AUCTIONEER, will, on WEDNESDAY NEXT, 19th November, at One for Two o'clock, SUBMIT FOR SALE, at 21, Old Bond-street, Piccadilly, upwards of 50 new and second-hand Pianofortes by Broadwood, Collard, Wornum, and the most eminent makers; also single and double action Harps by Erard, a Barrel Organ, Harmonium, Violins, Violoncellos, Cornets, and other Musical Instruments. May be viewed the day prior and morning of sale. Catalogues forwarded on the receipt of two postage stamps addressed to the Auctioneer, 8, High-street, Kensington.

BEAUTIES OF CAMBRIA,

By BRINLEY RICHARDS.

A Series of Welsh Melodies, arranged for the Pianoforte.

The Live Long Night, Sweet Richard,
 Margaret's Daughter, Lady Owen's Delight,
 The Ash Grove, March of the Men of Harlech;

Price 3s. each.

These beautiful national melodies of Wales are arranged in a most masterly style, worthy of Mr. Brinley Richards' great reputation as a King's Scholar of the Royal Academy of Music.

LEE and COXHEAD, 48, Albemarle-street, where may be had
 The Prince of Cambria's Band March 2s. The celebrated Chinese Band March,
 The Prince of Cambria's Quadrilles, 3s. 2s. 6d.

MUSIC FOR THE ORGAN OR HARMONIUM.

THE AMATEUR ORGANIST—a collection of soft and full Voluntaries, arranged in six Books, 3s. each, by EDWARD TRAVIS, and may be had elegantly bound, price 18s. "Mr. Travis has introduced to the musical world a new and interesting work for the Organ or Harmonium, under the title of 'The Amateur Organist.' Mr. Travis has availed himself of an extensive and classical music library, and selected with great taste the most beautiful morceaux of the great masters, Foreign and English. To lovers of classical music this work will be found to be the most superb selection that has ever issued from the musical press."—Vide Musical Review.

THE AMATEUR INTERLUDIST—a collection of short Interludes to play between the Verses of the Psalms, in one Book, price 4s., by EDWARD TRAVIS and J. P. DYER.

THE AMATEUR PRELUDIST—a collection of Preludes, with the Organ Stops carefully marked, in one Book, price 4s., by E. TRAVIS.

SACRED VOCAL MUSIC.

KELLER'S Collection of ANTHEMS, CHURCH SERVICES, CHANTS, &c., arranged for the Voice and Piano, in six Books, price 3s. each, with six beautiful and appropriate designs by Brandard, arranged by ALBERT KELLER. The six Books can be had in one Volume, elegantly bound, price 18s.

THE PSALMODIA BRITANNICA—a selection of Psalms and Hymns for the Voice and Organ, in six Books, price 3s. each, arranged by EDWIN FLOOD, and may be had in one Volume, neatly bound, price 18s.

London: LEE & COXHEAD, 48, Albemarle-street, and can be had of all Book and Music-sellers.

N.B.—A New Edition of "Hark, the Sabbath Bells," by Edwin Flood.

BLACKWOOD & CO.'S REGISTERED MUSIC FILE.

THIS new and useful invention is designed to supersede the old portfolio. It will be found the most convenient article yet introduced for holding and preserving from dust unbound music.

To be had of all Music-sellers, and Wholesale at the Manufactory, 26, Long Acre, London.

GREAT DISCOVERY IN HARMONY.

Now ready, price 6s.

THE PRINCIPLES OF NATURAL HARMONY, being a Perfect System founded upon the discovery of the True Semitonic Scale, by J. F. MATTE. London, Published by the Author, 76, Leadenhall-street. To be had of Messrs. Ewer and Co., Newgate-street, and Messrs. Cocks and Co., New Burlington-street.

LONDON SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY, EXETER HALL.

COMMENCEMENT OF THE FOURTH SEASON.

ON FRIDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER the 14th, will be performed, for the first time by this Society, Handel's Oratorio, BAL-SHAZZAR. Vocalists:—Miss Birch, Miss Dolby, Mr. Lockey, Mr. T. Williams, Mr. R. F. Smith, and Mr. Lawler. The Band and Chorus will be on an extensive scale, consisting of Eight Hundred Performers. Conductor, Mr. Surman, Founder of the Exeter Hall Oratorio. The Subscription to the Society is £1 ls. per annum, or for Reserved Seats, 2s.; each Subscriber is entitled to Two Transferable Tickets to each Subscription Concert. Office, No. 9, Exeter Hall.

SECOND EDITION.

MUSICAL MEMENTO OF THE GREAT EXHIBITION.

HYMN OF PRAISE FOR ALL NATIONS.

A SACRED CANTATA, composed in honour of the Great Exhibition. The Words selected from the Holy Scriptures; the Music by THOMAS LLOYD FOWLE. The whole work price 7s. 6d.; separate movements, One Shilling each. J. Alfred Novello, 89, Dean-street, Soho-square.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.—"Commences with an overture representing the March of All Nations, which is in reality a grand hymn, full of rich chords; then follows a chorus for four voices—

"Sing unto God, O ye Nations of the Earth."

after which a short solo, then another chorus, then we find the National Anthem, a very good arrangement of it for four voices, and several more hymns, solo, and choruses, of each of which we can freely say the one is only equalled by the other."—The Britannia of May 31.

"Ambitious, full of promise, and will doubtless survive the occasion which gave it birth."—Church and State Gazette.

"We regard this work as a most creditable and promising composition, comprising as it does much careful, agreeable, and orthodox—(if not entirely original)—writing; and we congratulate Mr. Fowle upon his success—a success happily commensurate to his praiseworthy ambitious design."—Magazine of Science for June, 1851.

"The Overture is full of rich chords: it represents the March of all Nations to the Exhibition. This is followed by a chorus for four voices, sweetly arranged—'Sing unto God, O ye Nations of the Earth.' After a short solo we have another splendid chorus, and a capital arrangement of our National Anthem for four voices. Several other hymns, choruses, and solos are introduced, all of which are arranged with great taste, sweetness, and effect."—Mark Lane Express, June 30, 1851.

"This work is handsomely printed and embellished, and will doubtless be a leading feature of its kind during the gathering of the people of all Nations."—Musical and Dramatic Review.

"This work is within the compass of all players and vocalists. Its simple grandeur of style is well fitted for its comprehensive title, and will form a pleasing and appropriate musical record of the great and all-absorbing event of the never-to-be-forgotten year of 1851."—The Guardian of July 2.

"Mr. Fowle has succeeded in producing a work which will doubtless prove very acceptable to many a private family, or small party of musical friends."—Pool and South Western Herald.

NOW PUBLISHING, BY SUBSCRIPTION, HANDEL'S ORATORIO,

BELSHAZZAR,

ARRANGED for the Organ or Pianoforte with Vocal Score), folio, price 21s. Single Pieces Now Ready—Overture, 1s.; Recit. and Air, Thou God Most High, 2s.; Chorus, Behold, by Persia's Hero, 2s.; Recit. and Air, Opprest with never ceasing Grief, 1s. 6d.; Air, O Sacred Oracles, 1s. 6d.; Recit. and Air, Thus saith the Lord, 1s. 6d.; Chorus, Sing, O ye Heavens, 2s. 6d.; Air, O God of Truth, 2s. Orchestral Accompaniments and Single Chorus Parts—Principal Violino Primo, 10s. 6d.; Ripieno ditto ditto, 5s.; Principal Violino Secondo, 10s. 6d.; Ripieno ditto ditto, 5s.; Principal Viola, 10s. 6d.; Ripieno ditto, 5s.; Principal Violoncello e Basso, 13s. 6d.; Ripieno ditto, 5s. Wind Parts—Fluting, Vocal Parts—Treble, 5s.; Alto, 4s. 6d.; Tenor, 5s.; Bass, 4s. 6d.

Now Publishing, THE LONDON PSALMIST, on a new and improved principle; containing a collection of the best Psalmody harmonised for Four Voices, with an arrangement for the Organ or Pianoforte, by A. J. S. MOXLEY, Organist of St. Paul, Covent Garden (edited by JOSEPH SURMAN, Founder of the Exeter Hall Oratorio, and Conductor of the London Sacred Harmonic Society), with the words of Thirty-three Psalms and Hymns. The Rev. W. J. Hall's selection. The work to be complete in Sixteen Parts, One Shilling each. Parts 1 to 14 are now ready.

London: 9, Exeter Hall, Strand, and Sold by Messrs. Longman and Co., Paternoster Row, and all Music and Booksellers. Persons wishing to have the Music as performed by the London Sacred Harmonic Society, should order Surman's Exeter Hall Edition. Office, No. 9, in Exeter Hall.

HERR KENIG

HAVING DISSOLVED PARTNERSHIP with Mr. PASK, is now attached only to the Firm of JULLIEN and Co., Sole Agents for all Brass Instruments manufactured by Réson and Courtisols, of Paris. Lists of prices forwarded on application. The best Cornet à Pistons by either of the above makers may be obtained for £8 8s. 214, Regent-street.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

M. JULLIEN'S ANNUAL SERIES OF CONCERTS, MONDAY, NOVEMBER 10TH, 1851.

M. JULLIEN has the honour to inform the Nobility, Gentry, and Public, that his Annual Series of Concerts will commence on Monday, November 10th. In announcing the Series of Concerts for 1851, M. JULLIEN begs to assure his numerous Patrons that his endeavours are still constant to enlist in the service of these Annual Entertainments the most renowned Executants of Instrumental Music, and thus, while ensuring an Orchestra the ensemble of which is totally unrivalled, he is enabled to present to his Audiences some of the greatest Musical Celebrities in Europe. M. JULLIEN, in carrying out these views, has entered into Engagements with

SIGNOR SIVORI, SIGNOR PIATTI,
AND SIGNOR
BOTTESINI.

The Success of the two first-named Artists, at a former Series of M. JULLIEN'S Concerts, is too well known to need comment—Signor Bottesini, however, will perform at them for the First Time; the nature of the Engagement of the great Contrabassist securing his exclusive services. The appearance of Signor Bottesini at the various Concerts of the past extraordinary Season, created a sensation in the Musical Circles of the Metropolis, as well as among the numerous Continental Musicians then assembled in London, but very rarely excited by an Instrumental Performer; in fact, Musicians and Amateurs, as well as the Public Press, universally regarded the success of this young Artist as alone equalled by that of the great Paganini.

THE ORCHESTRA

Will be complete in every respect, and include the following celebrated Solo Performers:—

BAND, BIZETH, COLLINET,
COOPER,
CROZIER, DEFOLLY, DELOFFRE,
DOYLE,
FRELO,
GODFREY, HANDLEY,
HARPER, T.,
HARPER, C.,
HOLT,
HOWELL,
JANZA,

JARRETT, KÖNIG, KREUTZER,
LAVIGNE,
LAZARUS,
LUTGEN, MORI,
PAYNE,
PHILLIPS,
PIATTI,
PILET, PRATTEN, SONNENBERG, THIRLWELL,
VOGEL, WINTERBOTTOM.

Conductor—M. JULLIEN.

Principal Cornet-a-Pistons, HERR KÖNIG, who, being exclusively engaged by M. JULLIEN during the whole year, can only be heard in his Concerts.

Several of the Instruments, to which were awarded the Council Medals at the Great Exhibition, having been purchased by M. JULLIEN, they will be introduced during the Concerts.

Notwithstanding that Instrumental Music has always been the special characteristic of M. Jullien's Concerts, he has, as during former Seasons, secured the services of an eminent Vocalist, and, this year, he has made an engagement with

MISS DOLBY,

Who will appear on the OPENING NIGHT.

The repertoires of M. JULLIEN, already one of vast extent, will, this season, be increased by the addition of several most important Works of the Great Masters. M. JULLIEN has also arranged a GRAND

Selection from Mozart's celebrated Opera, "IL FLAUTO MAGICO,"

And another from

Beethoven's Grand Work, "FIDELIO."

Among the lighter portions of the Music will be presented, the new Waltzes, Polkas, and Quadrilles, which M. JULLIEN, last year, had the distinguished honour of composing for Her Majesty's State Balls, and also, several entirely new Pieces, composed expressly for the present Series of Concerts, among which will be found

THE INDIAN QUADRILLE,

COMPOSED ON EAST INDIAN MELODIES,

And Exhibiting the peculiar characteristics of the Instruments of the Native Indians used in their Dances, Festivals, Sports, Wars, Religious Ceremonies, &c.

THE DECORATION of the Promenade will be ENTIRELY NEW; and the whole Theatre well Warmed and Ventilated.

THE GRAND CRYSTAL CURTAIN WILL ALSO BE EXHIBITED,

THE READING ROOM

Will contain Six well-lighted Reading Tables, on which will be found Six London Morning Papers, Three Evening Papers, Twenty-three Weekly Papers, and Twenty Provincial Papers; besides the Irish, Scotch, German, American, Italian, Swiss, Dutch, Indian, Chinese, Australian, New Zealand, Malta, Portuguese, Ionian, Canadian, Belgian, and Spanish Newspapers, Magazines, and other Periodicals.

The Refreshments will be provided by Mr. G. PAYNE, and be of the best quality and at the most moderate Prices.

The Concerts will on each Evening commence at Eight, and terminate at Eleven o'clock.

Prices of Admission:—Promenade, Boxes, and Galleries, One Shilling. Dress Circle, 2s. 6d.; Private Boxes, 10s. 6d., 21s., and 31s. 6d. Places, and Private Boxes may be secured on application to Mr. O'Reilly, at the Box-Office of the Theatre, which is open from Ten till Five; Private Boxes also at Mr. Mitchell's; Mr. Sims's; Messrs. Leader and Co.'s; Mr. Chappell's; Messrs. Cramer, Baple, and Co.'s; Messrs. Campbell, Ransford, and Co.'s; Mr. C. Olivier's; and at Jullien and Co.'s Establishment, 214, Regent Street.

N.B.—The Theatre being Let at Christmas for Dramatic Performances, the Concerts can continue for One Month only.

Printed and Published for the Proprietor by MICHAEL SAMUEL MYERS, of No. 3, Studdley Villa, Studdley Road Clapham Road, in the parish of Lambeth, at the office of MYERS & Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, in the parish of St. Paul, where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed, post paid. To be had of G. Parkes, Dean Street, 8-ho; Allen, Warwick Lane; Vickers, Holywell Street, and at all Booksellers.—Saturday, November 8, 1851.

The Musical World.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s.; Half year, 8s.; Three Months, 4s.; (Stamped Copies 1s. per Quarter extra, payable in advance, to be forwarded by Money Order, to the Publishers, Myers & Co., 22, Tavistock-st., Covent Garden).

No. 46.—VOL. XXIX.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 1851.

Price Fourpence.
Stamped Fivepence.

THE ITALIAN OPERA IN PARIS.

RENTREE OF SOPHIE CRUVELLI.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Paris, Thursday.

I have only time to write you a few lines about this very interesting and important event, which came off on Tuesday night. As you have been, from first to last, the staunch and enthusiastic advocate of Sophie Cruvelli, you will be pleased to hear that all you predicated in her favour has been more than verified in Paris. Three weeks repose in the bosom of her family, at her native town of Bielefeld, in Westphalia, have restored her energies, invigorated her health, and enabled her to show herself—what you have all along declared her to be—the greatest dramatic singer of the day. I shall not enter into any description either of the performance or the sensation produced on Tuesday night. They beggar description. Suffice it, that Sophie Cruvelli, by one effort, has resuscitated the Opera Italien which was “on its last legs.” If Mr. Lumley be not the luckiest man in the world, he ought to be. He has found another Jenny Lind, at a moment of imminent danger. Barbieri Nini, I regret to say, has been a failure, and the Theatre Italien was gradually being deserted, when a champion comes forth in the form of a young, gifted, and lovely girl—a German, not an Italian—and holds up the shield of genius in its defence. Nothing can resist her. She appears as Norma the Druidess, and with one gesture, one glance, one regard, lays the whole audience at her feet. You do not want an account of Norma, much less of Cruvelli's Norma. It is enough to sum up with the assurance, that so great and complete a triumph was never before achieved on the boards of the French Italian Opera. For the present I shall conclude with the following literal translation of a short paragraph from the glowing pen of Fiorentino, which immediately followed the night of the representation, in anticipation of his feuilleton in the Constitutionnel:

“OPERA ITALIEN.—We have at last a veritable Italian Theatre. The success which Mlle. Cruvelli has just obtained in Norma has surpassed the expectations of her most fanatical admirers. The formulas of eulogy have been so unhappily lavished, that we can only supplicate those who were not present at the performance to believe that what we announce is no more nor less than the cold and exact truth: None of the artistes who have preceded Sophie Cruvelli in this great part—Malibran and Pasta included—ever reached so high a degree of inspiration. Never was voice of more prodigious extent, of more admirable quality, of more irresistible attraction, placed at the disposition of more burning passion, or of greater dramatic genius. Tragedian as great as Rachel, cantatrice incomparable and unique, Mlle. Cruvelli realises in Norma the ideal of the art. At each phrase, at each gesture, at each burst, the public rose en masse, bounded with surprise and delight, and covered with incessant plaudits the voice of the singer. The performance was interrupted several times, and Mlle. Cruvelli was compelled to retire to the back of the stage to wait until the acclamations had subsided. We will not speak of the recalls, bouquets, and other such ordinary manifestations, which might have been dispensed with on such an occasion, since they only served to recal the too frequent abuse of them in honor of commonplace mediocrity. Enough that it was one of the most irreproachable representations, and one of the most complete we ever witnessed. We shall return, as may well be believed, to this memorable soirée, which opens a new era to the Italian Opera, at the very moment when its clat appeared to be fading, and its fortune to be on the decline.”

In my next I shall enclose the articles of the chief feuilletonists. Meanwhile all Paris is in extacies, and, perhaps, never was opinion so unanimously enthusiastic in praise of an artist. It is unnecessary to add that I agree with the general opinion, being not a less warm, though a much less eloquent advocate than yourself, of the genius and endowments of Sophie Cruvelli.

JULLIEN'S CONCERTS.

JULLIEN is the Grand Master of the ceremonies to the winter season. He is the Usher of the White Rod, and yearly proffers invitation to our hybernal festivities. He is the titanic porter of the Temple of Music, who turns the key, and lets in the world to enjoyment. Without Jullien we should have no veritable season. His loss would be, as it were, unsuppliable, irremediable. The public, deprived of Jullien at this period of the year, would become a moping, melancholy, disappointed, and maimed public, having, so to speak, one eye plucked out of their recreations, one ear cut off from their diversions. But Jullien and the public will, we trust, for many years to come, shake hands in brotherhood, and exhibit unnumbered interchanges of good feeling. Jullien will still prove himself the Napoleon of eaterers, and the public will not show itself ungrateful. Jullien will demonstrate his invention and research, and the public will subscribe to his genius. Jullien will provide novelties and wonders, and the public will roar and pay.

We are going to write down a used-up phrase—but what can we do? No new words can express so forcibly the truth. Were a going to say, that the largest audience ever congregated within the walls of Drury Lane assembled on Monday night—the opening night of Jullien's Concerts—and that the theatre was crowded to suffocation. This is neither true nor original. We have occasionally seen the theatre as crowded, and there was no "suffocation," if we except one short fat man in the pit, who fainted in the arms of a policeman, and was carried to an oystershops in Russell Street, borne on a back door with a bolt in it. If we say that Drury Lane was chock full (or, choke full, to save disputation), and that nearly 7000 people were crammed and jammed together in the theatre, we shall convey no very indifferent notion of the state of affairs.

The interior of the house has undergone but little change. The decorations of the promenade are, however, new, and exceedingly simple and chaste. They consist of plain white and gold, with single wreaths of flowers very tastefully disposed. Mr. Frederick Gye has an excellent eye for effect, and he has seldom exhibited a nicer feeling for arrangement and contrast than on the present occasion. The magnificent, fairy-like, and unique crystal curtain still hangs its glittering splendours between the stage and the front of the house, and adds greatly to the appearance of the theatre. The arrangements in the reading-room are on the same gigantic scale as before, and Mr. G. Payne provides bodily condiments for such as eschew the more attenuated refreshments of music.

The orchestra is, perhaps, the finest and most complete which Jullien has yet brought together. All the players of note and merit in London are retained, and one or two has been drafted from the Continent to fill up a "toom" space, which could not otherwise be well supplied. The following is a list of the solo performers:—Baumann, Baker, Band, Cioffi, Collinet, Cooper, Defolly, Deloffre, Doyle, Frelon, Godfrey, Handley, Harper, T. Harper, C. Holt, Howell, Janza, Jarret, König, Kreutzer, Lavigne, Lazarus Lutgen, Mori, Piatti, Prospero, Pilet, Phillips, Sonnenberg, Thirlwell, and Vogel.

This alone would constitute a strong phalanx, but it makes little more than a third of the band. Herr Janza, who leads the second violins, is the Viennese artist, of whom, some weeks since, we introduced a memoir in the Musical World. He is a first-rate player and a distinguished musician. We are pleased to see M. Baumann at his old post in Jullien's troupe; although Mr. Winterbottom, his successor, the last two seasons, was far from being an inefficient substitute. M. Remusat is first flute, and a better selection could hardly have been made. In short the band is nearly perfect at every point, the cymbals alone being objectionable on the score of pitch.

M. Jullien's phalanx had a glorious opportunity of exhibiting their power and capability in the grand overture to Leonora, which in some respects was better played than we ever heard it. Jullien conducted the overture admirably and did not allow a single point to be lost. The few bars for the trumpet, introduced with such magical effect, were played to perfection by König, and made a distinct feature in the performance. The band were also heard to great advantage in the andante to Mendelssohn's third symphony, and the andante from Beethoven's symphony in D, both of which were delightfully given and immensely applauded. Previous to the Leonora overture, with which the concert virtually commenced, there were two demonstrations of popular feeling; one when Jullien appeared on the platform, and one, when "God save the Queen" being called for was played by the whole strength of the band. Jullien was received with deafening cheers, as was also Her Majesty, who though absent was musically present, and the feeling popular and the feeling loyal contested for mastery. For the sake of loyalty and gallantry we are glad to announce that the Queen had a trifle the best of the conductor.

Beside the pieces named, the programme included a new quadrille, composed by Jullien on themes from Il Prodigio, an excellent set, and sure to become popular, concluding with the celebrated "Pas des Poignards;" Jullien's "Crystal Fountain Polka," first time of performance at the concerts; "Marianette," a valse by König (first time in public); and several old friends, among whom we may name the exciting, brilliant, and overpowering "Great Exhibition Quadrille," which terminated the first part with a perfect furor and gave rise to a double encore for "God save the Queen," and a demand for "Rule Britannia," amid a noise like the roaring of ten thousand buffaloes in amorous season.

The grand feature of the evening, however, was the performance of Signor Bottesini, which produced as powerful a sensation on the audience as ever we remember to have witnessed in any theatre by any performer. Bottesini is the instrumental wonder of his age. He has been well styled the Paganini of his instrument, and is, no doubt, as perfect a performer on the contra-basso as his illustrious countryman was on the fiddle. It is quite impossible to conceive the absolute mastery which Bottesini holds over this most unwieldy of instruments: nor how he awakens from its massive strings those exquisitely delicate and fluty tones, which would seem born of a silver thread spun to the fineness of a hair; nor how he runs up and down, as it were, miles of lines with the rapidity of the electric telegraph, and never deviates in his intonation, the note being true as a tuning-fork; nor many other things which seem impossible, and which are impossible to all but himself. But if Bottesini's sway over the contra-basso be marvellous, if his execution be "perfect as conjecture," his beauties are not confined to mechanical wonders and sleight of art or artifice. Bottesini can play a simple air as Miss Stephens or Alboni would sing it, without ornament or alloy and produce a greater effect than any body else by aid of lace-work and embroidery. Who that has heard Bottesini sing, not play, the "D'un pensiero" in his Sonnambula fantasia but must have felt the same emotions as when listening to a Malibran or a Cruvelli! We shall not dwell upon the effect Bottesini produced on his audience on Monday night. It was prodigious, and truly unparallelled.

Miss Dolby, who was received with great fervour, introduced "Nobil Signor" from the Huguenots, and the Scotch song "Bonnie Dundee." Both were given with the fair singer's peculiar charm, and the first encored. Miss Dolby is a great favourite and deservedly so. She has a most beautiful voice and sings like a true musician.

The opening night augurs well for Jullien's concert season. Bottesini is a grand eard, and will be sure to draw thousands to the theatre. Indeed, no one should miss the opportunity of hearing the unrivalled contra-bassist. Miss Dolby will also prove a great attraction, but we would advise her, with deference, to adhere more to simple ballads, or arias of the non-bravura character, which none can sing better than herself, and leave Meyerbeer's cavatinas to their proper home, the stage. We never admired vastly "Nobil Signor," even when Alboni sang it on the stage, and have no great affection for it off. There are songs of Mozart for which Miss Dolby's pure and delicious voice is far better suited.

The performances have been varied nightly, but we must postpone our notice of the novelties until next week, having already devoted a large space to one performance. It is enough to say that a new Grand Quadrille, called "The St. Leger Day," has been produced; also a new walse, called "La Prima Donna," and "The Bloomer's Quadrille" (new); and the "Indian Quadrille," is announced for next week, full particulars of which will be given in our next.

NATIONAL ENGLISH OPERA.

(From an occasional Contributor.)

Having been absent from town some little time, I have not had my weekly opportunity of reading your clever little paper, but feeling interested in the subject-matter of several letters you published a short time since, on the formation and establishment of a National Opera, I set myself down on this thoroughly November day, to scan briefly over the feasibility of such a proposal with reference to existing circumstances, and to offer a few remarks as to what I conceive to be essential before we can entertain even a bare hope of ultimate success.

If the permanent establishment of an English Opera be in this age something more than a myth, there is but one way to set about it, and that one way is fraught with many serious and complicated difficulties. The success (or I should perhaps more correctly say the existence) of two Italian houses, does not at this present moment afford the slightest criterion of a similar result in a national undertaking—I say at this present moment, for tastes do alter and appetites vary, but where music is concerned, seldom at the instant. Unfortunately for our native products, we cannot in this damp atmosphere, make up our minds to turn fashion adrift, even in matters where she is positive destruction to our better feeling and judgment; and this is especially palpable, when our own lyric genius and industry is brought into question. Again, in the first setting such a scheme on foot, there are of necessity so many cross purposes to battle with, so many divers tastes and wills to consult, and in many instances how to, such dangerous heads to conciliate, so much of popularity to make, and so very much of injustice and absolute malice to encounter, that unless a tolerably fair field be given, and hand joined in hand to effect a safe launch, the permanent establishment of a National Opera will never in my life time be ought but a name. It is in vain to hope for anything lasting, unless at the very onset there be constituted, what may be termed a musical republic—not in management forsooth! nothing could possibly be worse than that—but in a powerful co-operation of our leading English composers and artists, in a strong and united endeavor to place the advancement of native talent on a better and surer footing (it cannot by any manner of means be in worse plight than at present), and to make English music and English musicians what they should be, in a country which already boasts of, with much reason, the greatness and excellence of its many national institutions. For my own part, I am, under a few restrictions, a staunch musical protectionist, and shall continue to be so, until I can discover some shew of justice towards the home article. I have no personal objection to either Italians, Germans, or Frenchmen. I respect their talent, and enjoy it thoroughly. I delight in the two great rival houses, but I faint must mourn over the aggrandisement and fame of an enormous body of aliens to the utter exclusion and ruin of my gifted compatriots, who are alas! for bread and butter's sake, compelled at times to drag at fashions' tail, ay, even to twist plain Mr. into Signor, and tack an harmonious vowel to the harsh final consonant of their English surnames. Sir Charles Coldstream "et hoc genus omne," make take snuff, and yawn at the idea of there being such a commodity as indigenous musical talent amongst us Britishers, but nevertheless there it is, lying about, and only waiting to be picked up; talent that does not surely possess the mighty aids of rank, fortune, or fashion, that very "Gamp" of the age, but talent nevertheless. On this point we need be under no apprehension, we have so far little of the right elements to commence our work, but much, very much of good support from those, whose love of the science, means, and position in society, should make them lean with sympathy towards a class of men, who are their brethren, both in country and in art. Nor can we conceal from ourselves, how disagreeable a difficulty we have to meet, in the want of good union and friendship that exists amongst the profession, for without some such bond, I am firmly convinced success is impossible. And this is strange enough, for they, upon whom this last issue is so materially dependant, are those who are in every way interested in the well-doing of this enterprise, as much I trust for the honour and glory of the art they represent, as for the better filling of their mouths and pockets. It is however on this rock I fear our ship will run foul, if not split, for I do not hesitate to affirm, and I will arraign the profession as my witnesses, that as there is on the one hand a greater amount of talent in the body of English musical artistes, than in most other callings; so there is assuredly, on the other, a much larger sum of jealousy, ingratitude, hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness. There is a total want of sympathy amongst them, the very reverse of a disposition to lean tenderly to one another's failings, the success of the one is bitterness to the other, the advancement of one member a sure card to generate the envy and ill will of his neighbour. As in every case so in this; there are many happy exceptions, but take the profession en masse, their want of goodfellowship is a proverb, even amongst themselves. But I must not be misunderstood. I do not say, nor do I think, the unity we ought so much to covet is impossible. If it be so, I do believe, as I said before, the permanent establishment of a National Opera is also impossible, at all events at this present time. It is fatal to allow ourselves to be influenced by the success attendant on foreign opera houses or theatres. They are set fairly afloat. We have not as yet stirred one foot from our moorings. The skilful guidance of a vessel out of port, which is surrounded by rocks and shoals, and the direction of it in smooth water, when past all immediate danger, are two very different things. Our undertaking just now presents no feature in common with other establishments. We have nearly everything to make, with scarcely anything at hand. Our difficulties soar one above the other; powerful rivalry, prejudice, and a host of evil spirits, will do their worst to foil us, and our only chance is to make ourselves fully aware of the danger, and to meet it steadily and boldly. We may be as hopeful and earnest as possible, but without screening one iota of the true state of our position, and when we examine the one sheet that exhibits the possibility of gain, we must instantly turn to the other, that sets forth the possibility of loss. There are scores of males and females, who as Puff shrewdly remarks, "never take the trouble of judging for themselves." These characters will require much to persuade them, an English throat may perchance warble full as sweet as an Italian's, or that they are very wrong indeed to constitute fashion their Queen, in place of their subject. When we can then fully appreciate our present position, understanding how mainly dependant we are one upon the other, we shall have made a grand step towards maturing, at all events, the preface of our work, and a good preface is very often half the battle. But if on the other hand, Mr. Second Violin Jones, is to put on his war paint, and brandish a tomahawk because Mr. Second Violin Smith is to play two desks higher than himself; if Mr. Double Bass Stiggins refuses to play under Double Bass Wiggins, and in accepting two pounds ten shillings per week, insists, that it is "position" he only cares for, and "position" he must have at any sacrifice; if, in fine, we are all preparing to stickle for this, that, and the other, and run counter to everybody who does not entertain the exact views we ourselves hold, it will be better, far better, for the profession, and the public at large, to leave posterity the task of supplying, what is now supposed by some, and denied by others, to be a desideratum.

The possibility of obtaining a government grant for the formation and support of a National Lyric Establishment has I believe been mooted more than once, but I cannot remember that the subject has ever as yet been placed in its proper light, before proper persons, that is to say, before those whose rank and influence qualify them to advance matters. We have seen within the last few years, a vast and cumbrous pile erected at a prodigious expence for the reception of the choicest works by the greatest masters, many of which have been purchased at the price of a handsome fortune. True it is that the three sisters,—Poetry, Painting, and Music, walk hand in hand in name; but now-a-days in fact, the case is widely different, the first seems but little appreciated, and has gone sadly out of date, the second is housed and tended by a refined and polite nation; while the third, inasmuch as national character and claims are concerned, is forced to seek a crust and shelter where it may. We have institutions in plenty, but not one for the shewing forth and development of English musical genius. I do not give a thought to the Royal Academy, for wherein is the use of instruction, if the fruits of that instruction cannot be made manifest. The Royal Academy of Painting is another affair altogether. In the case of talent, that institution may be but the stepping stone to the adjoining rooms, and whether it prove so or not, matters but little to the man of genius and industry. His fame is reaped, and money paid year by year. In musical matters England neither does herself credit nor us justice. She shews forth her national love, by importing whole shoals of foreign singers, fiddlers, dancers, and actors, by expending enormous sums, not in supplying their wants, but in pandering to their luxuries, and very often vices, and by discarding the claims of those who only rightly have a claim. It is impossible to advise just now any measure, by which this most important matter of a government grant may be well and advisedly brought forward. Doubtless there are wise and experienced heads, who have the subject at heart, and who are capable of treating it. It is in my opinion one of the first features to be attended to. It must be entered upon with full consideration, and all efforts must be directed in the proper quarter. If this be done, I by no means despair of success, for I have often thought if the circumstances of the case had been placed in their true light by men of influence and position, whose love of the divine art would have made them earnest in the cause, we need not now have been speculating upon possibilities.

The choice of a head man or manager involves again no small difficulty. The proverb tells us, "In the multitude of counsellors there is wisdom," but, as far as operatic and theatrical management is concerned, there never was a graver error. There must be but one prime minister, with a good working cabinet at his elbow. The essential attributes for such a position are numerous,—diplomacy, a certain amount of musical capability (not genius, that would be dangerous), decision, prudence, shrewdness, knowledge of the world, and of theatrical matters in general, and if possible, honesty. Oliver Goldsmith's remarks on this head delivered nearly a century ago, are full as applicable at this present day. Alluding to the Italian Opera as at that time existing in London, he writes:—"However upon the whole I know not whether ever operas can be kept up in England; they seem to be entirely exotic, and require the nicest management and care. Instead of this, the care of them is assigned to men unacquainted with the genius and disposition of the people they would amuse, and whose only motives are immediate gain." There are of course men fully qualified to conduct the administration of affairs, but it is a difficult matter to put one's hand upon them, so few in this reprobate world have characters to lose, so many reputations to make.

The enormous disproportion of salaries is another principal evil. Any one acquainted with such matters must know right well what sums our principal foreign artistes are in the habit of exacting, sums that cannot fail (save in the case of the two London Operas, where subscriptions and patronage are on a grand scale) to eat up not only any profit that might accrue, but that must effectually prevent the necessary regard and attention to other not minor details. The due efficiency of conductor, orchestra, chorus, etc., being of far more consequence than the engagement of some one or two cormorant vocalists, on whom very often nature, not genius, has been lavish in her gifts.

I cite the greatest authority the world ever has, or I believe will produce, in reference to the numerical strength of an orchestra. Sixty good men and true are, I am convinced, sufficient for every purpose. We shall in this case have some chance of feeling whether the chorus are really singing, and not merely opening their mouths, a fact extremely problematical in these days of ophicleides, drums, and thunder. In regard to the chorus, much must of course depend on the works to be produced; but I would prefer a picked staff of strong choristers, men, who would sing out loud, clear, and in tune, to an overwhelming so so band. With a good working number, it would be easy, under extraordinary circumstances, to enlist extra assistance, without in any way marring the effect.

A word in conclusion on the prices of admission, which should in the first instance be simply of a remunerative character; nothing more or less. I do not suggest any particular scale, for circumstances might, of course, affect a different decision; but we may rest assured, money is well known to be money in this age of events, and where a pound was little thought of years since, a sixpence is now turned over a score of times.

I fear I have trespassed very far on your space and good humour, although I have necessarily left much unsaid I wished to say. If, perchance, you should speak to the contrary, I may resume the subject at a future period. I am satisfied the success of the undertaking in question, is, under certain circumstances, feasible; but unless it be taken in hand well and steadily, and by those who are really fit to move so important a measure, we shall but experience disappointment and loss; and inflict much injury on the exponents of a science we would fain love and cherish.

H. L. C.

THE PIANOFORTE CONTROVERSY.

Messrs Collard and Collard have sent us the following document, which we print without hesitation, as a corollary to our remarks, in a late number, on the distribution of the prize medals in the matter of Broadwood and Sons. It may be remembered that we ourselves testified to the injustice done to the Messrs. Collard, and stated that they were unanimously awarded the Council Medal by the first, or professional jury. The rescinding this verdict by the second or group jury, who were quite incapable of giving any opinion on the subject, naturally excited the indignation of the Messrs. Collard, who had every just reason to feel themselves aggrieved, and they made their protest accordingly. The document below, however, originated in the desire to set aside the erroneous impression created in the public mind by the omission of the Messrs. Collard in the first protest to the Royal Commissioners by the musical jury, all of whose names will be found appended to the protest in favour of Collard and Collard, as in the case of Broadwood and Sons, whose name alone was included in the first protest. In fact, two protests were issued by the musical jurors; the first in favour of Broadwood and Sons, the second on behalf of Messrs. Collard and Collard. Of course the latter firm was not mentioned in the first protest, but many who had read it were led to the conclusion that the musical jury awarded the Council Medal only to Broadwood and Sons. Hence the publication of the accompanying document.

PROTEST OF THE MUSICAL JURORS.

To His Royal Highness Prince Albert, K.G., President, and to the Royal Commissioners of the Great Exhibition.

May it please your Royal Highness, My Lords and Gentlemen, With reference to the memorial which the undersigned members of the Musical Jury, Class 10a, had the honour of addressing to your Royal Highness and the Royal Commissioners on the subject of the reversal or non-confirmation of their awards of the Council Medals for pianofortes at the Great Exhibition, they beg most respectfully to state, that the eminent firm of Messrs. Collard and Collard was also returned by the unanimous decision of the Musical Jury, as entitled to the Council Medal for their various improvements in pianoforte-making, and for the general excellence of their instruments. The memorialists would respectfully beg leave to impress upon your Royal Highness and the Royal Commissioners, that the arguments already adduced by them in the memorial referred to, apply with equal force to the house of Collard, which, from an early period, has been most honourably distinguished in connexion with the manufacture of the pianoforte, and whose important improvements have had a beneficial and lasting influence on this branch of our manufacture: in confirmation of which and of their own awards, the undersigned would respectfully refer your Royal Highness and the Royal Commissioners to the accompanying list of Patent Inventions which have been introduced by the house of Collard, and which, in the opinion of the memorialists, fully entitle them to the award of the Council Medal. They have the less hesitation in thus again addressing your Royal Highness and the Royal Commissioners, as they find that public opinion has already called into question both the justice and the correctness of the awards for this section of the Exhibition, recently published under the authority of the Royal Commissioners; and that the musical public in particular attach to the memorialists the responsibility of such decisions.

While the memorialists will be ever ready to defend the integrity and soundness of their own decisions, they cannot but protest against being held responsible for those of other bodies—from whose opinions they unequivocally differ, and who however competent on other subjects, have not evinced on this the requisite knowledge to justify the reversal of the decrees of those better qualified, both by professional experience and scientific acquirements, for the more effective discharge of such duties.

HENRY R. BISHOP, Knight, (Chairman and Reporter),
The Professor of Music at the University of Oxford.

DR. SCHAFHAUTL, Commissioner from Bavaria and Juror, Member of the Royal Academie, and Professor and Head Librarian in the University of Munich.

LE CHEVALIER SIGISMOND NEUKOMM
WILLIAM STERNDALÉ BENNETT, Professor in the Royal Academy of Music and Queen's College.

CIPRIANI POTTER, Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, London.

GEORGE T. SMART, Knight, Organist and Composer of Her Majesty's Chapel Royal.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH THE ROYAL COMMISSIONERS (Copy, No. 1.)

"To His Royal Highness Prince Albert, K.G., etc., etc., President, and to the Royal Commissioners of the Great Exhibition.

"May it please your Royal Highness, my Lords, and Gentlemen,—It has been intimated to us that the jurors, consisting of eminent professors of music, appointed to make the awards for the musical section of the Exhibition, had decreed to us a first class prize in respect of our pianofortes, and, moreover, that that decision had been unanimously arrived at by that body. We also learn that another jury, termed the Group Jury, consisting mainly of non-musical members, to whom that award had been subsequently submitted, had thought proper to reverse the decision, and to assign us a prize of a secondary character.

"Assuming these reports to be authentic, we lose no time in recording our protest against this proceeding, and in stating our resolution to reject any award, but the one decreed to us by the Musical Jurors—the only tribunal recognised by the musical exhibitors, as competent to form a correct opinion of the relative merits of musical instruments, and of pianofortes in particular.

"It is not for us to canvass the propriety of inviting a body of eminent men to devote their time and their talent to the discharge of an onerous and delicate duty, and afterwards of empowering another body, incompetent by reason of their non-musical acquirements, to review and reverse their decisions; nor do we seek to obtrude the merits of our instruments, to the disparagement of those of our competitors. It is sufficient for us that a body of gentlemen, known to the world for their high character and eminent professional attainments, have done us the honour to return our names as worthy of the highest distinction, and it is satisfactory to us to feel, that their verdict has been generally concurred in by a large body of the public, among which may be cited the names of some of the most eminent native and foreign professors of the age.

"At an early period we had occasion to protest against the acts of partiality evinced in favour of a foreign competitor, by the Executive Committee, or its subordinate officers, in direct violation of the prescribed regulations,—regulations which we ourselves had most rigidly observed. Our remonstrances remained either unheeded, or received no other than a mere formal official acknowledgment; and we owe to the courtesy and friendly feeling of the Coalbrookdale Company, rather than to official justice, a position in the Exhibition for the display of our manufactures, equal to that officially conceded to our more favoured competitors, although denied to us.

"It has never been intimated to us, that it was incumbent on us to bring under the notice of the Group Jury, either the number or the character of the improvements we have introduced in our pianofortes, secured to us by patent right. Had this principle, as the ruling guide of the jurors, been promulgated (which it was not) we should have been prepared to have shown that, either for their number, or their character, or for the more recent date of introduction, our position in all these respects was in no degree subordinate to that of our competitors; but we imagined (declusively, as it would now appear) that the test of merit would alone be the intrinsic excellence of the instruments exhibited; and that due merit was accorded to us on that score, is sufficiently shown by the fact, that the unanimous verdict of the Musical Jury was in our favour.

"Feeling strongly that an act of injustice has been, perhaps unintentionally, inflicted upon us, we beg respectfully to urge that the decision of which we complain may be re-considered, with a view of securing to us the award, to which, after the decision of the Musical Jurors, we feel we are justly entitled; or we would respectfully request to be heard before any competent tribunal, to substantiate our claims, not only by reason of their intrinsic merit, but by our numerous patent inventions, all of which, we submit, have tended as much to the permanent improvement of the pianoforte as to the maintenance of the traditional superiority of England in this important branch of the industrial arts—a superiority which we fear not will still be sustained, notwithstanding the effect that may be produced by this temporary discouragement of English claims.

"We have the honour to remain,

"May it please your Royal Highness,

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"With profound respect,

"Your obedient humble servants,

(Signed)

"COLLARD AND COLLARD.

"26, Cheapside, Aug. 7, 1851."

(Copy, No. 2.)

"Exhibition Building, Hyde Park,
August 13, 1851.

"Gentlemen—I am directed by Her Majesty's Commissioners for the Exhibition of 1851 to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 7th instant, on the subject of the jury award, which you state it has been intimated to you has been made in respect of the pianofortes exhibited by you.

"In reply I am directed to acquaint you that the Commissioners have at present no official cognizance of the awards of the various juries, the whole of the proceedings of which have been strictly confidential; and they are therefore not in a position to entertain the question raised in your letter.

"I have the honour to be, Gentlemen,

"Your obedient Servant,

"EDGAR A. BOWRING, Acting Secretary.

"Messrs. Collard and Collard."

(Copy No. 3.)

"To His Royal Highness Prince Albert, K.G., etc., President, and the Royal Commissioners of the Great Exhibition.

"May it please your Royal Highness, my Lords, and Gentlemen—We have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your communication, dated the 13th inst., under the signature of your acting secretary, Mr. Bowring, informing us that, the awards of the juries not having come officially under your notice, you are not in a position to entertain the question raised in our letter.

"We trust when the decisions are brought officially under your cognizance, and it should be found that our anticipations in respect to the awards are well founded, we may not be considered unreasonable in again respectfully soliciting your attention to the facts laid before you in our letter of the 7th inst., especially as we have since learned that no less than three great medals have been awarded among the few organs exhibited; while for pianofortes, one of the staples of our commerce, and of which there are nearly two hundred specimens, contributed by upwards of one hundred exhibitors, the award has been limited to one great medal; an anomaly which, we conceive, is perfectly irreconcilable with the comparative commercial importance of the two instruments.

"We beg to tender our most respectful apologies for again trespassing on your attention, and "We have the honour to be,

"May it please your Royal Highness,

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"With profound respect,

"Your most obedient humble servants,

(Signed)

"COLLARD AND COLLARD.

"26, Cheapside, Aug. 18, 1851."

Appended to the paper is a list of the dates and particulars of patents assigned to Messrs. Collard and Collard, the period of which ranges from 1829 to 1847.

MUSIC AT MANCHESTER.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Mr. Charles Hallé's Second Classical Chamber Concert took place on Thursday the 6th. The programme was as follows:—

Part First.—Grand trio, pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, (in D, op. 70, No. 1)	Beethoven.
Scena, Der Freyschutz ,	Weber.
Grand Sonata, pianoforte (in E flat, Op. 33),	Beethoven.
Part Second.—Grand trio, pianoforte, violin, and violoncello (in E flat, op. 100),	Schubert.
Song, Nina ,	Hobbs.
Miscellaneous Selection, Pianoforte, Presto scherzando (in F sharp, minor); Lieder ohne Worte (in E major and C major, 6th book)	Mendelssohn.

Every succeeding concert of Hallé's seems greater than the last; yet to listen to such a concert as the one above given on the 6th instant, one would think it impossible to surpass it. Hallé shows his thoughtful attention to his friends and subscribers even in minor matters, for the Town Hall was not a little improved since the former occasion, by a different arrangement of the seats, by the floor being carpeted, and last, not least, by the covered part of the dome being shut out with a covering of glazed crimson calico, a manifest improvement, the performance being much more distinctly heard. The programme, as will be seen, was of first rate quality, admirably selected by Hallé to give specimens of the more choice of these compositions for chamber performance. A trio and solo sonata of Beethoven—that remarkable trio of F. Schubert, which he introduced to us last season—and a short selection, as usual, to finish with for himself on the pianoforte (not too greatly contrasted, as by a mispunctuation we were made to say of Chopin's nocturne and polonaise last concert) but greatly contrasted, and so much the more delightful on that very account. Hallé, Baetens, and Lidel were all evidently in good vein, and the opening trio was gloriously played; it was the perfection of performance in concert on three instruments, as near as we can imagine it. The allegro was so charmingly conversational, we might with very little stretching imagine the three instruments sentient beings holding a most delightful colloquy. Then the Large—again the same intimate relations—but a more subdued and serious tone is given to the converse between them, which rises by degrees into a hymnal strain of as fine harmony as ever Beethoven produced. All wound up by the presto finale into a perfect poem.

The sonata, op. 30, is a very fine one, and to say that Hallé played it, is needless; to say how he played it, is no less so. We were greatly delighted, though in especial with the minuetto and its grand motivo. Hallé made the subject to sing out from the instrument with his right hand so expressively; it was altogether a great treat.

Schubert's clever and brilliant composition was better performed than ever—all three artists seemed to glory in mastering its difficulties, and showing the trio with all its beauties to advantage. It is quite unnecessary to select one movement for any particular mention, they are all so good, differing though they do from each other; we know no trio which so well displays each instrument in every style of playing adapted to this class of composition. Schubert seems to have brought them all in, yet all are introduced appropriately, easily, and effectively; the various subjects are all melodious, and are worked up in the most provokingly, teasing, and tantalizing manner—now on one instrument, now on the other, then on the pianoforte, next in combination. But it should be heard—and by such players, nothing less—certainly no pen can do justice to it. Being so elaborate it is necessarily long, as long as a symphony, some forty minutes or so in the performance, yet the audience were interested to the last. The pianoforte selection was entirely from Mendelssohn—a presto movement in F sharp minor, and two of the songs without words from his sixth book (E major and C major), each of which was highly relished by the refined and appreciating auditory, and loudly applauded. Mr. Perring had the distinction of again being selected as the vocalist, and he proved that he was worthy of it by his performance. His first effort was a trying one, the magnificent tenor scena from Der Freischütz, "Through the forest, through the meadow," which he gave in Italian, and which we liked no better for his doing so. He sang the melody very sweetly indeed; but the impassioned and agitated movements in this difficult scena require somewhat more force and energy than nature has gifted Mr. Perring with; still he manages his voice well—never offends, and never tries to do more than he can accomplish. There is an earnestness too, and a distinctness in his expression, which renders his delivery peculiarly agreeable. His second song, Hobb's "Nina," got considerable applause—the sweet telling quality of his voice, his perfect intonation and purity of style, well deserved it. He was accompanied in both songs most ably by Mr. R. Andrews on the pianoforte. The room was well filled, and the audience seemed all delighted with this charming chamber concert.

The next concert, we see, takes place on Thursday, the 20th instant. We are glad to see that Mr. Perring is engaged for the next dress concert and ball on Monday, the 17th instant, to sing in company with Miss Birch and her sister, and Mr. H. Phillips. Our new tenor is evidently becoming a favourite in Manchester. Most inadvertently we have done injustice it seems to two clever artistes—Signori Paltoni and Stigelli, who were both in the Italian Opera Company lately here. The fact was they did not appear either of them, in the only opera we saw, viz., Lucrezia Borgia. Stigelli we never heard—but Paltoni is an old established favourite in Manchester, having been on the boards of our old Theatre Royal in Italian opera some fourteen or fifteen years ago, and we have since heard him with pleasure many a time and oft at concerts at the Free Trade Hall and elsewhere. We regret not having seen his Dulcamara and his Figaro.

On Tuesday evening last, we went to hear Balfe's ever popular and pleasing Bohemian Girl, at our Theatre Royal. Allen was the Thaddeus; Whitworth, Count Arnheim; Miss R. Isaacs, Arline; Miss S. Kenneth the Queen of the Gypsies; and Delavanti, Devils-hoof. It was a very satisfactory performance; Allen's voice shews symptoms of wear and tear, but his dramatic feeling and expression place him still at the head of all our acting tenors; the feeling and finish he infused into, "With other lips," quite made it another affair, and produced a rapturous encore. Pretty nearly the same thing may be said of the song:—

"When the fair land of Poland."

It was given with greater dramatic force than we ever heard it, especially the lines:—

"My birth is noble, unstained my crest,
As thine own, let this attest."

The encore was vociferous and unanimous. Miss Isaacs won a well merited encore for the neatness with which she gave the well known, "I dreamt that I dwelt in marble halls," and the spirit she infused into the aria with chorus, "I am the Gypsy Bride." Delavanti made a capital Devils-hoof; his make up and bye-play were excellent, and his singing very serviceable in the concerted pieces. Whitworth was most respectable as Count Arnheim, and sang well "The heart bowed down," and all the music allotted to him. With a word of praise to Miss S. Kenneth—the chorus (which were very good, especially trebles and tenor)—thanks to Mr. Anthony and band—thanks to Mr. Seymour, we must conclude. All the principals were recalled.

(From a Correspondent).—In accordance with an established rule of the society, the members of the Gentlemen's Glee Club held their usual monthly meeting on Thursday last, when we were glad to find the large room of the Albion Hotel well filled. Mrs. Sunderland, and Mr. Perring, the now resident tenor here, had been engaged in addition to the regular choir. We were never more painfully impressed with the fact that our vocal singers are sadly deceiving themselves in supposing they have a claim to rank high in this branch of art, for although this Club did at one time stand perhaps the highest in the kingdom of its class, in later years, the materiel has been gradually sinking, and we have but little hope of ever again hearing the pure glee given with all that intelligence and point which so strongly characterised the palmy days of the veteran "Daddy" of the Club, and his worthy co-mates. With this we pass on to remark that the meeting of which we are now speaking may (taking the applause of the company as a criterion) be considered more than usually successful. Mrs. Sunderland, the "people's" vocalist of the northern provinces, was never a favourite of ours. In her part singing we lose all that beautiful blending of the single voice for the effect of the whole, an absence of that sympathy which so strongly pervaded all the efforts of the clever Glee and Madrigal Union of but a few weeks past. Here this lady will always be more successful in the concert room than in the quiet glee club. Of Mr. Perring we can only say he fully justified all that we have before said of him, and his reception by this rather fastidious company was most unequivocal and complete. After supper a variety of songs and catches were given, and the hilarity of the evening considerably heightened by the introduction of Mr. Delavanti, who gave several of Hutton's songs with much humour. The series of cheap "concerts for the people," at the Free Trade Hall, are already beginning to manifest a want of novelty and variety in their schemes, although the audiences are rather on the increase than otherwise. The conductor does his best with his somewhat refractory forces, for there is no mistaking it, that the choir, altogether, this year, is not by many degrees equal to former seasons, the basses alone being good. Of the trebles it were charity to say nothing, while the tenors at all times appear as if they were "lost in a fog." This may, in part, be owing to the scenery which has been placed on the platform or orchestra, and which we are rather disposed to believe, as the two leading principals who have sung at former seasons do not now appear to be gaining in popularity, but rather the contrary, if we may judge from the reception each Monday evening, which is often of late a compliment very like "cold porridge." Miss Shaw does not possess sufficient qualification for the position she has assumed or been thrust into, we know not which. As principal soprano of these concerts, her first appearance before the public was premature and ill-judged. With young artists this is at all times a dangerous experiment, and, in the present instance, a fact only too painfully proved. Young ladies' talents are often precipitately brought before the public, and are by them indiscreetly applauded; the result is, that pride and vanity are engendered, and no further pains for improvement are deemed necessary. Mrs. Thomas does not fulfil the expectations formed of her in past seasons. We would also counsel her to abandon the shake until she has thoroughly mastered it. We feel these remarks to be due to the individuals we have commented on, and not less to the musical conductor, who must be aware that the concerts, with the exception of Messrs. Perring and Delavanti, are by no means equal to former seasons. The opening piece usually played on the organ, we would gladly sacrifice for something more in accordance with the instrument. Surely there is good organ music to be found.

* The late much respected Mr. Isherwood.

Original Correspondence.

ANDANTE AND ANDANTINO.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—The above words seem destined to inspire confusion. I sent you an article upon their relative meaning. In that article I unfortunately attributed to the two "supplements" of the "Dictionnaire de l'Academie," and to "Leveau's Dictionnaire de la Langue Française," an explanation of "Andantino" as slower than "Andante," whereas, in truth, these authorities all make it "quicker" than Andante. I soon afterwards discovered my error, and immediately corrected it in a fresh cast of the article in full time for insertion; unfortunately, instead of inserting the corrected article, you inserted the one I first sent you. In justice to you, to the public, and to myself, I desire to correct the error; and, not to occupy too much of your space, I will state how the matter stands as shortly as possible. Alberti, Lichtenthal, and the above French dictionaries, make Andantino quicker than Andante, and Messrs. Merou and Lafage very peremptorily maintain the same opinion. These latter gentlemen, however, state that many composers (beaucoup de Compositeurs) use "Andantino" to express a slower time than "Andante." I find also in Clementi's Gradus ad Parnassum, Andantino expressly given as slower than Andante; and there can be no higher authority. I also must mention to you the "Andantino Sostenuto Cantabile" in Mozart's fourth Stanza for pianoforte and violin, in E flat (Pleyel's edition), which from its character cannot possibly (I think) be meant to be played faster than Andante. Lastly, I would speak of the words themselves. Andante, from Andare to go, signifies an onward movement, and its diminutive Andantino must signify a diminution of that onward movement; in other words a slower time, just as Allegretto, diminutive of Allegro, signifies a slower time than Allegro; and Larghetto, a diminutive of Largo (which signifies a slow time) signifies a quicker time than Largo. In Beethoven's third trio, opera 1, in C minor, marked Andante, part of the movement is marked piu Andante, and this is always played, as it ought to be, faster than the other part of the movement. Now if piu Andante signifies faster, the diminutive must signify meno Andante, that is slower.

In this so widely spread difference of understanding, we can therefore only form the best opinion in our power of what a composer meant by Andantino; but I think I have shewn that the true sense of Andantino must mean a slower time than Andante; at the same that there are many good authorities for this, its proper meaning.

I have been driven to more repetition than I could wish, but I wish to do my best to put the matter on its true footing.

I am, Sir,

Your obedient servant,
AN OLD AMATEUR.

Nov. 11th, 1851.

GREGORIAN CHANTS.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

DEAR SIR,—To commence where I left off last week. Those who volunteered to expound the means of effecting the purification and elevation of church music, instead of urging on the attention of the clergy the propriety of studying music in its present advanced and improved state, and so entitling themselves to willing recognition as the "chief musician" in their churches—those rather to advocate a depression of the highest standard of church music; a course which, while it rendered a knowledge of "the science" of music more easy of attainment, certainly lessened its value when acquired, and scarcely entitled its possessor to the distinction of chief musician in the old spirit, whatever it might do in regard to the mere form. The Gregorian Chants offered the most appropriate materials wherewith to commence the work of musical retrogradation. And most cleverly was the commencement made, too. The said chants were raked out, and plausible pretexts invented, on which to justify their revival, and to urge their acceptance by the laity. They were said to be essentially "the people's song"—"the birth-right of the people"—and so forth; and most particularly that they were far easier to sing than any other kind of chant.* This solicitation to see "the rights of the people" restored to them, and their "ease and comfort" studied, took immediately in some quarters. The disinterestedness of the ultra high church clergy was highly extolled, and an eager desire to accept their suggestion exhibited accordingly.

But how have matters turned out? Were the clergy acting with the singleness of heart, for the interest of "the people," as they affected to be? By no means. A return to those chants—so particularly suited to uncultivated voices and uncultivated ears—was said to be made for "the people's" sake; although it is well known that such voices and ears exist to a greater extent among the clergy themselves than among any other class of men whatever. But the ruse was not perceived by many; and some of the laity were induced to consent to the introduction of those chants.

This being done, the real design of the movement now began to appear. The clergy were able to sing these chants, and by doing so, were made to appear as the leaders of the voices of the congregation. Here the first step was gained by the party towards their real object, the establishment of an ecclesiastical "chief musicianship." The next thing was the announcement that the reciting note of the chant had no fixed pitch, but might be raised or lowered as might be found most convenient to "the priest and people." So now it came out that the voice of the people, whose comfort had been, it was pretended, so much consulted, was now liable to be dragged to all parts of the gamut, according as "the priest's" voice might be high alto or deep bass. If they could not follow him they might hold their tongues: all was being done for the comfort and convenience of—the people. So much for ecclesiastical "disinterestedness." It is not many months since I heard a "priest" in the fullness of his zeal and musical innocence, start a Gregorian Chant on a note which he afterwards found he himself could not sustain; so in the course of a few short verses he was obliged to lower the pitch of the reciting note gradually to the extent of a fourth. The voice of "the people"—which latter were in the full enjoyment of their "rights" and privileges—was also dragged down to the same extent by the assistance of their chief musician.

At the present time the leaders of the movement are busily engaged in exhuming medieval hymn tunes, equal in sublimity, it is said, to the Gregorian Chants, which is excessively possible. These products from "the diggings" in Missals and Breviaries will be attempted to be forced on the acceptance of "the people," accompanied, no doubt, by the customary professions of "disinterestedness;" but before professed musicians lend their aid to forward the success of this second step towards the entire degradation of the music of the church, it will be well for them to take a lesson from the past, and consider what may be the probable consequences of the success of the scheme about to be submitted to them, in common with the laity generally.

When the medieval hymn tunes are accepted, the magnificent corales of the Reformed Church will be condemned. In the same manner that the Gregorian Chants were intended to supersede the best Anglican Chants, the medieval hymn tunes are designed to supplant our glorious Protestant psalm tunes; and those who give their assistance to the revival of what was at the Reformation by general act laid aside, will be but hastening this consummation.

Then observe what may follow. Gregorian Chants being the productions of a Pope, and the medieval hymns of priests, it may then be said that the best church music is admitted to be that composed by ecclesiastics. And this assertion may, perhaps, be backed up by the professional recognition of competent but unwary organists:

* The question concerning the transposition of the Gregorian Chants, and other matters connected with them, can be discussed at a future opportunity.

Here will be the first clear claim for ecclesiastical chief musicianship. Next, music being carried back a thousand years, and the rules of "the science" once again reduced to a primitive state, and capable of mastery by those of the smallest aptitude, here will be a chance for a second claim for ecclesiastical musicianship.

In a word, church music will again be placed in the same shackles which for so many centuries utterly checked its progress. The priesthood of the middle ages, if they kept music at a stand still, yet cultivated it to the extent it then reached. The English priesthood of the present day are doing nothing of the kind. They will not recognise the precedent set by Pope Gregory, although they acknowledge him in another way by accepting his chants.

Until the clergy of the Church of England, then, by principles entirely different from those they are now pursuing, entitle themselves to the distinction which they as a body have the ambition but not the attainments, still less the "spirit" to attain, there is no sort of reason why the laity should entrust the entire regulation of the music of the church to those who at present are only prepared to abuse that power.

I am, dear Sir,
Yours very sincerely,
AN OLD CORRESPONDENT.

Nov. 12th, 1851.

BURNEY'S HISTORY OF MUSIC.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

Wisbech, Nov. 8, 1851.

SIR,—It seems I made a misstatement in saying, a few days ago, that Dr. Burney's History of Music had been recently published by Bohn. This I regret, and must apologise for it. I had seen the work announced as preparing for publication, in Mr. Bohn's advertisements, and concluded it had appeared accordingly.

Yours truly,
B.

MR. BRINLEY RICHARDS AND HIS WELSH MELODIES.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—I have been in the habit of teaching, for a few years back, a selection of Welsh melodies, arranged by Mr. B. Richards; I sent to town a few days ago for a fresh supply to a music seller, when to my surprise he sends me the same airs, newly arranged by the same composer, but totally different in every way.

It must prove a serious detriment to the music publishers of both sets of Welsh melodies, besides being a subject of annoyance to

Your obedient servant,

Birmingham.

A COUNTRY PROFESSOR.

P.S.—Surely Mr. Richards might have found other subjects to display his ability on, without reiterating the same tunes over again. The Principality is not so deficient of good melodies.

THE ORCHESTRAL SOCIETY.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

Brighton, Nov. 15, 1851.

SIR,—Is there no friend to the above Society to give the council some advice to prevent them from giving their last concert? They have started with the understanding that new and untried compositions were to be the features of the undertaking. I have the programme before me, and with the single exception of Mr. G. Macfarren's overture (Don Carlos), certainly a very great novelty, what new or untried work is to be heard besides? It is hoped the conçoitors are not trying to make it a society of mutual applause.

Weber's Preciosa, and Mendelssohn's symphony in A, are, no doubt, classical works, but are they unknown to the amateur and professor; while the vocal music announced to be sung has been heard for years in London, at every concert bordering on respectability. Are there not composers whose works have never been heard in London, both native and foreign, for which the amateur and professor would gladly support any society, strictly adhering to the point—that the said unheard works should have the preference to a hearing, instead of what has been performed over and over again for years back. They have made another grand mistake, charging the public 10s. 6d. for a single admission. If they mean to keep it amongst themselves, they could not go a better way to work. There is not that great difference either in talent or music, between the Orchestral Society and the Promenade Concert at Drury Lane, that should warrant them charging the public over ten times as much. If they were admitted for 2s. or 2s. 6d. (even that sum I doubt, under present circumstances, whether they would pay), it might be a helping hand towards popularizing the art in a slight degree; but considering the present state of music, it is, their charging the sum announced for admission, as bad as a baker charging 2s. 6d. for a half quartern loaf, the present price of flour under free trade considered, and I fear they have just as much chance of customers as the baker that would attempt such an extortion.

I remain, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
WELLINGTON GUERNSEY.

ANDANTE AND ANDANTINO.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—As some of your readers appear to be in a state of doubt and uncertainty as to the relative meaning of the words "andante" and "andantino," and as an "Old Amateur," in a letter betraying both learning and research, gives reasons and authorities on both sides of the question, perhaps you will allow me to suggest that when words are used as terms of art, their literal meaning, as applied to language generally, becomes quite a secondary consideration; and a word applied to art has a distinctive, and often different meaning to the same word as applied to general language; therefore references to dictionaries will generally mislead.

The word andante as applied to music, will, I think, be generally admitted to mean slow; and as it will also be admitted that andantino is the diminutive of andante, it necessarily follows that andantino means less slow, and therefore indicates a quicker movement than andante.

Even before the invention of the metronome, words of this kind were used as much to indicate the spirit and expression as the speed of the movement; and as now the use of the metronome is quite general, their meaning as the degrees of movement is altogether unimportant.

I am, Sir,
Your very obedient servant,
Newark, November 12, 1851. EDWARD DEARLE.

Reviews of Music.

"BEAUTIES OF CAMBRIA."

- No. 1. "The Live-Long Night" (Ar hyd y nos).
- " 2. "Margaret's Daughter" (Morch megyn).
- " 3. "The Ash Grove" (Llwyn onnen).
- " 4. "Sweet Richard" (Richard Melys).
- " 5. "Lady Owen's Delight" (Pleser arglwyddes owen).
- " 6. "The March of the Men of Harlech" (gor Hoffdd-gnŷr Harlech).

Arranged as Divertimentos for the Pianoforte by H. B. Richards.
Leoni Lee and Coxhead.

These six pieces belong to an entirely different class of music from that in which we ranked some compositions of Mr. Richards' in our review of last week, they being obviously designed for the purpose of bringing the beauties of Cambria within the capacity of pianoforte players at a very early stage of proficiency. To such executants they offer the attraction of the highly-esteemed national melodies, alternated and relieved with a variety of graceful passages calculated to strengthen the finger and form the taste. There is more merit in writing easy music than the world is generally willing to allow; this is proved by the fact that though we should never look for beauties in what may be properly considered as elementary works, we see not many publications of this class in which there are not faults as striking as to manifest themselves without our looking for them. The more praise is therefore due to a writer who, with the limited means to which he must prescribe himself in composing for beginners, can produce some degree of effects and avoid everything that can offend the most scrupulous criticism.

These arrangements fulfil all the purposes for which they can have been designed, and we confidently recommend them to the attention of teachers.

DEUX VALSES STYRIENNES—"Pour le Piano par W. GRILLIERS. Op. 1.

"NATIONAL MORAVIAN MARCH"—"For the Pianoforte, composed by W. GRILLIERS. Op. 2.

"THE IMPERIAL MAZURKA"—"For the Pianoforte, composed by WILLIAM GRILLIERS. Op. 3. Rüst and Stahl.

Mr. Grilliers makes a good beginning as a writer of graceful trifles in these, which the title-pages announce to be, his first publications. Op. 1 pleases us decidedly the best, but our preference of these Waltzes over the Mazurka Op. 3, we admit to be only a matter of taste, while we pronounce the March Op. 2, to be inferior to both, inasmuch as it aims at more, and accomplishes less. This young composer has evidently a natural facility for melody, and his music lies well for the instrument.

"HYMN OF PRAISE FOR ALL NATIONS"—"A Sacred Cantata for four voices, with Chorus and an Accompaniment for the Organ or Pianoforte; the words chiefly selected from the Holy Scriptures; the music by THOMAS LLOYD FOWLE. J. A. Novello.

This is also the first production of a young composer, who disarms criticism of its severity by declaring in his preface that "while he did not dare to aim at anything great, he was wishful to commemorate in as simple and pleasing a manner as he could," &c., &c. After this we of course expect not greatness; we certainly find simplicity, and we doubt not but that the work may be pleasing to some. It consists of a march, several choruses, a quartet, a duet, and a song, all of which have the characteristic of brevity. We consider the quartet, "Oh Lord save thy people," with the symphony that precedes it, as the most original part of the composition, and to us it is by far the most pleasing. Mr. Fowle has a long list of subscribers, whom he thanks gracefully in his preface, and he dedicates his Sacred Cantata to the Queen of England and all her assembled guests from the four quarters of the globe.

G. A. M.

Dramatic.

SADLER'S WELLS.—The management here is unusually active, and comedy at length seems to be in the ascendant at the theatre. Scarcely is the ink dry with which we announced the appearance of Miss Fanny Vining, a promising votress of Thalia, than we have to notice the return of Miss Fitzpatrick, the young lady who, two years ago, at Sadler's Wells, so successfully filled Mrs. Nisbett's line of characters. The play was The Love Chase, and we need say no more of Miss Fitzpatrick at present, than that she had a most gratifying reception, that she looks, plays, and dresses as well as ever—for we remember her to be an accomplished mistress of the toilet. The piece was unusually well played. Mr. Barnett is probably the best Sir William Fondlove (except Mr. Farren) that the stage at present possesses; and Mrs. Marston (now that Mrs. Glover is gone) the best Widow Green. Miss Frost was the Lydia. She is very young, exceedingly pretty, both in face and person, and, allowing for her extreme youth, evinced a graceful and delicate perception of the character.

SURREY.—From the comparatively thin houses that have attended the performance of Ernani, its production must be considered as at least a partial failure; in short, the music of Verdi—young Verdi, as the Italians call him—which was to bring another spring-tide, and actual abundance to the art, turns out to be nothing but the very sear and yellow leaf of modern Italianism. Ernani is Verdi's best opera; but if it contain fewer imitations of worthless models, and less noise and bombast than his other works, yet, like them, it leaves the imagination untouched, and the passions cold.

"We cannot blame, indeed, but we may sleep."

The exceptions to this general characteristic are few. The chief one is perhaps the little chorus in the masquerading scene, commencing the last act. This chorus is elegant and fanciful, and would make graceful dance music. The performance was excellent throughout. The mise-en-scene was admirable; and the performers being the usual ones, were, of course, as usual. The encore—the only one during the evening—of the concluding terzetto, was due less to the music than to the spirited acting of Miss Romer, who, moreover, looked exceedingly well in her bridal dress.

A new opera is advertised, and Masaniello and La Gazza Ladra are both talked of. The new piece, called Pride, or the Curse, gives occasion for some excellent acting on the part of Mr. Mead.

If the success of Ernani has been doubtful, not so that of Fra Diavolo, produced on Monday last to a house crammed to excess, a fact alike honourable to public taste, and to the spirit which can discover and foster it. The opera presented us, as usual, with Mr. Travers and Miss Poole. The gentleman obtained a loud and well-deserved encore in the popular serenade, "Young Agnes, blooming flower," the lady receiving the like honour in the song at the beginning of the second act; while her ease and nonchalance during the cavatina, in which she makes her night toilet, excited the merriment and applause of the audience. Miss Poole never forgets the histrionic side of her duties.

Midas, with its quaint old English melodies, and Miss Poole for Apollo, has been played with Ernani for the purpose, we presume, of helping on the latter to the end of the week, when, let us hope, we shall hear no more of Verdi, at least for the time to come.

Foreign.

(From our Correspondent.)

PARIS.—The much talked of engagement of Lola Montes with Mr. Barnum, has, it appears, not been concluded, as the lady in question has been dancing at several of the provincial theatres, and lately at Lyons, with considerable success. The Salut Public of Lyons publishes a warlike epistle from the Countess of Landsfeldt to Dr. Veron of the Constitutionnel, in consequence of some sarcastic remarks upon her, which appeared in his journal, in which she warns the Doctor, that in case of the attacks upon her in the Constitutionnel being continued, she will send him a challenge to fight a duel—not with the sword or pistol, but arms more familiar to him, two pills—one of them poisoned, each of the combatants to swallow one! Whether this letter be bona fide, or a pleasantry on the part of the Salut Public, we have no means of knowing, but the joke is a good one. An American journal states that the Countess has declined to being Barnumized in America, and has made an engagement with Mr. Barry of "The Broadway" New York, to appear at that theatre in the month of December. The fair Lola will dance in Paris before her departure.

LYONS, 17th October.—The Countess of Lansfeldt gave one representation here lately. She had addressed the following letter to a French newspaper:—"To A. M. Veron, editor and proprietor of the Constitutionnel. Here are two occasions, within two months, on which your journal has made me the subject of its articles. The first does not designate me by name, but the least intelligent reader can perceive that it is I who am meant, and to avoid the responsibility you stated that you had extracted it from an English journal. The English writers are not so perfidious. The second article (a Belgian counterfeit) bears no name, and for this reason I require you to insert my reply to your very ill-conceived sneers; for I know not what I have done to merit them. First, then, sir, I do not know how to swim. * * * You would be my master in politics. Second, my correspondence with high personages, * * * is worth considerably more than yours as a tragedian. Third, as to poniards or pistols, I don't know the use of them, but your journal possesses weapons still more powerful—falsehood, ridicule, and perfidy; you will let nothing pass to avenge yourself upon an unprotected woman. This is neither frank nor manly. If you continue, sir, I will see myself compelled to send you my card, with a witness, to put a stop to your contemptible animosity; but it is not to the pistol I shall appeal; I shall act in a manner more germane to such a combat. I offer to you the choice of one, I taking the other, of two pills in a box, one of which shall be poisoned; and you cannot surely refuse a duel with arms which are so familiar to you. I have the honour to salute, LOLA MONTES."

NEW YORK, October 25.—Catherine Hayes is still in Boston, and will remain there, we understand, until the end of next week, when she will return to New York. We are happy to record the fact, that the warm eulogiums bestowed upon the artistic efforts of Catherine Hayes in this city have been fully endorsed by the Providence and Boston journals; the beauties, natural and artistic, which we pointed out after her first appearance, have been dwelt, and commented on, by the most able of the Boston critics, and there is scarcely a shade of difference in the opinions set forth. In fact, the merits of Catherine Hayes, stand forward in bold relief, that it is only those that will not see, that do not acknowledge them. Those who cavil, have to cavil upon hair-breadths, and pin's-points, or are obliged to manufacture, for the occasion, some new rule of art, by which to condemn a fault that does not exist.

There are many of our great critical authorities who have a fit of indigestion if they cannot pick some great or little hole in the artist's coat; and this very tendency to spleen, which they mistake for critical acumen, generates a dissatisfaction in their own minds, which is invariably, and very generously, put down to the credit of the artist. Most of the slashing articles which are remarkable for every thing but justice, originated in this way, and should therefore be read with considerable suspicion. Boston has, we understand, one grumbler, who can see nothing good in Catherine Hayes, or any of her party. Well, New York had several unbelievers in the first instance, but, one by one they retired from their hostile position, and eventually yielded to the fascination, which, in verity they could not resist, and acknowledge that power of truth and nature by which Catherine Hayes sways the multitude. Besides, the public voice is omnipotent, and though one voice may turn the popular tide, if it speak truths, palpable truths, it effects nothing, talk it never so loud, if it be raised only in the spirit of cavil, and contrary to fact. The public voice is with Catherine Hayes, and that is certain success, and the best kind of success; for so long as the principle is not vicious it will teach and delight thousands, while the ultra-purist in art will only influence the smallest possible minority.

The concerts of Catherine Hayes in Boston have been crowded to the utmost by the elite of the city, and the pecuniary result has, we have no doubt, been satisfactory in the highest degree. In Providence the rush for tickets was immense; every seat in the hall was occupied, and high prices were paid for standing-room. So great was the impression made by her singing, that a repetition of the concert was unanimously demanded, and Mr. J. H. Wardwell announced to the public assembled, that Miss Hayes would repeat her concert in Providence at the earliest possible moment. Catherine Hayes' success in this country is a settled fact; there is nothing to stay her triumphant course from Maine to Georgia. We wish her all possible success; we have taken a lively interest in her career from the first moment she came to the country, and it is pleasant to find our impressions confirmed and our prognostications verified.

Messrs. Augustus Braham and Herr Mengis have been received by our Boston friends, with much more kindness and consideration, than was awarded them in this city. In Boston they have been judged by their merits and not by comparison.

We understand that Catherine Hayes will appear at Tripler Hall, on Monday, November 8th, that she will only give two or three concerts before proceeding to Philadelphia and Baltimore. It was rumoured, and we hoped and believed, that she was to appear, positively, in opera, in the latter part of November, or the 1st of December, but judging from appearances, there is little prospect of so rich a treat. We fear that her operatic greatness will remain as a sealed book to us.

MADAME THILLON.—Niblo's has been crowded to excess and the plaudits bestowed upon Madame Thillon, have been not merely the formal recognition of the presence of genius, but the warm and spontaneous effusions of the heart. Mr. Niblo, who deserves infinite credit for his shrewdness in effecting an engagement with this "bright, particular star," desires to obtain from her an immediate re-engagement; but her previous arrangements made for Philadelphia, Baltimore, and other cities, preclude the possibility of a New York audience having her again for some time to come. She is one of those few artists that never weary by their performances, because they are true to nature, like a beautiful landscape, which imparts pleasure every time it is beheld. Hence the fact that she has performed so many as two hundred times in a single character, in one season, in London. In Paris, and in the British metropolis, she has been equally triumphant, and the critics of both countries have been unanimous in their judgment as to her incomparable charms, while the subtlety and versatility of those charms have defied the art of criticism to analyse them. It is not this or that feature in her performance, but the tout ensemble—like the statue of Venus de Medici—that dazzles and captivates the spectator.

Madame Thillon was born in Calcutta, of English parents, but was brought up in France from the age of fourteen. She made her debut at Clermont, in the opera of Le Rossignol. She afterwards appeared in Jean de Paris, in which she attracted the marked notice of the French critics and the public. This was the commencement of a victorious career in France, which was succeeded by an equally flattering one in England, having obtained an engagement at the Princess's Theatre in London, where she made her first appearance in Crown Diamonds, creating an excitement not often surpassed by that attending the performances of any other artist. Her success in France and England is crowned by her triumphs here, which, however, have only commenced, for there is a brilliant future before her. The artist that can produce such effects in the Old World and in the New—in the three greatest countries on the face of the globe—differing in many respects in a most remarkable degree, but all unanimously concurring in their judgment in her favour—must be more than an ordinary woman. In truth, Madame Thillon possesses capabilities and talents of a very high order, and her gifts have been cultivated with the most perfect care. She is entirely unique, there being no other comic opera singer in this world like her.

We feel utterly incompetent to convey our impressions of the fair cantatrice. Criticism cannot fully describe her. To realize what she is, she must be seen and heard in the Crown Diamonds or the Daughter of the Regiment; and that not only once, but many times, for such is the witchery of her charms that they cannot be comprehended in a single night. Like a picture, they must be taken separately and in detail, in order to obtain a just idea of the whole.—New York Herald.

Provincial.

LIVERPOOL.—The fifty-second public performance of the Festival Choral Society presented a new oratorio by the composer of the Deliverance, which produced so great a sensation a short time since. Striking as are the beauties of the above named work, we perceive great advance in Isaiah. The society exhibited no less judgment in the adoption than in the selection of material in the performance; and the engagement of Mrs. Sunderland left Mr. Jackson nothing to wish for in the rendering of his production. The introduction was the commencement of a train of subjects invariably and faithfully maintained to the very last note of the finale. The instrument typical of the prophet is no less novel and effective; and we are impressed with an awful feeling at the deep, yet mellow iteration of the trombone. The accompanied recitative, by Mr. Armstrong, was carefully delivered; and the succeeding chorus, "Clash the symbols high in air," was enthusiastically encored, and repeated with increased effect. Miss Whitnall's absence, through indisposition, afforded Mrs. Sunderland an occasion of exhibiting no less her professional acquirement than her kindly feeling in the alacrity with which, at a moment's notice, she prevented any shadow of disappointment by singing the songs assigned to Miss Whitnall, in addition to the very arduous duties of her own allotted portion of the music. We never heard her in better voice. Mrs. Sunderland's delivery of the recitative, and the air succeeding, "Ah, sinful nation," delighted everybody. The chorus, "We have made a covenant with death," is written for descriptive effect. In a style utterly opposite, but with equal felicity, Mr. Jackson's feeling and taste are shown in the solo and chorus of "Holy is the Lord of Hosts," the performance of which was highly creditable both to the vocalists and band. Mr. Ryalls gave considerable effect to the beautiful air, "Woe to Israel;" the concluding chorus of the first part is very fine. The introduction to the second part is in keeping with the overture, and exhibits a pleasing subject, which Mr. Jackson has given with no less ingenuity than effect. In the second part, "The Lord shall comfort Zion," may challenge the happiest effusions of the best of the moderns. Mr. Armstrong sung an air, "As the hart pants," admirably, as, indeed, he did the whole of his portion, both of solo and concerted music. We were much struck with the originality of a chorus, "Behold, O God, thou art wroth," and deeply regretted its non repetition. Mr. Jackson has varied the soprano airs; and Mrs. Sunderland's style was eminently conspicuous in "Hearken unto me," a song which must soon be popular. Her last song is "O let the nations rejoice." Mr. Jackson, in his chorus, has accomplished the junction of attractive airs with elaborate and skilful contrivance. This has given to the work a charm with which choral auditors are not familiar, and neutralizes the general indifference except for solos. In the choice and application of instrumental power, there is a transparent clearness in his score worthy of note by many who overlays his productions to suffocation. The winding up of this train of effect and beauty is by a bold, clever, and well-wrought fugue, upon a subject of which the simplicity is far from its least merit. We must not (though conscious of many beauties at present unenumerated) omit to express our admiration of the delicious specimen of pastorelle in a duo, "Then shall the earth," sung by Messrs. Ryalls and Armstrong, the instrumenting of which is praiseworthy. The choral precision was admirable, and worthy of their excellent director, Mr. G. Holden, at whose wish and earnest desire the talented composer was invited to attend on the occasion. The room was densely filled by a delighted and discriminating audience. The applause was incessant, and the recognition of Mr. Jackson no less honourable to themselves than gratifying to him. The calls for repetition were too numerous to be all acceded to, of choruses in particular.—(Abridged from the Liverpool Mail.)

This week Albert Smith has given his most amusing and instructive entertainment of "The Overland Mail," three times at the Philharmonic, before large audiences, comprising the élite of the town and neighbourhood. As might be anticipated, from the well-known and versatile talent of Mr. Smith, the entertainment went off each day with the utmost success—the somewhat frigid audiences being kept in a state of amused and unusual excitement during the whole time it lasted. No one that has ever appeared in Liverpool with the intention of amusing the public has done so more successfully than the talented author of "Christopher Tadpole," whose wit, good humour, vocal fluency, and happy delivery, make his efforts to please always interesting, and never tiresome. The scenic views, by Mr. Beverley, are as glowing and as brilliant as ever, while a new one of Folkestone harbour by moonlight, is a miracle of scenic and dioramic art. This morning and evening, Mr. Smith gives his entertainment at Birkenhead, and, as it is the last time he can ever give it there, we advise our trans-Mersey friends not to omit the opportunity of hearing him.

OXFORD.—(From our own Correspondent.)—On Wednesday, 29th ultimo, the Choral Society gave a miscellaneous concert at the Town Hall, in aid of the Blue Coat Boys' School. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Wilcox (who gave her services gratuitously), Miss Messent, and Messrs. Houghton and Horsley. Mrs. Wilcox was encored in Spohr's song, "The Bird and Maiden." The two gentlemen sang a variety of songs, of which "The Tempest," by Mr. Horsley, and "Non piu Andrai," by Mr. Houghton, were the most effective. To Miss Messent, however, was awarded the largest share of the honours. Besides delivering Mozart's "Per Pieta" and Sir Henry Bishop's popular song, "The Mocking Bird," with charming effect, she was loudly encored in "Tell me my Heart," by the latter writer, as also in Mr. Baker's pretty ballad, "I've a heart to exchange." The audience was more remarkable for gentility than number.

TUNBRIDGE WELLS.—(From a Correspondent.)—On Monday last Mr. Charles Goodham, the resident professor of music, gave a musical soirée, assisted by Miss W. Williams, the vocalist, Mr. Goffrie, the violinist, and Mr. H. W. Goodham, the violoncellist from London. The programme comprised some of the choicest classical morceaux, and included Hummel's charming trio, in E flat, for piano, violin, and violoncello; Mendelssohn's grand duo, in D, for piano and violoncello; Beethoven's trio, in D; Benedict's and De Beriot's duet on airs from Somnambula, for piano and violin; and De Beriot's "Tremolo." As will be seen from the above programme both the mental and executive talents of the artists had full scope for display, and we must do them the justice to say that their rendering of each of these beautiful compositions left nothing to be desired. Miss Williams's lovely contralto voice was heard to perfection in Gluck's Rec. ed aria, "Che farò," in Land's ballad, "When Sorrow Sleepeth," in Linley's song, "Thou art near me again," and in Lackner's beautiful song, "Think of me," with violoncello obligato. The latter was encored with great enthusiasm. The audience was select, and the delight with which they listened to the performance was an evidence of the advanced state of musical taste in Tunbridge Wells.

LEEDS.—Miss Mountain's benefit concert took place on Thursday evening last, and was very successful. The fair beneficiaire possesses a fine soprano, the notes being clear and mellow, and her forte and piano well modulated. We find Miss Mountain's voice improved in flexibility. This was observable in her song "Dearest Companions," from La Sonnambula. Miss Mountain was received with much applause throughout the evening. The pretty song of Wallace's, which was allotted to Miss Atkinson, she gave with a purity of tone and chasteness of style which fully deserved the encore demanded by the audience. There were two more features in this concert, viz.: the singing of Master Ramaden, and the violin playing of Mr. J. W. Sykes. Master Ramaden, a youth of about thirteen years, a member of the choir of our parish church, has one of the finest voices we ever heard. It cannot, of course, be expected that he should be able to execute secular music in a very finished style, he being too inexperienced a musician; but his extraordinary fine notes quite electrified the audience, and the applause which was showered upon him was as enthusiastic as it was long continued. Master Ramaden will probably keep his present voice a year or two longer, when it will be prudent to abstain from singing for a time, in order to allow nature to develop his future voice. Mr. Sykes played a violin solo, composed by Sainton, his former master. The first movement of this composition deserves high praise for its beautiful plaintive strains. The performance of Mr. Sykes was excellent; he has greatly improved since we last heard him, and there is no doubt that he must have practised with unabated perseverance. His double notes are clear; his rapid passages neat and distinct; and his adagio is replete with feeling and infinite expression. The room was very respectably attended, and the audience, as we have already stated, was extremely profuse in its applause.—R.

SHEFFIELD.—On Tuesday the venerable poet, James Montgomery, Esq., completed his 80th year. In celebration of the event, an oak tree was planted on the lawn in front of the Sheffield Infirmary by the poet, whose name has been intimately associated with the annals of the institution since it was projected in 1702. The ladies of Sheffield also presented Mr. Montgomery on his birthday with a "friendship offering," consisting of a handsome easy chair, beautifully carved in walnut wood, with laurel leaves, and covered with Utrecht velvet; a reading stand, with a lyre for the bookrest, the rose, thistle, and shamrock entwining the pedestal, with a royal rest footstool; together with a donation to be presented, in his name, to the Moravian Missionary Society. A similar contribution was awarded to the Sheffield School of Design for an annual prize medal, to be designated "the Montgomery medal," and for free pupils in the same institution.

LIVERPOOL.—The eighth concert of the Philharmonic Society took place in their great hall, on Tuesday evening week. It was principally instrumental, Mr. Sims Reeves being the only vocalist. The great pieces of the evening were Spohr's celebrated symphony, "The Power of Sound," and Beethoven's quintett, op. 16, for pianoforte, oboe, clarinet, bassoon, and horn. The band performed admirably; the brass instruments were much better than usual, and the audience appeared highly gratified, though the symphony took no less than three quarters of an hour in performance. It was indeed in itself a perfect illustration of "the power of sound." Beethoven's quintett was also admirably performed, but it would be a poor compliment to the composer of David, to tell him that he is a fine pianoforte player. Mr. Sims Reeves sang the scena from Euryanthe beautifully, but when Sir Henry Bishop tells us that the whole of the music of this opera was composed by Weber, "so as to be appreciable only by first-rate musicians," we cannot wonder that it did not produce a very great effect. We cannot quite admit the full force of this; but we are willing to allow that it requires to be heard more than once to be appreciated by unlearned hearers; we therefore hope the committee will give us some more of it. We recommend to their especial attention the fine solo and quartett "Ben vieni, O Lysart." Mr. Sims Reeves was very happy in Beethoven's Adelaide; he was encored in the recitative and airs from Roberto Devereux, "Ed ancor la tremenda porta," by Donizetti, "Come if you dare," by Purcell, and in a ballad by Chimon. Mr. E. W. Thomas and Mr. Lidel performed a duet concertante on airs from Guillaume Tell, which appeared to give great satisfaction, but most unquestionably, from the admirable skill of the performers, rather than from any great merit in the composition.

Two madrigals by Bennett, 1598, were not effective. The intervals were well filled up by two sparkling overtures by Auber and Lindpaintner, and the whole wound up by the march from the Prophete taken rather slow. In spite of the weather, the attendance was full and brilliant, and the concert appeared to give great satisfaction. The next concert is to be the oratorio of St. Paul, with Miss Birch, Miss M. W. Williams, Mr. Lockey, and Mr. H. Phillips for principals.—Liverpool paper.

HENRI HERZ—REMINISCENCES OF HIS TRAVELS IN AMERICA.

Translated from "La France Musicale," by W. Grilliers.

(Continued from page 695.)

THEORY OF CONCERTS.

It will, doubtless, appear strange to those unacquainted with musical matters, when I affirm that it requires as necessary and indispensable a knowledge for concert-giving, as for musical composition; that there exists an equal theory for both. Travelling artists must not only possess talent, they must also have tact, and a knowledge of this theory concerts; without it no artist can ever hope to attain glory or renown. I must add that this tact and knowledge can only be acquired by experience.

Doubtless, there exists numerous and various ways and means of succeeding in a country where an artist is known by reputation only. I cannot pretend to be acquainted with them all, but I will mention two, which have been practised by some of the greatest celebrities. For instance, you arrive in a town where you have been anxiously expected; you give a concert, and obtain an immense success. Will you leave the public under the first impression, and abruptly abandon the scene of your triumph, to return in a short time, and gather an additional harvest? Or will you (renewing the part of the man that Horace mentions) remain, unflinchingly and undauntedly, at your post, and exert your utmost energy and fertile invention to invest each succeeding concert with greater and increasing attraction, till you have exhausted both admiration and purses? The celebrated Catalani, Jenny Lind, Paganini, Lafont, Sivi, Liszt, Berlioz, and the sisters Milanollo, have followed this plan; Baillot, Thalberg, De Beriot, Moscheles, Servais, Vieuxtemps, and Artot, have employed the first. I am well aware that both the one and the other have at times been crowned with an equal success; but, for my own part (after having, in many travels, essayed both) I have acquired an indubitable and unalterable belief, that it is better, as the saying is, to beat your iron while it is hot, than to let it cool by cutting it in half. When an artist is fortunate enough to excite in the first instance public sympathy, his reason and interest both command him not to retire till he has won it completely. But how often do not circumstances and events overrule and annihilate our will and intentions? For me, there was no reasoning or personal interest which could have induced me to forfeit my word. I had promised, and that was sufficient; I had mentioned the time I would return to my Boston friends, and I did not for an instant hesitate to abandon the successful career of my concerts in New York, to fulfil the engagement to which I had given my word and honour. I engaged a berth on one of the magnificent steamers which perform the journey between New York and Boston.

MY DEPARTURE FOR BOSTON.

It is impossible for me to give my readers an idea of this vast and superb floating palace. It was one of the finest steamers I had ever seen. To the French, who have not viewed the wonderful steamers of the Mediterranean, who have seen nothing more than those of the Channel, the description of an American steamer such as the Atlantic, must call imagination to its aid. I was told it had cost 150,000 dollars, and could supply commodious and spacious convenience for five hundred persons. The saloon was adorned with princely splendour. Most of the ornaments were of a bright and dazzling gold colour; and on the numerous panels, shown to better advantage by being encased in splendid frames, were painted excellent paintings, representing hunting and battle subjects. This gigantic steamer was entirely lined with polished mahogany, which shined as gloriously as the waves, when the lovely sun gilds them with his beams; each object was reflected back with the irreproachable truthfulness of the finest mirror. Along the galleries which formed the first floor, were spread with the utmost profusion sofas and easy-chairs; it is true they were somewhat of equivocal taste, but they were constructed and adorned with unheard of richness. Each object and intention—in fact, the great aim of all that is done in the United States—appears to democratize luxuries; profuse and luxurious ease prevails among a vast number of the population. The fare of these royal habitations—for indeed they merit the name—is so small that numbers find it economical to reside, and altogether take up their abode in them. They meet with innumerable amusements, see lots of society, and enjoy the sea air, in addition to rooms of exquisite cleanliness, and delicious and abundant breakfasts, dinners, &c. The provision department in these vessels equals their magnificence; for they are both irreproachable.

THE STRUGGLES OF OPPOSITION.

But to all these good and fine things (as to most in this world) there is a reverse side. All those honest people who go to seek for pleasure and amusement in these splendid steamers, oftentimes meet with a cruel and heartrending deception, and such a deception as puts it out of their power to remedy, or recover from it, as we do from most in this world; for it not unfrequently annihilates both the happiness they are at the time enjoying, and any future they might anticipate. The annals of American shipping are crowded with these awful and sinister accidents. They throw a sad and melancholy reflection upon the genius, industry, and perseverance of the inhabitants of the New World. Doubtless, their genius and industry shine with a brilliant and dazzling light; but this brightness is so frequently accompanied by such desolating strokes of lightning and thunder, that they can almost count in equal number their days of glory and their days of mourning. Civilization takes rapid strides in the United States; but in its haste it passes over many and many a corpse. For example, to the captains or proprietors of the steamboats between New York and Boston, the lives of the passengers are of very small importance; they are held in quite a second, if not a third consideration. To arrive at their journey's end with the greatest promptitude—such is their aim—no matter the risk or danger; no consideration or thought of this kind will stop them; to attain the greatest speed is their object. This is their sole pleasure and delight. Should they happen to perceive a rival steamer pursuing the same route as themselves, they immediately augment their steam, and no attention whatever is paid to any traveller who might mention that the boiler is on the point of bursting. The first time I witnessed one of these frightful marine-races, I was completely terrified. But it is a most singular and unaccountable thing, that one gets quite inured to them, and imitates the conduct of the American passengers, who, instead of recommending and suggesting prudence, animate, both by word and gesture, the captain and crew to increase the speed, so as to leave the competitor in the background. Not unfrequently their rashness and audacity is crowned with complete success, and affords a certain satisfaction, in which each passenger seems to partake. But oftentimes, Providence chastises their reckless and immoderate rashness; such temerity frequently receives an awful check; such frightful accidents occur, they baffle description. I will, however, attempt to relate the catastrophe of the Atlantic, which happened by a competition for speed between it and another steamer.

(To be continued.)

Miscellaneous.

MADAME PARIKH ALVARS.—This most admirable artist is charming a circle of fashionable amateurs at Leamington with her rare talents on the harp, whence she will return to perform at a concert in Brighton previous to her making a professional visit to Manchester, where she cannot fail to make many friends and gain universal admiration.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.—This fashionable place of amusement opens, for the winter season, on Monday, with Macfarren's King Charles the Second, and the farce of The Rough Diamond. Mr. Webster is determined to make opera a principle feature of the performances, indeed we might say, the principal feature, seeing that he has provided so excellent a vocal troupe, and so efficient a band, which we are pleased to see has been strongly reinforced. A good working chorus, also, we understand, has been obtained; so that we may confidently reckon upon seeing Macfarren's opera rendered in a complete and satisfactory manner. Mrs. Stirling is engaged, and will appear on Tuesday. Mr. and Miss Vandenhoff are also on the bills. Various novelties are in preparation.

RE-UNION DES ARTS.—This Society commenced its second, or Winter season, last Monday evening at the Beethoven Rooms, Queen Ann Street. The programme was excellent, including the Quartett by Mozart, No. 1 in G for two violins, tenor and bass; a grand pianoforte trio in D, by Beethoven, and several songs and solos. The artists assisting, were—Vocalists, Mad. Garcia, Mad. Wagner, Miss Young, Herr Stoffregen and Mr. Jansen:—Instrumentalists, Mad. Goffrie and Herr Kloss (pianoforte), Herr Goffrie, Herr Gollmick (violin). Mr. Boose (tenor), and Mr. Goodban (violoncello). The entire works of Mozart and Beethoven were listened to with the greatest attention, and were executed in first-rate style by the above named artists. The manner in which these soirées are conducted, deserves especial commendation.

MOZART.—Mozart was born at Salzburg, on the 27th of January, 1756. His father, Leopold Mozart, was skilled in music, being sub director of the Princes Chapel. This was a circumstance highly favorable to the predilections of the young Mozart. From infancy, Wolfgang displayed a marked fondness for music. When only three years old he would busy himself in trying to find thirds on the piano; the success of his incipient efforts always afforded him the most exquisite pleasure. Up to the age of ten he had an unconquerable horror of the trumpet. One day his father, hoping to subdue this fear, blew the trumpet in the presence of his son. The affrighted boy turned ghastly pale, and immediately fell almost senseless to the floor. Before Mozart was sixteen years old he had performed, in conjunction with his sister, Mary Ann, at the principal courts and cities of Europe. At this early period of his life the entire continent of Europe literally rang with his fame. In the month of November 1780, Mozart made his final settlement of residence—Vienna was the favoured city. With such a chaplet as that which now encircled the young prodigy's brow, any ordinary mind would have been intoxicated, or settled into a self-complacent inertia; not so with Mozart. He never seemed flattered by the showers of honour that everywhere fell upon him; but totally indifferent alike to sincere applause and the jealous carplings of an envious criticism, he pursued his course with unabated and undeviating vigour. There is hardly any department of music in which he did not excel. Opera, symphony, song, and dance, flowed from his pen with a richness and grandeur never achieved and sustained, except by genius of the highest order. So intense was his application that it checked considerably his natural growth. The most striking thing in Mozart's personal appearance was his perpetual restlessness and the ever-varying expression of his features. He seemed to have little or no idea of economy and domestic management. Extravagantly fond of expensive pleasures, and possessed of a heart more generous than wise, he emptied his purse with the recklessness of one who cared not for wealth, who had not even learned the value of money. In the midst of fame and labour, with his thirty-sixth year yet incomplete, surrounded by "troops of friends," his magnificent career was suddenly closed in death. Haunted by the gloomiest forebodings, he seemed to have a strange presentiment of his own early decease. For some time previous to his death his health had begun to decay. One day a circumstance occurred which, working powerfully as it did upon his morbid sensitiveness and strong imagination, doubtless hastened his end. A grave-looking personage called upon him and agreed with him for a Requiem, which the stranger said, was for a friend. He withdrew, refusing to give either his own name or his friend's and promised to call again in a month. The time expired, the mysterious visitor again appeared; but Mozart's health and spirits rits had been so wrought upon, that he had been unable to finish the composition. Another month was agreed upon, and the stranger again withdrew, still refusing to satisfy Mozart's curiosity as to who he was. The terrified composer tried to obtain some knowledge of this strange personage but in vain. The melancholy visit, the veil of mystery that hung upon it, led Mozart to conclude that the stranger was an inhabitant of the invisible world. "I am writing this Requiem for myself," said he, in accents of utter despair. He toiled on, finished his task, was seized with fits and died. Requiescat in pace.—Aurelian.

BARNUM AND LOLA MONTES.—The much-talked-of engagement of Lola Montes with Mr. Barnum, has, it appears, not been concluded, as the lady in question has been dancing at several of the provincial theatres, and lately at Lyons, but without success. The Salut Public of Lyons publishes a warlike epistle from the Countess to Dr. Vernon (of the Constitutionnel), in consequence of some sarcastic remarks upon her in his journal, in which she warns the doctor that, in case the attacks upon her being continued in the Constitutionnel, she will send him a challenge to fight a duel—not with sword or pistol, but arms more familiar to him—two pills—one of them poisoned; each of the combatants to swallow one! Whether this letter be a bona fide, or a pleasantry on the part of the Salut Public, we have no means of knowing, but the joke is a good one. Galignani's Messenger, however, has the following:—"We are requested, on sufficient authority, to contradict the statement copied into the Messenger on Saturday, to the effect that the tour of Lola Montes in the province had not been successful, no artiste of modern times, our informant states, having succeeded so well in a pecuniary sense. She is engaged for the United States, and will appear at New York in December."

Advertisements.

MUSIC FOR THE ORGAN OR HARMONIUM.

THE AMATEUR ORGANIST—a collection of soft and full Voluntaries, arranged in six Books, 3s. each, by EDWARD TRAVIS, and may be had elegantly bound, price 18s. "Mr. Travis has introduced to the musical world a new and interesting work for the Organ or Harmonium, under the title of 'The Amateur Organist.' Mr. Travis has availed himself of an extensive and classical music library, and selected with great taste the most beautiful morceaux of the great masters, Foreign and English. To lovers of classical music this work will be found to be the most superb selection that has ever issued from the musical press."—Vide Musical Review.

THE AMATEUR INTERLUDIST—a collection of short Interludes to play between the Verses of the Psalms, in one Book, price 4s., by EDWARD TRAVIS and J. P. DYER.

THE AMATEUR PRELUDIST—a collection of Preludes, with the Organ Stops carefully marked, in one Book, price 4s., by E. TRAVIS.

SACRED VOCAL MUSIC.

KELLER'S Collection of ANTHEMS, CHURCH SERVICES, CHANTS, &c., arranged for the Voice and Piano, in six Books, price 3s. each, with six beautiful and appropriate designs by Brandard, arranged by ALBERT KELLER. The six Books can be had in one Volume, elegantly bound, price 18s.

THE PSALMODIA BRITANNICA—a selection of Psalms and Hymns for the Voice and Organ, in six Books, price 3s. each, arranged by EDWIN FLOOD, and may be had in one Volume, neatly bound, price 18s. London: LEE & COXHEAD, 48, Albemarle-street, and can be had of all Book and Musiciansellers.

N.B.—A New Edition of "Hark, the Sabbath Bells," by Edwin Flood.

BLACKWOOD & CO.'S REGISTERED MUSIC FILE.

THIS new and useful invention is designed to supersede the old portfolio. It will be found the most convenient article yet introduced for holding and preserving from dust unbound music. To be had of all Musiciansellers, and Wholesale at the Manufactory, 26, Long Acre, London.

PIANOFORTES FOR HIRE AT REDUCED PRICES.

ECONOMY being at all times commendable, Messrs. ROUSSELOT and Co. have established a new system for Hiring Pianofortes, including the tuning once a month, which presents not only a great saving, but also the advantage of having the instrument regularly kept in tune. Pianofortes, sold, exchanged, and repaired. For particulars apply to Rousselet and Co., 64, Conduit-street, Regent-street.

CAUTION.

SEVERAL notices relative to the Bloomer Polkas having appeared, Henry Distin, in justice to himself, begs to inform the Music Trade, Profession, and Public in general that DISTIN'S BLOOMER POLKA, by Wellington Guernsey, price 2s. 6d., was the original one published, the title of the said Bloomer Polkas having been surreptitiously obtained by other parties in the first instance. Distin's Bloomer Polkas are nightly performed at the Public Balls, Concerts, Theatres, &c., and also at Distin and Sons' Concerts throughout the Kingdom, and the various military bands of the army. Published by Henry Distin, at his Depot for Military Musical Instruments, 31, Cranbourn-street, Leicester-square, London, where also may be had by the same popular author, The Court Beauty Polkas (as performed at Her Majesty's State Balls) 2s. 6d. The Angelina do. do. do. 2s. 6d. The Belvidere Galops do. do. do. 2s. 6d. The Cuckoo Galop do. do. do. 2s. 6d. All with Cornet accompaniments.

SAX MILITARY BAND INSTRUMENTS.

COUNCIL MEDAL, July 10a, 1725. Messrs. ROUSSELOT & Co. beg to announce that being the representatives of the eminent inventor of the Sax Horns, who has gained the sole Council Medal for the Military Band Instruments, they are able to provide purchasers with genuine Sax Horns, French Horns, Trombones, Cornets with or without the patent slides, &c., at moderate prices. The admired Instruments from the Exhibition are now on view at 66, Conduit-street. List of prices forwarded on application. London, Rousselet and Co., 66, Conduit-street, Regent-street.

NEW AND FAVOURITE SONGS

PUBLISHED BY CRAMER, BEALE, AND CO.

The Tears of Love	W. Maynard.
My Home in the Valley	Frank Mori.
Softly ye Night Winds	W. V. Wallace.
Astoria	G. Linley.
O thou, whose beauty shines	Kaliwodra.
Came smile again	W. V. Wallace.
The Rhine Girl	G. Linley.
Farewell	Frank Mori.

201, Regent-street, and 67, Conduit-street.

BLUMENTHAL'S NEW PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

FLEURS EMBLEMATIQUES:—

No. 1, Primavera	4s. 0d.
" 2, Violette	3s. 0d.
" 3, Rose	3s. 0d.
" 4, Romarin	3s. 0d.
" 5, Pensée	2s. 6d.
" 6, Héliotrope	2s. 6d.

Cramer, Beale and Co., 201, Regent-street.

Just Published,

PROSPER SAINTON'S STANDARD BEARER.

SOLO FOR THE VIOLIN.

With Accompaniment for Piano	4s. 0d.
" " " Orchestra	10s. 6d.

Schott and Co., 89, St. James's-street.

HERE IS YOUR REMEDY!

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.

A MOST miraculous Cure of Bad legs, after 43 years' suffering.—Extract of a Letter from Mr. William Galpin, of 70, Saint Mary's-street, Weymouth, dated May 15th, 1851. To Professor Holloway, Sir,—At the age of 18 my wife (who is now 61) caught a violent cold, which settled in her legs, and ever since that time they have been more or less sore, and greatly inflamed. Her agonies were distracting, and for months together she was deprived entirely of rest and sleep. Every remedy that medical men advised was tried, but without effect; her health suffered severely, and the state of her legs was terrible. I had often read your Advertisements, and advised her to try your Pills and Ointment; and, as a last resource, after every other remedy had proved useless, she consented to do so. She commenced six weeks ago, and, strange to relate, is now in good health. Her legs are painless, without seam or scar, and her sleep sound and undisturbed. Could you have witnessed the sufferings of my wife during the last 43 years, and contrast them with her present enjoyment of health, you would indeed feel delighted in having been the means of so greatly alleviating the sufferings of a fellow creature. (Signed) WILLIAM GALPIN.

The Pills should be used conjointly with the Ointment in most of the following cases:—

Bad Legs	Cape Bay	Contracted and	Lumbago	Scabby
Bad Breasts	Chicago-foot	Stiff Joints	Fires	Sore Throats
Burns	Chilblains	Elephantiasis	Rheumatism	Tumours
Bunions	Chapped hands	Fistulas	Soids	Ulcers
Bite of Mosche	Corns (Soft)	Gout	Sore Nipples	Wounds
Itches and Sand	Cancers	Glandular Swellings	Sore-throats	Yaws
Flies			Skin-diseases

Sold by the Proprietor, 244, Strand, (near Temple Bar), London; and by all respectable Vendors of Patent Medicines throughout the Civilised World, in Pots and boxes, at 1s. 1d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 22s., and 33s. each. There is a very considerable saving in taking the larger sizes.

N. B.—Directions for the guidance of Patients are affixed to each Pot or Box.

THEATRE ROYAL,  DRURY LANE.

M. JULLIEN'S
ANNUAL SERIES OF CONCERTS.

LAST WEEK BUT TWO.

First Appearance of Messieurs DELOFFRE and PILET.
First Time of "THE BLOOMER QUADRILLE."
First Appearance of Mons. FRELON.
First Night of DON GIOVANNI.
Seventh Appearance of Signor BOTTESINI.

M. JULLIEN has the gratification to state that he has become the purchaser of several of the Instruments to which were awarded the Council Medal, at the Great Exhibition, among which are:—The Violin manufactured by M. Vuillaume, of Paris—several of M. Sax's Wind Instruments—and also the Grand Pianoforte of the Messrs. Erard; this latter Instrument will be EXHIBITED EVERY EVENING, and will be performed upon by the celebrated Pianiste, Mons. BILLET.

PROGRAMME FOR MONDAY EVENING, Nov. 17, 1851.

PART I.

Overture, . . .	"Der Freischütz," (First Time this Season.)	Weber.
Quadrille, . . .	(Humorous,) "The Bloomer Quadrille," founded on American and English Melodies.	Jullien.
Symphony, . . .	"The Power of Sound,"	Spohr.
Song, . . .	Miss DOLBY, "Ah quel Giorno," from the Opera "Semiramide." (First Time at M. Jullien's Concerts.)	Rossini.
Valse, . . .	"La Prima Donna," composed for the Court Balls, (1851,) and performed at Buckingham Palace.	Jullien.
Solo, Contra-basso, Sig. BOTTESINI, "Le Carnaval de Venise," originally composed by Sig. Paganini for the Violin, but performed by Sig. Bottesini on the Contra-basso.		Paganini.
Quadrille, . . .	"Great Exhibition,"	Jullien.

PART II.

Opera, . . .	Grand Selection and Fantasia, from Mozart's Chef-d'œuvre , "Don Giovanni," arranged expressly by M. Jullien. The Solos by M. LAVIGNE, M. BAUMANN, M. PROSPER, Mr. TAUBER, and Herr KENIG.	Mozart.
Solo, . . .	Mons. FRELON, on Mons. Alexandre's new Instrument the Melodium.	Donizetti.
Polka, . . .	"Polka des trégnards,"	Auber.
Song, . . .	Miss DOLBY, "The Flowers are sleeping,"	Baker.
Duo, Violin and Violoncello, without Accompaniment, Mons. DELOFFRE and Mons. PILET (first time)		Deloffre.
Valse, . . .	"Miranda,"	Kenig.
Galop, . . .	"The Review,"	Jullien.

COMMENCE AT EIGHT, TERMINATE AT ELEVEN.

Promenade, Boxes, and Galleries, 1s.
Dress Circle, 2s. 6d.

GRAND BAL MASQUE.

M. JULLIEN'S Annual Grand Bal Masque will take place on FRIDAY, DEC. 12th.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY,
EXETER HALL.

CONDUCTOR, MR. COSTA.—THE SEASON will COMMENCE on FRIDAY, the 5th of December, with Haydn's Oration, THE SEASONS (first time by this Society). Subscriptions are received at the Society's office, No. 6, in Exeter Hall (where also prospectuses for the ensuing season may be obtained), daily, between 10 and 5; also on Tuesday evenings, between 7 and 10. The Subscription is—for central area seats, numbered, £3 3s.; area or gallery, reserved, £2 2s.; body of the hall, £1 1s.

MISS DOLBY

BEGS to inform her friends that her first MUSICAL SOIREE will take place at her residence, No. 2, Hinde-street, Manchester-square, on TUESDAY, Nov. 18th, at Eight o'Clock.

BEAUTIES OF CAMBRIA,

By BRINLEY RICHARDS.

CONTAINING:—

- No. 1, The Live Long Night,
- " 2, Margaret's Daughter,
- " 3, The Ash Grove,
- " 4, Sweet Richard,
- " 5, Lady Owen's Delight,
- " 6, March of the Men of Harlech;

THE PRINCE OF CAMBRIA'S BAND MARCH.

Price 2s. each.

The "Beauties of Cambria," by Brinley Richards, were first performed by the author at an Annual Festival of the Cambrian Society of Ancient Britons on St. David's Day, at the Freemason's Tavern. The delight and enthusiasm which these national melodies produced on the company were immense. The "Prince of Cambria's Band March," by the author of "The Beauties of Cambria," threw the company into a state amounting to delirium. These Melodies were dedicated by permission to His Grace the Duke of Newcastle, by whose kind patronage this talented Ancient Briton became a student of the Royal Academy of Music, where he gained the honour of being elected a King's Scholar.

LEE and COXHEAD, 48, Albemarle-street.

NICOLÒ PAGANINI'S

POSTHUMOUS WORKS FOR THE VIOLIN.

Op. 6, Premier Concerto, with accompaniment for piano	12s. 6d.
" 7, Second Concerto. (Clochette)	10s. 6d.
" 8, Le Straghe. (Witches' danse)	4s. 6d.
" 9, God Save the Queen	4s. 6d.
" 10, Le Carnaval de Venise	3s. 6d.
" 11, Moto perpetuo	2s. 6d.
" 12, Non più mesta	4s. 6d.
" 13, I palpiti	4s. 6d.
" 14, Etudes en 60 variations sur l'air Barucaba for Violin Solo, in 3 books, each	2s. 6d.

The same nine works together in two books, and embellished with the author's portrait £1 16s.

Schott and Co., 59, St. James-street.

SECOND EDITION.

MUSICAL MEMENTO OF THE GREAT EXHIBITION.

HYMN OF PRAISE FOR ALL NATIONS.

A SACRED CANTATA, composed in honour of the Great Exhibition. The Words selected from the Holy Scriptures; the Music by THOMAS LLOYD FOWLE. The whole work price 7s. 6d.; separate movements, One Shilling each. J. Alfred Novello, 69, Dean-street, Soho-square.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.—"Commences with an overture representing the March of All Nations, which is in reality a grand hymn, full of rich chords; then follows a chorus for four voices—

'Sing unto God, O ye Nations of the Earth,'

after which a short solo, then another chorus, then we find the National Anthem, a very good arrangement of it for four voices, and several more hymns, solos, and choruses, of each of which we can freely say the one is only equalled by the other."—The Britannia of May 31.

"Ambitious, full of promise, and will doubtless survive the occasion which gave it birth."—Church and State Gazette.

"We regard this work as a most creditable and promising composition, comprising as it does much careful, agreeable, and orthodox—if not entirely original—writing; and we congratulate Mr. Fowle upon his success—a success happily commensurate to his praiseworthy ambitious design."—Magazine of Science for June, 1851.

"The Overture is full of rich chords: it represents the March of all Nations to the Exhibition. This is followed by a chorus for four voices, sweetly arranged—'Sing unto God, O ye Nations of the Earth.' After a short solo we have another splendid chorus, and a capital arrangement of our National Anthem for four voices. Several other hymns, choruses, and solos are introduced, all of which are arranged with great taste, sweetness, and effect."—Mark Lane Express, June 30, 1851.

"This work is handsomely printed and embellished, and will doubtless be a leading feature of its kind during the gathering of the people of all Nations."—Musical and Dramatic Review.

"This work is within the compass of all players and vocalists. Its simple grandeur of style is well fitted for its comprehensive title, and will form a pleasing and appropriate musical record of the great and all-absorbing event of the never-to-be-forgotten year of 1851."—The Guardian of July 2.

"Mr. Fowle has succeeded in producing a work which will doubtless prove very acceptable to many a private family, or small party of musical friends."—Pools and South Western Herald.

Printed and Published for the Proprietor by MICHAEL SAMUEL MYERS, of No. 3, Studley Villas, Studley Road Clapham Road, in the parish of Lambeth, at the office of MYERS & Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, in the parish of St. Paul, where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed, post paid. To be had of G. PURKISS, Dean Street, Soho; Allen, Warwick Lane; Vickers, Holywell Street, and at all Booksellers.—Saturday, November 15, 1851.

The Musical World.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s.; Half year, 8s.; Three Months, 4s.; (Stamped Copies 1s. per Quarter extra, Payable in advance, to be forwarded by Money Order, to the Publishers, Myers & Co., 22, Tavistock-st., Covent Garden).

No. 47.—VOL. XXIX.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 1851.

Price Fourpence.
Stamped Fivepence

CRUVELLI AT THE ITALIENS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

I promised you in my hurried letter last week a more detailed account of the first appearance of Mademoiselle Cruvelli, accompanied by a translation of the articles of the principal feuilletonists. As the tone of all these criticisms, however, is precisely similar, the most enthusiastic and unrestrained terms of eulogy being adopted by all the authorities of the press, it would be wasting my time, your space, and your readers' patience to reduce the whole of them into English. I shall, therefore, satisfy myself with extracting a few passages here and there, so as to give you a general impression.

One of the most glowing apostrophisers of the merits of Sophie Cruvelli is M. Eugene de Fresne, feuilletoniste of Le Pays. M. de Fresne is not merely recognised as an eloquent writer and a sound critic, but has distinguished himself as a musician by several compositions. He appears to have been completely magnetised by the influence of the new Norma. He does not attempt to criticise, but contents himself with paying her homage. The following is an extract from his article:—

"The Italian Theatre was in a languishing state. The rentrée of Madlle. Cruvelli has in an instant, and, as though by the touch of a magic wand, restored it to power, health, and eclat. Madlle. Cruvelli, however, is a rare and precious artist; she seems to have been endowed by the fairies. She is Grisi at twenty years of age, with more sentiment, more distinction, with a beauty less opulent but more refined, and of a loftier character; with a voice less hard in the higher notes, more varied in its tones, and provided with magnificent lower notes, which rival the quality of the contralto. When Madlle. Cruvelli appeared on the stage as Norma, with the scythe of gold and the crown of oak, we thought we saw before us the beautiful Velleda of Chateaubriand; severe and tender, fanatic, and amorously subdued; the flames of Greece in the melancholy of Armorica; the sun burning in the mist. It was a vision. Only that Velleda was fair and Norma is dark. Hardly had Sophie Cruvelli cast her fixed and flashing look upon the public than the effect of that magnetic ray, which signalizes the powers of the earth, was felt in every heart. Incessu venit Deus.

"The audience at once felt that they had to do with a soufflé de la maestria, one whom they were called upon not to judge but to admire and be happy. The explosion of the burning soul—which penetrates its material covering by the mysterious action of life, to spread itself into sympathetic and dominating rays over all the âmes soumises that group themselves around it in the mystic relations of art and love, the principles of all creation and all happiness—was felt like a thunderclap! Perhaps our expressions may be found somewhat hyperbolic. We obey, nevertheless, the impression we truly received. We were struck as with an electric flash at the apparition of Sophie Cruvelli—we say it because we felt it. Ought criticism to be always cold and meticulous? Is it not lawful for it at times to become the intermediate between the charm prestigious of the artist and the admiration of the crowd? Have we for an instant ceased to be critics to fall into the ranks of the audience? If so, what a triumph is achieved by the mystic and sentimental influence of the artist over that frigid spirit of analysis, which resists always, and only allows itself to be conquered when it is crushed!

"The representation of Norma was a long triumph. Never in that large golden cage, which is called the 'Italian Opera,' sang bird more beautiful. Birds are only happy among flowers, and flowers among birds; a shower, a storm, a hurricane of bouquets were not slow to present themselves, and more than one of the boldest Romans of the guard of Pollio was employed in carrying to the feet of the goddess the offerings of the faithful. Have we judged Madlle. Cruvelli, or have we only admired her? Are we traitors to criticism, or only faithful to art? The future will decide, but we do not fear to compromise our oracles in announcing for Madlle. Cruvelli the prodigious career of Jenny Lind."

It is not easy to turn such high-flown language as that of M. de Fresne into simple English. Your readers must therefore excuse me if I have botched it. I could send you a dozen more articles in the same strain, equally enthusiastic and metaphysical; but a quoi bon? the example I have given you is a good specimen of the rest. Suffice it, that the critics of the Journal des Debats (M. Delecluze), of the Constitutionnel (M. Fiorentino), of the Presse (M. Theophile Gautier), of the Assemblée Nationale (M. Adolphe Adam), of the Patrie (M. Alex. Basset), of the France Musicale (Léon Escudier), not to mention the witty Eugene Guinot, the biting Alphonse Karr, and a host of erratic and brilliant writers, are all of one mind, and all pay the same homage to Sophie Cruvelli. You can read their articles, which I enclose, and judge for yourself. To this you will reply, that I have not fulfilled the pledge with which I commenced this letter; to which I reply, it is true I have not. But what then? Sophie does not stand in need of an army of Parisian advocates, glowing and magniloquent, to remind her London admirers of her great merits, or make them long for the period of her return. It is enough that the lively inhabitants of the most brilliant of cities echo, without a dissentient voice, in their own sparkling and animated style, the deeper and more sober homage of the English—and that in Paris, as in London, Sophie Cruvelli is appreciated and admired.

SOPHIE CRUVELLI IN PARIS.

The political correspondent of The Times affixes the following account of Cruvelli's rentrée at the Theatre Italien, in his Paris letter dated Wednesday, the 12th inst. :—

"Not for years past has any theatre in Paris witnessed a greater triumph than that won by Mdlle. Cruvelli at the Italian Opera last night. How Mdlle. Cruvelli sings and acts it is superfluous to say, but never yet did the genius of the artist appear more glorious than on the occasion of which I speak. The piece was Norma, and the Druid Priestess has seldom, if ever, found a more magnificent representative. The improvement in singing and acting made by this artist since her last appearance in Paris was admitted by every one to be great. During the whole of the first act it was impossible for the audience to restrain their feelings. It was not an occasional burst of applause, but a continued display of enthusiasm throughout. The stage was covered with bouquets, and the attendants were obliged to appear more than once between the acts to remove them. The house was never so crowded; in fact, people were obliged to go away from the doors from the impossibility of finding places. All that Paris contains of rank and fashion had representatives there; and I believe the whole of the distinguished artists of the capital witnessed this undoubted triumph of Mdlle. Cruvelli."

The correspondent of the Morning Post writes in terms no less glowing and decided in his Paris letter, dated Nov. 13, of the brilliant success of Mdlle. Cruvelli :—

"ITALIAN OPERA IN PARIS.

"PARIS, Wednesday.

"Cruvelli appeared here last night in Norma, and fairly carried the cold audience of the Salle Ventadour by storm. On her first appearance the house became hushed. The young and beautiful singer advanced clad in graceful drapery, and her fair brow encircled by the priestess' wreath, which hitherto none but singers of the highest renown—as Malibran, Pasta, and Grisi—have fitly worn.

"Encouraged by the voice of English criticism, and the plaudits of a London public, Sophie Cruvelli now advanced to ask of the judgment of one of the severest of operatic audiences a confirmation of her right to wear the laurel crown as the successor of the great names above mentioned.

"She had no sooner sung the 'Casta Diva,' than the entire house, as surprised as delighted, rose to applaud the debutante again and again. The whole opera was a scene of continued triumph, varied only as the plaudits were earned by the wonders of her singing, or the power of her acting.

"The judgment she called for was given. It was decided that she was a fit successor of the greatest singers, and that had she been their contemporary, their laurel crowns would have sat but doubtfully on their brows.

"The critics were delighted; they could scarcely find terms to express the full amount of their praise. The Corsaire, no mean authority, says, 'Never was a voice of so prodigious a compass, of so admirable a quality, of so irresistible an attraction, placed at the service of a more ardent passion, or a greater dramatic genius.'

"The great success of Cruvelli promises a brilliant and prosperous season for this most fashionable of theatres."

The following detailed account, from the widely circulated columns of Galignani's Messenger, the Parisian English paper, will give our readers a more distinct idea of the performance and triumph of the celebrated artist :—

"ITALIAN OPERA.—MDLLE. CRUVELLI.

"One of the great privileges of true genius is its extraordinary power of creating fresh interest, and revealing new points of beauty and colouring in things with which we have been long familiar. Thus, in Bellini's Norma, one of the most popular operas of modern times, every phrase of which the musical public have known and admired for a series of years, a young artiste suddenly comes forward, and, though following almost countless vocalists, all of high celebrity in the part, by her bold and original conception, intensity of feeling, and powers of voice and dramatic expression, at once annihilates all our recollections of the past, and gives us another and a new reading of the character, more tender, more impassioned, and more deeply tragic than we had ever witnessed, or even conceived before. The public came prepared to admire; for the impression Mdlle. Cruvelli had produced last season during her brief stay in Paris, in Verdi's Ernani, was not a thing to be easily effaced—still her personation of Norma took them by surprise; they were not prepared for the splendid display of power, both vocal and dramatic, which burst upon them, and in her very first scene their delight broke out into plaudits which seemed almost without bounds, and, surely, never was this lovely opening scene given with so much poetry and profound feeling. Her appearance was indeed that of the inspired priestess—but it was the priestess who had forgotten her holy vows, and who was already paying the penalty of her crime by the pangs of remorse, jealousy, and betrayed affection. Mdlle. Cruvelli, on her entrance, presented a perfect picture of the unhappy Ariadne, described by Catullus,

"—deserta in litore quondam—

Guossia Thesæ flevit perjuria linguæ."

The adagio was given sotto voce, and it was not until the passage in which she implores for peace that she ventures to raise her eyes to the Deity, whose altars she has profaned. All this was as beautiful as it was original, and was more than once interrupted by murmurs of delight. The cabaletta, which anticipates a return of her lover's affection, was exquisitely rendered; here she put forth some of the secrets of her great vocal power. In a cadence on the word sereno, she descended from Re above the lines to Fa below, bringing out the lowest note with extraordinary force and firmness. This feat was accomplished with an effortless ease, which seemed to banish every idea of vocal difficulty. The applauses and bouquets which followed brought the performance to a stand-still for some minutes. In the grand trio which concludes the first act, in which the perfidy of Pollione is fully disclosed, her concentrated rage and jealousy was only to be compared to one of the magnificent bursts of Rachel in Phedre or Horace. Her

"'Trema per te fellow

Pei figlia tuoi—per me,' was given with the scorn and hatred of an avenging spirit. The duo, Deh! con te! with Adalgisa was given with soul-touching pathos and beauty; and here Mdlle. Corbari most justly divided the applause with the new Diva. In the concluding scenes Mdlle. Cruvelli was equally perfect in her singing and acting, the enthusiasm of the audience being equally divided between the vocalist and the tragedian. Indeed, with the single exception of the great ornament of the French stage, mentioned above, we know no equal to Mdlle. Cruvelli as an actress. The reiterated plaudits which followed the conclusion of the opera, and the overwhelming recall of the étoile de la soirée, set the final seal to her triumph. Madlle. Corbari delighted the audience by her singing of Adalgisa, which was perfection throughout. The house was crowded to excess by one of those elegant and fashionable assemblages only to be found at the Italiens, the foyer fairly presenting a congress of the élite of all nations. The season may now be set down as really begun.

"Norma will be repeated to-night at the Italian Opera. The brilliant success of Mdlle. Cruvelli—which we may go so far as to say—was one of those splendid displays of talent which mark an epoch in the history of musical art—seconded by the admirable performance of Mdlle. Corbari in Adalgisa, renders the representation of Bellini's chef d'œuvre one of the most perfect that can be witnessed on the lyric stage."

In addition to the above our correspondent has sent us a file of the French journals, who are all in raptures with the new Norma. Of these, we shall avail ourselves as occasion offers, since it gives us no small pleasure to be able to prove to the satisfaction of our readers that we do not stand alone in our opinion of the genius and extraordinary endowments of the young and beautiful Sophie.

THE PIANOFORTE QUESTION.

We have this week received two letters on the all absorbing subject of the Pianoforte controversy, from which it would appear that we have not been sufficiently clear and explicit in our remarks, prefixed last week to the protest of Messrs. Collard and Collard against the decision of the Council of Chairmen. "In a momentous matter of this kind," writes one of our correspondents, "it is necessary that every thing should be distinctly understood and plainly expressed." Good! We shall, therefore, simplify our present remarks, and render them so legible that all who run may read.

We stated last week that there were two protests from the first or professional jury against the decision of the Council of Chairmen—one on behalf of Broadwood and Sons, the other in favour of Messrs. Collard and Collard. So far correct; but we neglected to add, that the protest on behalf of the Messrs. Broadwood and Sons was the only bona fide one drawn by the professional jury of their own accord, and sent to the Royal Commissioners; while that of the Messrs. Collard and Collard, was transmitted some time after to the Commissioners, and did not proceed directly from the first jury, being drawn up by themselves, and signed at their request. It is true that the professional jury unanimously awarded a Council medal to the Messrs. Collard and Collard, and it is also true that they signed the protest; but the distinction should have been marked between the spontaneous issuing of the protest by the jury, as in the case of Broadwood and Sons, and that sought for and obtained, as in the case of Messrs. Collard and Collard. It appears to us that the Messrs. Collard and Collard should have directed the battery of their protest against the second or group jury, not against the Council of Chairmen, who had no voice in the matter, the verdict of the first jury having been set aside before it reached them.

We trust now we have made ourselves sufficiently clear, and that our Liverpool correspondent will have no further occasion to object to our lucidity—at least, in the matter of the Pianoforte Question.

THE LONDON SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

This society commenced its fourth season, on Friday, the 14th of the present month, with Handel's Belshazzar. This work was originally produced under Handel's own direction, and was performed three times in the Lent season of 1745; viz.:—the 27th and 29th of March, and the 23rd of April. The principal singefers were as follows:—Signora Francesina, Nicotris; Miss Robinson, Daniel; Mr. Bend, Belshazzar; Mr. Rainhold, Cyrus, and likewise Gobryus, with the exception of one song. The events which form the subject of this oratorio are the siege and destruction of Babylon by Cyrus, and the consequent overthrow of the Assyrian empire, and deliverance of the Jewish nation from bondage. Handel's opinions upon the merits of the work as a drama designed for music may be interesting to our readers. On the 19th of July, 1744, in a letter to Charles Jennens, Esq., the compiler of the libretto, he acknowledges the receipt of the first act, which he states he had perused with great pleasure. On the 21st of August he expresses himself in similar terms with regard to the second act, which he had just received, saying—"I am greatly pleased with it, and shall use my best endeavours to do it justice," he adds, "I can only say that I impatiently wait for the third act." Two days after this date he commenced composing the music. On the 13th of September he writes—"Your most excellent oratorio has given me great delight in setting it to music and still engages me warmly. It is, indeed, a noble piece, very grand and uncommon; it has furnished me with expressions, and has given me opportunity to some very particular ideas, besides so many great choruses." The last letter on the subject is dated October 2nd, and begins thus:—"I received the third act with a great deal of pleasure, as you can imagine, and you may believe that I think it a very fine and sublime oratorio," &c. Since the time of its first production it has seldom been performed entire. Selections from it, consisting of the recit and air, "Rejoice my Countrymen," the air, "O Surest Oracles," and "O God of Truth," with the choruses, "Sing O ye Heavens," "See from His Host," and "O Glorious Prince," were especial favourites at the Ancient Concerts.

The Oratorio was revived by the Sacred Harmonic Society, March 19, 1847, when under Mr. Surman's direction, and drew a full room, since which time to the present, it has not been heard, although it is a work admirably adapted to the means of large choral societies.

The vocalists on the present occasion were Miss Birch, who sang the music of Nicotris with her usual correctness. The part of Belshazzar in the hands of Mr. Lockett was highly effective. Mr. Lawler's fine bass voice told well in the recitatives and songs for Cyrus, and Mr. R. F. Smith was all that could be desired in the part of Gobryus; but to Miss Dolby, as Daniel, however, must be awarded the palm of the evening. Her delivery of the recitative, "Thou O King," was magnificent, and was listened to by the audience with breathless attention, and at the end a loud call was made for a repetition, which was not complied with, as it would have broken the thread of the story. The choruses on the whole went with great spirit and correctness, although it appeared to us that many were taking part that had not attended the rehearsals; such persons generally do more harm than good at performances. The hall was well filled, while everybody seemed provided with a comfortable seat.

The next concert given by this society, will be on Monday, Dec. 22, when will be performed Handel's Messiah.

HENRI HERZ—REMINISCENCES OF HIS TRAVELS IN AMERICA.

Translated from "La France Musicale," by W. Grilliers.

(Continued from page 734.)

A TRAGEDY AT SEA.

The 26th of November, 1846, the steamer Atlantic started, with about a hundred passengers on board. They had hardly lost sight of the lighthouse, before the pipe which conveyed the steam from the boiler, burst, with a tremendous noise, and brought the machinery to a standstill. A few of the passengers had been scalded by the explosion, and their cries threw the rest of the company into the greatest alarm and confusion. The night was pitch dark; and, by a species of fatality, the weather which till then had not been boisterous, all at once became violent and tempestuous, and increased to a perfect hurricane. The wind also changed from the north-east to the south-east. The storm raged with the utmost fury; the steamer could neither advance nor govern its course; it was at the complete mercy of the furious waves. The three anchors were thrown out, but without success; they offered no resistance to the raging sea. Nought but fear and consternation reigned within the unfortunate ship. The cold was intense; all the fires had been extinguished by the water, which could not be kept out. The unfortunate passengers were compelled to wrap themselves in their blankets. The storm gave no appearance of abatement; its fury only appeared to increase. To ease the ship, the chimneys and pilot's cabin were thrown down, and about forty tons of coal were cast into the sea; and the flag was hoisted half-mast high, in signal of distress.

The opponent steamer had also suffered great damage; it was compelled to pass on, it could offer no help to the unfortunate Atlantic. The captain seeing himself abandoned in his distressed position, had the signal flag taken down, and ordered all the goods and merchandise which were on deck, to be thrown overboard; amongst other valuable objects consigned to the furious and unmerciful waters, was a chest of plate worth seven thousand dollars, and a bundle of lace valued at the same sum; the passenger to whom the latter valuable article appertained, offered to give it to any one who would save his life. During this time, tables, chairs, doors, everything was seized upon to construct rafts, and many bound themselves to life preservers; fortunately the ship was well supplied with them. A few passengers had three or four with them, and by this means several escaped this fearful disaster. For a moment the storm appeared to have exhausted its fury, and hope seemed to renew in every breast; but oh! deception, this momentary calm only gave way to increased violence. The unfortunate ship was drifting nearer and nearer towards the shore, destruction seemed to threaten every soul on board. About four o'clock in the morning, the after-part of the vessel went aground, and the two cables which still retained the anchors were instantly snapped asunder; this was the climax to their uncertain and fearful situation; no longer could they hold out; a thousand voices appeared to answer the shock; in an instant the ship was driven on its side, and the helpless passengers engulfed by the furious waves; some were carried on to the rocks, where they met their fate, others immediately sunk with the wreck to rise no more. I cannot help a shudder when I call to mind the terrible incidents of this fearful disaster. Amongst the victims all the women were enumerated, there was six on board. A family consisting of husband, wife, daughter, and three others, all—perished. A gentleman, an inhabitant of New York, had had a young lady from Boston confided to his care; he exerted the most unheard of efforts to save her life, but could not accomplish his praiseworthy act; it was with great difficulty he himself escaped.

Captain Dunstan must be noticed as one of the most heroic victims of this sad catastrophe, he is remembered by his rash devotion, "if my ship perishes," said he, "I perish with it." He left a wife and five children (of whom he was the sole dependance) to mourn and bewail his unhappy fate. It is strange that this man, who was so stoical and indifferent towards himself and family, should have experienced such an interest in the fate of a youth, one of the crew of the Atlantic. The captain was heard to call him several times before the steamer went aground. This youth reached the shore in safety, in company of a passenger from Massachusetts; their preservation was perfectly miraculous. This latter had been sitting on deck busily occupied in securing his safety by the help of several life preservers, when a tremendous wave from behind sent him rolling headlong from one side of the vessel to the other; he however contrived to grasp one of the masts, but his life preservers getting entangled in an iron crook, he was almost strangled in their folds. With immense exertion he was fortunate enough to free himself, but in an instant he was washed overboard; again he was favoured by fate, he was able to reach one of the port-holes of the unfortunate ship, now almost a wreck; on the inside was the youth we have spoken of. The half-drowned passenger called to him to throw some planks out, but he, thinking he was counselled to quit the ship, immediately left it: both passenger and the boy were instantly swept away by a furious wave. The first swam to land in the midst of dead bodies and pieces of the wreck, he had hardly touched terra firma before he heard a voice crying "Oh, what shall I do, what will become of me, I cannot reach land!" It was the poor boy. His companion in misfortune encouraged him to persevere in his efforts, guided him by his voice and gestures, and soon had the pleasure of seeing him safe and sound by his side.

Another of the crew of the Atlantic was saved in a most singular and remarkable manner. When one of the boilers was with great violence thrown into the sea, he and four of his companions were forced along with it, the boiler was subsequently driven to land by the waves, and he was found insensible in the inside. The manner in which he got there could not be accounted for; it must have been an interference of Providence. His four unfortunate comrades were all killed by the shock.

Three young men affianced to three young ladies of New York, were also among the victims. Another was returning to his native place, to rejoin his young wife, and obtain the pardon of a father, with whom he had long been on unfilial terms, when death put an end to his anticipations of happiness. When his unfortunate young wife heard the awful news, she lost her senses.

By the side of the painful impression which this lamentable catastrophe aroused, I am grieved to mention an occurrence which is a stain upon humanity. While the hand of death was laying so many heads low, the hands of men were busy with their victims. Each time a corpse was brought to shore by the unmerciful waves, human vultures, with the greatest haste, immediately seized their clothes, their jewels, and their money; boxes were broken open and their contents strewed by the side of those who had no more use for them. Nothing was respected by these inhuman and unfeeling monsters, tempted as they were by the Satanic demon, avarice. Oh, humanity! humanity! Thou art, indeed, weak and frail.

This accident gave rise to another painful exhibition. A few days after, profit and speculation made the most of by an outrageous puff upon the life-preservers of the Atlantic. It is thus that the dead supply the living with eating and drinking.

The Atlantic was lost through want of prudence. The circumstance was talked of for a day; the next, it was replaced by one of far superior magnificence.

Boston.

I had faithfully promised to be in Boston before the end of November,* and true to my word, arrived there on the 29th, I was thoroughly worn out and exhausted by my efforts in New York. But my courage had not for an instant given way, I felt armed with more than sufficient energy to carry on a musical campaign, which had been fraught with so much success in the Empire-City.

My first care, on arriving at Boston, was to study and appreciate as much as lay in my power, the habits, customs, and manners of its inhabitants, known in all America and in Europe by the name of Yankees. This is the appellation of all those born in Massachusetts, and I cannot possibly imagine or institute a more just and striking comparison than by liking them to our cunning, crafty, and clever Normands. They are loyal to the utmost degree in the fulfilment of any contract, either written, signed, or sealed, or by word of mouth, no matter which, each is held as sacred and binding, and no breach is ever, for an instant, thought of. They, however, foresee all objections, any difficulty which might afterwards arise is anticipated, no unforeseen or unexpected probable occurrence can escape them; and there is no combination of words (tournures des phrases) or argument ever overlooked. Nothing which might carry conviction or belief into the minds of the undecided is ever neglected or unemployed. There is nothing that their smooth tongues will not have recourse to when this object is in view; and they never fail to have recourse to any permissible cunning which will hasten or bring about the conclusion of any advantageous affair. The Yankee most essentially differs from the inhabitant of New York, and one is inclined to suppose that nature has established this difference. The inhabitants of Massachusetts further enforce this dissimulant, and seem to have a cunning pleasure in making this natural dissemblance more apparent. For this reason, nothing was more likely than an enterprise, which had met with success in New York, should altogether fail in Boston. This, for some years past, has been the same with Paris and London; longer ago, it was quite the reverse. To make certain of a cordial welcome in England, it was indispensable to have received the plaudits—the baptism—of a Parisian audience, this was the sine qua non. At the present moment, I believe it to be quite different, it is enough to have gained the spurs in Paris, to have them refused in London, to obtain—where nothing but glory and honour was expected—a repulse and total defeat: or, if the English do, not unmake the reputations we have formed with great trouble, they completely monopolise and claim them as their property, so saturate them with enthusiasm and guineas as to force the object to forget and erase from his memory the country where he first took wing. This is the exact kind of rivalry which reigns between New York and Boston.

CHARACTER OF THE YANKEES

The mind of the Yankee is serious, calculating, meditative, and religious. Among them the sciences obtain a far greater share of honour and profit than the arts. Puritanism sways to an extraordinary extent, both their actions and thoughts, and naturally inclines them to find much more pleasure and enjoyment in scientific lectures and public preaching than any amusement or instruction the arts could pretend to afford. Preaching and religious instruction take place even in the open air, and crowds flock to these public exhibitions, of which the expounding of the Bible and the ways and means for the salvation of the soul, are the principal objects. Warnings for the wicked and consolation for the good, compose their whole stock-in-trade, not weighty in a material sense, but of the utmost importance in a Divine one. Preaching, which has temperance for its object, is generally the most patronized, and Sunday is the day the orators mostly choose for their orations. Oftentimes have I met them on chariots, furiously gesticulating, opening a large and capacious mouth for their voices to be heard at a distance, by those who were not fortunate enough to obtain a near approach. Ordinarily, they are surrounded by an immense concourse of auditors, who listen with the most profound silence and pay the most scrupulous attention to the harangue; not a single assistant would think of leaving the crowd he has helped to enlarge, before the preacher strikes his hands together twice; this is the signal that the oration is concluded. The same individual, drawn by his vehicle, will repair to another neighbourhood, and again repeat the same sentiments to a new and increased audience no less attentive and silent than the previous one. Both men and women mix in these public assemblies, but never to the prejudice of the most irreproachable conduct, nothing can be more orderly or well-behaved than these Sunday congregations.

Numerous blue-stockings are to be found in Boston, and I must confess, that it was not this I was best pleased at. There, she who is acquainted with a little of everything, who has studied the sciences, commerce, she who has gathered a thorn from the path of literature, who has attempted any of the arts, neither resembles the English or French, she has no analogy with our blue-stocking of Europe; she is a creature apart, it is a mixture of the priest and the man of knowledge, of the merchant and the literary man, with all the faults of a pedant, and none—not one—of the qualities you would wish and expect to meet with in a woman of real knowledge. After this, can you be astonished at the puritanism which seems to have instilled itself in all ranks of the inhabitants of Boston? Can you feel any surprise at the severity with which the male portion not only regulate their dress, but their conduct? They will not suffer any stranger to smoke in the streets, and should a watchman meet with any incautious personage innocently enjoying a cigar in Tremont-street, or in the Park, he peremptorily gives him to understand that no such thing is allowed in Boston, that the immaculate town, of which he surveys and regulates the public conduct, does not grant the same liberty of action as the other towns of the Union.

Should you feel inclined to visit the theatre, you must not neglect to dress with the utmost exactitude, a red or yellow spot either on a black or white cravat, would authorise them to refuse you entrance. The black coat is so rigorously enforced, and so usual, and so generally adopted by the Yankees, that they suppose it impossible for any one to appear otherwise accounted either in a theatre or concert-room.

One day my servant, while brushing my coat, caught sight of a small piece of red ribbon which was attached to the button-hole. He innocently thought it was a private mark for me to recognise my coat from those of the other travellers lodging in the same hotel. He came, and with great precaution, asked me if he might take it away, assuring me, I should never have cause to blame him for giving me any other coat than my own. To cut short the observations of this scrupulous negro, I took the offending piece of ribbon and put it in my pocket.

MUSIC IN ARABIA.

M. Comber, commissioned by the French government to make certain scientific investigations in the East, gives the following interesting particulars respecting the state of music among the Arabs:—

"In quitting France, I have regretted few things so much as the music I leave behind. As often, therefore, as an opportunity has presented itself of listening to music, I have seized it with avidity. At Malta, I was present at the representation of Mercadante's I Briganti, but in spite of my inclination to be satisfied with the orchestra and singers, I am obliged to avow that they were detestable: and greatly was I grieved to hear this score of Mercadante, which seems to me very fine, so ill understood and interpreted. I found, too, a theatre at Alexandria and another at Cairo, but he who would enjoy them must not be too particular. Nevertheless, the establishment of these two theatres in a Mohammedan country is a remarkable fact, well worth recording. Arab music makes little progress; it is monotonous, without sweetness or charm of any kind. The Arabs have some few melodies slightly striking; but all the rest are impressed with one character, which offers no variety. Of harmony they are entirely ignorant. If they sing in chorus, they sing the same notes; and yet they are passionate lovers of music. No fete can take place among them without music, nor do they ever work but to the accompaniment of singing. Their musical sense only wants enlivening, they want composers and teachers. It is remarkable

* It will be remarked by the reader, that at least a year must have elapsed between Mr. H. Herz's first and second visit to Boston.

that music is here more intensely felt by the multitude—the populace—than by the higher classes. The few European musicians who have visited Egypt, have asserted that the Arabs were insensible to our music. This is not strictly true, and the following incident proves the contrary. We were journeying towards Upper Egypt, and had halted in the neighbourhood of a beautiful village, called Magaga, situated between Benisouef and Mignie, on the left bank of the Nile. The sky was cloudless, and the full moon shone on a fairy landscape. The ripples of the river ran silver in its light, and majestic palm trees threw their waving shadows on the bank. At intervals veiled women passed silently by, and in the distance was heard the barking of famished dogs. The firmament glittered with stars, and I wandered slowly through the palm groves, drinking in the beauty of the spectacle which spread out before me. All at once I was seized with a passionate desire for music, and I entreated Peluchenu, one of my travelling companions, to send for his violin, which was in the boat, and play for me. With his accustomed courtesy, he indulged my longing; and at the first sounds of his instrument a number of natives, who were scattered around, grouped themselves about us, and leaning on their clubs, listened attentively. The first pieces played were heard in silence, and it was evident that the auditors were agreeably affected by the music. A murmur of pleasure hailed the overture to La Caravane, but the enthusiasm somewhat cooled at the ondante. A waltz by Labitski, excited transports; but Weber's Last Waltz seemed to strike them as wearisome. The allegros, the quick and light movements, were decidedly more to their taste than grave and imposing compositions. The "Prayer of Moses," however, made a profound impression on them. They listened in religious silence, and questioned us as to the meaning of that mysterious and sublime language. When I explained to them that it was the prayer of a prophet to God, they asked him for a repetition of it; and when their request was complied with, they looked at one another with astonishment, and expressed their admiration by a general exclamation. An Arab never stands when he can sit; yet, so long as the sounds of the violin continued, no one sat down; the pleasure which they evidently experienced made them forget that they were on their legs—a fact sufficiently remarkable to any one familiar with Oriental habits. A native—I mean an Arabian—air, performed by Peluchenu, concluded the musical entertainments of an evening, which will be long impressed on my memory. Peluchenu was vehemently applauded; and the Arabs, grateful for the pleasure which they had received from us, repaid the debt by dancing to the sound of the tarabouk, and singing their favourite airs. We passed a portion of the night beneath the palm-groves, and the hours glided rapidly away.

Dramatic.

HAYMARKET.—Mr. Webster's elegant and fashionable theatre opened for the winter campaign on Monday with brilliant eclat. The house, in every respect, presented a brilliant appearance. The interior has been thoroughly cleansed, refreshed, and partly re-decorated, and was as gay as new colours, new gold, and new damask could make it. The audience was unusually brilliant, the dress circle exhibiting quite an operatic splendour. The entertainments were, Macfarren's opera, King Charles the Second, and the two popular Buckstonian farces, the Rough Diamond, and the Three Shaws; or, Wagshaw, Bagshaw, and Ragshaw—the latter by no means calculated to excite the "pshaws" of the critic. A smiling opera, therefore, and two roaring farces constituted a right merry entertainment for one evening.

Our readers have no need to be made acquainted with our opinions respecting the merits of Macfarren's work. They have been told over and over again, in the pages of the MUSICAL WORLD. It is just two years and a month since King Charles the Second was first produced at the Princess's Theatre. It had a run of nearly fifty nights in that house, and has since been played in most of the principal towns of England, Ireland, and Scotland, with invariable success. Its performance on Monday night, at the Haymarket, included four of the principal artistes in their original parts; viz. Mr. Harrison as Charles; Mr. Weiss as Captain Copp; Madame Macfarren as the Page; and Miss Lousia-Pyne as Fanny. The substitutions were, Miss Pyne for Mrs. Weiss in the Queen, and Mr. Durand for Mr. H. Corri in Rochester. The orchestra was well and carefully selected, and comprised several names of note, and, if not all that could be desired for a work of such pretension as that of King Charles the Second, was very efficient, and certainly the best we have heard at a non-operatic theatre for many years. The same may be affirmed of the chorus, which did the music great justice as far as their means allowed. The whole of the first finale—an unusually lengthy and elaborate composition—was excellently rendered, as were also the concerted pieces in the second act. We must here award the highest praise to Mr. Alfred Mellon, the musical conductor, for the pains he has taken, and the care he has expended in getting up the music. King Charles the Second is no ballad opera, and requires a good head to superintend it and bring it to fruitful issue. The dresses were extremely rich and appropriate, and the scenery and miseen scene all that could be desired. In short, the greatest credit is due to the management for the enterprise and spirit exhibited in a production out of the usual routine of the theatre.

The favourites were all received with immense fervour; Mr. Harrison and Miss Louisa Pyne, of course, coming in for the lion's share of enthusiasm. We have not heard Mr. Harrison in such good voice for years; he sang with unusual power and effect. The duet with Rochester was rendered with so much spirit and energy as to provoke an encore, which, we believe, had not happened hitherto. Mr. Harrison was also exceedingly happy in his other songs, especially "Here's to the maid with the love-laughing eye," which barely escaped a repeat. We also admired greatly his mezzo voce singing in the beautiful quartet, "O father, prove not so unkind," and the expression exhibited therein, which went far in obtaining for it the rapturous encore it got. Mr. Harrison's acting is also to be praised for the heartiness and jollity in the disguised scenes—the only situations, by the way, where acting can be really shown—and the exertions he made throughout the performance, to do it every justice, vocal and histrionic. Altogether, we should say, Mr. Harrison's King Charles is decidedly his best part. He was applauded throughout very warmly.

Mr. Durand is a debutante. He is not deficient in vocal capabilities, but has hardly the powers to suit him for a part like Rochester. After a few nights he may improve.

Miss Pyne sang the music of the Queen carefully and tastefully. She has a nice mezzo-soprano voice, which she manages with skill. Her first ballad, "Fare ye well, fond hopes adorning"—with new music, by the way—was rather a nervous display. As Miss Pyne warmed she became better, and in the concerted morceau in the Palace, she gave the bravura passages capably and with decided effect.

Madame Macfarren, as usual, exhibited her musician-like feeling and skill, and sang every note of the music entrusted to her with effect, despite her evident nervousness. We could wish that Madame Macfarren would get rid of that extreme timidity which seems to mar her best histrionic intentions. The fair artist need not feel ashamed of displaying her limbs, which are particularly well-shaped; and yet it always appeared to us as though this very talented lady was not quite at her ease in masculine garments since she never exhibited any of that nervous timidity, when we saw her in Gustavus, or the Night Dancers, in her proper attire. Madame Macfarren is very young to the stage, and will, no doubt, get rid of this very natural feeling.

Miss Louisa Pyne sings as charmingly as ever, and acts with a great deal more spirit and naïveté. Her reception was a very warm one, and the several encores she obtained showed her still the particular favorite of the public. We marked and admired many points in Miss Louisa Pyne's Fanny on Monday night, which, not seeing on former occasions, we could not admire. Miss Louisa Pyne was encored in "Canst thou deem my heart is changing," "A poor simple Maiden," and in the quartet, "O father, prove not so unkind."

Mr. Weiss, we fancy, makes up rather too old in Captain Copp. The fine voice of this gentleman tells to peculiar advantage in the concerted music, in which he bears a conspicuous part, and his "Nan of Battersea" is a fine specimen of rough and energetic singing—qualities best adapted in interpreting a sea-song.

The encores were seven in all; two in the first act, and five in the second. This was a great triumph for the music, more especially since two of the "popularities" in the first act escaped the usual honors.

All the artists were recalled at the termination of both acts.

It being opening night the "National Anthem" was sung by the whole company, Miss Pyne, Miss Louisa Pyne, and Mr. Harrison taking the solos. A general call was then made for Mr. Webster, whereupon the curtain rose, and "God save the Queen" was repeated. The curtain having descended, a second call was made for Mr. Webster, who, being at Calais, did not respond.

The inimitable Buckstone and the charming Mrs. Fitzwilliam next enlivened the audience in the Rough Diamond; and the three "Shaws" wound up the night.

On Tuesday Mrs. Stirling made her reentrée—to borrow a word from over the way—in The Ladies' Battle, and Mr. Webster made his first winter bow in his celebrated part, Tartuffe, in Molière's play of that name. Mrs. Stirling is a great favorite with all publics, and whether she play at the Strand, the Olympic, Drury Lane, or the Haymarket, she possesses equal attractions. In obtaining the services of so popular and talented an actress Mr. Webster exhibited sound generalship.

Mr. Webster had a tremendous reception. The audience cheered him for several minutes. He played with as much finesse and fineness as ever in the immortal hypocrite of Molière, and was never more loudly and continuously applauded.

King Charles the Second was repeated on Wednesday and last night. We have to notice an improvement in the general performance, seeing that Miss Pyne and Mr. Durand had, in a great measure, got rid of their nervousness, and that Madame Macfarren did not show that extreme timidity observable on the first night. This opera ought really to prove attractive. The beauty of the music, the merriment and liveliness of the book, and the careful and efficient manner in which it is performed should secure for it a large amount of patronage. All we have to say is, if King Charles the Second does not draw, we have no hope whatever for a National Opera.

OLYMPIC.—On Tuesday week, Shakespeare's play of The Merchant of Venice was produced here with Mr. Henry Farren as Shylock and Miss Laura Keane as Portia.

Mr. Henry Farren has now been some time before the London public, and although, on his first appearance, he was favourably received as bearing a name which his inimitable father had for ever rendered celebrated in the annals of the British Drama, there were many persons who predicted very confidently that he would never attain to any very eminent rank in his profession; they were willing to allow that he would prove a respectable actor, but not a great one. These persons forgot one thing: that use and experience are to a young actor's talent what the chisel of a Canova is to the block of marble; however great the actor's talent may be, it avails him little until use and experience have lent their aid to mould it into those forms which shall charm and delight the beholder. The Shylock of Mr. Henry Farren completely proves what we have now advanced. We have no doubt that this gentleman conceived the character as well, three years ago, as he does at present; but we are equally as sure that had he played it then the result would have been widely different, and we might perhaps have had to chronicle a failure; at present we have to record a triumph: his Shylock is most certainly the most perfect of his performances we have yet witnessed.

Among the best scenes we may mention that with Antonio in which he has to deliver the celebrated speech beginning—"Signor Antonio, many a time and oft," etc., and that with Salarino in which he pours out his long list of interrogatories—"Hath not a Jew eyes? Hath not a Jew hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions," etc., with the most telling effect; nor must we pass without praise the following scene with Tubal in which he learns that Antonio has an "Argosy cast away coming from Tripolis," and exclaims thereupon—"I thank God, I thank God! Is it true, is it true?" The manner in which Mr. H. Farren delivered this last sentence brought down long continued applause, and proved to our mind most satisfactorily that though talent is not generally hereditary, there are some rare instances in which it most certainly is so.

The Portia of Miss Laura Keane was a quiet, ladylike performance, never absolutely bad, but never rising into greatness. We still adhere to the opinion we gave in the MUSICAL WORLD of last week, that this young lady has much to learn before she can claim for herself the vacant thrones of Helen Faucit or of Miss Cushman.

A new farce entitled the "Original Bloomers" has not met with the most uproarious success. Plot there is none—fun, very little. It is a mere piece de circonstance, and not a very good one. It will serve to fill up a space in the bills until the management have something new, and then it will be shelved.

PUNCH'S PLAYHOUSE.—A little sketch founded on our national and Christianlike practice of burning Guido Faux, Esq., every Fifth of November, has proved a "hit" for this little theatre. It is from the pens of Messrs. Sutherland Edwards and Augustus Mayhew, and has achieved merited success.

ADELPHI.—We believe that no more novelty is to be expected here until Christmas. M. Grisar's pretty opera "Good Night, Signor Pantalon," has reached its 120th night, Mr. Silsbee continues to give his Americanisms amidst incessant bursts of merriment—and last, though not least—the fair Adelphian luminary, and most graceful Bloomer, Miss Woolgar, displays the social vivacity of her acting, and a costume in which she has continued to combine elegance and femininity to a degree that we could hardly have supposed to belong to Bloomerism.

SADLER'S WELLS.—Murphy's little comedy, "Three Weeks after Marriage," has been played during the week.

Miss Fitzpatrick's Lady Racket differs somewhat from the traditional readings, which have always invested the character with the polished dignity and elegance of fashionable life. Miss Fitzpatrick, on the contrary, is the lively and spoiled child, become a woman, and transferring her love of power and contradiction from the nursery to the drawing-room. If this reading is less striking, it is more original, and the fair artiste embodies it with natural ease, and grace. In short, Miss Fitzpatrick's thoughts are evidently her own—she puts no faith in tradition, and hence her acting has an impulsive freshness which already atones for the defects of youth and inexperience.

THE RIVAL HOUSES RECONCILED.

(From "The Month.")

We learn, from private information that may be relied upon, that Messrs. Lumley and Gye have determined on uniting their respective companies next season, and conducting the Opera on an entirely new and original plan, which, owing to the excitement attendant on the Great Exhibition having subsided, and a duller season than ordinary, anticipated will be necessary to ensure anything like success.

Acting, therefore, upon the old adage that "union is strength," Messrs. Lumley and Gye have joined forces, and agreed upon a very peculiar line of management, of which the following is a slight sketch. In the first place they have come to the conclusion, that, without the inducement of "playhouse prices," none but a few grey-headed old gentlemen, or withered old ladies, of the bygone Ancient Concert style of audience, will pay to attend a representation of Don Giovanni, or Le Nozze di Figaro. Secondly, all the pretty lighter operas, such as L'Elisir d'Amore, La Sonnambula, Don Pasquale &c., &c., are too hacknied to be looked upon as great attractions; so that the repertoire of really "drawing" operas may be said to be nearly confined to Lucrezia Borgia, Les Huguenots, Le Prophète. In this emergency, as the roccoco legitimate drama has all blown up and gone to pieces at last, having nobody but Messrs. Creswick, Charles Kean, Hicks, and Co., to support it, it has occurred to Messrs. Lumley and Gye to have some of the best-known English comedies and farces translated into Italian; and to engage M.M. Meyerbeer and Auber, at liberal salaries, to compose music for them.

We are in a position to give our readers the cast of one or two of those that have been already decided on:—

THE SCHOOL FOR SCANDAL.

Sir Peter Teazle	Signor Ronconi.
Sir Oliver Surface	Signor Lablache.
Joseph Surface	Herr Formes.
Charles Surface	Signor Mario.
Sir Benjamin Backbite	Signor Stigelli.
Crabtree	Signor Tagliafico.
Rowley	Signor Polonini.
Snake	Signor Rache.
Trip	Signor Luigi Mei.
Moses	Signor Rommi.
Lady Teazle	Madame Sontag.
Mrs. Candour	Madame Garcia.
Lady Sneerwell	Mademoiselle Angri.
Maria	Mademoiselle Corbari.

This will be followed by an Opera Buffa version (somewhat in the style of the Prova d'un Opera Seria) of Box and Cox, under the title of

IL STAMPATORE ED IL CAPPELLAIO.

Box, stampatore	Signor Lablache.
Cox, cappellaio	Signor Ronconi.
Mrs. Bouncer	Mademoiselle Cotti.

We are unable at present to give the full cast of The Beggar's

Opera, which is also mentioned; but Tamberlik is talked of for Captain Macheath, and Grisi and Viardot for Polly and Lucy. Tamburini will most probably be the Peachum, and Alboni, Mrs. P.

Other pieces are mentioned, but are, as yet, by no means, decided upon. Among them we may mention Hamlet, High Life Below Stairs, She Stoops to Conquer, and The Wreck Ashore. In the latter piece, Lablache's Marmaduke Magog will, it is believed, eclipse John Reeve's. Maraldi will play Walter Barnard; Sofie Cruvelli, Alice; Herr Formes, Grampus; Corbari, Bella; and Massol, Miles Bertram. Meanwhile we can only heartily wish Messrs. Gye and Lumley the success their novel undertaking so well deserves.

JULLIEN'S CONCERTS.

Jullien is doing wonders at Drury Lane. Without the French Drummers he is doing wonders. Without the three Military Bands he is doing wonders. Without the chorus to shout in the Grand Exhibition Quadrille he is doing wonders. By means legitimate and simple—by the instrumentality (without a pun) of the first players, some of the first players, in the world, he is doing wonders. And where is the wonder, if, with Bottesini, Sivori, Piatti, Miss Dolby, Mrs. Alexander Newton, and others, together with his magnificent band, Jullien is doing wonders. Drury Lane is, as it were, roomless every night. Never did such crowds congregate before even to these most popular of entertainments. Were they to continue but for half a year with such success as in the two weeks past, Jullien would be enabled to purchase one of the Irish Encumbered Estates, and retire from public life. Wherefore, we are thankful that the Drury Lane Concerts continue not for so long a period, and thus present an impossibility to Jullien's conglomerating so much money as would render him lord of an encumbered estate and take him from our eyes for ever.

There were several novelties since we last quoted. M. Billet, the eminent classical pianoforte player, appeared on Saturday and had a great success. This success, however, according to the Times, was neutralised by the thin tone of the instrument on which he played; the instrument, most strange to say, being neither more nor less than the identical one, according to the bills, which obtained the Council Medal at the Exhibition. For our own parts we agree with the writer in the Times, and consider the piano in question as one by no means favourable for the exhibition of the qualities of a pianist in a large theatre. So much so indeed, that we would advise M. Billet to take an unexhibited piano on which to test his powers for the future.

Mrs. Alexander Newton was another novelty, and one which proved highly acceptable to the multitudes. Mrs. Newton has appeared every night during the week, Monday excepted. She chose for the two first songs, the "Qui la voce," from Puritani, and a new song by Macfarren, called "I am alone." Mrs. Alexander Newton's voice told with brilliant effect in Bellini's cavatina, and excited great applause; and an enthusiastic encore was the consequence of the second. Macfarren's new song is a charming specimen of a plaintive ballad, and was given with irresistible feeling and expression by the fair songstress. We should advise Mrs. Alexander Newton, however, as we last week advised Miss Dolby, to eschew scenes and cavatinas, which depend so much for their effect on the same situation. "Qui la voce," for instance, is sung by Elvira, under the influence of madness, with her hair dishevelled, and all made up for dramatic effect. Mrs. Alexander Newton, on the contrary, comes forward in the calmest manner possible, like Lalagen, sweetly smiling, dressed with the most minute attention to graceful details, and with a printed copy (by Boosey or Prowse) runs her sparkling glances over the pages, and commences her mad song with a happy and a healthful look. Mrs. Newton, let us have no more mad songs at Jullien's Concerts! Your sweet looks and charming voice will tell to more advantage in songs not directly wedded to the situation.

Another novelty was Piatti, who played a duet with Bottesini on Wednesday night. The effect was terrific. Bottesini continues the lion of Jullien's menagerie, even although Sivori—another novelty—tried a bout with him for superiority, several nights during the week.

The "Bloomer Quadrille"—another novelty—was produced on Monday, and excited great mirth and applause. It is Jullien's comic masterpiece. A new valse by Jullien, also was played; and the fantasia on airs from Don Giovanni, which proved so favourable for Jullien's soloists; as well as many more novelties—all acceptable to the patulous public.

On Monday, positively, the "Indian Quadrille" will be given, and the highest anticipations are formed about this new work of the composer, which is expected to contain many novelties, surprises, and new effects.

GIAMBATTISTA MARTINI.

The historians of music, to whose labours we are indebted for much of the materials employed in our biographical department, have no less a claim to our notice than professors themselves. Many productions of the latter, and even the very names of some of the individuals, would have sunk into oblivion, had they not been rescued by writers in this branch of literature, through whose means attention has often been called to meritorious compositions nearly lost, of which only a copy or two had escaped the spoliation of time; while the record of names has in several remarkable instances led to the discovery of works, which in a few years would, probably, have perished.

Among these historians the subject of the present memoir holds a prominent place, though he only completed part of a great design. But his history is not the only produce of his pen that entitles him to our notice. His practical Essay on Counterpoint has conferred on him a distinction which alone would be sufficient to render the omission of his name in this portion of our work an act of injustice to his memory, and a sufficient cause of complaint to our readers.

GIAMBATTISTA MARTINI—well known in Europe by the title of Padre Martini—minor conventuale of the order of St. Francis, and Member of the Institute of Sciences and Philharmonic Society of Bologna, was born in that city in 1706. In his youth he was admitted into the Franciscan order; but it does not appear whether he was ordained before or after his taste for erudition and love of antiquity had led him in his travels even as far as Asia. But it was on his return that he devoted himself entirely to music, which he studied under many masters; among whom he mentions the celebrated Antonio Pertì.

His progress in composition was so rapid, that in 1723 he was appointed maestro di capella of the monastery of his order at Bologna, a situation which he retained till his death. He exercised as part of his office the functions of professor, and his school—the most learned at that time existing in Italy—produced a number of artists of the highest excellence, among whom was the famous Jomelli.

To a talent for instruction, he united that for composing. He wrote a vast quantity of church music, which was highly esteemed; but those compositions which had the greatest success were his duets in the fugue style, and canons for the harpsichord or organ, which are excessively difficult. These, in spite of their coldness, pleased by the purity, clearness, and good taste which characterise them.

But he derived most of his reputation from his Saggio fondamentale pratico di Contrappunto sopra il Canto Fermo, (or Practical Essay on Counterpoint on a Plain Song), and his History of Music.

The former of the works is divided into two parts, or volumes. In the first is a "Compendium of the Elements and Rules of Counterpoint." The laws of harmony are here comprised in ten rules, which are well explained and illustrated. Then follows his Practical Essay on Counterpoint, with upwards of sixty compositions in all the ecclesiastical tones, by the greatest masters of the old school of counterpoint in Italy; such as Animuccia, Cifra, Palestrina, Porta, Zarlino, and others.

The second part contains a practical essay on contrappunto fugato, by which the art of fugue is intended to be implied, though inaccurately expressed. Here all the terms of this art are explained, and canon is defined. There are prefixed to many ancient canons, certain mottoes and enigmas of very difficult solution. The author has collected and explained a series of these. All the rules and terms are illustrated by examples of composition by Martini himself. After which are nearly fifty compositions from the works of Palestrina, Agostini, Luca Marenzio, Monteverde, Clari, Lotti, Marcello, Pertì, Stradella, Steffani, Scarlatti, &c., in 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8 parts. The grand merit then of Martini, in this work, consists in his having proved how perfectly conversant he was with the excellent schools of the 16th and 17th centuries; and in having made his reader appreciate the admirable taste and judgment with which he has selected the chef-d'œuvres of that period.

His "History of Music" is a work that proves his immense reading, and prodigious erudition. It is a succession of essays written with a complete knowledge of the subject, but the design is defective, and the arrangement without method. He proposed to comprise it in five volumes, but would have extended it to five times the length, had he finished it according to the plan on which he set out.

With a view of pursuing his labours, he amassed an enormous quantity of materials. All the Italian libraries enriched him with their precious manuscripts. His friend Botrigari bequeathed to him his grand collection, which contained many rare works; and the generosity of the famous Farinelli, who furnished him with considerable funds, enabled him to obtain all the materials that were to be procured. These, united, formed a library of seventeen thousand volumes, of which three hundred were manuscript. They occupied four rooms. In the first were the MSS., the second and third contained the printed books, and the fourth was filled with the works of composers of all ages and countries.

"No history of music," says Dr. Burney, "had been attempted in Italy since that of Bontempi appeared in 1695, till Padre Martini, in 1757, published, in 4to., the first volume of his Storia (della) Musica, upon so large a scale, that though the chief part of his life seems to have been dedicated to it, only three volumes were published before his decease."

The first volume of this elaborate work only contains sixty-one pages of history, which advance the subject no further than what the sacred writings have told us concerning its state among the Hebrews, &c. The rest of the volume is filled with dissertations on the nature of melody, the Greek system, &c.

The second and third volumes, printed in 1770 and 1781, do not bring the history down lower than Alexander the Great. The style of his work has been said to be dry and prolix. "It is, indeed, enlivened by no extraneous matter, but each page is replete with information on the subject in question! and the notes abound in curious passages from scarce books."

In 1769 the Padre drew up, and gave to his disciples, a very short tract, entitled "Compendio della theoria de numeri per uso del musico di F. Giambattista Martini." In this are defined the principal calculations and ratios in the division of the monochord, and in temperament.

A rude and formidable attack was, in 1775, made on his Saggio di Contrappunto, by the Spanish jesuit Eximeno, in which, in defence of his own system, he endeavors to overturn all others, and principally that which Martini explains and defends. Eximeno was an acute reasoner and an able writer, and there is much good sense and strong argument, mixed up with some conceit and pertinacity, in his "Dubbio," but his publication did not produce the effect he anticipated from it; the advocate of Cantor Fermo stood on ground that remained unshaken by the violence of the Spaniard. He was also assailed by Andrea Manini, of Udini, in a work entitled "Trattato in genere teorico," whereupon the Neapolitans, whose school and method of teaching counterpoint by writing upon Canto Fermo, had been so ably defended by Martini in his Saggio di Contrappunto, published, without name or date, a pamphlet under the title of "Giudicio di Apollo," in which all the venerable harmonists of the 16th and 17th centuries appear before the god of song in defence of the person attacked; and "the author of the libel is sentenced, not only to perpetual banishment from Parnassus, and from all intercourse with the Muses and their votaries, but prohibited in future from all use of his pen." This pamphlet was circulated all over Italy, nobody knew by whom or by what means.

The gentleness, simplicity, and modesty which formed the character of Martini; his eagerness to communicate to every one who desired it the treasures of science and learning which he possessed, gained him universal veneration and esteem. Frederick the Great, to whom he sent his History of Music in 1782, paid him the compliment to acknowledge the present with his own hand, accompanying his letter by a snuff-box, in which was the monarch's miniature, encircled with diamonds. Every one whom the love of the arts conducted to Italy, visited him as he passed through Bologna; and withdrew penetrated with sentiments of admiration and gratitude.

Burney says, "that he had symptoms of water on the chest, as far back as 1774, of which he died in 1784."

At Rome, a discourse on the Padre Martini was delivered, and published, by the Padre della Valle, on the 24th of November, 1784. It was likewise on this occasion that the Maestro di Capella, Sabbatini, caused a mass by Padre Martini to be performed with vast pomp. Another eulogy appeared at Bologna in 1786, by G. B. Moreschii. Martini bequeathed his materials to the Abbe Matte, his scholar, who it was hoped, would finish his History of Music; but he never, we believe, set seriously to work in his task; in fact, the publication of Burney's rendered such an undertaking almost unnecessary.

Original Correspondence.

"THE GREGORIAN CHANT."

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—I have always been unwilling to notice anonymous articles in the public prints, but having seen two lately in your paper signed "An Old Correspondent," which I think both ill-spirited and likely to do mischief, I am led to say a word or two respecting them.

As regards your correspondent's views of the Gregorian Chant I entirely agree, so far as to its being behind the musical knowledge of the day, and not being in accordance with the feeling or taste of the public generally; with the aid of modern harmony it may however be made, and has been made, a very suitable adornment of devotional praise; but I entirely disagree with the motives your correspondent attaches to such as have adopted it. "A ruse," he says in his letter two, was adopted by the clergy for the sake of keeping the lead in the musical arrangements of their churches; and this ruse he explains further on to be the introduction of these antiquated chants; for what purpose think you? In order, he says, that the clergy, whom he describes as having uncultivated voices, and uncultivated ears to a greater extent than others, might be able still to lead the people, and still to secure their prerogative!

Was anything ever heard half so preposterous, anything half so absurd? Again, too, still bearing hard upon the same body, he says, "the clergy of the church of England have the ambition to seek the direction of musical matters, but have neither the attainments nor the spirit to carry it out." There is a bitterness lurking in these words which defeats their object, and carries with them their own condemnation.

First of all let me in reply say, that the clergy of the church of England with few, very few, exceptions, are not advocates of Pope Gregory's music; and that where they are, that music is conducted by the organist who instructs the choir; that it is not "led by the priest at whatever pitch is convenient to himself," so that the "ecclesiastical disinterestedness" of which your correspondent ironically speaks, which is shewn in the choice of these chants, just means what the expression is worth—nothing at all. In the second place, permit me to say that the clergy are not more deficient in music, as a body, than the laity generally, but (waiving the presumption that they ought to know more of it, by being so constantly interested in the music of their churches, attending rehearsals, and watching its progress) we will assume for argument's sake they know as much, the musical profession always excepted; are these, according to your correspondent's argument the laity, to have the chief direction of the music used at the sacred services, and also to be first in objecting to what is contrary to their taste, as your correspondent does, who from his expressions I presume is a layman?

Are the clergy then, equally capable of judging as they, to have the last, or no voice at all either way? Nay, Sir, I have said they were, or assumed them to be equally capable of judging with the laity, but I might have said, that their profession leads them naturally to a certain familiarity and acquaintance with church music more than what the laity enjoy; whereas it is urged in the two letters before me that "the clergy understand least of it, and have neither the attainments nor the spirit to acquire its knowledge!"

How differently has a "musician and organist lately expressed himself on these subjects in a short but excellent pamphlet, which I strongly recommend to "An Old Correspondent's" perusal. Imbued at once with the spirit of knowledge, and of charity, he speaks of the simplicity of church music, such as can be participated in by both priest and congregation as an indication of its surpassing excellence, and complains of the florid character of much of the present day; while "An Old Correspondent" speaks of the clergy reducing church music to this plain simplicity, in order that they might master it the more easily, and as a ruse on their parts to maintain their supremacy! The objection here urged against the simple form of music being that most used as laudatory of its fitness for sacred purposes by the writer named above, who complains of the removal of the plain song from the tenor to the treble part, and thus depriving the people of their birthright and portion in the sacred song.

I am sure every clergyman would gladly leave, as many do, the sole direction of the church music in the hands of such able men as him I have named above, whose judgment, no less than ability, are sufficient to ensure its being properly done; but unfortunately they cannot always do so. Some organists lack zeal, others industry, others ability; consequently the choirs become indifferent, and the music is sadly rendered; in many of our metropolitan churches the choral service is anything but creditably done. Does this imperfection then arise, as your correspondent urges, from the interference of the clergy? or is it not as probable by chance that the want of supervision in the clergyman may have induced a sense of apathy in that important branch of Divine service, and promoted rather than checked its indifference? I am much inclined to the latter opinion, for sure I am that where the clergy take a due interest in the choral parts of our sacred services, there we shall find a better rendering of the same, and it will be easy there also to trace the same spirit or feeling with which they have been influenced, communicated in large measure both to choir and choir-master.

I have made, Sir, these few observations, not with any direct intention of meeting, that is opposing or frustrating your "Old Correspondent's" arguments, or at all of controverting his singular notions regarding the unmusical voices and ears of the English clergy, and regarding their peculiar little ruses in the adoption of the old chants, for which I am sure they will feel much obliged to him; but I have done so with a view to check, if I may, the spread of such notions amongst others who may not be so well acquainted with the attainments or the spirit of the English clergy, as your correspondent happily seems to be.

I remain, Sir,
Respectfully apologising for the intrusion,
Your obedient Servant,

Notting Hill, 17th Nov., 1851.

ONE OF THE CLERGY.

* Lecture on Church Music by William Spark, organist of St. George's and St. Paul's, Leeds; conductor of the Philharmonic Society, &c. Leeds: R. Slocombe;—London: Novello.

ANDANTE AND ANDANTINO.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—Andante is oftentimes used as a positive term; it is unsafe to calculate upon its literal source, viz., from "Andare," to go—otherwise why would many of our great composers write Andante, con moto?

The Andante is often understood as the slow movement of the piece, and piu Andante would then be slower, and meno Andante quicker.

Yours,
PRACTICE.

BEAUTIES OF CAMBRIA.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—I was much surprised to see in the last number of the Musical World a review of some Welsh airs, arranged by me, and published by Mr. Lee ten years ago. I do not think it correct that pianoforte arrangements published so long since, should now be submitted to your reviewer as modern works. Of these circumstances your reviewer could not be aware, although he has justly stated in noticing the "Beauties of Cambria," that "these six pieces belong to an entirely different class of music from that in which we ranked some compositions of Mr. Richards' in our review of last week." I should have treated this affair, like many others, in silence; but that these publications have been advertised in the Musical World and in the Times as new music. In your last number Mr. Lee has also stated in his advertisement, that these "Beauties of Cambria" had been played by me at the meeting of the Welsh Society, on St. David's day, at the Freemasons Hall; and that they were dedicated to the late Duke of Newcastle; these statements are both incorrect. The arrangements of the Welsh airs performed in public by me, have never been published by Mr. Lee, and if this gentleman had recently perused the title-pages of the "Beauties of Cambria," he would not have made the mistake as regards the dedication.

I remain,
Truly yours,
BRINLEY RICHARDS.

6, Somerset-street, Portman-square,
Nov. 20th, 1851.

FERDINAND RIES'S WORKS.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—In the catalogue of Ferdinand Ries's works which is given in No. 16 of the Harmonicon, April, 1824, there are mentioned three pianoforte trios (op. 2, 28, and 63), and three pianoforte quartets (op. 13, 17, and 129). Can you give me any information as to where these works can be procured? Have they been published in London?

Your obedient servant,
LEGNA.

[Can any of our readers reply to Correspondent?—Ed.]

"WHAT TO AVOID."

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—As very many of your subscribers may be arranging their professional tours for the winter season, I think it but fair to tell them about the Assembly Rooms, at the King's Head Hotel, Cirencester, as, out of above 200 rooms that I have tried in all parts of England, this is the first complaint I have chosen to make publicly.

The room itself is a bare barn of a place, with stable-like, semi-circular windows, and plastered walls, and the approaches are rough and uncarpeted. The only ornament, is a large gas illumination plume of feathers, such as we stick up outside houses on great occasions; and this gem, the landlady is comically capacious of having touched, from some hazy legend of the Mississippi having blown her roof off. The sum I paid for the room was in itself quite enough. Two guineas, without lights and seats, compared with such fine rooms as the Council Chamber at Chichester, the New Hall at Reading, and fifty others; but this I do not so much grumble at. In the first place, for three dozen old chairs and twelve forms, an additional charge of one pound two was made. (The other chairs for stalls, I hired of an upholsterer at two shillings a dozen.) Finding the place damp and cold, I had a fire lighted in the rusty grate, from about half-past three till six. For this, five shillings (!) was charged. I carry my own London gas-man with me, as my apparatus at times requires a little more tact than we meet with in the provinces; but a man was forced on me, whom I did not want, and who charged four and sixpence, for turning the stopcock of the metre, which was all he did. An additional five shillings was then charged for some mysterious porter, whom I never saw; so that altogether the room came to Four Guineas, at the least, a few shillings less than the Music Hall in Store Street, in the height of the London season. I do not grumble at five, or ten, or even fifteen guineas (as at Bath), for a room with corresponding advantages; but in a little town like Cirencester, this extortion was really too glaring.

I am, yours obediently,

ALBERT SMITH.

Provincial.

MAIDSTONE.—(From our own Correspondent.)—A selection of music was given at the Corn Exchange, on Thursday se'nnight, for the benefit of Mr. Ireton, the director, we believe, of the military band of the cavalry depot. The concert, which was given under the patronage of Colonel Middleton and the Officers, was very well attended. The room was quite full; the audience including many of the gentry and musical amateurs of the town and neighbourhood, and a number of the officers of the depot. The vocalists were Miss Messent, Miss Bassano, and Mr. Leffler; and Mr. Willy played a couple of solos on the violin—Macfarren's trio "The Troubadour" was expressively delivered by Mr. Leffler and his fair compeers. Miss Messent was encored in Mr. Baker's ballad, "I've a heart to exchange;" Mr. Leffler sang Bellini's aria, "As I view these scenes;" and Miss Bassano was loudly applauded in Donizetti's popular aria "In questo semplice." Mr. Willy followed with a solo and variations, in which he displayed his usual taste and mastery of the instrument. The popularities of the second act which received the honour of encores were Barnet's duet, "The Singing Lesson," sung by Mr. Leffler and Miss Messent; "The Minstrel Boy," sung by Miss Bassano, in her most charming and impassioned manner; and the lively Scotch song, "Gin a Body," delivered by Miss Messent with the characteristic humour peculiar to her, this being the third encore the fair artiste received in the course of the evening. Indeed the concert throughout seemed to give very general satisfaction.

BARNSTAPLE.—(From a Correspondent.)—The theatre here which has now been open two months, under the management of the popular Plymouth Director, Mr. Newcombe, has had one run of continual success, such a troupe never having visited the town before. On Tuesday evening Miss Aldridge, a name well known in all the musical societies of Liverpool, gave The Hunchback and The Waterman for her benefit. The theatre was crowded in every part, and the performances gave the greatest satisfaction. Mr. Paumier's Master Walter was excellent, as was Mr. Newcombe's Modus. There was a dry quaint humour throughout in the latter gentleman's performance which hit the audience, and kept them in roars of laughter during the scene with Helen, which was admirably sustained by the fair beneficiaire. Sir Thomas Clifford and Julia, in the hands of Mr. and Mrs. Boyce, could not have been better acted in any provincial town, and the minor characters so often neglected in the provinces, were all ably sustained. Miss Aldridge was a capital Tom Tug. She sung the music admirably, and why the bills stated that she acted it (on this occasion only) I am at a loss to conceive, for she ought to be the stock Tom Tug, if one may judge from her success on Friday. Mr. Newcombe's Robin, well known in London and the provinces, is as humorous a bit of acting as one ever meets with; his song of "Cherries and plumbs" was received with shouts of laughter and was vehemently encored. Mrs. Parker's Mrs. Bundle was excellent, not the least exaggerated or vulgar. This lady's dressing is a model for all "the old women" on the stage.

PLYMOUTH.—Mr. Henry Reed is appointed conductor, and Mrs. Henry Reed (late Miss Emily Newcombe) pianiste to the Plymouth Philharmonic Society, which is supported by the chief aristocratic musical amateurs of the country, including the Earl of Mount Edgcombe.

LIVERPOOL.—The second of the Musical Union reunions took place on Monday evening last, in Mr. Elliston's room, Nelson St., Great George-square, which we were glad to see was again well filled by a numerous and fashionable audience. The programme included the names of Ries, Mozart, Mendelssohn, and Beethoven, with the addition of one piece by Wolff and Batta, illustrative of the modern school of composition. The quartett in F minor, for piano-forte, violin, viola, and violoncello, one of Ries's early works, was well played by Mrs. Beale, Messrs. Willy, Baetens, and Haddock. The performance of Mozart's quintett in C major was admirable. The undante was remarkable, as affording a very fine example of viola playing. Mr. Baetens has always stood high in our estimation as an artiste of first-rate capabilities. The duo concertante, by Wolff and Batta, for piano-forte and violoncello, was executed by Mrs. Beale and Mr. Haddock in a manner that elicited repeated expressions of admiration. Mr. Haddock's tone on the violoncello is pure and refined; and he displays considerable mechanical facility and certainty. Beethoven's trio in C minor, for piano-forte, violin, and violoncello, was capitally played by Mrs. Beale, Mr. Willy, and Mr. Haddock. We never heard Mrs. Beale play better. Mendelssohn's quartett in D, splendidly executed by Messrs. Willy, Lawson, Baetens, and Haddock, terminated the concert. Mr. Willy's rendering of this quartett was the theme of universal admiration. His tone is beautifully clear and liquid, and he has great energy and animation. His general style of playing is sound and musician-like, qualities which place him at the head of English violinists. We hope for other opportunities of hearing Mr. Willy during the series.—Liverpool Mail

KINGTON.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The first meeting of the Kington Musical Society, for this season, took place on Thursday evening, the 13th inst. Lord Mornington's glee, "Here in cool grot," was effectively rendered by the chorus, and elicited an enthusiastic encore. Haydn's andante, from Symphony No. 3, Mozart's spirited overture, "La Clemenza di Tito," and the andante, minuet, trio, and finale, from Haydn's symphony No. 1, also received the same compliment. Bateman's "Angel of the Flowers," and Miss Barker's clever glee, "Can a bosom," was well interpreted. Several other compositions of a lighter cast were sung, which found favour with the numerous audience assembled.

Reviews of Music.

"ROMANCE SANS PAROLES"—Pour Piano.

"REVERIE"—Nocturne.

"LA GRACIEUSE"—Mazurka—H. BOHRER. Chappell.

We have not lately met with three moderately easy pieces for the pianoforte better suited to the purpose for which they are destined, and at the same time graceful and well written, without a sign of labour or difficulty. Herr Bohrer is evidently a musician of experience, which in addition to an elegant turn of thought gives additional value to his effusions. Of the three pieces our preference must be given to the Romance sans paroles, the theme of which is exceedingly pretty and fresh, while the variations are skillfully designed and brilliant in effect. The Mazurka and the nocturne are shorter than their companion, but offer many noticeable points. Professors of the piano will lose nothing by recommending the three morceaux of Mr. Bohrer to their pupils.

"THE NATIONAL ANTHEM, 'GOD SAVE THE QUEEN'"—Newly harmonised by J. B. KEARNEY, B.A., St. John's College, Cambridge. J. Alfred Novello.

For treble, alto, tenor, and bass. An offering to the loyal and curious, to whose inspection we can safely recommend it.

"THEY WONT LET ME OUT"—Irish Ballad—Written by HUGH REILLY, Esq.—Composed by WILLIAM MURPHY, Jun. G. Case.

An Irish song to the backbone, written by an Irishman (Hugh Reilly is decidedly Celtic), and composed by an Irishman (Murphy—there is no mistake about the alias for potatoe). Were there no other proof present that this ballad was the concoction of a son of the Emerald Isle, it would be found in the fourth bar, where the three A's are repeated, and at the close, where the three D's are ditto'd. The air is not very original, but Mr. Murphy, jun. is a Mus. Bac.; nor the words egregiously poetical. The song, however, must pass muster, the more especially as the title-page is very handsome, being drawn in gold and crimson, or lake colour, which, notwithstanding, is a bull, the proper colour for an Irish song being an emerald green.

Foreign.

PARIS.—(From a Correspondent.)—The city of pleasures is becoming daily more animated and brilliant. Notwithstanding all that has been said about the impending crisis, Paris s'amuse and waits the coming blow with philosophic composure. True, many timid foreigners quit the city, but, as a balance, as many bold ones continue to arrive, and the season is likely to prove one of universal gaiety even for Paris, which is ever gay and busy. The theatres are progressing. The departure of the glorious Alboni, for awhile threw a damper upon the Opera; but her place has been filled up by a new singer, Mdle. Tedesco, of American celebrity, who, in Halevy's grand opera, La Reine de Chypre, has appeared with great success, and been much lauded by the press. In the same opera the popular barytone, Massol, has made his reentrée with brilliant success, en attendant the new part in M. Halevy's forthcoming opera, Le Juif Errant, which he is about to create. Roger, fresh from his German triumphs, added to the interest of the representation; and Shapuis, the new tenor, sang the couplets of the fifth act. The opera has been repeated several nights since, en attendant the new grand ballet, Vert-Vert, which will be produced on Monday next. Meanwhile, Alboni is gone to Turin to fulfil an engagement of eight performances in the capital of Sardinia, and takes Lyons en route for four performances. She is not going, as was stated, to return to Madrid. On dit, that both Mr. Lumley and M. Roqueplan have despatched messengers after the celebrated cantatrice, to endeavour to obtain her for the Italiens, or the Academie; which will get her, if either, it is impossible to say. The third lyric theatre, or Opera Nationale, is not doing very well. Perhaps, however, when the new opera of Felician David comes out, things may change for the better. One of the approaching novelties of this theatre is Balfe's Bohemian Girl, which has never been heard in Paris. The popular composer is here completing a new opera for the ensuing campaign of Mr. Bunn at Drury Lane. He keeps very quiet, and is seldom seen on the Boulevards. At the Opera Comique a new opera, by Limnander, a Belgian composer, who gained considerable reputation by his Montenegrins, is in rehearsal, and will be produced immediately. Madame Ugalde will take the principal character. In the meanwhile Mehul's Joseph, and the inexhaustible repertoire of Auber font les frais. You will be glad to hear that Auber is engaged in the composition of an opera comique.

Among the lions here now is Leopold de Meyer, "le puissant pianiste Viennois," as Berlioz calls him, who, I understand, will shortly give a concert. Ernst, too, the celebrated violinist, who has not been heard in Paris for many years, and whom all Paris is longing to hear, announces a similar intention, previous to setting out for England, where he is going to establish, I am told, some classical chamber concerts during the ensuing winter.

Vivier, the inimitable, is still the lion of the salons, and the wonder of the Boulevards, although, in regard to his instrument, he maintains a provoking silence. Were Vivier to announce a concert, all Paris would respond to his appeal. His name bears with it a sort of mysterious prestige. Paris acknowledges him a great artist, and yet Paris knows nothing of his talent, the chosen few excepted of his intimate associates, to whom Vivier has condescended to reveal it. Vivier has abandoned for awhile his soap bubbles; but he has not abandoned his "charges." The principal seat of his exploits is the Magasin of a debitante de tabac on the Boulevards des Italiens, which the presidency of two or three charming and spirituel demoiselles renders the centre of attraction to the jeunesse and esprit of artistic Paris. One of Vivier's most recent tours de force was on Sunday last at the time of drawing the numbers for the great lottery of the "Lingots d'Or," in the Champs Elysées. The weather was very unfavourable for the ceremony. There were between one and two hundred thousand persons present in and about the Champs Elysées, whose going and returning caused the whole length of the Boulevards, as far as the Rue de Richelieu, to be a continued scene of bustle and excitement. Vivier, vexed at having purchased a number which gained no prize, amused himself at his favorite cigar shop by sticking up against the window the following announcement of his own invention, which he had traced in large characters on a sheet of paper:—

LINGOTS D'OR.

Le numero gagnant le gros lot de [400000 FRANCS] est sorti, mais il est rentré si vite a cause du mauvais temps qu'il a été impossible de distinguer le nombre exact de ses chiffres.

Les autres numeros ne veulent absolument pas sortir.

Le tirage est renvoyé au premier rayon de soleil. Prefet de Police D. Maupas.

The announcement thus publicly exposed, as may be imagined, attracted the attention of the passers by, who perceiving the heading "Lingots d'Or," began to peruse with eager curiosity. Those who had wit enough to see that it was a joke, went away laughing, and saying, "La charge est bonne." Those who had not read and read again, puzzling their brains to discover what it meant. All, of course, who had had shares in the lottery, took an interest in the matter, and in a short time the crowd was so great in the vicinity of the cigar shop that it was impossible, not merely for those on foot, but for carriages and horses, to pass in that direction, which was completely blocked up by the crowd. At length, doubtless some apprehensions were entertained of an emeute from so dense a crowd having been gathered together without an obvious purpose, a large body of gens d'armes interfered, and after a time, with no little trouble, succeeded in dispersing the mob. The brigadier then went to the window to satisfy himself with his own eyes of the purport of what he supposed to be a seditious circular, when Vivier, who had been all the time in the shop quietly enjoying the scene, slipped out, took down the paper, presented it to the brigadier, and said, "Voila, Monsieur, mettez le dans votre poche, vous le lirez à la maison avant de vous coucher."

BERLIN.—(From our Correspondent.)—I am at present in a condition to inform you upon positive authority that the celebrated vocalist, Mdle. Wagner, has signed an engagement to appear at Her Majesty's Theatre during the ensuing season. Both Mr. Lumley and Mr. Gye have been in treaty with Herr Anders, the Viennese tenor. I do not think anything definitive has been settled. Among other news you will be surprised to hear Mr. Gye has engaged Guasco, the tenor, for the Royal Italian Opera, and Perrot, the celebrated dancer, which looks as if he was now determined to have a ballet next year. Mdle. Gazzenega is also talked of here as one of the recent engagements of Mr. Gye; and on the other hand, Mdle. Grua among those of Mr. Lumley. Both these ladies are celebrated as light sopranos, and will be acquisitions to the London Italian Opera. Meyerbeer has been here some time. The great composer is rapidly regaining his health. He will probably spend part of the winter in Paris, previous to his visit to London, upon which, it appears, he has positively decided. Spontini's Olympia, about which I wrote to you in my last, has obtained a succes d'estime, but nothing more. The performance of Mad. Kæster and Mdle. Wagner, however, have excited general praise.

BASLE.—Mendelssohn's Elijah was performed here in the St. Martin's Church, assisted by the "Sängerverein." Herr Jules Stockhausen sang the part of Elijah; the soprano principal by Madame Reiter, which tended much towards the success of this celebrated work. The greatest praise was bestowed on Herr Stockhausen, who not only possesses a baritone of uncommon purity and sweetness, but seemed also to have entered into the spirit of the composition with great fervour. Herr Bar's style of singing is also much admired; he undertook the tenor part.

BOSTON—Oct. 27th.—The series of concerts given by Catherine Hayes in this city has just terminated. It would be difficult to give you any idea of the impression which her performances have left on the memories of the large audiences which have thronged the Tremont temple each evening. The last concert took place on Thursday evening, the performance commenced with Mendelssohn's overture to the Midsummer Night's Dream, played as only the "Germania Musical Society" can play it; the pianissimos were excellent, and the director seemed imbued with the spirit of the immortal author. This was followed by the duet "Quando di Sangue into" from Belisario, sung by Mr. Augustus Braham and Herr Mengis, with considerable effect; after which, Mr. Kyle performed a solo on the flute, The aria "Robert toi que j'aime" next introduced Miss Hayes, in which she fully sustained her brilliant reputation; she received an encore not only in this, but in every thing else she sung during the evening. Two ballads sung by Mr. Augustus Braham, and also the "Bay of Biscay" though not exactly suited to the character of an audience like that of Miss Hayes, nevertheless received a large share of applause; the "Happy Switzer" and an "Aria Buffa" from Donizetti, sung by Herr Mengis, gave sufficient proof that he was an artist of no ordinary merit. The "Qui la voce" from Puritani, we think is the happiest effort of the fair "Swan"; the andante particularly, was given with a feeling and expression which we have never heard surpassed.

Miscellaneous.

PIANOFORTES.—Without in the least disparaging the instruments of other makers, we may call attention to the pianofortes manufactured by Messrs. Rüst and Stahl as uniting many good qualities. These gentlemen give their undivided attention to one class of instruments only, viz., the upright piano (piccolo and cottage), the moderate price of which is an additional recommendation. The instruments we have seen—piccolos of nearly seven octaves (C to A), and seven octaves full, cottages—appear to be made of the best seasoned materials; and to combine all the modern improvements; and the experience of Mr. Rüst as a professor, and that of Mr. Stahl as a maker, seem to have been successfully united in producing good pianofortes at a reasonable charge. Because an instrument is cheap, it does not necessarily follow that it is bad, and Messrs. Rüst and Stahl are willing to test this principle by their offer to exchange, free of expense, any instrument, if not found perfect in every respect. In these days of "Free Trade," small profits and quick returns are apparently their object.

MR. JOHN CLINTON, the flautist, was elected a member of the Royal Society of Musicians at the last monthly meeting.

SOCIETY OF BRITISH MUSICIANS.—Mr. John Rackham has succeeded the late Mr. Baker as secretary of this society.

MR. ELZA, Director of the Musical Union, has returned from the continent, after an absence of nearly two months.

MR. BEALE, of the great house of Cramer, Beale & Co., has returned from Paris.

MISS DOLBY'S SOIRÉES MUSICALES.—The first of the series of three was given on Tuesday, at Miss Dolby's residence, 2, Hinde Street, Manchester Square. The fair beneficiaire was assisted by Mr. Dando, Mr. Loder, Mr. R. Blagrove, Mr. Lucas and Mr. Sterndale Bennett as instrumentalists; and by Mrs. Endersohn, Miss Barclay, and Mr. Benson as vocalists. The next soirée is announced to take place on the 2nd of December.

PRINCESS'S THEATRE.—This fashionable place of amusement opens this evening with the Merry Wives of Windsor, with a strong cast, new scenery, new dresses, new decorations and new effects. Mr. Bartley is engaged, and will appear as the immortal "Jack." On dit, Messrs. Charles Kean and Keeley are about to dissolve partnership.

MR. WESSEL, the eminent music publisher, has returned to London after a lengthened tour on the Continent, laden with MSS of new and valuable works, of which his abonnés will doubtless shortly reap the benefit.

METHODS COMPLETE DE SAX HORN.—M. Adolphe Saxe, the celebrated inventor and manufacturer of the Sax Horns, which are now so rapidly obtaining vogue, has just issued a method for his instruments, under the above title, with a copy of which we have been favoured. We shall shortly bestow upon this valuable contribution to elementary literature, the attention to which the increasing popularity of the instruments, and the great reputation of their inventor, entitle them.

REUNION DES ARTS.—Last Wednesday night this society gave its second soirée of the winter season to a very crowded assembly, at the Queen Anne Street Rooms. The soirée opened with Beethoven's septet (No. 1) for wind and stringed instruments, which was most ably executed by Messrs. Goffrie, Hancock, Gantz, Suelling, T. Mann, Boosé and Ould. A trio by Beethoven, in the second part of the soirée, was also well played by Messrs. Gollmick, Hancock and Boosé, both pieces being listened to with great attention. The songs and solos were given by Miss Wagner, Miss Mary Rose, Madame Lemaire, Mr. Swift, Mr. Rummell, Mr. Kloss, Mr. Wüsterman and Mr. J. Case. Thalberg's grand fantasia from Don Pasquale was charmingly played by Mrs. Goffrie. (From a Correspondent.)

LONDON SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—This Society recommenced its performances on Friday sennight, with Handel's Belshazzar. The date of the composition of this Oratorio is somewhat late, coming after that of The Messiah and Samson. Although Belshazzar will certainly not stand the test of time like these and other of the author's great works, it contains abundant warrant for an occasional performance. The story relates the Fall of Babylon and the Assyrian Empire, effected by Cyrus and the Persians, and contains the appalling incident of the mysterious and prophetic "Writing on the Wall" of the Royal Palace. As this is the first time we have heard the entire work, we will not venture on more than a brief and general notice of it. A great deal of the recitative might be judiciously cut away. In the opening, for example, Miss Birch had to recite some twenty or thirty lines of indifferent verse, to an accompaniment of the same "kith and kin." Handel, however, soon rouses himself. The air which follows, contains many salient points, and the chorus, Behold by Persia's, is highly spirited and exhilarating. The next song, Dry those unavailing Tears, for the bass voice, is, perhaps the finest solo piece in the work. The somewhat difficult and elaborate chorus, All Empires upon God, we should have been better able to appreciate, had it obtained full justice from the choir, which lacked energy and precision throughout it. The next chorus, Sing oh ye Heavens, is, unquestionably, the triumph of the Oratorio. It consists of an introductory movement and fugue, both of which are invested with the colossal strength of the writer's genius. The first movement, from its greater clearness and simplicity, is probably the finest. The second act, also, contains a fine bass song. The martial chorus which follows it, is brilliant and characteristic. In the series of recitatives, solo and choral, describing the terror and confusion of Belshazzar and the Court at the writing on the wall, Handel has recurred, with considerable effect, although hardly with success, to his power of dramatic painting. The last act, which however, scarcely occupies half an hour, is unequal to the rest. The executants were Miss Birch, and Miss Dolby, Messrs. Lockey, Lawler, and R. F. Smith. Of these Miss Dolby contrived, as usual, to help herself to far the greatest share of the laurels. Her delicacy in the recitative "Yes to obey," is, of the kind, as fine a piece of vocal declamation as has ever been heard within the walls of Exeter Hall, and but for the rules of the Society, would have been enthusiastically encored. Mr. Lawler executed the two songs aforesaid most effectively. Miss Birch was less fortunate in her share of the music; but she sang very nicely, and looked very well. Mr. Lockey's chief share of the business, lay in the recitatives depicting Belshazzar's terror and confusion at the mysterious characters on the wall. Mr. R. F. Smith has a fine baritone voice, but he had so very little to do that we must hear further ere we can say more. The Hall was quite full.

Advertisements.

MUSIC.

GOD SAVE THE QUEEN, newly harmonised by J. B. KEARNEY, B.A., of St. John's College, Cambridge. Price 1s. London Sacred Music Warehouse, J. Alfred Novello, 69, Dean-street, Soho, and 34, Poultry.

MUSIC FOR THE ORGAN OR HARMONIUM.

THE AMATEUR ORGANIST—a collection of soft and full Voluntaries, arranged in six Books, 3s. each, by EDWARD TRAVIS, and may be had elegantly bound, price 18s. Mr. Travis has introduced to the musical world a new and interesting work for the Organ or Harmonium, under the title of 'The Amateur Organist.' Mr. Travis has availed himself of an extensive and classical music library, and selected with great taste the most beautiful morceaux of the great masters, Foreign and English. To lovers of classical music this work will be found to be the most superb selection that has ever issued from the musical press. —Vide Musical Review.

THE AMATEUR INTERLUDIST—a collection of short Interludes to play between the Verses of the Psalms, in one Book, price 4s., by EDWARD TRAVIS and J. P. DYER.

THE AMATEUR PRELUDIST—a collection of Preludes, with the Organ Stops carefully marked, in one Book, price 4s., by E. TRAVIS.

SACRED VOCAL MUSIC.

KELLER'S Collection of ANTHEMS, CHURCH SERVICES, CHANTS, &c., arranged for the Voice and Piano, in six Books, price 2s. each, with six beautiful and appropriate designs by Brandard, arranged by ALBERT KELLER. The six Books can be had in one Volume, elegantly bound, price 12s.

THE PSALMODIA BRITANNICA—a selection of Psalms and Hymns for the Voice and Organ, in six Books, price 3s. each, arranged by EDWIN FLOOD, and may be had in one Volume, neatly bound, price 18s. London: LEE & COXHEAD, 48, Albemarle-street, and can be had of all Book and Music-sellers.

N.B.—A New Edition of "Mark, the Sabbath Bell," by Edwin Flood.

NEW AND FAVOURITE SONGS

PUBLISHED BY CRAMER, BEALE, AND CO.

The Tears of Love ...	W. Maynard.
My Home in the Valley ...	Frank Mori.
Softly ye Night Winds ...	W. V. Wallace.
Astoria ...	G. Linley.
O thou, whose beauty shines ...	Kalliwoda.
Came smile again ...	W. V. Wallace.
The Rhine Girl ...	G. Linley.
Farewell ...	Frank Mori.

201, Regent-street, and 67, Conduit-street.

BLUMENTHAL'S NEW PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

FLURS EMBLEMATIQUE:—

No. 1, Primavera ...	4s. 0d.
" 2, Violette ...	3s. 0d.
" 3, Rose ...	3s. 0d.
" 4, Romarin ...	3s. 6d.
" 5, Pensée ...	3s. 0d.
" 6, Heliotrope ...	3s. 6d.

Cramer, Beale and Co., 201, Regent-street.

CAUTION.

SEVERAL notices relative to the Bloomer Polkas having appeared, Henry Distin, in justice to himself, begs to inform the Music Trade, Profession, and Public in general that DISTIN'S BLOOMER POLKA, by Wellington Guernsey, price 2s. 6d., was the original one published, the title of the said Bloomer Polkas having been surreptitiously obtained by other parties in the first instance. Distin's Bloomer Polkas are nightly performed at the Public Balls, Concerts, Theatres, &c., and also at Distin and Sons' Concerts throughout the kingdom, and the various military bands of the army. Published by Henry Distin, at his Depot for Military Musical Instruments, 31, Cranbourn-street, Leicester-square, London, where also may be had by the same popular author,

The Court Beauty Polkas (as performed at Her Majesty's State Balls)	2s. 6d.
The Angelina do.	2s. 6d.
The Belvidere Galops do.	2s. 6d.
The Cuckoo Galop ...	2s. 6d.

All with Cornet accompaniments.

SAX MILITARY BAND INSTRUMENTS.

COUNCIL MEDAL, July 10th, 1875. Messrs. ROUSSELOT & Co. beg to announce that being the representatives of the eminent inventor of the Sax Horns, who has gained the sole Council Medal for the Military Band Instruments, they are able to provide purchasers with genuine Sax Horns, French Horns, Trombones, Cornets with or without the patent slides, &c., at moderate prices. The admired instruments from the Exhibition are now on view at 66, Conduit-street. List of prices forwarded on application. London, Rousselet and Co., 66, Conduit-street, Regent-street.

LECTURE HALL, GREENWICH.

MISS BINCKES' GRAND EVENING CONCERT will take place at the above Hall on THURSDAY NEXT, Nov. 27th, to commence at Eight o'clock. Vocal performers—Mesdames Garcia, A. and H. Alexander Binckes, and Ransford, Messrs. W. Harrison, J. Haigh, A. Irving, and Signor F. Ronconi. Instrumental—Pianoforte, Mr. Brinley Richards; Flute, Mr. E. S. Pratten; Conductor, Mr. Brinley Richards. Tickets and Programmes to be had at the Hall, and at Binckes' Pianoforte and Organ Manufactory, Old Kent Road.

PIANOFORTES FOR HIRE AT REDUCED PRICES.

ECONOMY being at all times commendable, Messrs. ROUSSELOT and Co. have established a new system for Hiring Pianofortes, including the tuning once a month, which presents not only a great saving, but also the advantage of having the instrument regularly kept in tune. Pianofortes, sold, exchanged, and repaired. For particulars apply to Rousselet and Co., 66, Conduit-street, Regent-street.

BLACKWOOD & CO.'S REGISTERED MUSIC FILE.

THIS new and useful invention is designed to supersede the old portfolio. It will be found the most convenient article yet introduced for holding and preserving from dust unbound music. To be had of all Musicians, and Wholesale at the Manufactory, 28, Long Acre, London.

PIANOFORTES.

MESSRS. RUST & STAHL, in calling the attention of Pianists and the Trade to their unique instruments, beg to intimate that they have just completed arrangements for the manufacturing of the upright piano only, viz., the Piccolo and Cottage; hence they are enabled to give their undivided attention to this now almost universal class of instruments, which, combined with the terms to meet the present exigencies of the times, small profits and quick returns, will place their pianofortes beyond the possibility of competition. To this they need only add that their instruments combine all the modern improvements, and are made of the best seasoned materials, are warranted, and may be exchanged free of expense if not found to be in every respect perfect. Drawings and lists of prices forwarded post free.

Rust and Stahl, 320, Regent-street. Manufactory, Edwards' Yard, Edward-street.

BEAUTIES OF CAMBRIA,

By BRINLEY RICHARDS.

CONTAINING:—

- No. 1, The Live Long Night,
 " 2, Margaret's Daughter,
 " 3, The Ash Grove,
 " 4, Sweet Richard,
 " 5, Lady Owen's Delight,
 " 6, March of the Men of Harlech;

THE PRINCE OF CAMBRIA'S BAND MARCH.

Price 2s. each.

The "Beauties of Cambria," by Brinley Richards, were first performed by the author at an Annual Festival of the Cambrian Society of Ancient Britons on St. David's Day, at the Freemason's Tavern. The delight and enthusiasm which these national melodies produced on the company were immense. The "Prince of Cambria's Band March," by the author of "The Beauties of Cambria," threw the company into a state amounting to delirium. These Melodies were dedicated by permission to His Grace the Duke of Newcastle, by whose kind patronage this talented Ancient Briton became a student of the Royal Academy of Music, where he gained the honour of being elected a King's Scholar.

LEE and COXHEAD, 48, Albemarle-street.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC,

KING'S SCHOLARSHIPS.

THE Examination of Candidates for the Two King's Scholarships, one male and one female, annually vacated at Christmas, will take place at the Academy, on Friday, the 19th December next.

Candidates, whose age must not be under twelve nor exceeding eighteen years, will send in their names and addresses to the Secretary, at the Academy, accompanied by the recommendation of a Subscriber to the Institution on or before Saturday, the 13th December.

The certificate of birth must be produced previous to the Candidate being allowed to compete for a Scholarship.

By Order of the Committee,

Royal Academy of Music, J. GIMSON, Secretary.
 4, Tenterden-street, Hanover-square,
 November 19th, 1851.

LINDSAY SLOPER'SEDITION OF PIANOFORTE WORKS.

ALREADY Published:—No. 1, L'Absence, by F. David, 3s. No. 2, Reverie, by F. David, 2s. No. 3, Souvenir de Reims, by F. Beyer, 2s. 6d. No. 4, Valse Brillante, by Burgmüller, 3s. No. 5, Valse de Salon, by A. Thomas, 3s. No. 6, Krieger's Lust March, by F. Beyer, 2s. 6d. No. 7, Le Torrent, by Marchalton, 2s. 6d. No. 8, Air and Variations, in F major, by Mozart, 2s. No. 9, Air and Variations, in A major, by Mozart, 3s. 6d. No. 10, Air and Variations, in G major, by Beethoven, 2s. No. 11, Reverie, in G, by Rossellen, 2s. No. 12, La Filia del Reggimento, by E. Wolff, 3s. No. 13, Notturmo, by Commettant, 2s. No. 14, La Femme du Martin, by Kalkbrenner, 2s. 6d. To be continued.

Campbell, Ransford, and Co., 53, New Bond-street.

ITALIAN VIOLIN STRINGS,

28, Holles-street, November 20th, 1851.

MESSRS. BOOSEY & Co. have just received from Padua a case of very choice VIOLIN STRINGS, to secure any of which an early application is necessary.

THE ROAD TO HEALTH.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS!

CURE of a disordered Liver and Bad digestion. Copy of a Letter from Mr. R. W. Kirkus, Chemist, 7, Prescott-street, Liverpool, dated 6th June, 1851. To Professor HOLLOWAY, Sir,—Your Pills and Ointment have stood the highest on our sale list of Proprietary Medicines for some years. A customer, to whom I can refer for any enquiries, desires me to let you know the particulars of her case. She had been troubled for years with a disordered liver and bad digestion. On the last occasion, however, the virulence of the attack was so alarming, and the inflammation set in so severely, that doubts were entertained of her not being able to bear up under it; fortunately she was induced to try your Pills, and she informs me that after the first, and each succeeding dose, she had great relief. She continued to take them, and although she only used three boxes, she is now in the enjoyment of perfect health. I could have sent you many more cases, but the above, from the severity of the attack, and the speedy cure, I think speaks much in favour of your astonishing Pills.

(Signed)

R. W. KIRKUS.

These celebrated Pills are wonderfully efficacious in the following complaints:—
 Ague Constipation of the Bowels Fits Rheumatism Tumours
 Asthma the Bowels Gout Retention of Urine Ulcers Bilious Complaints Debility Head-ache Scrofula or King's Weakness, from Bloated on the Dropsy Indigestion Evil whatever cause
 Skin Dysentery Inflammation Sore Throats &c., &c.
 Bowel complaints Erysipelas Jaundice Liver complaints Stone & Gravel
 Colic Female Irregularities Sore Throats &c., &c.

Sold at the Establishment of Professor HOLLOWAY, 244, Strand (near Temple Bar), London, and by all respectable Druggists and Dealers in Medicines throughout the Civilised World, at the following prices—1s. 1d., 2s. 6d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 21s., and 35s. each Box. There is a considerable saving by taking the larger sizes.

N.B.—Directions for the guidance of Patients in every Disorder are affixed to each Box.

THEATRE ROYAL,  DRURY LANE.

M. JULLIEN'S ANNUAL SERIES OF CONCERTS, LAST WEEK BUT ONE.

FIRST NIGHT OF THE INDIAN QUADRIILLE.

Solo.—Signor BOTTESINI.

Solo.—Signor SIVORI.

Solo.—M. BILLET.

M JULLIEN has the honor to announce that the theatre being let at Christmas for Dramatic performances, the present is most positively the last week but one.

The Programme for Monday Nov. 24th, will include the first performance of the new Indian Quadrille composed on East Indian Melodies and exhibiting the peculiar characteristics of the Instruments of the native Indians used in their Dances, Festivals, Sports, Wars, Religious Ceremonies, &c. &c. A Solo on the Contra Basses by Signor Bottesini; a Solo on the Grand Piano-forte of the Messrs. Erard, to whom was awarded the Council Medal at the Great Exhibition, by M. Billet, a Solo on the Violin by Signor Sivori, the new Waltzes and Polkas of the Season, &c. &c.

COMMENCE AT EIGHT, TERMINATE AT ELEVEN.

Promenade, Boxes, and Galleries, 1s.
Dress Circle, 2s. 6d.

GRAND BAL MASQUE.

M. JULLIEN'S Annual Grand Bal Masque will take place on FRIDAY, DEC. 12th and terminates the Season.

NICOLÒ PAGANINI'S POSTHUMOUS WORKS FOR THE VIOLIN.

Op. 6, Premier Concerto, with accompaniment for piano	0 12 0
" 7, Second Concerto. (Clochettas) "	0 10 6
" 8, Le Streghe, (Witches' dance) "	0 4 0
" 9, God Save the Queen	0 4 0
" 10, Le Carnaval de Venise	0 3 8
" 11, Moto perpetuo	0 3 6
" 12, Non più mesta	0 4 0
" 13, I palpiti	0 4 0
" 14, Etudes en 60 variations sur l'air Barucaba for Violin Solo, in 3 books, each	0 2 6
The same nine works in two books, and embellished with the author's portrait	1 16 0

ORCHESTRA PARTS.

To Op. 6, Premier Concerto	1 4 0
" 7, Second Concerto	1 4 0
" 8, Le Streghe	0 10 0
" 9, God Save the Queen	0 8 0
" 11, Moto perpetuo	0 3 0
" 12, Non più mesta	0 8 0
" 13, I palpiti	0 10 0

Paganini's Portrait	0 5 0
Biographical Notice of Paganini, &c., &c.	0 1 6

Schott and C., 89, St. James's-street.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY, EXETER HALL.

CONDUCTOR, MR. COSTA.—The SEASON will COMMENCE on FRIDAY, the 5th of December, with Haydn's Oratorio, THE SEASONS (first time by this Society). Vocalists—Miss Birch, Mr. Lockey, and Mr. H. Phillips. Subscriptions are received at the Society's office, No. 6, in Exeter Hall (where also prospectuses for the ensuing season may be obtained), daily, between 10 and 5; also on Tuesday evenings, between 7 and 10. The Subscription is—for central area seats, numbered, £3 3s.; area or gallery, reserved, £2 2s.; body of the hall, £1 1s.

LONDON SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY, EXETER HALL.

ON MONDAY, December 22, 1851, Handel's Oratorio, MESSIAH. Vocalists—Mrs. Sunderland, Mrs. Temple, Miss Dolby, Mr. Lockey, and Mr. H. Phillips. The Band and Chorus will consist of 800 performers. Conductor, Mr. Surman, Founder of the Exeter Hall Oratorios. The Subscription to the Society is—£1 1s. per annum, or, for Reserved Seats, £2 2s. Subscribers joining previous to the 22nd of December will be entitled to Four Tickets, and Reserved Seat Subscribers a splendid copy of the oratorio.

HER MAJESTY'S PUBLISHERS.
MESSRS ROBERT COCKS & Co.'s
SUCCESSFUL MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

BRINLEY RICHARDS' RECOLLECTIONS OF WALES.

- No. 1, Poor Mary Anne, ... No. 4, March of the Men of Harlech.
" 2, The Ash Grove, ... " 5, Of Noble Birth was Shenkin.
" 3, The Rising of the Lark, ... 3s. each.

(To be continued.)

"We have never heard these airs so admirably rendered; there is a power, delicacy, and finish about the variations which must charm all who hear them. We long to see more of Mr. Richards' 'Recollections.'"—Vide Eliza Cook's Journal.

"6, Somerset-street, Portman-square, Nov. 20, 1851.

"Dear Sir,—The manuscript letter you showed me a few days since, from the publishers of the 'Beauties of Cambria,' has just been placed in my hand, in the form of a printed circular; which, however, upon comparison with the original, I find to be an incorrect copy. I will not waste your time by pointing out the altered portions of that circular, but proceed at once to more important points. In the first place, any one perusing the circular would, of course, conclude that I had sold to you the identical works published by the other house; and secondly, that the 'Beauties of Cambria' had recently been written and published. In duty to you, to the public, and to myself, I feel bound to repudiate these insinuations. In the first place, the two works are widely different in style and character, and, in the second, 'The Beauties of Cambria' were written by the ten years ago. No language or personal abuse can justify the publishers in wilfully advertising these works as 'new music.' The 'Recollections of Wales,' now published by you, are a collection of Welsh airs recently arranged by me in the modern style of piano-forte music, containing three of the melodies introduced in the old work; but these three airs are so differently written (as might naturally be expected after an interval of ten years) as to render the grievances of the other house quite imaginary. Attached to the circular I find an announcement that the 'Beauties of Cambria' had been played in public by me. This assertion, like the advertisements that they are 'new music,' is equally devoid of truth. The fantasias upon Welsh airs have never been performed by me at the anniversary meetings on St. David's Day have never been published by Mr. Lee."

I remain, truly yours,

BRINLEY RICHARDS.

NEW PIANO MUSIC BY THEODORE GESTEN.

When the Swallows hasten Home	2s. 6d.
Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor	2s. 6d.
Three Legend Fantasias, Nos. 1 to 3	each 3s. 6d.
Variations on Weber's Preciosa	2s. 6d.
Der Wilschütz, by Lortzing	3s. 6d.
Fantasia on the Freischütz	3s. 6d.
on Norma	3s. 6d.
L'Étoile Avancé, two instructive Rondos	each 2s. 6d.
Perles de l'Opéra, twelve elegant pieces on operatic themes	each 2s. 6d.
Perles Allemandes, six elegant fantasias on favourite German airs	each 2s. 6d.
Pathway of Flowers, books 1 to 4 (piano duets)	each 3s. 6d.
Soirées Elysées, Nos. 1 and 2	each 2s. 6d.
Musettes de l'Opéra, No. 1 (duets)	3s. 6d.
Fantasia on La Dame Blanche	3s. 6d.
on Der Mulatte	3s. 6d.
au clair de la lune	3s. 6d.
Trois Grandes Valses, Nos. 1 to 3	2s. 6d.
Fantasia on Die Grossfärsinn	3s. 6d.

BRINLEY RICHARDS'S THE STUDENT'S PRACTICE FOR THE PIANO.

CONTENTS:—No. 1, Sonata, Steibelt; No. 2, Sonata, Clementi, 2s.; No. 3, Sonata, Beethoven, 2s. 6d.; No. 4, Sonata, Steibelt; No. 5, Sonata, Haydn, 2s. 6d.; No. 6, Rondo, Mozart, 2s.; No. 7, Andante and Variations, 2s.; No. 8, Sonata, Clementi 3s.; No. 9, Thema con Var., Beethoven, 2s.; No. 10, A, ditto, 2s.; No. 11, Capriccio, Haydn, 2s. 6d.; and No. 12, Sonata Pastorale, Haydn, 2s. 6d.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

As it is impossible to include, within the space of an advertisement, one title of the numberless works published by Robert Cocks and Co., the Musical Profession and Public are hereby informed that upon application they can receive, gratis and postage free, Catalogues of Music for all Instruments, published by their house. But, as the Catalogues are classed in nine parts, each containing music for a specific instrument, it is requisite to state for what instrument the Catalogue is required.

London: ROBERT COCKS and Co., Her Majesty's Music Publishers, New Burlington-street; and to be had, on order, of all Music-sellers and Librarians.

WILHELM KUHE'S LA GORBEILLE DE FLÛRS,
Valse de Salon, and GALOP di BRAVURA. The most successful pieces of this popular composer.
Campbell, Ransford, and Co., 53, New Bond-street.

Printed and Published for the Proprietor by MICHAEL SAMUEL MYERS, of No. 3, Studdley Villas, Studley Road, Clapham Road, in the parish of Lambeth, at the office of MYERS & Co., 32, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, in the parish of St. Paul, where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed, post paid. To be had of G. Parkers, Dean Street Sub; Allen, Warwick Lane; Vickers, Holywell Street, and at all Booksellers.—Saturday, November 22, 1851.

The Musical World.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s.; Half year, 8s.; Three Months, 4s.; (Stamped Copies 1s. per Quarter extra Payable in advance, to be forwarded by Money Order, to the Publishers, Myers & Co., 22, Tavistock-st., Covent Garden).

No. 48.—VOL. XXIX.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 1851.

Price Fourpence.
Stamped Fivepence

THEATRICAL PRICES.

While Jullien is filling Drury Lane every night to excess at the cheap rates of admission, nearly every theatre in London—at least, on this side of the water—is empty. This is a sign of the times too significant to be overlooked. While the prices of provisions and necessaries are lowered, and every article of traffic falls in proportion, theatres and muffins alone make no alteration in their charges. After sundry managers had ruined themselves at Covent Garden, by upholding the high terms of admission, Mr. Osbaldiston, in his two years' administration, showed how easily the treasury might be replenished by reducing the prices. Subsequent managers took no hint from Mr. Osbaldiston's success, but returned to the old prices, and were ruined. Even Macready—at the old rates—with an unparalleled company, could not make Covent Garden pay. How infatuated are theatrical speculators! How self-dependant and hopeful are managers, when they are actors themselves! What Macready could not effect at Covent Garden, he expected to achieve at Drury Lane. But the same objections confronted him at one house as well as the other. The prices were too high, and people would not go. It is useless to adduce the failures of Mr. Hammond and Mr. Anderson as examples of cheap prices not proving attractive, since the companies provided by these gentlemen were below mediocrity, and would have proved remunerative under no circumstances. Mr. Bunn, we think, might have made his own fortune, and that of Drury Lane, if he had lowered the prices so as to meet the conveniences of theatrical goers; but, with a pertinacity worthy of a better cause, he has remained a strict conservative in his management for many years, and will not bate his terms of admission a doit. Should Mr. Bunn prove as contumacious and inveterate as ever in adhering to the old prices, it will require no great prophetic powers to foresee the result of his present managerial diplomacy.

Why is Drury Lane crowded to suffocation every night—six nights in the week? Because admirable entertainments are provided for the visitors at cheap prices! This is the secret, and no manager takes the hint. Jullien alone consults the interests and inclinations of the public—alone makes money. It is certain that Jullien procures the first artists of the day, engages a most admirable band, and provides every novelty which can amuse and entertain, thereby involving a serious outlay; but his theatre is filled every night from floor to ceiling, his expenses are paid, and a large sum remains to reimburse him for his time and trouble. Let Jullien double the prices at Drury Lane, and what will be the issue? Empty benches, unoccupied boxes, a deserted promenade! We stake our lives upon it. But Jullien will try no such conclusions. He will keep his charges as they are, and meet the conveniences of the multitudes who flock to his standard.

Every day we hear complaints on all sides of the decrease of public taste for theatrical amusements. There is no such decrease. People are enticed to theatres because they must be entertained of an evening. If the prices are agreeable to their means, they will go, provided they perceive sufficient attraction in the bill of fare set before them. If they see the attraction, and find the charge of admission without their means, they may be tempted to go—occasionally; or, much more likely, they will seek for a cheaper place of amusement, and learn to forego something of their anticipations. All this, and much more, works against the high prices and tells in favour of the low.

Entertainments of a peculiar kind, such as the Opera, the Philharmonic, &c., constitute exceptions, because they are supported by a particular class, who do not make terms of admission a primal consideration. Even in these high places, unless we are very much mistaken, we espy indications of a change which will create a revolution in the prices. Already faint murmurs reach our ears of a rival Philharmonic, which if once established will necessarily create opposition, and opposition will necessarily engender an alteration in the subscription—even as Crawford and Hearnden's Penny Busses have brought down to the same standard the flagrant Fourpenny Charges of their rivals, the Conveyance Company and the Wellingtons.

Her Majesty's Theatre this year offers a strong corroboration of what we have advanced. During the whole of the regular season, although in the height of the Exhibition time, when everybody was supposed to be in London, Mr. Lumley lost money nearly every night. No sooner, however, was the subscription closed and the extra season commenced, at low prices, than the fortunes of the theatre turned, and a large sum was realised in a brief space of time. This is matter of history and needs no testimony. If, after this, the managers of our London Theatres require fuller proof of the insufficiency of their conservative prices, let them seek for it in the treasury next pay day. Meanwhile Jullien is making a fortune and they are losing one—and we wish them all every success.

CARLYLE AT HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

Of the Haymarket opera my account in fine, is this: Lustres, candelabres, painting, gilding at discretion: a hall as of the Caliph Alraschid, or him that commanded the slaves of the lamp; a hall as if fitted up by the genies, regardless of expense. Upholstery, and the outlay of human capital, could do no more. Artists, too, as they are called, have been got together from the ends of the world, regardless likewise of expense, to do dancing and singing, some of them even geniuses in their craft. One singer in particular, called Coletti, or some such name, seemed to me, by the cast of his face, by the tones of his voice, by his general bearing, so far as I could read it, to be a man of deep and ardent sensibilities, of delicate intuitions, just sympathies; originally an almost poetic soul, or man of genius as we term it; stamped by nature as capable of far other work than squalling here, like a blind Samson to make the Philistines sport!

Nay, all of them had aptitudes, perhaps of a distinguished kind; and must, by their own and other people's labour, have got a training equal or superior in toilsomeness, earnest assiduity, and patent travail, to what breeds men to the most arduous trades. I speak not of king's grantees, or the like show figures; but very few soldiers, judges, men of letters, can have had such pains taken with them. The very ballet girls, with their muslin saucers round them were perhaps little short of miraculous; whirling and spinning there in strange mad vortexes, and then suddenly fixing themselves motionless, each upon her left or right great toe, with the other leg stretched out at an angle of ninety degrees;—as if you had suddenly pricked into the floor, by one of their points, a pair, or rather a multitudinous cohort of mad restlessly jumping and clipping scissors, and so bidden them rest, with opened blades, and stand still, in the devil's name! A truly notable motion—marvellous, almost miraculous, were not the people there so used to it. Motion peculiar to the opera—perhaps the ugliest, and surely one of the most difficult, ever taught a female creature in this world. Nature abhors it, but art does at least admit it to border on the impossible. One little Cerito or Taglioni the Second, that night when I was there, went bounding from the floor as if she had been made of India-rubber or filled with hydrogen gas, and inclined by positive levity to bolt through the ceiling. Perhaps neither Semiramis nor Oatherine the Second had bred herself so carefully.

Such talent, and such martyrdom of training, gathered from the four winds, was now here, to do its feats and be paid for it. Regardless of expense, indeed! The purse of Fortunatus seemed to have opened itself, and the divine art of musical sound or rhythmic motion was welcomed with an explosion of all the magnificences which the other arts, fine and coarse, could achieve. For you are to think of some Rossini or Bellini in the rear of it, too; to say nothing of the Stanfields, and hosts of scene-painters, machinists, engineers, enterprisers; fit to have taken Gibraltar, written the History of England, or reduced Ireland into industrial regiments, had they so set their minds to it!

Alas, and of all these notable or noticeable human talents, and excellent perseverances and energies, backed by mountains of wealth, and led by the divine art of music and rhythm vouchsafed by heaven to them and us, what was to be the issue here this evening? An hour's amusement, not amusing either, but wearisome and dreary, to a high-dizened select populace of male and female persons, who seemed to me not worth much amusing! Could any one have pealed into their hearts once, one true thought, and glimpse of self-vision: "High-dizened, most expensive persons, aristocracy so called, or best of the world, beware, beware what profits you give of betterness and bestness!" And then the salutary pang of conscience in reply: "A select populace, with money in its purse, and drilled a little by the posture-maker: good heavens! if that were what, here and everywhere in God's creation, I am! And a world all dying because I am, and show myself to be, and to have long been, even that! John, the carriage, the carriage: swift! Let me go home in silence, to reflection; perhaps, to sackcloth and ashes!" This, and not amusement, would have profited those high-dizened persons.

Amusement, at any rate, they did not get from Euterpe and Melpomene. These two muses, sent for, regardless of expense, I could see, were but the vehicle of a kind of service which I judged to be Paphian rather. Young beauties of both sexes used their opera-glasses, you could notice, not entirely for looking at the stage. And it must be owned the light, in this explosion of all the upholsteries, and the human fine arts and coarse, was magical; and made your fair one an Armida,—if you liked her better so. Nay, certain old Improper females (of quality), in their rouge and jewels, even these looked some reminiscence of enchantment: and I saw this and the other lean domestic Dandy, with icy smile on his old worn face; this and the other Marquis Singedelomme, Prince Mahogany, or the like foreign dignitary, tripping into the boxes of said females grinning there awhile, with dyed moustachios and macassar oil graciously, and then tripping out again;—and, in fact, I perceive that Coletti and Cerito and the rhythmic arts were a mere accompaniment here.

Wonderful to see; and sad, if you had eyes! Do but think of it. Cleopatra threw pearls into her drink, in mere waste, which was reckoned foolish of her. But here had the modern aristocracy of men brought the divinest of its arts, heavenly music itself; and, piling all the upholsteries and ingenuities that other human art could do, had lighted them into a bonfire to illuminate an hour's flirtation of Singedelomme, Mahogany, and these improper persons! Never in nature had I seen such waste before. O Coletti, you whose inborn melody, once of kindred, as I judged, to "the melodies eternal," might have valiantly weeded out this and the other false thing from the ways of men, and made a bit of God's creation more melodious,—they have purchased you away from that; chained you to the wheel of Prince Mahogany's chariot, and here you make sport for a macassar Singedelomme and his improper females past the prime of life! Wretched spiritual Nigger, oh, if you had some genius, and were not a born Nigger with mere appetite for pumpkin, should you have endured such a lot? I lament for you beyond all other expenses. Other expenses are light; you are the Cleopatra's pearl that should not have been flung into Mahogany's claret-cup. And Rossini too, and Mozart and Bellini—O Heavens, when I think that Music too is condemned to be mad and to burn herself, to this end, on such a funeral pile,—your celestial opera-house grows dark and infernal to me! Behind its glitter stalks the shadow of eternal death; through it too I look not "up into the divine eye," as Richter has it, "but down into the bottomless eye-socket"—not up towards God, heaven, and the throne of truth, but too truly down towards falsity, vacuity, and the dwelling place of everlasting despair.

What will the readers of the "Keepsake," and the old improper-females (of quality), say to it?—Keepsake for 1852.

MADAME SONTAG is still attracting large audiences to the Opera at Frankfort.

MUSIC AT MANCHESTER.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Mr. Charles Hallé's Second Classical Chamber Concert took place on Thursday the 20th. The programme was as follows:

Part First.—Grand trio, pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, (in G, op. 1) Beethoven
 Grand Sonata.—Pianoforte and violin, (in C minor, op. 30) Beethoven
 Part Second.—Grand trio, pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, (in B. minor, op. 49) Mendelssohn
 Bourree and Double.—Violin and pianoforte, (in B minor) S. Bach
 Preludes (D flat and A flat) and Polonaise (A Major.)—Pianoforte Chopin

Before noticing the above, there are one or two inaccuracies in our report of the last concert which we wish to correct. We are quite willing to attribute them to our crabbed writing, rather than to your reader or compositor; but we are very unwilling that they should go unnoticed. In speaking of the improvement of the Town Hall, we are made to say that the "covered part of the dome was covered, &c.; it should be "the coved part. Again, we did not find fault with Perring for singing the Freyschütz scena in Italian, we merely notice the fact from having heard it only in German or English before. We spoke of Mr. Perring having received an engagement to sing at "the next dress concert at the Concert Hall," which is made into "the next Dress Concert and Ball." Now Mr. Perring dances, we dare say, but it would appear strange to your readers that a tenor singer should be engaged for such a purpose. The concert in question took place on Monday last, with Molique as solo violin; but have not seen or heard as yet any report thereof.

Hallé's third Chamber Concert, as above, came off on Thursday the 20th instant, when the chief feature of interest was the appearance of Molique as primo violin—in fact, sole violin—for he, Lidel, and Hallé, were the only artists, not a vocalist being engaged.

The result proved that Hallé was right, the hall being fuller than on either of the two previous concerts, and no concert could be more successful in every sense of the word. To our thinking, Molique is the most perfect player in concert in this class of music that has yet appeared in Manchester. If he lacks the sentiment and impassioned fervour of Ernst, his intonation is invariably unerring, and he has a peculiar clearness and bell-like purity, as well as a singing quality in his tones, mixing and blending at the same time so carefully with his co-executants, as to become absolute perfection. As a whole, we never listened to a more masterly performance. Molique was great, very great, but he had artists fully competent to play up to him in Lidel and Hallé. How all three seemed to enjoy it to be sure! They played with that confidence in each other which gives such aplomb and nicety to particular passages, such force to a forte, and such delicacy to the faintest piano. Never did we hear more perfect mechanism: the wonder at the beauty and genius of Beethoven or Mendelssohn was eclipsed by our marvels at the talent of the performers.

The first part was devoted (as will be seen above) to Beethoven—his Grand Trio (in G. op. 1) for violin, violoncello, and pianoforte; and his Grand duo Sonata for violin and pianoforte (in C minor, op. 30.) To attempt to describe each successive movement, as given by such hands, is quite out of the question. We can merely allude to one or two as being superlatively beautiful, as for instance the largo con espressione, and the short and fantastic scherzo in the first, and the adagio in the latter. The interest and attention of the audience were most intense; every one seemed to listen with bated breath, lest they should miss a note of this matchless performance. The absence of a vocalist between the two pieces was a relief, rather than otherwise, enabling the audience to give expression to each other of their pent-up feelings. Beethoven makes such large demands on the imagination, that it was also a relief to have a change in the second part, and most grateful did it prove. Mendelssohn's grand trio (in D minor, op. 49.) is an established favourite at these concerts; and it had never more ample justice done to it than on this occasion, by both executants and listeners. The whole trio abounds in elegant and melodious motivi, all of which are treated by the hand of a master; and we know not which most to admire, the flowing graceful Mozartian allegro, the lovely andante (with its wonderful gliding passage from violin to violoncello, when you cannot tell when the one ends and the other begins), the vivacious scherzo, or the impassioned finale; perhaps, if anything, the andante has it—if any. Each movement was rapturously applauded, the andante narrowly escaping an encore. The Bourree and Double of Sebastian Bach was a masterly display of genuine good fiddling, in this quaint old school, by Molique, accompanied by Hallé. Then Hallé wound up with two preludes, and the polonaise of Chopin that he gave us at the first concert in October, in his usual powerful style, closing this exquisite concert about half-past ten o'clock. The next takes place on the 4th proximo.

At our Theatre Royal, the only novelty since our last has been the reproduction of Loder's clever and pretty opera of the Night Dancers, but we have not been able to go and see it. Mr. Loder, by the way, has acted as conductor during the entire series [both of Italian and English operas; the latter will be continued, we understand, until the theatre closes to prepare for the Christmas pantomime, which is to be founded on the old nursery tale of "The Babes in the Wood." Barnett's Mountain Sylph is to be the next English opera produced. Since writing so far, we have seen the report in the Manchester Guardian upon Hallé's concert, which agrees in the main with the above—especially in our estimate of Herr Molique—but it contains also an interesting anecdote about Molique's violin, which we cannot refrain from quoting entire.

"It is said of him (Molique), that he is sceptically heterodox on the great and unapproachable merit of the old makers of violins—the Cremonas, the Amatis, and the Straduaris—which have so high a celebrity as to make it worth while to counterfeit them, which is done in some parts of Italy, with as much success as they manufacture pictures of old masters. Herr Molique, to parody the well-known couplet on Sir Joshua Reynolds

'When they talk of Cremonas, Amatis, and stuff,
 He looks at his fiddle, and only—takes snuff.'

"He may well look at that violin. It has no high birth to boast of. Herr Molique bought it of its maker, an ingenious baker at Stutgard, who was very well satisfied with the price he received for it, £7 10s. 0d.; and its tone was liked so well by musicians, that a worthy amateur of this town, since deceased, gave Molique a commission for a batch of three such fiddles, from the oven of the Stutgard baker. They proved good articles, and we believe one of them is occasionally heard with delight by musical audiences here."

MUSIC OF THE ANGLO-SAXON RACE.

BY A YANKEE.

Every race, and almost every nation of men, has created some peculiar form of musical expression, and most of these individualities are so well defined, that they are generally recognized, even by those who have not made music a study, and who know but little of it, save the vague pleasure derived from listening to melodious and harmonious sounds. Thus, the Italians are celebrated for the grace and expression, the tenderness and pathos of their melodies; the Germans for the complication and intricacy of their musical forms; the Scotch for wildness, plaintiveness and abruptness; the French for gaiety and sprightliness, &c. &c.

The peculiar form of musical expression characteristic of the Anglo-Saxon race, is unquestionably the glee, catch, madrigal and round—all the same thing in principle, with only slight variations in the minor forms and the number of performers. Although other nations have occasionally produced pieces which may be ranked as glees, yet it is only in England that this description of music has been regularly cultivated by great composers, and thus received its highest developments. It is not too much to say, that this glee is the national music of the English. Although in London and New York, a few of the more refined and pretentious aristocracy make the Italian Opera fashionable, and support it by the most enormous contributions, yet the taste for it is forced and exotic, and only extends to the few who have introduced it. The general public taste, both in England and the United States, remains inevitably wedded to its ultimate form of musical expression. Thus, while it is only by the most extraordinary exertions that the Italian Opera is enabled barely to exist for a few weeks in the year, in the metropolis itself, every respectable company of quartett singers can draw large audiences in every city, village, and hamlet in the Union; and even a company of negro melodists, vamping imperfect accompaniments to "Lucy Neal" or "Jim along Josey," draw crowds of well dressed, and well-educated auditors; while "classical" concerts, "operatic" entertainments, and "grand musical festivals" without number, are advertised, puffed, passed over and forgotten, by all save the unfortunate givers, who find themselves hundreds of dollars minus every year.

The reason of this is strong and simple: The Anglo-American, in his semi-savage state, does not sympathise with the refined and sentimental-song of the Italian music, and instantly condemns all the cadenza-ing, bravura-ing, and fortiure-ing of the soprano assoluto de cartello, the bellowing of the basso cantante, and the sky-rocketing of the primo tenore, as the most unmitigated trash and nonsense. If compelled by fashion, or the persuasion of wife and daughter, to rent a sofa at the Opera for five dollars a night, he yawns, fidgets and sleeps through the finest passages over which his foreign-bred neighbours go into mustachioed ecstasies; and the whole family, sighing for the full and rich harmonies of the "Alleghanians," turn languidly toward the stage, and exclaim with Christopher Sly, "'Tis a very excellent piece of work—would it were done!" With the glee and its varieties, on the other hand, the Englishman (?) or the American heartily sympathises. It is full, strong, clear and straightforward, like himself; like himself, too it goes ahead, and never stoops to effeminate dallying nor meretricious ornament. Its tones are the natural compass of the human voice, and its melodies move energetically and independently, now approaching and now receding from each other, like the bright streams of his native land, and anon gracefully mingling their outlines, yet each preserving its independant form, like the blue mountain horizon that at sunset bounds his wide and picturesque view. The glee in short, is as natural and indispensable an object of admiration to the full-grown and thoroughly developed Englishman as his rivers, his mountains, or his azure skies.

The original meaning of the Saxon word Glee, is mirth, merriment, and in old authors, music itself. Its technical musical signification is, a song in three or more parts, without instrumental accompaniment, in which the voices begin and end together. In the Catch, the voices take up their parts in succession, and a ludicrous turn is generally given to the words by the peculiar manner of the performers breaking in upon each other. The Madrigal is a composition generally in four parts, intended to be joined in like New England Church Music by all the company. In time the arrangement of parts to single voices was found to be the most capable of diversified effects, and was employed in all classes of subjects—eventually giving rise to the apparent anomaly of a serious glee. The prominence given to this species of composition has therefore given us glees of a pathetic, grand, and (as Webbe's "When winds breathe soft," and Calcott's "Oh! snatch me swift.") even devotional character. It is generally, however, a delightful and rational compromise between the trivialness of the theatre, and the solemnity of the choir. All the great masters of English composition have bestowed particular attention upon the writing of glees, rounds, catches, etc., etc., and some of the finest and best remembered pieces of Purcell, Arne, Looke, and other great names in English Musical History, are of this character. Among the composers whose principal works consist of glees, catches, rounds, madrigals, etc., we ever recall with pleasure Atterbury, author of the charming round, "Sweet enslaver," and the popular glee, "Lay that sullen garland by thee;" Baidon, author of "When gay Bacchus," and "Adieu to the village of delights;" Danby, Paxton, Spofforth, author of "Hail, smiling morn!" Dr. Harrington, author of "How sweet in the woodlands!" Dr. Benjamin Cooke, author of "Hark! the lark at Heaven's gate sings," "How sleep the brave," "In the merry month of May," etc., etc.—his son, Robert Cooke—and Lord Mornington, father of the Duke of Wellington, and author of some of the most beautiful glees, "Here in cool grot," Gently hear me charming maid," "Hail, hallowed fane!" "'Twas you, sir" etc., etc. Sammel Webbe is another honoured name, and his "When winds breathe soft," is still recognized as one of the most sublime musical pictures extant. He is also the author of "Glorious Apollo," the "Ode on St. Cecilia," and many other well known pieces. Dr. Calcott is another honoured and revered name in musical annals, and divides the glee-crown with Webbe. The "Oh! snatch me swift from these tempestous scenes," of Calcott, has probably never been surpassed.

But it is unnecessary to prolong this list of the composers and compositions, in a species of music which, although just now somewhat overlaid by the Italian Opera in New York, still claims its numerous appreciators and supporters, not only here, but throughout the country. In every principal city, private glee clubs exist, many of the members of which would do credit to the public stage or concert room. Quite recently, too, there has arisen a quartett band of native vocalists, under the name of "The Alleghanians," whose public performances are so perfect and exquisitely expressive of the very spirit of English Glee, that they promise to revive the popularity of this charming style of music. In Boston, (the musical taste of whose citizens cannot be questioned) they have been listened to with the greatest admiration; and in every other place where they have been heard, they have elicited the most unanimous applauses. We learn that it is the intention of these vocalists to give one concert only at Saratoga springs, on Saturday evening, Aug. 3. We have heard them in private, and fully endorse the recommendations they elsewhere received. We watch their course with lively interest, and cordially bid them God speed upon their refining and ennobling mission.

There is one idea which we would press upon our readers in the country where the "Alleghanians" may happen to pass. It is that in the principal churches of Europe and the principal cities of this country, the choir consists of only four voices, and the Alleghanians are an admirable model for amateurs to study. They have already laid the foundation of several admirable church quartetts in different parts of the country, and in this way their influence is destined to be widely and actively beneficent.

Original Correspondence.

FERDINAND RIES'S WORKS.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—In reply to an inquiry for Ferdinand Ries's Works in your No. 47, page 747, I beg to state, the Pianoforte Trios Op. 2 and 28, are published at N. Simrock at Bonn

" 63, (easy) ditto ditto

" 143, are published at Les fils de B. Schott, Mayence, Paris and Anvers

The Pianoforte Quatuors

" 13 and 129, at C. F. Peters at Leipzig.

" 17 and 129, at N. Simrock at Bonn.

I am, Sir,

Your obedient Servant,

JOSEPH RIES.

33, Great Pulteney Street, Golden Square.

FERDINAND RIES'S WORKS.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—In reply to an enquiry of "Ligna," in your last publication, respecting Ferdinand Ries's Trios and Quartetts, they are to be had at Ewer and Co.'s, Newgate-street.

"MELODIES OF WALES" AND "BEAUTIES OF CAMBRIA."

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—Permit me to reply to the letter from Mr. Brinley Richards, inserted in your widely-circulated paper of the 22nd inst.

In the first place, it would appear from the Author's written statement, that he is justified in selling his copyright to another firm. I find on enquiry at first-rate music publishers and booksellers that there is no instance in which any author of repute has so committed himself. I confess I am at a loss to conceive how Mr. Brinley Richards can justify a mere re-arrangement of the same "Melodies of Wales," long since sold to his former patrons, firstly, as duets; secondly, as solos; thirdly, the same subjects under the title of "Beauties of Cambria;" and fourthly and lastly, sold to another house.

Some of our best poets and composers have considered their first works to be their best; and there are now in my possession many unpublished works by Sir J. Stevenson, Wade, C. Horn, John Barnett, the late Alexander Lee, and, amongst others, of Mr. Brinley Richards himself; but because I have not published them, does that argue that these works are not new.

Now, Sir, permit me to state without quibble, that the "Melodies of Wales," which were dedicated by permission to the Duke of Newcastle (notwithstanding Mr. Brinley Richards' disclaimer) were published first, and were performed by the Author at the Cambrian Society of Ancient Britons, on St. David's Day, at the Freemason's Tavern. They had never been reviewed nor advertised in the public journals; consequently I presume they must be new to the public, for although many meritorious works may lay untouched on the shelves for years, yet, by some unaccountable impulse of the moment, they may suddenly become familiar with the musical world in general.

It may be, Sir, that under ordinary circumstances I should not have noticed the plagiarism of which Mr. Brinley Richards has been guilty, but when a flagrant attempt is made to injure the character of my firm, some explanation is doubtless as much looked for as it is required.

I am truly sorry that any respectable professor should descend so low in the scale of propriety as to promulgate publicly vexatious and unnecessary mis-statements. My firm is, however, on its trial before a discerning and enlightened public, and such is my faith in the principles of truth and justice, that I feel confident of a favourable verdict from all disinterested parties, fully convinced I shall rise superior to my adversaries in this controversy.

In conclusion, Sir, allow me to assure you that had Mr. Brinley Richards applied to his early friends and first publishers to re-arrange or edit a new edition of his works, either the "Melodies of Wales," or "Beauties of Cambria," he would have not only met with most liberal terms, but would have received that courtesy which I regret to perceive he denies to his former patrons.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

LEONT LEE.

Firm of Lee and Coxhead,
48, Albemarle-street, Piccadilly.

WHERE MR. WILKINS LIVES.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

DEAR SIR,—I shall feel obliged if you can please to inform me where Mr. Wilkins lives, a Professor of Music, who London two or three times a week to give lessons.

I am Dear Sir,

Your's truly,

A CONSTANT READER.

[Can any of our Subscribers answer the above?—ED. M. W.]

THE BEAUTIES OF CAMBRIA.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—The following is a copy of a letter which I had the pleasure of receiving a few days since, from one of the most distinguished composers of the day; and as it tends so materially to confirm the statement contained in my last letter in the Musical World, I shall feel much obliged, if you will do me the favour to insert it. Without reference to its importance to myself, it will be perused with interest by your readers, as an example of the writer's characteristic independence of mind.

I remain, truly yours,

BRINLEY RICHARDS.

6, Somerset Street, Portman Square, Nov. 25, 1851.

"Mr. G. A. Macfarren presents his compliments to Messrs. Lee and Coxhead, in answer to a circular from Messrs. Lee and Coxhead just received; Mr. Macfarren begs to state, that having lately reviewed in the Musical Journal referred to in that circular; both Mr. Richards's works, "Beauties of Cambria," and "The Recollections of Wales," is at a loss to suppose how Messrs. Lee and Coxhead can in any way confound or connect these two publications with each other, seeing they are dissimilar in every particular by which a Musician can distinguish them, and from their different degrees of difficulty, they address themselves to entirely different classes of players.

The circular of Messrs. Lee and Coxhead, contains a misstatement in the announcement that the "Beauties of Cambria" are dedicated to his Grace the Duke of Newcastle, inasmuch as the title-pages of the various numbers, contain dedications to various private individuals. This incorrectness, and Mr. Macfarren's knowledge of Mr. Richards's abilities as a pianist, induce him to disbelieve another statement in the circular, namely, that Mr. Richards performed these arrangements "at the Freemasons Tavern, &c. &c.," as it is highly improbable that an artist of eminence would perform in public pieces such as these, calculated as they are most admirably for the advancement of little children. Mr. Macfarren would not trouble Messrs. Lee and Coxhead with these remarks, but that he supposes their sending him their circular is intended to elicit a reply. He forwards a copy of this note to Mr. Richards with full permission to that gentleman to make any use of it he may think proper."

78, Welbeck Street, Nov. 21, 1851.

CHERUBINI.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—Can you inform me whether Cherubini composed the Mass for the Emperor Napoleon's Coronation, and if so, by what key it is designated, as in D, or C, or F, and whether it is published in Paris?

I enclose my card, and am, Sir,

Your most obedient Servant,

AN AMATEUR.

London, 26th Nov. 1851.

BURNEY'S HISTORY OF MUSIC.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—In a late number of the Musical World, the question was mooted whether a reprint of Dr. Burney's History of Music would not prove very acceptable at the present time; and in a subsequent impression appeared an intimation that there would be no lack of persons ready and willing to subscribe to such an undertaking.

The original suggestion and the assurance drawn forth are welcome indications of the healthy desire that exists to study music, not simply practically and theoretically, but also historically and philosophically. But would a literal reprint of Burney supply all that is expected or required at the present day? There are I think adequate reasons for supposing not. In the first place, although Burney's is undoubtedly the best written English History of Music, it is I believe, generally admitted that Sir John Hawkins's contains a greater amount of curious records concerning the art; but from his materials not being so well arranged and digested as Burney's, they are not so readily available to the Musical Student. Now it seems to me, that any fresh publication ought to embody all the historical facts and particulars that are within reach, and which must be allowed not to be included entire in Burney. Then, many of Burney's criticisms require material modification. For instance, some of the harmonies used by Dr. Blow, he has reviewed with great severity; yet the self-same chords have been employed by Mendelssohn, and with most charming effect. Again, Burney's opinion when speaking of Sebastian Bach's great Organ works, that Bach "seemed to have been constantly in search of what was new and difficult, without the least attention to nature and facility," would require absolute reversion before it could now be accepted or reiterated.

What seems to me to be the great desideratum just now is "a revised Burney" (as being the better written work) by way of text, with ample extracts and extra illustrations, from Hawkins and other published and MS. authorities, as foot notes; and if some patient musical antiquarian, such as Dr. Rimbault, could be induced by some spirited music or book publisher to undertake such a compilation, the object so much desired by your correspondents H. J. F., Belfast, &c., and, I may add, myself and others, would, I imagine, be more satisfactorily attained than by the course originally suggested.

But what seems to me to be most urgently required for more immediate practical use, is, a continuation of the History of Music from the period of Burney and Hawkins to the present time. It is not asserting too much to say the present histories leave off where one of the most important eras in the art commenced. The discovery and development of the symphonic form of instrumental composition, and the rise and progress of the difficult art of writing for an Orchestra, are subjects wholly untouched upon by either Burney or Hawkins; and although the compositions of Haydn the inventor, and of Mozart the improver of the symphony, were known to the former, he dismissed these authors in about half a page each. The last observation made by Burney on the subject of Instrumentation, is I think that wherein he speaks of Handel making the Flutes play in octaves with the Violins, then a "new effect," but how much this leaves to be said on Orchestration is too obvious to enlarge upon. Now, what I think will be admitted on all hands to be a much needed addition to our musical literature, is a work embodying a complete analysis of the Instrumental and Choral works of the great writers of the last seventy or eighty years.

The production of so interesting and desirable a book should, of course, only be entrusted to one who was a deeply read musician and composer to begin with, one who could alike detect the dawn of new harmonies, or the slightest modification in the form of a movement, and most particularly, who possessed the fortunate gift of conveying his impressions clearly and vividly to his readers; and I can call to mind no gentleman in whom these several necessary powers are so happily blended as Mr. George Macfarren.

And as I suppose we must take a mercenary as well as a professional view of such a proposition, a publication of the kind just hinted at would be sure to sell well. The possessor of a copy of either of the present histories would require the "continuation." This would secure a circulation to the extent of perhaps twice that ever attained by Burney or Hawkins; and if the numerous warm and public thanks that have been offered to Mr. Macfarren for his masterly essays and criticisms in your journal be any criterion, there are hosts of others who would be but too glad to welcome the appearance of such a volume.

Hoping that some steps may be taken to meet the present growing desire for a more intimate acquaintance with the history and science of the divine art of music, and apologising for troubling you with so long a letter.

I am, Sir,

Your very obedient Servant,

EDWARD J. HOPKINS.

69, Tachbrook Street, Warwick Square, Nov. 25th.

HENRI HERZ—REMINISCENCES OF HIS TRAVELS IN AMERICA.

Translated from "La France Musicale," by W. Grilliers.

(Continued from p. 741.)

SINGULARITIES.

The Sunday is invariably a dull and melancholy day in Boston. Woe be to the stranger who lets himself be overcome by the spleen; to chase it away, he has not the resource of visiting his friends or acquaintances. Everybody is at church; should you attempt to see any one, you would find nothing but closed doors. I have even remarked that on this day the most charming countenances are dull and severe, which appearance ill contrasts with the sweet and kindly humour of the young women of the country. I remember that I found them far handsomer on the other days; and not to lose any of my illusion (if such it was), I made a determination never to stir out on a Sunday as long as I should remain in Boston.

I believe these facts will sufficiently illustrate the puritanism which predominates both in the public and private life of the inhabitants of Massachusetts; but by an inexplicable anomaly, Boston is the only town in North America where concerts are held on a Sunday. They are certainly concerts which are called sacred, doubtless to place them in some sort of unison with their religious principles, but in truth they are nothing but musical entertainments: and they attract the greater number of persons as the public has not on that day the choice of amusements.

Another singularity of the Bostonians is, that they compel artists to give concerts at half-price; for example, if the entrance fee is a dollar in New York, it must be only half a dollar in Boston, not for economy, but philanthropy, say they.

Another and more remarkable phenomenon exists among the inhabitants of Boston: it is impossible to distinguish an artisan from what in society is denominated a gentleman. There appears to be no outward distinguishing trait of the Lord or the man of wealth from the plebeian: they present the extraordinary and rare spectacle of equality; and moreover, this dogma of equality is so profoundly rooted, that the rich would reproach themselves if they partook of any amusement or recreation of which their less fortunate brethren would be deprived. The possession of riches and wealth does not extinguish all feeling and consideration for their fellow mortals. I will venture to say there is more enlightenment and real knowledge diffused among the people of Boston than in any other town of America. I will presently relate the precaution and cunning to which I was obliged to have recourse, to conciliate my interest with the exigencies of the Boston public. I will for the present only relate one characteristic fact.

One day I dined with one of the wealthiest inhabitants of the city. Immediately after the repast, my amphitryon, who had hired a piano expressly for the occasion, said with great emphasis, that he had never had the pleasure of hearing me play, and would feel much obliged if I would play him a piece. Surprised at this abrupt request, which followed rather too close upon the coffee, I excused myself, and invited him to come and hear me at my next concert. "I could not think of it, sir. What would the persons of my acquaintance say, who cannot, like me, afford to spend a piastre?"

"Then, Sir," I answered, "I hope you will come and dine with me, and you shall hear me play without incurring the risk of being criticised by any of your fellow citizens."

I scarcely need say, that by this reply I saved the trouble of renewing my invitation.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

As my reminiscences may be read by artists who have the intention of visiting America, I think everything worth mentioning that may be conducive to their comfort during their sojourn. I will then say that the hotels of Boston appeared to me the finest and best regulated in the world. Those of River and Tremont must above all others be signaled for their magnificence and incomparable comfort. The apartments are lighted by gas, and are furnished and decorated with finished taste. The four meals a day are delicious, and of an exquisite finesse. The attendance is performed with a military regularity.*

Here occurs a very uninteresting description of an American contrivance, intended to facilitate and render the attendance in Hotels prompt and perfect; this I have thought proper to omit.—Translator.

Time is money: The devise of the Americans, and of the Yankees in particular, everything they do, all their actions tend towards the fulfilment of their motto. Any mechanical contrivance which offers a saving of time, is hailed with applause, and received with delight by the industrious and active American people.

I have already said that instruction and knowledge is diffused to a far greater extent in Boston than in any other town of the Union. The numerous churches, the multiplicity of literary and scientific institutions, the magnificent hospitable establishments to be met with at each step, all—all attest the right that every man possesses to busy himself for the public good. These things spread among the artisans of Boston, a knowledge and enlightenment that might at the present time be vainly sought for even within the middle class of French people. I speak nothing but the truth when I say poverty is unknown, that every inhabitant of Boston can by his industry make sure of a small independence.

This feeling affords them an encouragement, and gives so much zest to their efforts, that every one is active and busy—no one is dormant or useless. It is the most animated maritime port of the Union.

MY FIRST CONCERTS IN BOSTON.

It was not till I had profoundly studied the manners, the customs, and the character of the Boston people, that I could trace a plan of conduct in accordance with their ideas. Deeply penetrated with the truth that nothing could be more opposed or dissimilar than the taste and habits of the citizen of New York and the habitant of Boston, I resolved upon a course of action totally different from that I had pursued in New York. I was severe and formal, even to the form and appearance of my programmes, and I banished from my concerts any exhibition of charlatanism, too much in usage in that country. Instead of seeking or conciliating the press, I did all that lay in my power to confine it merely to the announcement of my arrival and my concert: no exaggeration, no puff; nothing would I adopt that was not formal and reserved. My way of acting succeeded admirably. I had never imagined for my tactics the full and complete success they met with. I gave a great number of concerts in Boston, and I cannot but with pleasure reflect upon the reception I received.

Another singularity; the Boston public, notwithstanding its excessive puritanism, is infinitely more enthusiastic than that of New York; and I think it advances far beyond it in the understanding and appreciation of the beauties of music. Classical works here meet with great favour; and I can truly affirm that in no other town of America will the immortal works of Beethoven, Weber, and Hummel receive as sincere, as enlightened, and as ardent an admiration. It has so often been repeated that the compositions of these authors were serious works, that the Bostonians—serious by their nature—almost impose upon themselves as a law, their show of excessive enthusiasm.

(To be continued.)

THE DEAD MARCH.

A FANTASY.

In by no means a small sized room, there sat a youth, numbering, we will suppose, about twenty years of age, although by his appearance a person might easily imagine him much older, for anxiety, and toiling away the nights given by Nature to sleep, had left their mark, and caused him therefore to appear care-worn. He was seated by a round table, on which, among some musical instruments, papers, and folios, lay his watch attached to a heavy silk ribbon, and marking the advanced hour of the night, together with an inkstand, pen, and several loose sheets of music paper, on one of which he held his pen, though rather at a loss what thereon to write. By the light proceeding from a green shaded lamp, one or two pictures were distinguished on the wall, and two or three musical personages were represented by busts and statuettes around the room; there was also an open piano, and the windows of this apartment were screened by dark green curtains, and the floor was covered by a deep brown carpet.

The young man was a musician, but in vain pressed he his pale forehead with his still paler hand; in vain gazed he at different objects with a vacant stare; in vain bit he his pen and frowned, for no idea came, of no theme did he think that might be transposed to paper: he was writing for a prize which in a week's time would be awarded by the Academy of Music, that great institution having proclaimed that they would so do for the best original piece; and although quite young, yet this musician was noted, for his productions were spread around the land, and his fame went abroad.

Time went on.

He was at a loss, as I have said, what to write, and was beginning to despair, when on a sudden he beheld the end of the room opposite where he was, commence to recede, and the ceiling rose, changing from a plain to one of the splendid Gothic orders, and numberless immense columns reared themselves as if by enchantment, beginning a short distance from the table where he sat, on each side of the now widened room, all being, together with the floor and ceiling, hung, bound, and festooned with black crape, while his view was arrested by a velvet curtain of the same sombre colour, on which was delineated in silver two human skulls. He gazed thereon in wonder, and the light of the lamp now commenced gradually to fade away; and as soon as it was extinguished the dark curtain was drawn up, while a light, proceeding from behind, illuminated the columns, and gave the astonished beholder a view of what came forth. A body of men appeared slowly marching towards him, to the measured tap of the deep brass drum, all habited in dark dresses, their polished brass instruments being likewise bound in crape; in a moment they commenced playing, and the whole place was filled with the sweet, though solemn strains of the dirge-like music; when advancing half way they stationed themselves on the right side, while a tall man, dressed completely in black, with an immense sable plume nodding from his cap, advanced in front, and with a long wand beat time. Now appeared a company of twelve persons in red garments, and with red feathers in their hats, marching three abreast, having in their grasp burning torches reversed, being followed by a band of soldiers; twenty-five young girls dressed in white, bearing wreaths of the same coloured roses, preceded by as many boys carrying laurels, the whole being followed by an immense funeral car, having at the corners nodding plumes, and drawn by twelve horses. In the centre of this car lay a coffin, surmounted by the pall, and over which stood two persons, intended to represent Tragedy and Comedy, and the figure of Music weeping, with a broken lyre at her feet, showing that the deceased excelled in both these descriptions of music—and there was also seen a black banner, on which were written in letters of silver, words to the effect that peace was to the soul of Melchang; and the young musician who witnessed all those proceedings, turned still paler than usual, and with trembling frame looked aghast, for—he saw his own funeral!

The whole procession having turned to the left, disappeared between the columns, and when such was the case, the tall man with the wand stepped forth, the band followed, and to the time of the most splendid music that Melchang ever heard, commenced marching towards that place whence they at first appeared, and the head of the procession immediately followed from the right side, and the whole train passed once more before his eyes. The black curtain again descended, darkness for an instant followed, again light shone from his lamp, the columns tottered, and in falling vanished from the view, the ceiling changed, and the room was as formerly.

Melchang immediately set to work, and with the air still fresh in his memory, commenced writing it on the paper before him, being possessed of the idea that it would be his last performance, for as he was superstitious, he believed his death was near at hand. The watch indicated that the night had passed, yet he opened not his shutters to admit the light of day, but re-filling his lamp, proceeded with his work, at times trying passages on his piano; he placed the last note on the score, and with a triumphant smile on his wan features, sunk back exhausted in his cushioned arm chair, and thence and slowly to the floor, senseless.

The family in the house not seeing him at breakfast nor at dinner, grew alarmed at his absence—for he was very punctual in attendance—and proceeding to his room found the door fastened; they burst it open and entered.

The spirit of the young musician had fled for ever.

The whole Academy of Music turned out at his funeral, and his mortal remains were carried to their last resting place by the inspiring sound of the once visionary, though wild, soul-stirring and exceedingly magnificent composition of his own—the DEAD MARCH.

Dramatic.

HAYMARKET.—Mr. Bonnycastle fancies that an individual he has met in St. James's Park has snatched his watch out of his fob; meeting with the same individual a short time afterwards he puts in practice the Lex Talionis by twitching his watch out of his fob, and running off with it. On his arrival home he discovers to his horror that he has left his watch on his dressing-table, and has consequently been guilty of what in the eye of the law might simply be denominated highway robbery. He goes the next morning to state the matter at the nearest police office, but is so horrified by the view of a large placard offering £20 for the apprehension of the culprit, that he immediately packs up a few things in a carpet bag, and rushes in despair to Canterbury. Here he manages to obtain a situation as copying clerk to Mr. Smuggins, who is a relation of his wife. This Mr. Smuggins has a niece who possesses some property, and being naturally desirous to keep it, he proposes to Bonnycastle, whom he only knows as Mr. Jorum, that he should marry her. Besides her property, however, the niece has a lover, a Mr. Johnson, and the latter, to obtain admittance into Smuggins's house, takes the name of Bonnycastle, and excites the anger, indignation, horror and jealousy of the real Bonnycastle by the manner in which he talks of the latter's wife. But Bonnycastle is obliged to devour his rage, however unpalatable he may find it, as he dreads that Johnson may after all be a policeman in disguise ready to arrest him for his crime. To make matters worse, Mrs. Bonnycastle arrives, and to punish Bonnycastle, whom she suspects of an intrigue with Smuggins's niece, supports Johnson's deception by acknowledging him as her husband. Matters at last reach their culminating point, when the flat candlesticks are brought in, Mr. and Mrs. Bonnycastle, that is to say Mr. Johnson and Mrs. Bonnycastle, told that their room is ready. This is too much for Bonnycastle, who arms himself with a revolver, and is only prevented from adding murder to his other misdeeds by the whole affair being explained, and Johnson turning out to be the gentleman who has lost his watch.

Such is a brief outline of one of the best written, liveliest farces we have seen for some time. It was admirably played by everyone, more especially by Buckstone. Whoever wants to see Buckstone supremely Buckstone, must go and see him in the Two Bonnycastles; but, however, there is no need for hurry, for we believe that the piece will be running six months hence.

The Beggar's Opera was revived on Wednesday, and was as strongly cast as the means of the theatre would allow. We cannot, however, greatly laud the manager for resuscitating this obsolete masterpiece of the poet Gay. The Beggar's Opera—which, by the bye, was first suggested to Gay by Swift—was written at a particular time for a particular purpose, and no doubt satisfied the wits and audiences of the period. The time has past away, and the purpose does not exist. The consequence is that the wit is more than half lost, and many of the allusions are quite incomprehensible to a modern audience. Besides this, the Beggar's Opera requires the most accomplished singers and actors to show it in its most fascinating colours. The melodies are for the most part exceedingly beautiful, and afford the vocalist an excellent opportunity of exhibiting his voice and style to the best advantage. For this reason alone the Beggar's Opera will be preserved until, if the time should ever come, the ballad opera be entirely banished from the stage.

If we cannot laud the revival of the Beggar's Opera on Wednesday night as being foreign to the taste and refinement of the present time, and as being entirely obsolete, neither can we praise the cast, except in some particulars. Mr. Harrison certainly made a bold and dashing Captain Macheath, and sang occasionally with immense spirit and energy; Miss Louisa Pyne looked most charming—more charming than ever—in Polly, and sang the music beautifully, and Mrs. Fitzwilliam made the sauciest and perkiest of Lucys; but here our praise halts—no, we must except Mr. Weiss, who, as Mat O' the Mint, sang the Bacchanalian song, "Fill every glass," with unusual fire, and left out his best scene, that in which that glorious line occurs, "Damn it, Captain, die game." Mrs. Caulfield should not have been thrust into Mrs. Peachum, being unfit for such a part: neither ought Mr. James Bland have played Peachum, nor yet Mr. Lambert Lockit, these gentlemen being completely out of their element. Nor were we greatly enamoured of Mr. Buckstone's Filch, which was, what it should not have been, an irresistible caricature. On the whole, although the revival contained some excellent things in the performance, it was by no means satisfactory, and we cannot anticipate for it a long run.

It is a very unpleasant duty to find fault with an artist like Miss Louisa Pyne, who stands so high with the public, and whose rare gifts as an artist we have been amongst the first to perceive, and the most strenuous and persistent to uphold. We were grieved indeed on Wednesday night to find Miss Louisa Pyne departing so far from her usual good taste and judgment as to introduce two Italianised variations to "Cease your Funning," thereby completely setting aside the intention of the poet and musician. A more preposterous interpolation could not well be imagined, and we consider that the audience showed no small amount of forbearance in allowing Miss Louisa Pyne to continue the scales, arpeggios, roulades and trills she thought proper to tag to so simple a melody joined to such touching words. What the audience really thought, was evidenced most unmistakeably in the manner in which they received Captain Macheath's answer to Polly's passionate pleading—"Really, Polly, this is carrying the joke too far"—which was singularly apropos, and was received with shouts of laughter and opposition cheers. We must do Miss Louisa Pyne the justice to say she sang the variations with extraordinary fluency, and that she was rapturously encored in the last, which was quite a juvenile Sontag feat; but we would entreat her to keep her flourishes and fireworks for a more fitting occasion, when she will not be likely to make the judicious grieve, and peril her own position as a real artist.

King Charles the Second has been played five times, and goes better every time; and the new farce, The Two Bonnycastles, has proved one of the greatest hits for many years. As the Times says, "it promises to prove a rival to Box and Cox."

PRINCESS'S.—After an interregnum of hardly six weeks, this theatre re-opened for the season on Saturday last the 22d inst., to a house crowded in every part. The theatre has been cleaned and re-touched, but in decoration and appointment it remains much as it was. The play was the Merry Wives of Windsor. The whole strength of the company was put into requisition, and the parts were judiciously assigned. If it be true that Falstaff has never yet found an adequate representative, Mr. Bartley comes quite as near the author's ideal as any actor of the present day. We are told by the commentators that the Falstaff in the play is unequal to the same character in Henry the Fourth, because "we can take no part in the continual triumphs over him," a judgment to which we must demur; for there is certainly no reason why this facetious and bloated impostor should escape the reprisal and atonement which are his due; nor could any better instruments of justice have been chosen, than a couple of virtuous and intelligent women who have become the objects of his lust and cupidity. Mr. Charles Kean's Ford was all the better for a dash of comic humour which he infused into it, and which was just enough to give freshness to his portrait without compromising its integrity. Ford's jealousy of the fat knight, although a serious matter to himself, cannot be other than a subject of merriment to the audience. Mrs. Kean was all that could be wished in Mrs. Ford, although the part is, in fact, hardly worthy of her. Mrs. Keeley with her racy, rational humour, gave to Mrs. Page a prominence with which we never before saw the character invested. Mr. Alfred Wigan (the Doctor Caius) is probably the best Frenchman the stage possesses—the scene of the Doctor with Mr. Keeley for his adversary—was as droll as such practical fun can be made, although we are less edified by it than by other things. Mr. Harley's Slender is well known, as being happily adapted to the actor's peculiar style of rustic humour. Mrs. Winstanley's Mrs. Quickly would have been the better for a little more reflection. The dialogue with Sir John, in which she congratulates him on his bonnes fortunes was excellent; the rest lacked that most necessary quality in the representation of Shakspeare's discrimination. "Sweet Ann Page" in her youth and beauty, found an admirable type in Miss Keeley, whom, however, we must caution not to sing songs savouring at all of the florid kind, till she has obtained more fluency and confidence. G.

OLYMPIC.—The legitimate drama seems to have settled definitively at this theatre. We mentioned last week the performances of the Merchant of Venice, and we have to record the production of Romeo and Juliet last Monday. Miss Laura Keene was the Juliet. We have seen worse Juliets in our time, but candour compels us to avow that we have seen many better. This young lady's acting is deficient in many points and more especially in energy. She is too uniform, and although her reading is generally pretty correct, her impersonation of the gentle Juliet wants those salient points which appeal to the hearts of the spectators, and mark the existence of genius. We have never disputed Miss Laura Keene's claims to talent, but if she wish to maintain the position she has endeavoured to take she must do more than she has yet done, and prove that her acting proceeds not from the careful tuition of some old stager, but from the spontaneous promptings of her own heart. Miss Laura Keene must not think she has achieved every thing when she has got by rote certain traditions and instructions;—unless she feel for herself she will not rise much higher than a clever parrot, and most decidedly cannot pretend to be superior to Mr. Somebody's learned dog, who used to throw the audiences of the Surrey and Coburg into ecstasies by ringing the bell of the "Lone house in the forest," and dragging the comic man of the piece to the spot where the victim of villainy lay stretched a "co-r-r-r-pse" beneath the merry greenwood, etc. But we trust, and believe, that Miss Laura Keene has genius, and we therefore advise her to set seriously to work to dig up the precious gift from the mine of inexperience under which it at present lies hid. Let her persevere, and she may eventually be destined to achieve great things; but let her not be led away by a few plaudits, and fancy that she is already a great actress, and that she has nothing more to learn. Nature has done much for her personally, and we are inclined to think mentally also—it remains for the lady herself to prove us true prophets.

This was, we believe, the first occasion of Mr. W. Farren, jun.'s, undertaking the character of Romeo, of which we are glad to be enabled to speak in highly favourable terms. It was conceived and executed in the spirit of a gentleman. Intelligence went hand in hand with the actor's personal appearance, which is greatly in his favour, possessing, as it does, youth and elegance. Some of Mr. W. Farren's scenes took the audience quite by surprise, especially that in which Friar Lawrence informs him that he is banished, and likewise that at the tomb of Juliet, in which the artistic manner of his death told upon the spectators with thrilling effect.

The Mercutio of Mr. H. Farren may rank next to his Shylock; it is certainly a most clever performance, full of nice discrimination of the author's meaning backed with unflinching animal spirits and cavalierlike bearing. His delivery of the celebrated description of Queen Mab was sparkling with humour, all the more effective because, although no doubt the result of careful study, it bore no marks of elaboration, but flowed as glibly from the actor's tongue as the thoughts are supposed to do from Mercutio's brain.

Mr. Compton was the Peter; everyone knows what importance the part assumes in the hands of this popular and great comedian. Another small bout de rôle, which showed what a good actor can do with a little, was that of the Apothecary in which Mr. Shalders gave proof of great talent. The "make-up" was admirable, and very different from the absurd fashion in which actors generally dress the part.

At the fall of the curtain, both Miss Laura Keane and Mr. W. Farren, jun., appeared before the curtain in compliance with a unanimous call, but people soon forget the dead, and therefore it did not surprise us that no call was raised for Mr. Henry Farren, whose exertions had most certainly deserved this tribute of approbation.

PUNCH'S PLAYHOUSE.—A slight sketch, entitled Counter Attraction, written by Mr. Tilbury, was produced here last Monday, with complete success. On being summoned, at the fall of the curtain, to receive the plaudits of the house, Mr. Tilbury informed the audience that he had written the piece in order to afford an opportunity for the peculiar talent of Mr. J. Reeve in assuming a variety of characters. In this he was decidedly successful, as Mr. J. Reeve's efforts were greeted with continuous laughter and as continuous applause. The piece will doubtless have a long run.

Reviews of Music.

"LES RAVISSANTES" DE PARIS AND LONDRES—TROIS NOUVELLES DANSES POUR LE PIANO FORTE.

No. 1. La Kabyle.

" 2. La Willeikâ.

" 3. La Sicilienne.

C. L. CZAPEK. Wessel and Co.

M. Czapek is one of the most voluminous and popular of piano-forte arrangers, and is, besides, an elegant composer of light pieces. The "Ravissantes" are amongst the best things we have seen from his pen. The groundwork is slight and delicate, but they are built with neatness and much taste. These dances have already obtained a large share of popularity in some of the Parisian theatres, and are sure to make their way in London, when known. We have not seen them as yet performed, and know nothing of their several figures; nor does any description in the text accompany them. "La Kabyle," No. 1, was composed, we are informed in the title-page, by Messrs. Charbonnet and Babiller, and is in march time. "La Willeikâ," No. 2, composed by Messrs. Duffort and Angessy, is in the same tempo as the polka, and would answer as music for that dance. The "Sicilienne," No. 3, speaks for itself. As a composition, it is the longest and most ambitious of the three. The two last please us much, and we can recommend them not only as elegant specimens of dance music, but as neat and interesting morceaux of practice for the pupil. As mere dances, however, until the figures be explained, they must stand for nought.

"REMEMBER ME" Polka, for two performers on the pianoforte. Composed by CHARLES ELSASSER. D'Almaine and Co.

Simple in construction, simple in form, simple in tune, and simple in the accompaniment; and withal a lively and danceable polka: The theme is well divided between the two performers; and the polka itself would suit two fair players, anxious to join forces and entertain their friends in the ball-room. We rather like the idea of arranging a polka for four hands, and recommend it to be carried out furthermore.

Three Songs for Voice and Piano. No. 1, "TO A LADY." No. 2, "REMEMBRANCE." No. 3, "EARLY DEATH." Poetry by LORD BYRON. Music by S. PERCIVAL. Wessel and Co.

The first of these is written to Lord Byron's exquisite lyric, "And wilt thou weep when I am low," and the composer should so have entitled his song. Sadness is the prevailing characteristic. The three lyrics are, indeed, amongst the most painfully sad Lord Byron has written, and we are somewhat surprised, Mr. Percival should not have selected from his favourite poet verses which would have given his pen ampler room for contrast. The themes, however, of these three songs, although bearing a family resemblance in character and colouring, are well varied, considering the vraisemblance of the subject treated. Mr. Percival, in other respects, has written the songs not only with the feeling of a musician, but of a poet.

The first song, in D, common time, is very tuneful and flowing, and is, to our thinking, the best of the three. It possesses a semi-religious air, by no means out of keeping with the words. The second in C, 2-4 time, is not so tuneful, nor so characteristic, but is equally well written, and the accompaniments are sufficiently easy throughout. The third in D, 3-4 time, is of a more pretentious character, but hardly so tuneful, and loses, we think, by its want of simplicity.

Provincial.

LIVERPOOL.—During the week two little girls of the respective ages of six and eight years, have been playing a variety of characters at the Royal Amphitheatre with the utmost success, if we may judge by the applause their performances created. These two children, Kate and Ellen Bateman, came from the United States, where their talents were first discovered by the far-famed Barnum, who, after realising a considerable sum by their exertions in America, sent them over to this country, where they have also been most favourably received. In London they played for several months at the St. James Theatre, where they soon succeeded in attracting crowded and fashionable audiences, though a natural dislike to precocious prodigies made their reception at first far from hearty or enthusiastic. At present we have only seen them in one piece, The Young Couple, a translation of a petite drama by Scribe, in which they sustain the characters of two young members of the French noblesse, in the time of Louis Quatorze, who are, for worldly reasons, married before they can either read or write perfectly. The character of Henrietta de Vigny is performed by the eldest; Ellen Bateman, while little Kate in scarlet coat, powdered wig and satin smalls, hits off to the life, the gay, aristocratic, and dashing Charles de Blonville, her husband. In this little piece they each act with wonderful self-possession, and with a graceful ease and energy which is rarely found in our most talented performers. Their performances in fact are truly wonderful, without being painful, and it is plainly to be seen that the little artistes have not only been well and judiciously trained, but that they possess abilities of no common order. They succeeded in keeping the audience in a state of pleasurable excitement when they were on the stage—while at the termination of the piece, loud applause greeted them from all parts of the house. Mr. Baker and Miss Fanny Baker have also appeared in several of their most pleasing characters, with their usual success—the true comic humour and dramatic experience of the father, combined with the personal advantages and elegant impersonations of the daughter, making the several farces and dramas in which they perform, to go off right merrily.—Liverpool Mail.

CHELTHENHAM.—(From a Correspondent.)—On Thursday evening last the first of a series of Concerts took place in Messrs. Hale and Son's New Music Room. Sir H. Bishop was announced to conduct but was prevented from severe illness, in consequence of which Mr. Bianchi Taylor presided at the pianoforte, the company including many of the leading musical families of the place, whose frequent and hearty applause testified the pleasure they experienced from the performances. Mr. and Mrs. Millar, who sustained the principal parts in the scheme, sang very sweetly all they undertook, and Miss Thornton was also equally successful. To a peculiarly pleasing voice Miss Thornton adds a polished and agreeable manner, which materially contributed to the effect of her singing. Miss Loveday performed a sonata of Beethoven's with brilliancy. We must not omit to mention the performance of a concertina solo by a young lady (her first appearance), a pupil of Mr. R. Blagrove. Miss Creed, for such is the young lady's name, played in a style creditable to herself and her master; she was heartily encored. This, we believe, is the first concert held in this room, and we were pleased to find that it is in every respect admirably adapted for musical purposes. There were between 200 and 300 people present.

BILSTON.—(From a Correspondent.)—On Tuesday evening the 18th inst., the Annual Soirée was held in St. Mary's Schoolroom, when one thousand persons sat down to tea. The room was tastefully decorated with flowers and evergreens. Appropriate mottoes, ingeniously formed of laurel leaves, were exhibited on the walls, and opposite the platform was a portrait of the excellent vicar of St. Mary's, the Rev. J. B. Owen, tastefully encircled by a wreath of laurels, and surmounted by the words, "Long live our beloved pastor." Mr. Paget, of Atherstone, was present, and sang in an artistic style the recits. and airs, "Arm, arm ye brave;" "For behold darkness," and "But who may abide," which were warmly applauded. He subsequently gave, at the request of the Rev. chairman, an extra song—"The Song of the Haymakers" (without accompaniment, the piano being very much out of tune), which was capitally sung and vociferously encored. The choir of St. Mary's also added to the harmony of the evening, and executed several pieces with an accuracy that called forth loud expressions of approbation. In the course of the evening the Rev. J. B. Owen delivered a pathetic Scriptural allegory, and the performances of the interesting and talented family, "The Minstrel Fairies," elicited the most enthusiastic plaudits from the audience. Mr. Thompson, the organist of St. Mary's—a pupil from the Blind Asylum, Liverpool—presided at the piano with ability, and was awarded a vote of thanks for his services.

DUBLIN.—PAROCHIAL PSALMODY.—We direct the attention of our readers to one of the most important experiments of its kind which has been made within our memory. We allude to the performance of parochial psalmody last Tuesday evening, at the Parish Church of St. Mary, in this city; the object of which was to illustrate in the most effective manner, during divine service, the various chants, psalms, and hymns, for which provision has been made in the Book of Common Prayer, in harmony, and thus demonstrate what can be effected by a congregation, if trained and practised in singing. The experiment was instituted under very favourable circumstances. Mr. James Hill, the organist of Saint Mary's, has been long labouring to train the members of the congregation, capable of assisting, to the performance of Church psalmody in part singing. Invaluable facilities were afforded to him in his task by the admirable arrangements of the psalms and chants in "The Choralist"—a work for which the public are indebted to the joint labours of Messrs. Robinson and Bussell. In addition to the members of the congregation, the gentlemen and children of the choirs of Trinity College, the Cathedrals, and the Chapel Royal, and several distinguished members of our choral societies contributed their aid, so that a body of effective singers were collected, which could not have fallen far short of three hundred. The chants and psalms selected for performance were the following:—

Chant—95th Psalm, "O come let us sing unto the Lord" ... Dr. Smith
Psalm 42d, "As pants the hart" (Ferna) ... Ld. Mornington
Chant—Te Deum, "We praise thee, O God" ... J. Hill
Chant—Jubilate Deo, 100th Psalm, "O be joyful in the Lord" ... Bennett.
Anthem—a Prayer, "Lord, for thy tender mercies' sake" ... Farrant
Hymn—"There is a land of pure delight" (Madrid) ...
Psalm, the old 100th, "With one consent" (Savoy) ... Martin Luther EVENING SERVICE.

Chant—Magnificat, St. Luke i. 46, "My soul doth magnify the Lord" ... Ld. Mornington
Anthem—"God is gone up with a merry noise" Dr. Croft
Psalm 39th, "Lord, let me know my term of days" (Martyrdom) ...
Anthem—Job xxviii. 12, "O where shall wisdom be found" ...
Chant—Nunc Dimittis, Luke ii. 21, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace" ... Tallis
Psalm 149th, "O praise ye the Lord" (Hanover)
Evening Hymn, ending with "Glory, honour, praise and power" (Magdalene) ... Handel

Where every portion was well given, we are slow to mark any for particular commendation; still we must observe the fine effect of Martin Luther's hymn (the 100th psalm), one verse of which was given in unison.—Warder, Nov. 22.

BRIGHTON.—(From a Correspondent, Nov. 26.)—Herr Kühe's Annual Morning Concert took place on Wednesday, (yesterday,) when a very fashionable assembly attended the Newburgh Rooms, Cannon Place. Sivori, Platti, Stigelli the tenor, Miss Binckes, Madame Garcia and others, assisted Herr Kühe. Sivori created a furore in the Carnaval de Cuba, and Herr Kühe was unanimously applauded in all his performances.

CHELTHENHAM.—Mr. George Marshall gave a concert at the Assembly Rooms on Thursday evening. The programme was excellent, and included some rare specimens of the old madrigal writers. The chorus went well, and the concert afforded great satisfaction. Mr. Marshall himself sang several solos, and Miss Loveday varied the entertainment by performances on the pianoforte.

LEICESTER.—The performance of The Creation on Wednesday evening, in the New Hall, was one of the best choral concerts we have had in Leicester for some time. The band and chorus were numerous and effective, the comparative deficiency in strength being in the violins and the soprano. The solo parts were admirably sustained by Mrs. Sunderland, Mr. Lockey, and Mr. Lawler, and, with few and trifling exceptions, with a praiseworthy fidelity to the author's text. Mrs. Sunderland and Mr. Lockey are so well known to the musical public of Leicester, that we need only say that (though the lady was understood to be suffering from cold) both were in excellent voice. Mr. Lawler, however, has but once before visited us; and then, though struck with the fine quality of his sonorous bass, we could not but feel a want of ease and flexibility, as well as notice a certain roughness of style and pronunciation. In his delivery and style the improvement was so great, that we could scarcely believe our ears. Mr. Lawler now wants a little more fire and passion to place him in the first rank of English basses. In the choristers we noticed a decided improvement, especially in the male department, the parts in which were well balanced; and throughout the Oratorio, we noticed a much more intelligent appreciation of light and shade, and a greater attention to accuracy of intonation, than has sometimes been the case in our town. Mr. Oldershaw acted as chorus-master in preparation for the oratorio. The band was led by Mr. H. Gill, and the oratorio was conducted with great spirit by Mr. H. Farmer, of Nottingham; and the solo instrumental parts were ably rendered by M. Hausmann, and Messrs. A. and H. Nicholson, Adcock, Waldrom, Weston, J. Smith, Nicholson, sen., &c. The only drawback was, that the reserved seats were not full; and for the cause we are rather inclined to say—Musicians are bad financiers. One would have thought that Jullien had taught them that the lower the price of admission, the more they would gain. But we can only say "rather" inclined; for we are more struck with the bad finance-management which does not render the Hall capable of accommodating a much larger audience at moderate rates—(as might be done for an expense not exceeding £150)—and so will drive all the concert-business now doing there, to the Temperance Hall, when built.—(Leicestershire Mercury.)

READING.—(From a Correspondent).—A concert of vocal and instrumental music was given at the Town Hall—by permission of the Worshipful the Mayor—on Tuesday evening, under the direction of the Reading Amateur Musical Society. The committee has come to the determination of devoting the proceeds of this, or any subsequent concerts, to the various public charities in the town. The concert was well built up. The band and chorus amounted to more than seventy performers, and were in the main an efficient body. This force was led by M. Venua, according to the bills, "Late Leader of the Band, and Composer at the Italian Italian Opera, and Member of the Royal Society of Musicians, London." How ignorant we Provincials are! I was not aware that Mr. Venua had written an opera for Covent Garden, nor that he was leader of the Royal Italian Opera Band, always believing that Mr. Costa was the sole conductor, and that there was no leader of the band. We provincials are indeed woefully in the dark, and, as you see, must sometimes depend for our information on bills and programmes. I shall be most happy to be further instructed as to the precise operas Mr. Venua composed for the Royal Opera, and at what period, and for how long a time was he leader of the band. Mrs. Alexander Newton, and her fair and promising pupil, Miss Louisa Nevett, volunteered their services on this occasion, and came direct from London, which gratuitous visit, we of the town of Reading will be slow in letting slip from our memories. The band played Haydn's Surprise Symphony and the overture to Don Giovanni, besides aiding in the glees and chorusses. The chorus sang Webbe's glee, "Glorious Apollo," arranged as a chorus, with an appropriate instrumental introduction by Mr. Venua; Dr. Calcott's glee, "The Red Cross Knight," similarly preambled and garnished by the same composer and leader; and Bishop's "The Chough and Crow," (the solo parts by Mrs. Alexander Newton and Miss Louisa Nevett). Nelson's glee for four voices, "The Forester's sound," was also sung, and "God Save the Queen" served for a grand finale. To Mrs. Alexander Newton's share of the performance I would particularly call attention. She sang an air from the Lucia in brilliant style, and showed herself perfect mistress of the bravura school. In a different style, the ballad, she was still more successful, obtaining a boisterous encore in the Irish ballad, "Robin Adair," which she sang with exceeding sweetness and expression. Still more successful was the fair artiste in Mendelssohn's charming song, "The Charmer," which the audience encored unanimously, and would fain have had a third time, were it not for very shame. Mrs. Alexander Newton also assisted Miss Louisa Nevett in Mendelssohn's "Greeting," duet, and in a duet from Mercadante's Andronico, both of which were encored, the latter tumultuously. Miss Nevett's solos were "M'Odi, m'odi," well and energetically given, and a ballad by H. Farmer, which obtained an immense encore. Besides the above a flute solo was given by a gentleman whose name was omitted from the bills, and Mr. Venua and Mr. Brown played a sonata of Mozart's, for piano-forte and violin, with good effect, Mr. Venua handling the violin, and Mr. Brown fingering the Broadwood. Mr. Barton presided at the piano during the evening.

BIRMINGHAM.—(From a Correspondent, Nov. 24.)—The operatic performances, which will be brought to a conclusion to-morrow, have passed off exceedingly well. They have been confined to four operas, Sonnambula, Lucia di Lammermoor, Furiani, and the Bohemian Girl. Mr. and Mrs. Sims Reeves have been in immense favour, and the performances all went exceedingly well under the conductorship of Mr. Frank Mori, who is certainly a Field Marshal of the baton, and to whose exertions and high capacities the success of the speculation is mainly indebted. Mr. Frank Bodda was to have been the principal barytone, but having met with an accident, his place was supplied by Mr. Stretton. The operatic company leave on Saturday for Glasgow, where they give a series of performances.

MANCHESTER.—(From a Correspondent).—The Concert of Monday last of the series of "Concerts for the People" was the best given, if we except the opening night. We arrived only in time to hear a portion of the programme; but were much better pleased with the efforts of the choir; the fine glee by Horsley, "Hail! Golden lyre" for full chorus, being especially worthy of commendation. As we are "nothing if not critical," we will just remind the conductor that Kucken's "war song" could never be intended for female voices, and the sentiment of the piece altogether, we think, confirms this opinion; take for example the two opening lines—

"The banners wave, the drums are beating,
With courage, comrades, to the fray!"

With these comments we pass on to Mr. Perring, who, we are glad to find, continues increasing in popularity. We have never before had a resident tenor here who was so general a favourite with all classes. He has, during the short time he has been among us, had engagements to sing at the Gentlemen's Concert Hall, in company with the Misses Birch, and Mr. H. Phillips; also at two of M. Hallé's Classical Concerts, as well as at the Glee Club and other places in the neighbourhood. We hear he is also much sought after as a teacher, making his opening in this locality one of the most promising. On the evening of which we are speaking, Mr. Perring sang in an exceedingly chaste and pleasing style, the well known ballad, "Tell me, Mary, how to woo thee," as also Balfe's air from Juan of Arc "The peace of the valley." In the latter the cornet-a-piston was added as obligato with good effect. We need scarcely say both pieces were loudly encored. A merry troling chorus from Flotow's Stradella "Hark! the merry breezes bearing," with the aid of bells accompaniment, closed the first part. In the second part Mrs. Thomas sang the much hacknied and not very elegant composition, "Do you really think he did." The audience received this piece of purity with the utmost indifference, and hence, we expect, it is now "consigned to the tomb of all the Capulets." M. Delevanti gave the comic scena "Traveller's all," from Balfe's Siege of Rochelle, with excellent point and humour, and was complimented with an encore. Miss Shaw had less to do than on any former occasion. A clever professor here, Mr. W. K. Kohler, gave a couple of solos during the evening on the concertina and cornet-a-piston, and was loudly applauded. We have always looked upon the single voice glee as a failure at these concerts, the audiences are too migratory, and not perhaps as a mass sufficiently cultivated as will properly enable them to enjoy and appreciate the quiet glee in its purity. It is partly with these views we shall consider "A Knight there came," of Monday last, as the most unsatisfactory piece of the evening, although the amalgamation of voices was by no means as bad as we have heard in the same composition. The bass, a Mr. Craig—we believe one of the chorus—possesses a fine, full, rich voice, of considerable compass and volume, but his chief aim seems to consist in giving out the notes in that eight-day clock style of expression, very much reminding us at times of the clever automaton figure we witnessed some weeks past, when the ingenious Kaufman was here. Of the other singers in the glee, Miss Shaw, Mrs. Thomas, and Mr. Perring, we have little to say. Your advertising columns will contain an announcement of a prize glee to be given by a young and promising club at Ardwick, one of our suburbs.

We attended one of their concerts on Wednesday last, and were much pleased with the musical treat offered by the members. The professionals were Messrs. Edmondson, Walton, Phillips, and Smith. The former gentleman, a stranger in this neighbourhood, has a fine natural alto voice; perhaps the best of its kind we remember to have heard. He was very successful in the glees the whole evening, and must prove a great acquisition to our clubs in the vicinity. We cannot touch now on the programme, but may recur to this society in our occasional "dottings." A very excellent pianoforte player, Mr. Richard Seed, is the accompanist.

Miscellaneous.

DRURY LANE.—The attractions have not abated a jot. On the contrary they have increased. Despite the enormous crowds that wait on his baton, and despite his new magic loadstone, Bottessini, Jullien does not let novelty sleep, but varies his programme nightly, and infuses fresh materials into it. On Saturday Mrs. John Macfarren performed a popular fantasia on the pianoforte, and was most warmly received. The fair artist was exceedingly nervous, but played very brilliantly notwithstanding. Miss Bassano appeared on Monday and during the week, and sang several favourite songs with great applause. Of Jullien's "New Indian Quadrille," produced on Thursday, we can only say that it is worthy of Jullien's genius and talents, and is equal in every respect to his "Swiss Quadrille," which we have always considered the Quadrille par excellence. The success was immense. We shall give particulars next week.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—The opening concert of the season is fixed for Friday next, Dec. 5th, when the society are to perform for the first time Haydn's Oratorio, The Seasons, under the conductorship of Mr. Costa. This announcement has created much interest in musical circles, from the circumstance of the work (which many musicians prefer to the Creation of the same author) never having been adequately represented in London upon the grand scale of the society's performances. The subscription list is rapidly filling, and it is said that the amount is likely to exceed the, till then unprecedented, amount of last year.

MR. FOWLE'S HYMN OF PRAISE FOR ALL NATIONS.—This little work (now in its second edition), is a sacred cantata for four voices, and has been exceedingly well spoken of by the public journals. The author (a young amateur of the art), had he not succeeded so well as he has, would at least have deserved the highest praise for his spirited undertaking. The words, which are chiefly from the Holy Scriptures, are well selected. The work commences with an overture representing the March of All Nations to the Exhibition. The author shows, first the duty of all nations to sing praises unto the Lord, represented by a chorus, "Sing unto God, O ye nations of the earth," and after a short recitative another chorus, "We praise Thee O God;" 2nd, the duty to the Sovereign, and the prayer that God would bless and preserve her, shown by the introduction of a verse of the national anthem; 3rd, the prayer for the nations and the prosperity of the Exhibition, which brings us to "O Lord save thy people," an unaccompanied quartett; 4th, the uncertainty of life, and that our times are in Jehovah's hand, carries us on to a very plaintive duet and chorus, which, we may here mention, has been used in some churches as a hymn for New Year's day; a very effective recitative, solo, and chorus, teaches us the manner in which we are to show our thankfulness to God for all his mercies. The work then appropriately terminates with two chorusses, inviting all nations to worship the Lord, and to sing praises unto Him, "O all ye nations bless ye the Lord," Hallelujah, "Praise the Lord." Knowing this to be Mr. Fowle's first essay, we regard it as a most promising composition, comprising as it does, much careful, agreeable, and orthodox, if not entirely original writing, and we congratulate him upon his success, a success happily commensurate with his praiseworthy and ambitious design. The composition aims at nothing great, but as a cotemporary observes, "its simple grandeur of style is well fitted for its comprehensive title; it is within the compass of all players and vocalists, and we recommend it to such as it will form a most pleasing and appropriate musical memento of the great and all-absorbing event of the never-to-be-forgotten year of 1851."

CITY OF LONDON LITERARY AND SCIENTIFIC INSTITUTION.—The concert lately given at this institution was very successful. The programme was an attractive one. The list of vocalists included the names of Miss Helen Cundell, who was encored in Balfe's popular song from the Bohemian Girl, "I dreamt that I dwelt in marble halls;" Miss Eyles, encored in Phillips's "O, let us go a roaming;" Miss Clari Fraser, who sung with Miss Eyles Glover's duet, "What are the wild waves saying," and obtained an encore; Miss Poole and Miss Stuart, who are both apparently great favourites in the City, with Mr. Elliott Galer, Mr. Henri Drayton, and Mr. Leffler, who all received a due share of applause for their exertions. The instrumental portion of the evening's entertainment was small, being confined to a trio by Hummel, and a solo on the piano, Weber's polonaise, "Hilarité;" the latter was played by Miss E. B. Lohmann with considerable nervousness, but nevertheless with great promise of being able to do much better when more confidence in her powers shall have accrued from oftener playing in public. In the trio of E flat of Hummel, where she had the able assistance of Mr. Aylward, who seems likely to become one of our best violoncellists, and Mr. Simmons, an excellent violinist, Miss Lohmann (who by the bye we understand is a pupil at the Royal Academy of that excellent pianist Mr. W. Dorrell) was heard to much greater advantage. Her style is excellent, her execution unexceptionable, and her touch clear and brilliant. It was altogether a musicianly performance, and reflects, through the executants, much credit on Mr. Dorrell and the Royal Academy of Music, of which Mr. Aylward, Mr. Simmons, as well as Miss Lohmann, are pupils. Mr. Cornish (we believe) presided at the pianoforte with much ability.

Miss WHEATLEY's Concert took place on Tuesday evening, at Willis's rooms; a varied programme was provided and gave great satisfaction apparently to the audience, who desired to "encore" on all occasions; they were successful in persuading Mr. Wrighton to repeat Nelson's ballads "Madeline," and "I saw not her face," Miss Poole to sing again Alexander Lee's pretty cavatina "The spirit of good," Mr. Leffler to do the same for "Molly Bawn," (which he did "right well,") and Mr. Clinton to repeat, on his new patent flute, his variations on "Jenny Jones," which, en passant, we may note as being very effective and excellently written for the instrument. Miss Wheatley played on the pianoforte Weber's concert-stück, in a brilliant and effective manner, Schuloff's carnival, Etudes by Thalberg and Hiller, and Cipriani Potter's Allegro di Bravura (from the pezzì di Bravura), which our readers may recollect was first introduced by M. Billet, at his classical concerts. Miss Wheatley's performances as a pianist may be cited throughout as excellent; no less so was her playing the fantasia, (by Kalliwoda we think), on the violin—her bowing was excellent, and her tone remarkably good. We have not space enough for details, so must content ourselves with mentioning that the programme contained, besides those we have already mentioned, the names of Miss Lascelles, Miss Ransford, Miss Poole and Mr. Allen Irving, as vocalists, and as instrumentalists, Mr. T. W. Davis (trumpet), and Mr. R. Blagrove (concertina). Mr. Henry Wheatley was the conductor. The concert was well attended, and Miss Wheatley generously gave the proceeds to the fund of the Royal Free Hospital.

MR. FRANK BODDA. In consequence of a severe accident, and illness resulting therefrom, this popular barytone is incapacitated from accompanying Mr. and Mrs. Sims Reeves in their provincial operatic tour to Birmingham, Glasgow, &c., &c.

AN INCIDENT OF THE WEST.—"Music hath charms to soothe the savage breast." About a year since, a temperance man moved with his family from South Carolina to the West. The sparseness of the population and the continual travel past his place, rendered it a necessary act of humanity in him frequently to entertain travellers who could get no further. Owing to the frequency of these calls, he resolved to enlarge his house and put up the usual sign. Soon after this, an election came on; the triumphant party felt that it was a wonderful victory, and some "young bloods" of the majority determined, in honour of it, to have a regular "blow out." Accordingly, mounted on their fine prairie horses, they started on a long ride. Every tavern was visited on their route, and the variety thus drank produced a mixture which added greatly to the noise and boisterousness of the company. In this condition they came, about a dozen in number, to our quiet temperance tavern. The landlord and lady were absent; the eldest daughter, fourteen years of age, and five younger children, were alone in the house. These gentlemen (for they considered themselves as such) called for liquor. "We keep none," was the modest reply of the young girl. "What do you keep a tavern for, then?" "For the accommodation of travellers." "Well then, accommodate us with something to drink." "You will see, sir, by the sign, that we keep a temperance tavern." "A temperance tavern!"—(here the children clustered around their sister.) "Give me an axe, and I'll cut down the sign." "You will find an axe, at the wood-pile, sir." Here the party, each one with an oath, made a rush for the wood-pile, exclaiming, "Down with the sign! down with the sign!" but the leader, in going out, discovered in an adjoining room a splendid piano and its accompaniments. "Who makes that thing squeak?" said he. "I play sometimes," said she in a quiet, modest manner. "You do? Give us a tune." "Certainly, sir;" and taking the stool, while the children formed a circle close to her, she sung and played "The Old Arm Chair." Some of them had not heard a piano before; others had not heard one for years. The tumult was soon hushed; the whip-and-spur gentlemen were drawn back from the wood-pile, and formed a circle outside the children. The leader again spoke: "Will you be so kind as to favour us with another song?" Another was played, and the little ones becoming re-assured, some of them joined their voices with their sister's. Song after song was sung and played. One would touch the sympathies of the strangers, another melt them in grief; one would arouse their patriotism, another their chivalry and benevolence; until at length, ashamed to ask for more, they each made a low bow, thanked her, wished her a good afternoon, and left as quietly as if they had been to a funeral. Months after this occurrence, the father, in travelling stopped at a village, where a gentleman accosted him: "Are you Colonel P—, of S—?" "I am." "Well, sir, I am spokesman of the party who so grossly insulted your innocent family, threatened to cut down your sign, and spoke so rudely to your children. You have just cause to be proud of your daughter, sir; her noble bearing and fearless courage were remarkable in one so young and unprotected. Can you pardon me, sir? I feel that I can never forgive myself."—New York Journal of Commerce.

CAMBERWELL ATHENÆUM.—The first concert given by this institution took place on Wednesday evening last, under the direction of the Messrs. Thomas and Osborne Williams. The artistes who assisted on this occasion were, Miss Poole, Miss Messent, Miss J. Bleadon, Mr. Richardson (the celebrated flutist), Mr. G. Perren, (the popular tenor), Signor Bottura (basso from Her Majesty's Theatre), Mr. Arthur Cole, an amateur singer of some pretensions, and Mr. Osborne Williams, who officiated in the two-fold capacity of pianist and conductor, and whose elegant rendering of Streich's "Hirondelles" met with great applause. The great feature of the evening, however, was the performance of the "Concert Choir," consisting of eight carefully selected male voices, whose sensitive rendering of several concerted pieces by Balfe, Rossini, Auber, &c., did great credit to the training of Mr. Osborne Williams, and afforded unmitigated satisfaction to the audience. They gave Lutzow's "Wild hunt," with a delicacy of light and shade which won them a rapturous encore. Altogether the concert went off brilliantly, and was heartily enjoyed by the numerous audience which the occasion had attracted. The encores were no less than seven in number.

ON THE SUPPOSED MIRACULOUS EFFECT OF THE MUSIC OF THE ANCIENTS AND ITS INFLUENCE OVER THE PASSIONS.—Of the relative empire of music over the passions, it is said that Trepander apprehended a violent rebellion among the Lacedemonians by the assistance of music; and Pythagoras relates seeing a young stranger enflamed with wine, and in so violent a rage that he was on the point of setting fire to the house of his mistress for preferring his rival to him, but was restored to reason and tranquillity by hearing a flute played in a grave and soothing style. The painter Theon, who knew the value of martial music, availed himself of its power at an exhibition of a picture, in which he had represented a soldier ready to fall on the enemy; he first took the precaution of making a Jibicen (or flute-player) sound the charge, and as soon as he saw the spectators sufficiently animated by this music, he uncovered his picture, which gained universal admiration. A Thracian Prince, mentioned by Xenophon in Book 7, was roused in the same manner by flutes and trumpets, made of ox's hide undressed, and is said to have danced with as much impetuosity and swiftness, as if he had tried to avoid a dart. The trumpeter, Herodorus of Megara, is said to have had the power of animating the troops of Demetrius so much by sounding two trumpets at a time, during the siege of Argos, as to enable them to move a machine towards the ramparts which they had in vain attempted to do for several days before, on account of its enormous weight; now the whole of the miraculous part of the exploit may be construed into a signal given by the musician to the soldiers for working in concert at the battering-ram or other military engines, for want of which signal, in former attempts, their efforts had never been united, and, consequently, were ineffectual. All this proves that the best music of every age has great power over the human affections, and is thought very delightful and perfect, but would not give the same satisfaction or pleasure to persons of taste in future ages.—From J. H. Tomlinson's Lectures on Ancient Music.

JENNY LIND AS A BRIDESMAID.—Jenny Lind has been officiating as bridesmaid to the servant-maid who had charge of the rooms she occupied at Clifton house, Niagara Falls. It is said that the beauty, affability, and fidelity of the girl attracted the attention of the Swedish Nightingale, who, on hearing of her intended marriage, immediately purchased for her a becoming trousseau—earrings, gloves, bonnets, &c.—and with her own hands attended to her toilet on the morning of the ceremony. This done, she took her in her own carriage, having first read to her and her future husband beautiful and affecting passages applicable to the occasion, conveyed her to church, and there officiated as Margaret Atkinson's bridesmaid.

PORTRAITS OF MOZART.—It is known that Mozart was painted twice only from the life: once by the German painter, Tischbein, the other time by an Italian painter, Father Martini, of Bologna. Both pictures had disappeared. In recently taking an inventory of the effects of a former violinist of the Grand Duke of Hesse-Darmstadt's Chapel, the first of these pictures was found, signed with the autograph monogram of Tischbein. The immortal author of Don Giovanni appears here in a coat of French fashion, green in colour, large frill, waistcoat of yellow satin, and powdered wig. Two inhabitants of Mayence, M. Arntz, Professor of Natural Philosophy, and M. Schulze, the organist, who knew Mozart personally, affirm that the portrait presents a striking likeness; and the former adds, that the costume given is precisely that which Mozart was accustomed to wear when he played on the piano at the Court of the Elector. This portrait differs essentially from all the engraved likenesses of Mozart. Most of these were probably taken from a medal struck in 1784, at Munich, in honour of the great musician.

M. SERVAIS, the violoncellist, is about to make his last tour in Russia, where he has always been a great favourite. He will be accompanied by M. Achille Devigne, the pianist of Ghent, who may be remembered as having paid a short visit to London this last season.

RUDOLPH WILLMERS, the Danish pianist, is giving concerts in Frankfort.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

C. H., EDINBURGH.—Correspondent's letter is an advertisement. MISS BINCKES' CONCERT AT GREENWICH will be noticed at length in our next.

OUR BRIMINGHAM CORRESPONDENT.—Your notice of the first concert of the Festival Choral Society in our next.

BEAUTIES OF CAMBRIA,By BRINLEY RICHARDS.

CONTAINING:—

- No. 1. The Live Long Night,
- " 2. Margaret's Daughter,
- " 3. The Ash Grove,
- " 4. Sweet Richard,
- " 5. Lady Owen's Delight,
- " 6. March of the Men of Harlech;

THE PRINCE OF CAMBRIA'S BAND MARCH.

Price 2s. each.

The "Beauties of Cambria," by Brinley Richards, were first performed by the author at an Annual Festival of the Cambrian Society of Ancient Britons on St. David's Day, at the Freemason's Tavern. The delight and enthusiasm which these national melodies produced on the company were immense. The "Prince of Cambria's Band March," by the author of "The Beauties of Cambria," threw the company into a state amounting to delirium. The Melodies were dedicated by permission to His Grace the Duke of Newcastle, by whose kind patronage this talented Ancient Briton became a student of the Royal Academy of Music, where he gained the honour of being elected a King's Scholar.

LEE and COXHEAD, 48, Albemarle-street.

CAUTION.

SEVERAL notices relative to the Bloomer Polkas having appeared, Henry Distin, in justice to himself, begs to inform the Music Trade, Profession, and Public in general that DISTIN'S BLOOMER POLKA, by Wellington Guernsey, price 2s. 6d., was the original one published, the title of the said Bloomer Polkas having been surreptitiously obtained by other parties in the first instance. Distin's Bloomer Polkas are nightly performed at the Public Balls, Concerts, Theatres, &c., and also at Distin and Sons' Concerts throughout the kingdom, and the various military bands of the army. Published by Henry Distin, at his Depot for Military Musical Instruments, 31, Cranbourn-street, Leicester-square, London, where also may be had by the same popular author,

The Court Beauty Polkas (as performed at Her Majesty's State Balls)	2s. 6d.
The Angelina do.	2s. 6d.
The Belvidere Galops do.	2s. 6d.
The Cuckoo Galop do.	2s. 6d.

All with Cornet accompaniments.

WILHELM KUNE'S LA CORBEILLE DE FLEURS,

WALSE de Salon, and GALOP di BRAVURA. The most successful pieces of this popular composer.

(Campbell, Ransford, and Co., 53, New Bond-street.

PIANOFORTES FOR HIRE AT REDUCED PRICES.

ECONOMY being at all times commendable, Messrs. ROUSSELOT and Co. have established a new system for Hiring Pianofortes, including the tuning once a month, which presents not only a great saving, but also the advantage of having the instrument regularly kept in tune. Pianofortes, sold, exchanged, and repaired. For particulars apply to Rousselet and Co., 66, Conduit-street, Regent-street.

BLACKWOOD & CO.'S REGISTERED MUSIC FILE.

THIS new and useful invention is designed to supersede the old portfolio. It will be found the most convenient article yet introduced for holding and preserving from dust unbound music.

To be had of all Musicellers, and Wholesale at the Manufactory, 26, Long Acre, London.

LINDSAY SLOPER'SEDITION OF PIANOFORTE WORKS.

ALREADY Published:—No. 1, L'Absence, by F. David, 3s. No. 2, Reverie, by F. David, 2s. No. 3, Souvenir de Reinegger, by F. Beyer, 2s. 6d. No. 4, Valse Brillante, by Burgmüller, 3s. No. 5, Valse de Salon, by A. Thomas, 2s. No. 6, Krieger's Lust March, by F. Beyer, 2s. 6d. No. 7, Le Torrent, by Marchalton, 2s. 6d. No. 8, Air and Variations, in F major, by Mozart, 2s. No. 9, Air and Variations, in A major, by Mozart, 3s. 6d. No. 10, Air and Variations, in G major, by Beethoven, 2s. No. 11, Reverie, by G. by Rossini, 2s. No. 12, Le Flâneur (Capriccio), by A. Weber, 2s. No. 13, Marche, by Chopin, 2s. 6d. No. 14, La Femme du Martin, by Kalkbrenner, 2s. 6d. To be continued.

Campbell, Ransford, and Co., 53, New Bond-street.

PIANOFORTES.

MESSRS. RUST & STAHL, in calling the attention of Pianists and the Trade to their unique instruments, beg to intimate that they have just completed arrangements for the manufacturing of the upright pianos only, viz., the Piccolo and Cottage; hence they are enabled to give their undivided attention to this now almost universal class of instruments, which, combined with the terms to meet the present exigencies of the times, small profits and quick returns, will place their pianofortes beyond the possibility of competition. To this they need only add that their instruments combine all the modern improvements, and are made of the best seasoned materials, are warranted, and may be exchanged free of expense if not found to be in every respect perfect. Drawings and lists of prices forwarded post free.

Rust and Stahl, 330, Regent-street, Manufactory, Edwards' Yard, Edward-street.

MUSIC FOR THE ORGAN OR HARMONIUM.

THE AMATEUR ORGANIST—a collection of soft and full Voluntaries, arranged in six Books, 3s. each, by EDWARD TRAVIS, and may be had elegantly bound, price 18s. "Mr. Travis has introduced to the musical world a new and interesting work for the Organ or Harmonium, under the title of 'The Amateur Organist.' Mr. Travis has availed himself of an extensive and classical music library, and selected with great taste the most beautiful morceaux of the great masters, Foreign and English. To lovers of classical music this work will be found to be the most superb selection that has ever issued from the musical press."—Vide Musical Review.

THE AMATEUR INTERLUDIST—a collection of short Interludes to play between the Verses of the Psalms, in one Book, price 4s., by EDWARD TRAVIS and J. P. DYER.

THE AMATEUR PRELUDIST—a collection of Preludes, with the Organ Stops carefully marked, in one Book, price 4s., by E. TRAVIS.

SACRED VOCAL MUSIC.

KELLER'S Collection of ANTHEMS, CHURCH SERVICES, CHANTS, &c., arranged for the Voice and Piano, in six Books, price 3s. each, with six beautiful and appropriate designs by Brandard, arranged by ALBERT KELLER. The six Books can be had in one Volume, elegantly bound, price 18s.

THE PSALMODIA BRITANNICA—a selection of Psalms and Hymns for the Voice and Organ, in six Books, price 3s. each, arranged by EDWIN FLOOD, and may be had in one Volume, neatly bound, price 18s.

London: LEE & COXHEAD, 48, Albemarle-street, and can be had of all Book and Music-sellers.

N.B.—A New Edition of "Hark, the Sabbath Bells," by Edwin Flood.

SAX MILITARY BAND INSTRUMENTS.

COUNCIL MEDAL, July 10th, 1725. Messrs. ROUSSELOT & Co. beg to announce that being the representatives of the eminent inventor of the Sax Horns, who has gained the sole Council Medal for the Military Band Instruments, they are able to provide purchasers with genuine Sax Horns, French Horns, Trombones, Cornets with or without the patent slides, &c., at moderate prices. The admired Instruments from the Exhibition are now on view at 66, Conduit-street. List of prices forwarded on application. London, Rousselet and Co., 66, Conduit-street, Regent-street.

PRIZE GLEE.

FIRST AND ONLY NOTICE.

ARDWICK GENTLEMEN'S GLEE CLUB—The Members of the Ardwick Gentlemen's Glee Club hereby offer a Premium of FIVE GUINEAS for the best ORIGINAL CHEERFUL GLEE, for four male voices, such glee to be sent in or before the 31st of December next, addressed to the secretary of the society, at the George and Dragon Inn, Ardwick Green, Manchester. Each composition is to be distinguished by a motto, and accompanied by a sealed letter containing the real name and address of the composer, the glee and the letter being endorsed on the outside by the same motto. The Manuscripts will be retained by the club, but the copyright will not be interfered with. The name of the successful candidate will be publicly announced in the local papers immediately after the decision.

S. WOOD, Hon. Sec.

HERE IS YOUR REMEDY!

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.

A MOST miraculous Cure of Bad legs, after 43 years' suffering.—Extract of a Letter from Mr. William Galpin, of 70, Saint Mary's street, Weymouth, dated May 13th, 1881. To Professor Holloway, Sir,—At the age of 18 my wife (who is now 61) caught a violent cold, which settled in her legs, and ever since that time they have been more or less sore, and greatly inflamed. Her agonies were distracting, and for months together she was deprived entirely of rest and sleep. Every remedy that medical men advised was tried, but with out effect; her health suffered severely, and the state of her legs was terrible. I had often read your Advertisements, and advised her to try your Pills and Ointment; and, as a last resource, after every other remedy had proved useless, she consented to do so. She commenced six weeks ago, and, strange to relate, is now in good health. Her legs are painless, without seam or scar, and her sleep sound and undisturbed. Could you have witnessed the sufferings of my wife during the last 43 years, and contrast them with her present enjoyment of health, you would indeed feel delighted in having been the means of so greatly alleviating the sufferings of a fellow creature. (Signed) WILLIAM GALPIN.

The Pills should be used conjointly with the Ointment in most of the following cases:—

Bad Legs	Coco Bay	Contracted and	Lumbago	Scurvy
Bad Breasts	Chico-foot	Stiff Joints	Piles	Sore-heads
Burns	Chilblains	Elephantiasis	Rheumatism	Tumours
Bunions	Chapped hands	Pitrials	Scalds	Ulcers
Bite of Mosche	Corns (Soft)	Gout	Sore Nipples	Wounds
toes and Sand	Cancers	Glandular Swellings	Sore-throats	Yaws
Files		Ingrowns	Skin-diseases

Sold by the Proprietor, 244, Strand, (near Temple Bar), London; and by all respectable Vendors of Patent Medicines throughout the Civilized World. In Pot and boxes, at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 6d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 22s., and 32s. each. There is a very specific sale saving in taking the larger sizes.

N. B.—Directions for the guidance of Patients are affixed to each Pot or Box.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

LAST NINE NIGHTS OF M. JULLIEN'S CONCERTS.

Signor BOTTESINI, Signor SIVORI.
THE INDIAN AND EXHIBITION QUADRILLES.

M. JULLIEN has the honor to announce that his Concerts will most positively terminate on WEDNESDAY, December 10. On MONDAY, December 1st (being the Last Night but Eight) the Programme will include a Solo by Signor Bottesini, a Solo by Signor Sivori, the First Appearance of Miss Sarah Nott, Selections from "Le Prophète" (for the First Time this Season), a Symphony by Beethoven, with several new Waltzes, Polkas, &c.

COMMENCE AT EIGHT, TERMINATE AT ELEVEN.

Promenade, Boxes, and Galleries, 1s.
Dress Circle, 2s. 6d.

GRAND BAL MASQUE.

M. JULLIEN'S Annual Grand Bal Masque will take place on FRIDAY, Dec. 12th.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

BAL MASQUE.

M. JULLIEN has the honor to announce that his GRAND ANNUAL BAL MASQUE will take place at the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane, on FRIDAY, December 12th, and terminate the Season of Concerts.

Tickets for the Ball, 10s. 6d. each.

The Prices of Admission for SPECTATORS (for whom the Audience portion of the Theatre will, as before, be set apart), will be as on former occasions, viz.:—Dress Circle, 5s.; Boxes, 3s.; Lower Gallery, 2s.; Upper Gallery, 1s.; Private Boxes, from £3 3s. upwards.

Persons taking Private Boxes will have the privilege of passing to and from the Ball Room without extra charge.

The Theatre being let at Christmas for Dramatic Performances, this Ball will positively close the season.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY, EXETER HALL.

CONDUCTOR, MR. COSTA.—The SEASON will COMMENCE on FRIDAY, December 5th, with (first time by this Society) Haydn's Oratorio, THE SEASONS. Vocalists—Miss Birch, Mr. Lockey, and Mr. H. Phillips. Orchestra of 700 performers. Subscriptions may be paid, and Tickets obtained at the Society's office, No. 6, in Exeter Hall, any day from 10 till 5; and on Tuesday evenings, from 7 till 10. Terms of Subscription—central reserved seats (numbered), £3 3s.; reserved seats, area or gallery, £2 2s.; body of the hall, £1 1s. per annum; tickets, 3s., 5s., and 10s. 6d.

LONDON SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY, EXETER HALL.

ON MONDAY, December 22, 1851, Handel's Oratorio, MES-SIAH. Vocalists—Mrs. Sunderland, Mrs. Temple, Miss Dolby, Mr. Lockey, and Mr. H. Phillips. The Band and Chorus will consist of 800 performers. Conductor, Mr. Surman, Founder of the Exeter Hall Oratorios. The Subscription to the Society is—£1 1s. per annum, or, for Reserved Seats, £2 2s. Subscribers joining previous to the 22nd of December will be entitled to Four Tickets, and Reserved Seat subscribers a splendid copy of the oratorio.

EXETER HALL.

PROFESSOR TAYLOR'S version of Haydn's oratorio, THE SEASONS, dedicated by permission to His Royal Highness the Prince Albert. This celebrated work will be performed for the first time by the SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY on FRIDAY EVENING, December 5, 1851. Conductor, Mr. Costa. Price of the work (bound), 31s., to be had at the Society's office, 6, Exeter Hall, and at C. Lonsdale's Musical Circulating Library, 26, Old Bond-street. N.B. The above work may be had in detached vocal pieces, and is also arranged for the pianoforte as solos and duets, with accompaniments for flute, violin, and violoncello (ed. 4th.), by G. F. Harris. The single choral and instrumental parts can be obtained at Mr. Hedgley's, 12, Ebury-street, Pimlico.

MISS DOLBY

HAS the honor to announce that the SECOND of her ANNUAL SERIES OF THREE SOIREE MUSICALES will take place at her residence, 3, Hyde-street, Manchester-square, to commence at Eight o'clock precisely. Miss Dolby will be assisted by eminent vocal and instrumental artists. Tickets, Half-a-Guinea each; to be had of Miss Dolby only.

Just published, price 15s.

M. D'ALBERT'S PRESENTATION ALBUM FOR 1852.

CONTAINING a great variety of new Waltzes, Quadrilles, Polkas, &c.; and produced in a style to render it the most elegant and attractive musical prize or present yet published.

D'ALBERT'S EDINBURGH QUADRILLE, price 3s.—Just published, the third edition of this, the best Quadrille on Scotch airs ever written.—"M. D'Albert has chosen airs that have not been hacknied, and has nevertheless produced the most inspiring quadrille on Scotch airs we have yet seen; as a right merry set it is unequalled." Musical Review.—Solos, 2s.; duets, 4s.; full orchestra parts, 5s.

D'ALBERT'S FAUST and DEW-DROP WALTZES, performed with enormous success by Coote's band at Her Majesty's State Ball, and since at all the great balls in London and the provinces. "These waltzes are perfectly different in style, but each a gem of its kind." Price 4s. solos and duets; full orchestra parts, 5s.

D'ALBERT'S NEWEST POLKAS.—Just published—

The Bloomer Maria Polka	2s. 6d.
The Kosuth Polka	2s. 6d.
The Holstein Polka	2s. 6d.
The Garland Polka	2s. 6d.
The Ladies' Polka	2s. 6d.
L'Enfant Polka	2s. 6d.

The above Polkas are beautifully illustrated by Brandard, and promise to exceed in popularity all the celebrated works of this highly popular composer; also to be had as duets and for full orchestra.

M. D'ALBERT'S POPULAR MUSIC.—New editions, beautifully illustrated, of the following favourite Quadrilles, Waltzes, &c.:—The Cherbourg Quadrille, the Par. Quadrille on French airs, Edinburgh on Scotch airs, Grenada on Spanish airs, Naples on Neapolitan airs, each 3s. The Bride's Polka, 3s.; Garland Polka, 3s.; Linnet Polka, 3s.; Coquette, Helena, and Bridal Polkas, each 3s. The Fairest of the Fair Waltz, 4s.; Star of the Night Waltz, 4s.; Margarita Waltz, 4s.; Queen of the Ball, 4s.; and the celebrated Hungarian or "New Schottisch," 2s. 6d. "The above are the gems of M. D'Albert's compositions."

The most favourites of the above works are also arranged by Mr. Tutton for a full military band.

Chappell, 50, New Bond-street.

MOZART'S ZAUBERFLÖTE.

BOOSEY'S STANDARD LYRIC DRAMA, a Series of Operas for pianoforte and voice (with English and foreign texts), in the most perfect form possible, published in half-a-crown monthly part, each containing 60 pp. On the 1st of December will be published, the first part of Mozart's Zauberflöte, with English and German words. Now ready, complete, Ernani, 15s.; Fidelio, 15s.; Figaro, 16s.; Don Juan, 18s.; Sonnambula, 12s. 6d.; Norma, 10s. 6d.; Il Barbiere, 16s.; Lucresia Borgia, 16s.; and Der Freischütz, 12s. 6d. T. Boosey and Co., 25, Holles-street.

THE ENGLISH GLEE AND MADRIGAL UNION, (UNDER THE PATRONAGE OF HER MOST GRACIOUS MAJESTY).

MRS. Enderasohn, Miss M. Williams, Mr. Lockey, Mr. Francis, Mr. Land, and Mr. H. Phillips, will Sing at the Town Hall, Reading, on Monday morning and evening, Dec. 1st; Cheltenham, Tuesday evening 2nd, and Wednesday morning, 3rd; Devizes, 4th; Leicester, 16th; Derby, 17th; and the Town Hall, Birmingham, 18th.—E. Land, Hon. Sec., 8, Foley-place, London.

NEW AND POPULAR DANCE MUSIC.

Peterhoff Waltz. Gungl	2s. 6d.
Weidensehn Waltz. Gungl	2s. 6d.
Clipper Polka. Calcott	2s. 6d.
Magnet Polka. Calcott	2s. 6d.
Kasyuki's six Polkas, each	2s. 6d.
Queen of Night Waltz. Calcott	2s. 6d.

Cramer, Beale and Co., 201, Regent-street.

T. OESTEN'S

MOST POPULAR & FAVORITE PIANOFORTE WORKS

Lucresia Borgia	2s. 6d.
Gondallied	2s. 6d.
MORCEAUX MELODIE:—
No. 1, Le Postillon d'Amour	2s. 6d.
2, Pensez à Moi	2s. 6d.
Le Gai de la Rochelle	2s. 6d.
Paquita	2s. 6d.
Le Prophète	2s. 6d.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent-street

Printed and Published for the Proprietor by MICHAEL SAMUEL MYERS, of No. 3, Sudley Villas, Sudley Road, Clapham Road, in the parish of Lambeth, at the office of MYERS & Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, in the parish of St. Paul, where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed, post paid. To be had of G. Parkes, Dean Street, Soho; Allen, Warwick Lane; Vickers, Holywell Street, and at all Booksellers.—Saturday, November 29, 1851.

The Musical World.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s.; Half year, 8s.; Three Months, 4s.; (Stamped Copies 1s. per Quarter extra Payable in advance, to be forwarded by Money Order, to the Publishers, Myers & Co., 22, Tavistock-st., Covent Garden).

No. 49.—VOL. XXIX.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1851.

Price Fourpence.
Stamped Fivepence.

THE OPERA AT DRURY LANE.

Mr. Bunn will open Drury Lane Theatre on Boxing night with a tragedy and a pantomime. This is startling news for some of our readers, and will convey no small disappointment to some of our composers. Yes, Mr. Bunn has engaged a tragic company, and it is now probable that he may carry on his new campaign without opera at all. Whence has arisen this change? Has Mr. Bunn found it impossible to consolidate an operatic company, or has he merely changed his opinions, and turned from his old love to a new? Has he come to the conclusion, that in these brilliant days of the classical drama, with a superabundance of talent overrunning the three kingdoms, and a public rushing madly to receive their idols with open arms, that the tragic muse alone can be the mainstay of a theatre? If such be Mr. Bunn's sentiments, he is a very different person from what we have always considered him. But if Mr. Bunn have thrown over music, and taken up with tragedy, how, and from what source, it may be asked, can he amalgamate a corps dramatique? This will appear a foolish question when we remember how many tragic companies there are at this moment acting in and near London, all in working condition, and prosperous, as the saying is. Have we not the tragic company at the Princess's, under the great chief, Charles Kean? Have we not the tragic company at the Saddler's Wells, under the other chief, Mr. Samuel Phelps? Is there not a battalion of tragedians, all firing away like murder, at the Olympic; and another cohort of dingy denizens of the muse, upholding the serious drama under the captainship of Mr. James Anderson, ex-lessee of Drury Lane, at some theatre eastward of Newgate street, the Norton Folgate, the City of London, or that semi-fashionable place of suburban amusement, on the spur of the Islington Hills, yecept The Britannia Saloon? Mr. James Anderson will pardon us that we are not more intimately acquainted with his whereabouts; and he can the more easily afford to do so, since he is in the receipt of sixty pounds sterling, weekly, and unbounded applause, nightly. Besides the above, Mr. Webster is about to assemble a tragic army for the coming fight at the Haymarket, and Mr. Shepherd is on the eve of doing fierce battle in the same line at the Surrey. Mr. Webster, no doubt, perceiving that Buckstone and English Opera cannot make head against his high prices and the fun-and-music apathy of the public, flies to the legitimate drama and legitimate actors in these legitimate times to replenish his attenuated treasury, and engages Mr. Vandenhoff and Miss Vandenhoff, and other celebrities of the sock and buskin. Mr. Shepherd, also, with a happy insight into the human sympathies pervading the departments of Lambeth and the Borough, for his Christmas and Boxing entertainments, prefers George Barnwell to Massaniello, and makes Mr. Travers and Miss Romer give place to Mr. Creswick and Miss Vining; thereby very felicitously contrasting his diversions, and aptly precluding the possibility of instituting any comparison between his Opera and his Pantomime. We will say nothing of the Victoria Theatre, since it abuts on the New Cut; nor of the Marylebone, seeing that it stands adjacent to a Cabbage Market,—although in both abodes of the Muses Tragedy is rampant; and made brilliant with blue lights. In short, Tragedy, by way of retaliating for the poverty of its apostles, is overrunning the land like a huge weed, or the large vine at Hampton Court. Nay, our tragic cup is full to overflowing, and among the brightest beads which have run over the brim, we find the gracious Helen Faucit falling into the lap of Hymen, and the grand and sombre Mary Warner, with the ethereal and tantalizing Laura Addison, vanishing to Yankeeeland: while Gustavus Brooke takes his farewell benefit in two characters and a well-written speech at Liverpool.

But, if every theatre in London have its stock tragic company efficient and well furnished, absorbing all the talents, and swallowing monopoly, how can Mr. Bunn bring together a competent force—how discover individual talent—consequential and attractive? Mr. John Cooper and Mr. Belton, to be sure, are both, we believe, disengaged, and both, we believe, would be delighted, for a consideration, to exhibit their capabilities before the footlights of Drury Lane, in the presence of whatsoever audience Providence, fine weather, and disposable cash might send to behold them. But neither to Mr. John Cooper, nor to Mr. Belton, has Mr. Bunn pinned his faith and his hopes. He, Mr. Bunn, has made a discovery. He has found a young tragedian, not rising, but risen—if we are to believe certain authorities. Mr. Charles Pitt is to be the future hero of the Drury Lane Poster and Bills, with his name magnified and underlined. Mr. Charles Pitt is to be the future hero of the Drury Lane stage, with the spectators roaring and the actors bowing. Mr. Charles Pitt is to be the future hero of the Drury Lane Green Room, with the Committee of Management offering their congratulations, and Mr. Bunn promising an increase of salary. Whether Mr. Charles Pitt is destined to be the hero of the public and the press, remains for Mr. Charles Pitt to establish.

An unworthy question may here arise inadvertently to the lips of some of our readers. The question is, "Who is Mr. Charles Pitt?" To which, we are sorry to say, we are forced to return the unworthy answer, "We do not know!" If memory fail us not, however, we have seen Mr. Charles Pitt act at the Marylebone Theatre, and certainly he did not leave the impression on our minds that he was destined to step into Macready's shoes.* Mr. Charles Pitt was then a young man, and time and experience may have done wonders for him. He has been in America for several years and has gained a high reputation from the Yankees, which, we hope, an English public may confirm. With Mr. Charles Pitt Mr. Bunn has associated Miss Glynn, the fair pupil of Charles Kemble, who has already won for herself a reputable name by her performances at the Saddlers' Wells, for two or three years. But Mr. Charles Pitt, with his doubtful American laurels, and Miss Glynn, with her undoubted name from Saddlers' Wells, cannot, in themselves, constitute a tragic company, nor, by themselves, prove attractive enough to defray the expense of so large a theatre as Drury Lane. No doubt Mr. Bunn's prospectus will contain a long array of names, which will look exceedingly well at a distance; and no doubt the promises held out will be magniloquent and enticing; but, until we have proof to the contrary, we cannot but consider that Mr. Bunn has committed an unwise act of diplomacy in engaging a tragic, instead of an operatic, company for Drury Lane.

JULLIEN'S CONCERTS.

The feature of the past week has been the debut of Miss Cicely Nott, a young vocalist of great promise, who sang for the first time in public at these concerts. Miss Cicely Nott is a pupil of Mr. Emmanuel Garcia, and considerable pains appears to have been taken with her, if we may judge from what we heard on Monday and Tuesday nights. She has a most charming voice, a true soprano, of rare quality, exceedingly flexible, and unusually extensive. But what pleased us most, or rather, most astonished us, was the energy and dramatic feeling of which Miss Cicely Nott gave undoubted indications, and which, to our plain sense, marks out the stage as the area best adapted to her talents. Marliani's brilliant air, "Stanza di piu," was well selected to exhibit the quality, force, and neatness of Miss Cicely Nott's style to perfection. The fair artist, although evidently labouring under great nervousness, accomplished the difficulties of the aria with the utmost ease, and produced an immense effect; a unanimous and vociferous encore was the result, and Miss Cicely Nott repeated the air with more self-possession, and, consequently, with more power and more finish, and was a second time cheered enthusiastically. A more unequivocal success we have never witnessed; and a fairer promise in a debutante we have seldom seen evidence itself in so unmistakable a manner. Jullien has taken Miss Cicely Nott under the wings of his favour, and there is no doubt that her talents will have every justice done them. The young debutante sang every night during the week, and each night was received with thunders of applause, apparently gaining ground with the public after every successive display.

*Macready's shoes, we understand, have been placed at the foot of Shakespeare's statue, in Drury Lane Theatre, for all future coming actors to try on. Why do not some of the great tragedian's contemporaries make a trial? They would be sure to "put their foot in it," as Pedro says in Cinderella.

On Thursday the popular Koenig took his benefit, but the popularity of his name could not make any difference in the receipts of the house, since hundreds have been turned away every night, except that there were more hundreds turned away on Thursday night than on any other night of the season preceding. Bottesini made his twenty-second appearance, and for the twenty-second time enraptured his listeners, and carried off their hearts, and stowed them away throbbing in the body of his huge fiddle. Sivori also played, and was eke the idol of the moment.

The gems of the performance were the Leonora overture; the "Allegro and Storm" movement from the "Pastoral Symphony;" the Grand Selection from the Figlia del Reggimento; and the "Great Exhibition Quadrille," which has now become an indispensable part of the programme.

To-night the Beethoven Festival will be given. The whole of the first part of the Concert will be dedicated to selections from the works of the great master.

On Monday Jullien's benefit is announced to take place. It is to be lamented that Jullien could not combine Drury Lane and the Royal Italian Opera into one theatre for one night. Drury Lane on Monday night will be quite inadequate to contain one-third of Jullien's patrons and admirers.

The Bal Masqué—the only one of the season—will be given on Friday next, and will terminate the present season of Jullien's Concerts, the success of which has been altogether unparalleled.

A CHAPTER FOR ORGAN BLOWERS.

"There let the pealing organ blow
To the full-voiced choir below."—Milton.

From time immemorial, or in other words, during the while that professional blowers have lived and puffed in this world, a universal conspiracy seems to have prevailed, and also, there have been religiously handed down from generation to generation: a conspiracy having this intent, viz., that in the public apprehension, the player of an organ shall be regarded in advance of an organ blower; indeed, shall be considered as before the organ itself, in producing those majestic blows which have been the delight of ages, one of which blows so struck the exalted fancy of Milton, that he at once traced the effect to its proper source, and had the magnanimity and good sense to establish the same in the above immortal lines. Now, had Milton intended to run into common-place, and to follow popular opinion, he would undoubtedly have framed the above lines as follows:

"There let the pealing organ play
The full-voiced choir and all away," &c.

But to give to his lines such an allusion to playing, it is seen at once, is preposterous; the inference therefore is plain, that his reference applies principally, if not solely, to the blowing of an organ. But where else shall we look for such an independent and discriminating criticism on this subject, amidst all the puffs which the blower has equally called forth upon organs and organ playing? In public, is it ever remarked, "charming music that organ produces! Who can be the blower?" Or in the domestic circle, does any one remember ever to have heard it said, "What delightful blowing we had at church to-day?" No; the fact is but too evident that a conspiracy universally prevails to keep the organ blower in the background, if not quite out of sight, while the organist alone is held up to public view! And various are the instruments resorted to in accomplishing this object; but I scorn to expose them; I leave such a task to the sexton.

But in thus speaking a word in behalf of organ blowing, I would not be understood as attempting to disparage its very useful accessory, organ playing. Every blower is well aware that in order for his blowing to be properly comprehended, it is essential there should be someone at the keys of the organ, to see that the proper valves are duly opened, as the blower proceeds in the momentous work of supplying that wonderful musical breath which is to attune the souls of a thousand worshippers. This light and pleasant duty at the keys, devolves upon the organist; and the occupation is denominated organ playing, in contradistinction to the important and more laborious science of organ blowing. For this pleasant dalliance at the keys, children have often shown an early aptitude, not equally manifested for the brake of the blower, which is universally admitted to be far beyond infantile ability or stature.

Since the period of that eminent Blowic and illustrious champion of blowistic rights, he of a world-wide reputation—whom history records as having refused to supply any more wind until his arrogant player would admit that “WE,” i.e., blower and organist, and not organist alone, “played well”—numerous are the evidences which have been afforded of the superiority of the blower over the mere player of the organ. The narration of one or two of these examples, will show conclusively the degree of injustice which has hitherto been done to those indispensable members of society, organ blowers.

Where upon the chronicles of genius, do we find written an instance of a more self-sacrificing devotion to art, than was manifested several years ago by one Jackson, blower of the organ to the society of Universalists at Portland, who having obtained the key of their instrument went straightway therewith to one of the “trustees,” and in a towering passion, or, more properly, with righteous indignation, flung it down upon the table of that worthy functionary, and with it the blower’s commission and its income, (to him then indispensable)—declaring at the same time that “it was impossible to blow an organ so much out of tune as his’n!” But what did the player do? Why, the mercenary rascal thought only of his salary (!) and for the sake of it, continued to admit wind to that same instrument! Wind too of a quality such as might reasonably be expected could be produced by a totally unlearned and inexperienced blowist! And all this the congregation bore patiently, and even with complacency. To such lengths can human obstinacy go when a great wrong is to be thereby accomplished.

And not only are superior taste and self-devotion abundantly evinced, but the superior knowledge also of the blower, over that of the mere player of the organ, has been equally manifested. The following anecdote must suffice to illustrate this point. An organist of the Church of England, having occasion to be absent for a few Sundays, his place was temporarily filled by one who was thought to be even more learned as a player than his predecessor. This new comer had arranged several bars of prelude to the anthem which was to be sung on one occasion. The prelude was first performed by himself upon the organ, and then the anthem followed in due course. But great was the consternation that ensued, when within a few bars of the close, and in the midst of an unresolved seventh, the organ piteously yielded up its breath and became silent as the grave! Desperate were the efforts of the player to resuscitate the noble animal. He pulled convulsively the “blower’s signal,” but there came no response from what is here triumphantly proven to be its seat of life. The BLOWER refused to act: and not the fingers of Hercules, though inspired by the genius of a hundred Handels, can draw music from its keys, under such circumstances! The anthem was closed by the voices alone. The indignant player rushed irreverently into that sanctum where the blower remains hidden from mortal view, and commenced an unpremeditated harangue. But what was the sequel? He came therefrom rebuked and humiliated by the calm reply of the venerable blower: “I have blowed this organ,” said he, “for thirty years! and don’t you suppose I know how many puffs it takes to one of Dr. Blow’s anthems?” The mortified organist immediately compared the number of the bars of the prelude which he had surreptitiously introduced, with the number of bars of the anthem which succeeded the fatal point of failure, and found to his great chagrin, that they matched to a hair’s breadth! Now, doubtless that player had read all the works that had ever been written on music and organ-playing; and yet he had not reached that point of knowledge which a BLOWER communicated to him in a first lesson! Thus much in reference to comparative knowledge.

The qualities essential to form a successful BLOWER, it is believed, must be inherent in the individual himself. A passion for the art of organ-blowing seldom develops itself until after the physical and intellectual functions have become somewhat matured, and adequate to comprehend blowistic principles; it then appears spontaneously. The enthusiasm incidental to childhood is naturally excited by that which is more or less childish; such enthusiasm is progressive. Thus Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, and others, were in their childhood very fond of dabbling with organ keys; which early practice continued and cultivated through manhood, subsequently qualified them to attend upon the most eminent blowists, at the organ. But infinitely beyond all this, must be an art that can suddenly fire the stern breast of manhood, and convert it at once into a volcano of unaccountable ambition and unintelligible conceptions! It has been reserved for blowery, or Organ-Blowing, to accomplish this. An instance which recently occurred, put this beyond a doubt. A son of the Emerald Isle was provided to blow an organ in a certain city. Being thoroughly unacquainted with the business, he never having even seen an organ-brake before, it was doubtless the guiding-star of his destiny that led him to the spot; for “There’s a divinity that shapes our ends, Rough-hew them how we will.”

The time having arrived to “let the pealing organ blow,” the signal was given, but there was no wind. It was repeated twice, and even thrice—still, no wind. The delay was becoming awkward—the congregation were getting uneasy—what was to be done? “Blow! blow!! blow!!!” issued simultaneously from half a dozen different mouths, but not the slightest zephyr stirred within the wind-chest. The chorister hastened to the sanctum—when lo! how sublime the spectacle that presented itself to his astonished vision! Clinging with heels and hands to the long wooden handle of the bellows, there hung the full-grown prodigy—his eyes starting from their sockets, and his cheeks distended and crimson with efforts to force his breath into the end of that long wooden handle! Talk of inspired enthusiasm, and creative fancy, after this!

DR. MAINZER, the well-known musician, lecturer, and writer, died lately in Manchester.

PLAYING AT SIGHT.

J. J. Rousseau, in his "Musical Dictionary," has but few words on this subject, which deserve to be more fully developed. The explanation given by him is simply this:—"To read à livre ouvert, ad aperturam libri; or to play à première vue, a prima vista, at sight, are synonymous expressions."

Nothing delights the vulgar so much as a performer who can play at first sight, and who sits down to execute any piece of music whatever with imperturbable assurance. In the eye of a connoisseur, however, such an off-hand player will pass for no more than he really is—and what is that? Why, generally, a mere croqueton, to use Rousseau's expressive term, and which for want of a better word, we will translate note-grinder, a man of mere mechanism, who can decipher at first view what he would be unable to understand after the hundredth attempt. Mechanically speaking, I prefer the automaton of Maelzel to your first-rate decipherer of notes, who, vain of the facility he has acquired, is prepared to execute the masterpieces of the first composers, as if such works required no previous study or examination in order to enter into their style and investigate their character. What should we think of the pedant who should undertake to recite from Homer or Sophocles without having previously read the compositions, and thus enabled himself to form a general idea, at least, of the subject and manner of treating it?

Speaking of those who play at first sight, Grètry thus expresses himself:—"Many persons gain the credit of being able to perform perfectly at sight; but I declare that I never met with such a phenomenon, unless where the music was of the easy kind and written in the prevailing taste of the day: or perhaps to speak more clearly, every day music. I am aware that the man who has to support the title of a performer at sight displays all the hardihood of one sure of his object. But let us remember that it is the author whom he ought to satisfy, and not the hearers who are ignorant of the true character and expression of a work, the execution of which they believe to be ably accomplished merely because it is boldly got through."

We will adduce a few examples to show how apprehensive some great virtuosi have been lest they should commit themselves by playing at first sight, aware how much more forcibly great names speak than mere dry precepts.

The violinist Lamotte was an able performer at sight. With the view of putting his skill to the test, the celebrated Jarnowick proposed that they should play a concerted piece together. "Agreed," said Lamotte, "provided you will allow me to make you a proposal in return. It is, to bring me afterwards a concerto of your composition, and I will produce one of mine; we will make an interchange, you shall perform mine and I yours." Jarnowick no doubt found the proposal rather hazardous, for he declined accepting it.

The celebrated singer, Garat, is another example. He was the pupil of Nature, and perfected the gifts he had received from her by assiduous and unremitting application. Yet, with all his abilities, he was never able to sing a single bar at sight; and happy, perhaps, it was for the art that he never attained this mechanical capability. It is true he was obliged to labor, and yet when once he had thoroughly penetrated into the spirit and character of a composition, his expression was even more forcible than the feeling of the author in the very moment of inspiration. Few artists have yet appeared to rival his admirable manner of singing compositions of every kind and in every style. "I allow," observed some one to the great Sacchini, "that Garat sings well, but that he does not know music." "Sir, he is music itself," was the reply of this fine composer. The celebrated Italian singer, Viganoni, was also heard to say of Garat, "This Frenchman possesses a more original taste than the Italians themselves."

The author of these remarks once heard an expression from Garat which struck him very forcibly. "Others," said he, "attain the song by means of the notes, but I attain the notes by means of the song." These remarkable words might furnish an admirable text for some useful remarks on the true art of singing. In a word, with respect to Garat, he was all instinct for music. When he sang, so completely did he conquer all difficulties as regarded the notes, that he stamped every composition with its true character, and astonished even the composer himself by the delicate shades of feeling and sentiment which he had the happy art of imparting to it.

Sebastian Bach used to call those performers at sight who never hesitated to play off whatever was placed before them, whatever its difficulties might be, hussars of the harpsichord.

By the way, the mention of the name of this great composer recalls to my mind an anecdote relative to him, which bears immediately upon the subject before us, and which, if our note-grinders, of whatever description they may be, are at all capable of reflection, will afford them ample room for exercising it.

"Sebastian Bach," says Dr. Forkel, "had such an admirable facility in reading and executing the composition of others (which, indeed, were all easier than his own), that he once said to an acquaintance, while he lived at Weimar, that he really believed he could play every thing at first sight without hesitating. He was, however, mistaken, and the friend to whom he had thus expressed his opinion convinced him of it before a week had elapsed. He invited him to breakfast, and upon the desk of his instrument laid, among other pieces, one which at the first glance appeared to be very trifling. Bach came, and according to his custom went immediately to the instrument, partly to play and partly to look over the music that appeared on the desk. While he was turning over and performing the music that was laid there his friend went into the next room to breakfast. In a few minutes Bach got to the piece which was destined to make him change his opinion and began to play it. But he had not proceeded far when he came to a passage in which he stopped. He looked at it, began anew, and again stopped at the same notes. "No," cried he to his friend, who was laughing to himself in the next room, and at the same time going away from the instrument, "No! one cannot play everything at first sight; it is not possible."

LAW CASE.

(BEFORE SIR J. PARKER.)

BUXTON M. JAMES.

Mr. KENTON PARKER (with whom was Mr. Hialop Clarke) moved, upon notice, to restrain the defendant by injunction from selling the portion of No. 111 of the Pianista, or Italian Opera and Promenade Concert Magazine of Pianoforte and Vocal Music, containing three pianoforte solos from Mendelssohn's original composition of music to Shakespeare's Midsummer Night's Dream, called or termed respectively, the "Scherzo," the "Notturmo," and the "Wedding March;" and also from reprinting any further copies of the said No. 111 of the Pianista which shall contain the said pieces, or any of them; and also from printing, publishing, or selling any portion of the said work or composition of music to Shakespeare's Midsummer Night's Dream composed and arranged by Mendelssohn, except the overture thereof. In February, 1844, the plaintiff purchased from Mendelssohn the copyright of the three pieces of music, the sale of which was now sought to be prohibited, for the sum of £47 5s., and in the ensuing August he published them. On the 1st of November, 1849, the defendant published and sold on his own account those pieces of music, together with the overture to Shakespeare's Midsummer Night's Dream, the copyright of which last piece of music, however, the plaintiff was not the owner of. On the 6th of that month, which was the earliest period at which the plaintiff became acquainted with the sale, in No. 111 of the Pianista, of the pieces of music belonging to him, he gave notice to the defendant of his being the owner of those pieces of music, and that unless the sale of them were discontinued by him and the plates broken, he should take legal proceedings against him. The defendant, however, continued to carry on the sale of No. 111 of the Pianista in the same manner as he had done before the plaintiff had given him the above notice, and no further steps were taken in the matter by the plaintiff until the 20th of March, 1851, when he issued a circular among the publishers of foreign music (of whom the defendant was one), insisting on his rights. On the 20th of May, 1851, the Exchequer Chamber delivered its judgment in the case of "Boosey v. Jeffries" (20 Law Journal, 354), setting aside the ruling of Baron Rolfe (now Lord Cranworth) in that case, such ruling having been founded on the decision of the Court of Exchequer in the case "Boosey v. Purday;" and on the 20th of August the plaintiff's solicitor, in a letter to the defendant, adverted to that decision, and renewed the threat of taking legal proceedings against him. The state of the law which existed on this subject in November, 1849, and up to the period at which the decision of the Exchequer Chamber in "Boosey v. Jeffries" was given, had prevented the plaintiff from taking earlier proceedings in this court; for, prior to that interval, the last case which had been decided affecting the law of copyright in this country, in the case of an assignee of a foreign author, was "Boosey v. Purday," in which it was held that a foreign author was not entitled to the benefit of acts passed for the protection of literary property in Great Britain. The learned counsel cited the following cases:—"Boosey v. Jeffries" (20 Law Journal, 354); "Boosey v. Purday;" "Ollendorff v. Black" (14 Jurist); "Cocks v. Purday" (17 Law Journal, 233).

Mr. MALINS and Mr. CHARLES HALL, for the defendant, did not deny the plaintiff's copyright in the pieces of music in question, but insisted that he ought to have sought relief in this court at an earlier period, and that his proper remedy was an action at law. By the state of the law which existed in November, 1849, the defendant was quite justified in publishing the pieces of music in question. Moreover, the case of "Boosey v. Jeffries," on which the plaintiff relied, was now under appeal to the House of Lords. The following cases were cited for the defendant:—"Robinson v. Ropshiu" (1 Y. and C.); "Bailey v. Taylor" (1 R. and M. 78); "Robinson v. Wilkins" (8 Vesey, 224); "Saunders v. Smith" (3 Mylne and Cr. 711); and "Spottiswoode v. Clarke" (2 Phillips).

His Honour said he thought he must grant the injunction in this case. It might be that the plaintiff had his remedy at law; but it was admitted he had a legal right to the pieces of music in question, and that the defendant had infringed his copyright in them. But then it was said that "Boosey v. Jeffries," although a decision by the Exchequer Chamber in the plaintiff's favour, was under appeal to the House of Lords, and that the Court could not therefore treat the case as having been finally decided. But in granting the injunction, he did so on what appeared to him to be the law as laid down by the Exchequer Chamber, and he confessed he had never himself entertained any doubt as to the law which had been considered as unsettled on this subject. He thought, therefore, the injunction must be granted, the plaintiff undertaking, if required by the defendant, to establish his right at law. As to the delay that had taken place in instituting the present suit, and which was now relied upon as an objection, he thought the plaintiff might very innocently, as the law was understood in November, 1849, have imagined that he was right in not taking proceedings in this court. The question now for the Court was, not whether the plaintiff knew that his rights were being infringed, but whether the defendant was aware he was invading the plaintiff's copyright, and whether the law, as it was at present settled, established that the defendant had for a long time been doing that which he had no right to do. Then it was said the plaintiff had improperly delayed instituting this suit. Supposing that he had filed his bill in November, 1849, I think it greatly probable, and almost certain, that this Court would, in the state of the law which existed at that time, have refused to interfere and put him on the terms of bringing his action at law, or have delayed interfering until the law was settled by the result of the decisions in "Boosey v. Purday" and "Boosey v. Jeffries." His Honour did not think the plaintiff was, under the circumstances, bound to do more than he had done, the law being uncertain. He had given the defendant notice, insisting upon his rights, but waiting until the law was determined by the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in "Boosey v. Jeffries." This was not a case in which time was to be considered as a bar to the plaintiff's case, nor could he be considered as having abandoned his rights. The plaintiff, on being made aware of the infringement of his rights, gave the defendant notice, and then waited until the decision of the Exchequer Chamber. This was not enough to deprive the plaintiff of his rights. He had subsequently given another notice. His Honour said that if he were compelled to refuse the injunction on the ground of delay, he probably refuse giving any equitable relief to the plaintiff

But he was asked to refuse this injunction, not from any doubt of the plaintiff's right, nor from any doubt of the infringement, but on account of the delay. That was not a view which His Honour could take of the case. He thought the plaintiff was entitled to the injunction, and if the defendant required it he should put him under the terms of bringing his action. His Honour directed the case to be mentioned next sea, by which time the defendant must make his election whether he would put the plaintiff to his action at law or not.

LITERARY TREATY BETWEEN ENGLAND AND FRANCE.

The following are the main provisions of the treaty between England and France, for the suppression of literary piracy, as given by the Literary Gazette. It will be seen that it is likely materially to affect the interests of authors, publishers, dramatists, musical composers, and artists:—

"Art. 1. From the period at which, conformably to the stipulations of Art. 14, hereinafter mentioned, the present convention shall come into force, the authors of works of literature or art, to whom the laws of either country now insure, or shall in future insure, the right of property or authorship shall be authorized to exercise the said right on the territory of the other country, during the same time and within the same limits as would be allowed in the latter country to the right attributed to authors of works of the same nature if published there; so that the reproduction or piracy by persons of one country of any work of literature or art published in the other shall be treated as if it were the reproduction or piracy of works of the same nature originally published in the former country. Moreover, the authors of one of the two countries shall have the same action before the tribunals of the other, and enjoy the same guarantees against piracy or unauthorized reproduction, as are or may hereafter be granted to authors in the latter country. It is understood that the words, 'works of literature or art,' used at the beginning of this article, comprise the publication of books, dramatic works, musical compositions, drawings, paintings, sculptures, engravings, lithographs, or any other production whatever of literature or fine arts. The representative of authors, translators, composers, painters, sculptors, or engravers shall enjoy in every respect the same rights as those which the present convention grants to the authors, translators, composers, painters, sculptors, or engravers themselves.

"Art. 2. The protection granted to original works is extended to translations. It is, nevertheless, well understood that the object of the present article is merely to protect the translator in so far as his own translation is concerned, and not to confer an exclusive right of translation upon the first translator of a work whatever, except in the cases and within the limits mentioned in the following article:—

"Art. 3. The author of any work published in one of the two countries who shall have declared his intention of reserving his right of translation shall, from the day of the first publication of the translation of his work, authorized by him, enjoy during five years the privilege of protection against the publication of any translation of the same work unauthorized by him in the other country; and this on the following conditions:—1st. The original work shall be registered and deposited in one of the two countries within a period of three months from the day of the first publication in the other country. 2ndly. The author must have declared his intention of reserving to himself the right of translation on the title-page of his work. 3rdly. At least a part of the said authorized translation must have appeared within a year of the date of registration and deposit of the original; and the whole of it must have appeared within a space of three years from the date of the said deposit. 4thly. The translation must have been published in one of the two countries, and be registered and deposited as directed, in art. 8. As regards works published in parts, it is sufficient that the declaration by which the author reserves his right of translation be expressed in the first part. Nevertheless, in so far as regards the period of five years assigned by this article to the author for the exercise of his privilege of translation, every part shall be considered a new work; each shall be registered and deposited in one of the two countries within three months from the day of its first publication in the other.

"Art. 4. The stipulations of the preceding articles shall apply also to the representation of dramatic works, and to the execution of musical compositions, in so far as the laws of each of the two countries are or may be applicable in this respect to dramatic or musical works publicly represented or executed for the first time in the said countries. Nevertheless, in order to have a right to legal protection, in so far as regards the translation of a dramatic work, the author must publish his translation within three months after the registration and deposit of the original work. It is understood that the protection stipulated by the present article is not intended to prohibit bona fide imitations or the adaptation of dramatic works to the respective theatres of France or England respectively; but only to prevent pirated translations. The question of imitation or piracy shall in all cases be determined by the tribunals of the respective States, according to the legislation in force in either country respectively."

The other articles are of minor importance.

"By Art. 5, newspaper articles may be freely translated, on condition of quoting the original paper, provided the author of such an article has not publicly declared his intention of preventing reproduction.

"Art. 6 prohibits the introduction and sale of pirated works, whether printed in France or England, or any other country.

"By Art. 7 such contraband works shall be seized and destroyed, and the persons who have introduced or sold them may be prosecuted.

"Art. 8 regulates the formalities of registration in the two countries.

"Art. 9 extends the same formalities to productions of literature and art in the two countries.

"Art. 10 regulates the duty of importation upon works of literature and art in the two countries.

"Art. 11 stipulates that the two Powers shall mutually communicate to each other the new laws and regulations that may hereafter be made in either country with regard to literary property.

"Art. 12 reserves to each Government the right of prohibiting any production it may think necessary so to prohibit.

"Art. 13, in execution of treaties with other Powers on the subject of literary property.

"Art. 14 stipulates that the Queen of England engages to present a bill to the British Parliament for the ratification of such clauses in the present enactment as require a legislative sanction. A day is then to be fixed on which the present convention is to come into force, and such day is to be duly announced by each Government. The convention is to be applicable only to works, &c., published after that date, and is to last ten years, and continue to be in force until a twelvemonth's notice be given."

MONS. JULLIEN IN LABOUR AGAIN.

(From Punch.)

THE JULLIEN era of music must always form an important epoch in the Calendar; and the MONS is at this moment rearing his lofty head high above all opposition in Drury Lane.

We never see the MONS. JULLIEN without thinking of the famous Alpine MONS; and BYRON'S lines on the latter are capable of easy adaptation to the former:

'The MONS is the King of Conductors;
They crowned him long ago,
With jet black hair,
And moustaiches rare,
And a waistcoat, and stock of snow!'

We only regret that the MONS should be visible for so brief a period among us, and that he should only visit us like the "glimpses of the Moon" for the brief month of November. He is no sooner come than he is gone, and we have only just arrived at the knowledge that it is the "first week but one," when we find it is also the "last week but two" of his performances.

We understand that the MONS has in preparation for his next season a sort of companion to his Army and Navy Quadrilles, under the title of the

POLICE QUADRILLES,

of which we give the programme.

Figure 1.—Grand muster of the men on their best. Pas accéléré of the pickpockets, and pas redoublé of the constable.

Figure 2.—Rattling of the area rails. Triangle solo. Appearance of the cold mutton. Oboe solo, Cook.

Figure 3.—Assembly of the Chartists on Kennington Common. "Come if you dare!" Speech of the Chartist Orator, introducing the new drum called the hum-drum, brought over by MONS. JULLIEN from France, expressly for this occasion.

Figure 4.—The crowded thoroughfare. Politeness of the police to the female passengers. Love and duty.

Figure 5.—Gathering of all nations and all vehicles at the entrance of the Crystal Palace. Flagellation of the cab-horses. Solo, flageolet—MR. COLLINET. The meeting of the coal-waggons. Sax-horn obligato, Trema, tremo, scelerato. A purse is lost in the confusion. Il mio tesoro. Running accompaniment. Blocking up of the thoroughfare. Grand Concert Stuck, until all burst forth in the glorious cry of "MOV' ON."

Original Correspondence.

SOILED MUSIC.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

Great Saffron Hill, Dec. 1, 1851.

SIR,—I have been placed by Providence in that state of life known as waste-paper dealer; and, knowing the immense quantity of soiled music returned unsold to the various publishing houses, have been at a loss to account for so little passing through my hands. This fact I mentioned to one of the largest of your London publishers, and received for an answer the following candid admission:

"While we keep our houses open till eight o'clock in the evening, we can dispose of all our soiled music."

I think all purchasers of music will thank you for giving publicity to this.

I remain, sir,

Yours respectfully,
ROBERT WYNN.

THE ORGANIST'S MANUAL.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

DEAR SIR,—Permit me to suggest to the editor and publisher of the Organist's Manual the advantage of taking a little more care in correcting the errors of the engraver, previous to issuing the work to the public.

I have recently purchased No. 13 of the work, which contains (among other pieces) an "Adagio Cantabile," by Beethoven; and although this only occupies a page and a half, I find in it, on referring to the score, no less than five mistakes. I am sure that you will agree with me in thinking that in a work of the pretensions of the Organist's Manual, these errors ought not to be permitted to appear.

I am, dear sir,

Truly yours,
AN ORGANIST.

BURNEY'S HISTORY OF MUSIC.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR.—Can any of your readers inform me whether "Burney's History of Music," originally published in two volumes, be perfect or was there a third subsequently sent from the press? I am in possession of the two quarto volumes, which appear perfect, but yet I learn there was a third volume subsequently published. I would solicit your readers' information on this head.

I remain, &c., yours,
TOMLIN.

Cornwall, Dec. 1st.

LOLA MONTES AND "HER PILOT."

(From Galignani's Messenger).

The dispute between Lola Montes and M. Roux, theatrical agent, was on Thursday formally submitted to the Civil Tribunal. M. Roux's advocate stated, that by an agreement between them, Mlle. Lola undertook to take M. Roux as her pilote intermédiaire in a professional journey she proposed making as a dansseuse to different cities of Europe, and various parts of America, and to allow him 25 per cent. on her receipts; he on his part engaging to negotiate for her appearance at different theatres, and to superintend all the business operations. The penalty fixed for the breach of the agreement, by either party was 100,000f. In virtue of the agreement M. Roux accompanied Mlle. Lola to several towns in France, Belgium, and Germany, and caused her to dance at the respective theatres. He had also arranged for her appearance in some of the theatres of Prussia, but the authorities compelled her and him to quit the country. They arrived at Paris, and M. Roux in the capacity of "pilot," applied to the Vaudeville, the Cirque, and other theatres, for engagements for her. While occupied in the necessary negotiations, he learnt to his surprise that Mlle. Lola was about to leave for America without him, in company with a Mr. Willis. The departure was even announced in the newspapers. On this he gave her notice that he expected her to execute her agreement, and she at first professed herself ready to do so, but afterwards refused. He had since procured her engagements at the Vaudeville and Opera National, and, on account of her neglect to fulfil them, he now demanded 8,000f. as damages. The advocate for Mlle. Montes said, that the fact was that M. Roux himself wanted to get rid of the agreement, and had invented the charge of a breach of it by Lola as a convenient means of doing so. In taking him as her "pilot," she had expected that he would be a travelling companion who would watch over her interests, and she had engaged to dance six times a week. But he treated her as his temporary property, out of which he was to get as much as he could, and as quickly as possible. He had made her dance every day, and even several times a day. He had so fatigued her that more than once she fell exhausted on the stage. Yet the next morning, as early as four o'clock, he had presented himself at her bedside, and compelled her to depart. In addition to this he failed in the respect due to her dignity as a woman. She was accustomed to receive visits after her performance, and on such occasions he pompously presented her to her guests as his enfant terrible, and invented ridiculous anecdotes and circumstances respecting her. Moreover he had written an absurd biography of her, and had it distributed during the performances. In this notable production he represented that she did not pass herself as a first rate dansseuse, but as a dansseuse de fantasia. He stated that she was born at Seville in 1824, and at the age of five went with her father to India, "where she spent 11 years in visiting the different cities of Hindostan, China, and Persia, the language of which countries she speaks fluently;" and where, also, "she learnt drawing, history, and geography." Still, he continued, dancing was all her passion. Her wit, too, even at an early age, was so extraordinarily great, that it attracted the attention of the highest personages, of governors, rajahs, and of his Majesty the King of Nepal. Her education, he proceeded, had been of the most brilliant kind. Some journalists whom she had declined to receive had written ignoble tales about her, but she despised them. Apart from her eccentricity, she possessed, he assured his readers, kindness of heart, charity, and affability. "At the age of 16 she went to London, where several lords, to whom she was recommended, caused her to appear at her Majesty's Theatre. Her beauty and love of dancing drew her to Paris; but the unfortunate Dujarrier affair caused her to sign an engagement for Russia, where she was well received." She afterwards went to Munich. "History," continued the biographer, "would record her other doings. But he might say that the great power of which she had possessed herself, and her political views as to the reform of the Jesuits (here a shout of laughter broke from the auditory) occasioned her departure from Bavaria. She went to London, where a great Lord married her. In 1850 they found that their characters could not sympathise, and she returned to the dreams of her spring." And the biography concluded with this profound sentence:—"Explain who can, but no one can, her burning brain and eccentric character, which have rendered her so celebrated; she has yet only run the half of her career, for she leaves in November for America, and God knows the rest!" As long (the advocate continued) as Madame de Landsfelt saw herself treated as a wild animal shown at a fair; she contented herself with shrugging her shoulders with disgust; but when she saw the veil which covered her private acts raised she expressed loud indignation; and said to Roux; "It is lucky for you, sir, that my husband is not here, for my husband would break your head." On this Roux declared himself insulted, and took to flight. She came to Paris on the 6th. Her intention was to dance if Roux found her any engagement, and to leave for America on the 20th. This he knew, but he did nothing, and she heard nothing of him before the 10th, when he notified to her that she would have to execute her engagement. But he did not say where, on what day, or on what conditions. On the 13th he summoned her to name an arbitrator to decide on the differences which had arisen between them; but when she had done so he commenced an action. She then notified to him that she intended to send off her costumes on the 15th, and to embark on the 20th. It was then by means of a false declaration he had obtained authority to seize her costumes and other effects. That seizure had; however, been set aside. He now pretended that he had got an engagement for her, but he could not prove it, and, at all events, had not communicated the conditions to her. It was clear, therefore, that his demand ought to be rejected. The Tribunal decided that as Roux had not proved that he had entered into any serious treaty with any theatre at Paris, unless it were with the Opera National, and as he had not notified any treaty to Mlle. Lola Montes, she could not be bound to execute any. It accordingly rejected his demand, and condemned him to the costs.

Foreign.

CATHERINE HAYES' LAST CONCERT.—NEW YORK.—A large and enthusiastic audience attended this, the close of a series of triumphs. The programme embraced a judicious selection of secular and sacred music, and the performance of Miss Catherine Hayes was received with repeated bursts of applause and frequent encores, some of which, only, were granted. Herr Mengis also was received with much favour, and was encored in the scena, "Lorsque mon Maître." Mr. Augustus Braham was no less successful than the others, and considerable warmth was apparent in the receptions of his songs.

There was a different kind of performance going on outside, in the entry, and no little excitement, consequent on the appearance of a deputy sheriff, the seizure of the funds, and some other incidents; but the audience were not disturbed and Miss Catherine Hayes' concert in this city, "fading in music, made a swan-like end." It is said that the future concerts of Miss Hayes will not be under the direction of Mr. Wardwell. Catherine Hayes is at present rusticated at Staten Island, gathering strength for her proposed Northern and Western tour.

There are many rumors afloat in relation to Miss Catherine Hayes, her agent, Mr. Wardwell, Max Maretzek, and the Sheriff, and certain speculations in which all parties are concerned. Miss Catherine Hayes was sued by Maretzek, the Sheriff is to be sued by Mr. Wardwell; in short, there seems to be a very pretty quarrel all round.

As nearly as we can ascertain the facts, they are these:—There was a contract between Mr. Wardwell and Max Maretzek, in which the latter agreed to provide artists, such as were required for Catherine Hayes' concerts, and to provide them at short notice. For these services Mr. Wardwell agreed to pay 5000 00 dollars per month. On several occasions, it is asserted, the artists required have not been forthcoming, and Mr. Wardwell, conceiving the contract to have been broken by Maretzek, declined to pay the 5000 00 dollars. It is rumoured that some one has bought the claim from Maretzek, and in his name brought suit against Miss Catherine Hayes. We do not know whether this is true or not; but suits have been commenced, and we suppose the facts will soon become public. This affair has created quite an excitement in our musical circles.

The ninth annual report of the New York Philharmonic Society is now before us, and gives evidence of a continued prosperity most gratifying to all who seek the advancement of music among us. From this report we learn that the number of actual performing members is 64; actual non-performing, 17; making the total of available instrumentalists, 81; honorary members, 11, associate members, 288, and subscribers, 67.

It is said that the Mendelssohn, and Sacred Music Societies in Brooklyn are about to unite, and form a new one. The name under which it is to appear has not yet been selected.

Reviews of Music.

ALLEGRO BRILLANTE; for two performers on the Pianoforte.—Composed by F. Mendelssohn Bartholdy; Op. 92, Posth. Works, No. 21.—Ewer and Co.

There is no form of instrumental composition that is more interesting to the lovers of classical music than the pianoforte duet, and scarcely any that is so generally available for performance. This being the case, it is strangely anomalous, but it is no less true, that there are fewer original compositions in the classical form for two performers on the pianoforte, than for any other combination of executants in the whole range of instrumental music. There is the beautiful sonata in F of Mozart, and that in C of the same author; there is the sonata in F minor, and another of Onslow; there is the brilliant, but otherwise trivial, duet of Hummel, in F minor and A flat; and there is one of far higher pretensions of Moscheles, besides his Sonate Symphonique; but more than these, and two or three very small, though vigorous, compositions of Mozart and Beethoven, there exists nothing whatever of this class; at least, nothing that has come within our experience. Neither the great composers nor their little emulators, neither the masters of the art, nor the servants of the ephemeral public taste, have laboured in this very extensive field; and hence the obvious necessity manifested by the ceaseless demand for such music has been supplied by arrangements of all other classes of composition, symphonies, overtures, string quartets, and other chamber music, and even solo sonatas. The completeness of the effect of a pianoforte duet is, in our opinion, greater, and more satisfactory, than that of anything short of a full orchestra. This is proved by the arrangement for four hands being the only compression of an orchestral score that gives any adequate idea of the original; and it has been our constant marvel that such really great resources have been so rarely employed; for we can scarcely call it the legitimate employment of them, where they are used as substitutes for, or representations of, other means. In music composed for the pianoforte, in which the various peculiarities and capabilities of the instrument are brought into play, these resources must naturally be susceptible of a more complete, and much more extensive application, and must, therefore, produce a much more effective result than can arise from the adaptation, however skilful, of orchestral passages for a single instrument. All this is so obviously true, that we are sure it must have been felt again and again by every moderately skilled executant on the pianoforte; and the appearance, therefore, of an original pianoforte duet, from the hand of one whose peculiar and admirably effective treatment of his instrument, would alone distinguish him among the musicians of his age, were it not that the universal greatness of his genius raised him above all such distinctions is a matter of the very greatest interest, and will be welcomed with eager cordiality by all true amateurs.

This Allegro Brillante may be considered as equivalent to an overture for the pianoforte, it being a single movement, complete in itself, in which the essentials of plan comprised in the form of modern orchestral composition with which we have assimilated it are fully developed, while the detail that gives substance and life to this outline, brings into play all the best resources of the instrument with admirable effect. The composition is of a bravura character, in so far as it abounds with brilliant passages of executive display; but these are not passages of mere display, since they are themselves replete with universal interest, and in contrasting and relieving the principal subjects, they are of great importance in the construction of the movement, in which they are interwoven to such an extent as to justify our saying that they characterise the composition. It is remarkable for one peculiarity of instrumentation, if we may thus apply the term, that gives it a particular interest to the players, and not a little to the audience; this consists, namely, of each performer having occasionally the entire range of the pianoforte, which serves to exercise and contrast the style and powers of expression of the two executants. Our term, instrumentation, will apply better to some peculiarities in the distribution of the harmony between the four hands of the two performers, which have an entirely original and perfectly beautiful effect; let us instance a passage of pages 16 and 17, where the primo part has the second subject with the harmony complete, and the secondo part doubles the bass notes in octaves, which arrangement produces a depth and fulness of tone that we have not before heard in pianoforte music; and, again, at a recurrence to the same subject, in the coda of the movement, pages 22 and 23, there is a passage for the right hand of the secondo part, which stands out like the tenor notes of the violoncello in an orchestra, and which imparts a richness to the upper or principal melody that is no less striking than admirable. These points demand especial consideration; not only because of their own originality and beauty, but because they suggest most forcibly that the pianoforte is still capable of new and excellent effects, which wait only for the magic touch of genius to call them into being. The production of these effects results from the same class of thought that is exercised upon the distribution of an orchestral score, the calculation of the different qualities of tone, of the different portions of the instrument, and of the different degrees of power the performer possesses, according to his position, over different portions of the keyboard. This class of thought has been but little brought to bear upon pianoforte writing; but we are convinced, if only from the example before us, that there is a wide field open for what we have called instrumentation on the pianoforte, and we recommend the study of it to those composers for the instrument whose aim is to excite and to gratify the unqualified interest of the musician, and not merely to furnish a musical trifle that may gild the vanity of the drawing-room amateur.

We have now to speak more particularly of this duet, in respect of the ideas of which it is composed. These are essentially such as the lover of Mendelssohn will immediately identify with the train of thought familiar in the works of this composer. There is all about them that can characterise a decided style, with the utter absence of whatever betokens mannerism; there is that, in fact, which distinguishes the ideas of a great master from those of a writer in the rank next immediately below him; there is that which it is wholly beyond the province of criticism to describe, as being beyond the power of the critic to analyse; there is beauty which speaks for itself in its own language—which cannot be enhanced by any eulogium, but which appeals the strongest to the greatest intelligence. Fresh, sparkling, and ceaselessly melodious, we find that this composition but excites our interest at the outset to retain it to the very close; and the more and more we become familiar with the work, the more and more we find to admire in it.

There would be no avail in an analysis of a piece of music with which at present the greater number of our readers must be unacquainted, since no verbal reference to music can be intelligible except, either in memory or in quoted examples, the passages referred to be present for examination. We shall, therefore, content us with calling attention to a few points which we feel to be of especial excellence, and which are sufficient to justify all we have said of the whole. These are the very novel digression into the key of G for the second subject, which is introduced by a prolonged dominant cadence on B, that leads the hearer to expect the natural modulation into E major, the fifth of the original tonic; then there is the return to this key of E, with a recurrence to the opening subject, for the conclusion of the first part of the movement, which in its turn is equally a surprise with the previous unexpected transition. Again, there is a charming recurrence to this second subject, that forms a striking feature of the coda, when in the third and fourth bars the substitution of the sixth for the fourth of the scale in the melody has an effect that is truly irresistible on all who hear it.

In conclusion, we promise ourselves the sympathy of all who may become acquainted with this very interesting duet, in our hearty admiration of it. The more than pleasure that we feel, and we are sure all must feel, in hearing it, has but one, and that a bitter qualification, namely the regret that he whose immortality is certified by this, no less than by the many other legacies of beauty he has left us, is not to be stimulated, we will not say by our inadequate praise, but by the congenial admiration of all those who are best capable of appreciating his merits, to add many more to this duet, the only work of its class he has produced us, which is equally unique in form and in beauty.

G. A. M.

"BID ME NOT LEAVE THEE," Song; "FAREWELL," Song.—Words by Emma A. B.—Henry Bamber.—Wessel and Co.

Two very pleasing songs, and written well. The "Farewell" satisfies us most; but both, we think, are bound to find favour when they make acquaintances.

ANDANTE, AND VARIATIONS FOR THE PIANOFORTE; ON A MOTIVO FROM "LUCREZIA BORGIA."—Sophia S. Woolf.—Wessel and Co.

A sparkling and brilliant essay, and replete with many neat, musician-like points. Miss Sophia Woolf is a pupil of Mr. Cipriani Potter—to whom the "Andante and Variations" is dedicated—to whose masterly instructions she does great credit, and under whose superintendence she obtained the King's Scholarship at the Royal Academy of Music. The air chosen is the Brindisi, "Il segreto per esser felice," made famous by Alboni, to which Miss Sophia Woolf has supplied an introduction, and three variations. This piece might justly be termed a fantasia, as it includes all the requisites of a morceau of that genre. The pupil, already somewhat advanced, will find Miss Sophia Woolf's "Andante and Variations" a sound and useful practice piece, and one well qualified to give strength and pliancy to the fingers, without in the least bordering on the impossibilities of the modern school of pianoforte playing.

Provincial.

BELFAST.—At the last meeting of the Anacreontic Society, the members enjoyed a rare and delightful treat in listening to the performance of the distinguished composer and pianist, Mr. Ferdinand Praeger, of London, who favoured them with some of his compositions, in which he fully displayed the resources of an original and cultivated mind, and an execution seldom surpassed by any performer on the pianoforte. Mr. Praeger possesses a facility in the fingering of his instrument which would do little discredit to Liszt or Thalberg, with a power of sustaining the tone, and eliciting the sweetness of the strings, in which he is surpassed by few.—Belfast News Letter.

SHREWSBURY.—On Wednesday evening, Nov. 19, Mr. Henry Nicholls gave a Reading of Shakspeare's tragedy of Macbeth, in the Music Hall in this town, to the members and friends of the Church of England Literary and Scientific Institution. The attendance was numerous and highly respectable. At the conclusion of the third act Mr. Hiles performed upon the organ Locke's celebrated music to Macbeth, after which Mr. Nicholls resumed his reading. On Thursday evening Mr. Nicholls gave a reading of Mr. Justice Talfourd's tragedy of Ion, in the same room, to a respectable and crowded audience, during which he was repeatedly applauded. Previous to the reading of the tragedy, Mr. Hiles played upon the organ the overture to Guillaume Tell.—Shrewsbury Chronicle.

READING.—The Amateur Musical Society gave their first concert of vocal and instrumental music at the Town Hall, on Monday evening last, to a fashionable and very full attendance. The selection testified taste and judgment. The concert opened with Haydn's "Surprise Symphony." The execution of this piece reflected great credit on the performers. Mrs. Alexander Newton next delighted the audience by singing a most difficult recitative and air from Donizetti's Lucia de Lammermoor. Her rendering of this was most delightful; her merits as a soprano are power, and equal softness and pathos, indicating the mens divinior of genius, and giving promise of the highest standing as a vocalist. Moreover, to her charming vocal talents she unites a happy naïveté of manner and a readiness to oblige the audience. The many strains with which she delighted the hearers, cannot but be remembered with the liveliest emotions of pleasure. Successive plaudits told how warm were the acknowledgments which they in return tendered to her. We cannot say that with the glee, "Glorious Apollo," arranged as a chorus, we were much delighted. The vocalists were rather too flat throughout. Miss Nevett sang several solos amongst which were an aria from Lucrezia Borgia. This artiste, though very young, is decidedly a rising star in the musical horizon; her voice possesses great compass, a clear intonation, and a richness rarely to be met with in one so young. One of the gems of the evening was a grand sonata on the pianoforte and violin, from Mozart, by Mr. Burton and Mr. Venua. Whatever praises we might lavish upon the execution of this performance, they would not be more than its merits deserved; under Mr. Venua, the violin seemed to become a sentient thing discoursing in music; his pizzicato passages were executed with remarkable effect, while the extreme purity of his tone, and the unaffected brilliancy and finish of his execution combined to afford to the judges of really classical violin playing, the highest gratification. Mr. Burton's accompaniment on the piano was very far above mediocrity—au contraire, it was deserving of high commendation. A hurricane of applause succeeded its termination. The second part of the concert went off with much better effect. Among the pieces we notice as most successful "The Red Cross Knight," with the characteristic introduction by the talented leader, which drew down renewed encores, and is undoubtedly a very happy composition for displaying the united vocal and instrumental ability of a body of amateurs. The singing and playing of the amateurs was every thing that could be expected, especially when we remember that other avocations and pursuits lay claim to their time. Our space precludes our criticising further, and therefore we conclude by offering the members of the Reading Amateur Musical Society our hearty congratulations, and trust that they will speedily make a repetition of their efforts, and meet with that appreciation, success, and approbation, of which they are deserving.—Berkshire Chronicle. [NOTA BENE.—Our Reading Correspondent of last week must be informed that the programme, or bill from which he took his authority, was perfectly correct in styling Mr. Venua "Leader of the Italian Opera—not certainly, the "Royal Italian Opera," but "Her Majesty's Theatre," in his time "The King's Theatre,"—and left that establishment in August, 1813, and was succeeded by the late Mori in the direction of the orchestra. Mr. Venua was also a composer of music for the King's Theatre. Mr. Venua has resided in Reading ever since his secession from the Opera, and we must say, our correspondent displayed no small amount of ignorance in not being better versed in the history of a gentleman so long known and so highly respected.—Ed. M. W.]

LIVERPOOL.—Those clever children, Kate and Ellen Bateman, have, this week, attracted crowded and respectable audiences to the Royal Amphitheatre, by their really wonderful performances, which are, independent of the extreme youth of the juvenile performers, remarkable for sprightly elegance, vigour, and truthfulness. On Monday evening they appeared in a scene or two of Richard III., the younger child, Ellen, sustaining the part of Richard, and Kate that of Richmond. The performance of little Ellen in this most trying character, was truly astonishing, and the most fastidious playgoer, whatever may have been his dislike to "phenomenons," could not have helped being struck with the force and energy with which the various points in the character were delineated. In the tent scene more particularly, all the well known "effects" were carefully and forcibly produced, and though the imitation of all the traditional "hits" of Kean was plainly apparent, it was evident that the young actress possessed sufficient talent of her own to prevent the performance becoming either laughable or painful. The dying scene was also exceedingly well done—the "hated strong in the earth," which animated the guilty soul of the fallen tyrant, being depicted with vivid earnestness. On Tuesday evening they appeared in a scene from The Merchant of Venice. Ellen played Shylock, and Kate, Portia. Ellen's performance in this character was even more wonderful than in Richard, the vindictive hate and defeated malice of the usurious Jew being most truthfully and artistically elaborated by the tiny performer, who raved, and stormed, and sneered with an energy as amusing as it was appropriate and well-timed. Kate, as Portia, also acted very cleverly, and spoke the famous speech, "The quality of mercy," with great care and proper emphasis. They have also appeared nightly in The Young Couple, and on Wednesday evening, when the eldest, by some accident, could not find a letter which had slipped down her bosom, their "gagging," till she found it, was most laughable, from their cool self-possession. They are truly most talented and clever children, and the more we have seen of them the more we are convinced that as much is due to their inherent talents as to the care with which they have been taught. Mr. Baker and Miss Fanny Baker, have also appeared in a variety of popular farces and slight comic dramas. Mr. Baker is now one of the most sterling of our comic actors, always amusing and never coarse. Miss Fanny Baker promises to keep up the family reputation. She has rapidly improved since her last appearance in Liverpool. She is intelligent, elegant, and careful, and whether in tragedy, comedy, or farce, her performances are always above mediocrity. The dramatic season closed last night, with a variety of performances for the benefit of little Kate Bateman, who played Macbeth in two acts of that play with great fire and discrimination, though we fear that her tragic assumptions will seriously injure her voice, which is, at times, painfully strained. Both she and her sister also, played several other characters, and were loudly applauded. On Monday, the equestrian season commences with a series of performances by a mixed troupe of American and French artistes, who have recently appeared, with great success, at Drury Lane, and the Theatre Royal, Dublin.

The ninth concert of the Philharmonic Society took place on Tuesday last, when Mendelssohn's oratorio of St. Paul was performed with the aid of Miss Birch, Miss Martha Williams, Mr. Lockey, and Mr. H. Phillips. It was very fully attended, but did not provoke much enthusiasm from the audience, probably for want of prominent parts for the solo singers. The first encore was for the recitative and arioso (!), "The Lord is mindful of his own," beautifully sung by Miss Williams. Miss Birch was also encored in her recitative and arioso, "I will sing of thy great mercies." Mr. Lockey had also an encore, and two of the chorusses were similarly honoured. But the want of management in the libretto, of which we complained in the David of Mr. C. E. Horsley, the continual interruptions of short recitatives possessing no characteristic qualifications, a little bit by the soprano, then a few bars by the tenor, followed by what is called an air, but little more than a captable recitative by the bass, disturb the interest so much and dissipate the expectation to so great a degree as to prevent any but a real lover of music and a careful listener from appreciating the beauty of the work, which unquestionably lies in the accompaniments. Among musicians it has the repute of being a much finer composition than the Elijah, and we have no doubt that it is so; but it was his first great vocal work, and the symphonist appears too much to the disadvantage of the singers, who frequently seem to be only obscuring the beauty of the instrumental part. We had prepared a lengthy notice of this performance which we are unavoidably compelled to withdraw at the last moment.—(Liverpool Mail, Nov. 29.)

CAMBRIDGE.—On Monday evening Mr. Wood gave his annual classical concert, and combined with it, what is quite a novelty in Cambridge, a concert of the same high character on the following morning. The names of the eminent artists engaged for the occasion are sufficient evidence of the admirable manner in which the pieces were performed. Mr. Hill, the distinguished tenor player, is, we believe, the only one with whom a Cambridge audience has not been previously made acquainted at one or other of Mr. Wood's concerts. The others were Mr. Sterndale Bennett for the piano; Herr Molique and Mr. Dando for the violin; Signor Piatti for the violoncello; and Miss Ransford executed very effectively the songs which usage render a necessary accompaniment to every instrumental performance. Mr. T. M. Wood also took part in both morning and evening concerts. The music was selected from the works of Handel, Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven and Mendelssohn. The distinguishing feature of the concerts was that, owing to Mr. Wood's liberality, the audience had the pleasure of hearing, in addition to the trios and duos which have hitherto formed the main attraction of these entertainments, four quartets performed in a style which, it is not too much to say, could not possibly be surpassed in London or any metropolis of Europe. The eager and breathless attention with which they were listened to is sufficient proof of the progress which the art of music, and the appreciation of its finished works, has reached among us; and we cannot call by any less distinguished title than that of a public benefactor the man who gives us here, in a country town, the opportunity of hearing these noble works realised by artists whose genius is only second to that of the composers themselves. It is almost an impertinence to praise such players as Bennett, Piatti, Molique, and Hill; they always do their best, and their best is the best. And it is no small honor to Mr. T. M. Wood that he has listened to on the same occasion with such artists, and gave evident pleasure to his audience. It is in the light of a beneficial influence upon the musical studies of the place more than in that of a few hours mere amusement, that we look upon these classical concerts which Mr. Wood, senior, has now for some years persevered in giving, not much, we fear, to the benefit of his own pocket. At any rate the audience of Monday and Tuesday, especially the latter, were much more select than we should have liked to see them. It is, however, to be remembered that, twenty or even ten years ago, it would have been impossible to collect a hundred people in Cambridge to listen to any music that was not of a popular character. Still we should like to see such concerts as those of Monday and Tuesday draw crowded rooms; for we are sure that the more people learn to appreciate the highest forms of art, the more pleasure they will derive from it, and the more softening and civilizing will be its effects upon life and character. And this chamber music especially so adapts itself to the domestic character of the English, that we hope to see the time when the works of Beethoven and the great masters of the pianoforte and stringed instruments shall be as familiar in our households as the plays of Shakespeare, the epics of Milton, or the songs of Burns.

BIRMINGHAM.—(From our own Correspondent).—The first concert of the sixth season, of the Birmingham Festival Choral Society, was held in the Town-hall, on Wednesday evening, the 24th ultimo. The concert was under the direction of Mr. Frank Mori. The first part commenced with an ode, called "The Transient and Eternal," from the Was Bleibet Und Was Schwindet, written by Kowegarten, and translated by J. P. Hurlock; the music composed by Andreas Romberg. The ode, though carefully played and sung, and supported in the vocal department by Mrs. Sims Reeves, Miss Eyles, and Mr. Henry Phillips, was not particularly attractive. The music is neither brilliant nor deep, but has a certain Haydn-and-waterish air, which might render it tasteful to some palates. After the ode, Mr. Henry Phillips sang "Now Heav'n in fullest glory," with tolerable effect. Miss Eyles then gave Mendelssohn's beautiful air from Elijah, "O rest in the Lord," and pleased mightily. The placid style of the song suited admirably the pretty face and apathetic manner of the fair vocalist, who was encored unanimously. The orchestra went well; Mr. Sims Reeves was yociferously encored in the recitative and air, "Sound an Alarm," from Judas Macabæus, which terminated the first part. The second part commenced with the charming overture to the Barbiere, which wanted more finish, and as it were esprit. It was followed by the popular duet from Donizetti's Roberto Devereux, "Un tenor core," very finely sung by Mr. and Mrs. Sims Reeves, and rapturously encored. Mr. Frank Mori accompanied on the piano with the nicest possible tact. Miss Eyles, who seems in great favour here, was encored in rather a pleasing ballad by George Linley—the words of which, by the way, are remarkable for their contempt of grammar. Mr. Henry Phillips and chorus, as a matter of course, were encored in Handel's "Haste thee, Nymph, and bring with thee." Mrs. Sims Reeves was immensely applauded in Mr. Frank Mori's most charming ballad, "So mild, so good," which she sang most delightfully. Miss Stevens played a concerto of Mendelssohn's on the piano-forte, and created a favourable impression. Mr. Sims Reeves accompanied himself on the piano to "My Pretty Jane"—encored, of course. Miss Eyles was also encored in a ballad by Mr. Henry Phillips—the words of which, by the way, exhibited an evident dislike towards Mr. Lindley Murray—which was entirely to be attributed to the singer, the composition having very little merit. After Mrs. Sims Reeves was called on to repeat the Scotch ballad, "'Twas within a mile of Edinbro' Town," and substituted "There's nae luck about the house," and Mr. Sims Reeves had given Purcell's "Come, if you dare," (King Arthur), and Mr. Henry Phillips his "Wasting in despair," the concert terminated with "God save the Queen" by all the company.

WINCHESTER.—Mr. J. Conduit gave a concert of vocal and instrumental music, on Friday evening last, at the St. John's Rooms. Among those who assisted Mr. Conduit were Miss Birch (vocalist), Dr. Wesley (pianist), Messrs. H. Blagrove and Clementi, (violinists), Mr. Freemantle (violinist), Mr. R. Blagrove (concertinist), Mr. Aylward (violinist), Mr. Thomas, accompanist. Some of the instrumental were excellent. Beethoven's quartet, (No 2), for two violins, viola, and violoncello, by Messrs. Blagrove, Clementi, R. Blagrove, and Aylward, went especially well; as likewise did Mayr's sextet, in B flat, for two violins, two violas, violoncello, and double bass; performed by Messrs. H. Blagrove, Clementi, R. Blagrove, Freemantle, Aylward, and J. Conduit. Miss Birch sang four times, and several solos were played. The rooms were full, and everything went off well and satisfactorily.

NORTHAMPTON.—The Instrumental Music Society gave the second of their series of six concerts in the Music Hall, Corn Exchange, on Thursday evening, the 20th ult. The attendance was much larger than at the first concert; the numbers present could have been little short of a thousand. The orchestra, more elevated than on the previous occasion, was a decided improvement both for the performers and the audience. The vocalists were Mrs. Sunderland, Mr. Lockey, and Mr. Lawler, the two latter established favourites. Mrs. Sunderland's songs, "What Airy Sound," and "Sandy and Jenny," were sung with excellent taste, and were both encored. The duet, "Farewell for ever," with Mr. Lockey, was favourably received, and "The Singing Lesson," with Mr. Lawler, was encored. Brahm's song, "The Death of Nelson," was given by Mr. Lockey in a manner which received most rapturous applause; and the song was redemanded; and the ballad, "You ask me oft," of Glover, was given with much feeling. Mr. Lawler's songs, "My Boyhood's Home," and a sea song, were given in his usual style, and elicited more than ordinary marks of favour. The instrumentalists were Messrs. H. and A. Nicholson and Herr Hausmann. The flute obligato of the first-named gentleman was splendidly rendered, and fully established his title to the high position which he has attained. Mr. A. Nicholson (oboe) and Mr. Herr Hausmann (violin) are musicians of the highest rank, and their execution drew forth marked approbation. The orchestral pieces, overtures to Men of Prometheus, and L'Italiana in Algeri, and a selection from Norma, with solos for cornet, oboe, bassoon, and flute, were all given with great effect. The National Anthem concluded the evening's entertainment. The next concert is proposed to be given at the latter end of December, or the beginning of January.—Northampton Herald.

LEEDS.—(From a Correspondent.)—I have to record this week the first appearance in Leeds of a number of ladies and gentlemen, who, during this summer, united for the purpose of maintaining and developing our most national species of music—the glee and the madrigal. The party consists of Mrs. Enderssohn, Miss M. Williams, Messrs. Lockey, Francis, Land, and H. Phillips. It would be difficult for us to single out, where every thing was so perfect, in which of their part songs they achieved the greatest success. In the third part they were encored in Lord Mornington's glee for five voices, "O bird of eve." They substituted for it "Blest Pair of Syrens," the most perfect rendering of a glee which it has ever fallen to my good fortune to listen to. The second part of the concert consisted of solos and duets. Of their performance I can likewise speak in terms of undivided praise. Nothing could be more charming than the first duet, by Mrs. Enderssohn and Miss M. Williams. The singing of Mr. Lockey in the new song by C. Glover, "You ask me oft if I forgot," and Mr. H. Phillips in Handel's fine scena from the "Alexander's Feast," was excellent.

On Wednesday evening the first concert of the Leeds Madrigal and Motet Society took place in the Music Hall. In addition to the full chorus of the society the services of Mrs. Alexander Newton, Mr. Hemingway (of the Durham Choir), and Master Ward, were secured. The programme was divided into two parts, sacred and secular. In the sacred section I need only notice the trio from Spohr's Crucifixion, "Jesus, Heavenly Master," capitolly sung by Mrs. Alexander Newton, Miss Brown, and Master Milner; recit. and air, "O balm of life," by Assinayer, sung Mr. Hemingway, who has a fine voice, and is an especial favourite with the Leeds folk; Haydn's "On mighty pens," by Mrs. Alexander Newton, splendidly sung and, encored; and a chorus of Mendelssohn's, also encored. The secular part of the programme was all excellent. The madrigals, glees and part songs, which I need not specify, went to perfection. Mrs. Newton obtained a tremendous encore in "Qui la voce," from Puritani, and also in Bishop's "Lo, here the gentle Lark;" and Master Ward obtained the like honor in his concertina solo. The whole went off admirably, and altogether I do not think a better concert has been given in Leeds for years.

TUNBRIDGE.—On Monday evening a concert was given in the Town-hall, by Mr. and Mrs. Hinchings, professors of music and singing in this place, who performed several songs and duets in excellent style. The concert was well attended. On Thursday evening the usual meeting of the Catch Club took place at the Assembly Rooms, Bull Inn; when the following programme was performed:—Overture Sargino; Haydn's Sym. No. 3; Final No. 2, Mozart duet William Tell pianoforte and violin, by Messrs. Cullum and Venua, was played and gained much applause. A solo on the flute was played by Mr. Chas. Clifton. On Friday evening, Mr. Shapcott, of Exeter, and his seven sons gave a sax-horn concert in the Town-hall, and played several pieces sacred, and classical, exceedingly well. The performances of Master Frank Shapcott, only 6 years of age, are very surprising.

REUNION DES ARTS.—On Wednesday, the fourth soirée of the winter season took place at 27, Queen Anne Street. A very fashionable company attended. The programme consisted of the following pieces:—quartet, Beethoven (in C minor); violins, Messrs. C. Goffrie and J. Day; tenor Herr Ganz; and violoncello Mr. W. Chipp; German song, Mdle. Th. Wagner; oboe solo, Mr. Gratton Cook; song, Mrs. Wallack; fantasia pianoforte, (Antoine de Kontski), performed by Madame Goffrie; song, Miss Mary Rose, and a duet for piano and violin (Benedict and De Beriot) Miss Ellen and Mr. J. Day, for the first part. The second began with a quintet by Baerman, for clarinet and string instruments, performed by Messrs. Williams, Day, Goffrie, Ganz, and Chipp. It was followed by a song by Mdle. Wagner; a solo on the piano, Mr. Kloss; trio by Hummel; pianoforte, Miss Hemming (pupil of Madame Goffrie); violin, Mr. Goffrie, and violoncello, Mr. Horatio Chipp. An aria from Semiramide ended the soirée.

Poetry.

NEW POEM.

By BARRY CORNWALL.

Once I wandered with a Dream,
Where'er I went, by wood or stream
On sunny days, in stormy weather,
My dream and I were still together.
When I was young my dream was young,
And when I on my mother hung
With school-boy ebes that ran in streams,
How mournful was my dream of dreams;
So ran Time!

And when, at last,
I grew into a youth, and cast
My cradle pleasures half aside,
And rose from tears to blushing pride,
Ever did my dream and I
Together like two lovers wander,
And sometimes sigh and sometimes ponder,
Graver than in infancy;—
My dream, men told me, never true!
Yet,—so it was, we grew and grew,
Each loving now a sterner theme,
More subtle thoughts, more bold opinions,
Whilst higher in the heavenly blue,
On airier, more ambitious pinions,
Would rise—and rise—my dream!

My dream, they said, was never true,
And yet I dream'd of Truth—of things
Beyond the circling of the spheres,
Of haunts wherein the angel sings
For ever to Almighty ears.
Beyond the clouds,—beyond the thunder,
Beyond the planets over head,
Impetuous, daring, wild with wonder,
My dream and I together fled:—
Fled,—but soon return'd to earth,
Our gentle home our place of birth,
Where still the unlearned poet dreams,
Of humble wrongs and household themes.
Not starry-crowned, nor hid in steel,
Not wandering on infernal shore,
His simple Muse, content to feel
What is and was, asks nothing more
When her voice doth echo truly,—
Nothing, save to touch us duly
With the sadness of her story:—
This is all her glory!

And men say that thou art vain!—
Child of folly!—sinful Pain!—
No; they err, who thus arraign.
No; the God who giveth reason,
Armed for a severer theme,
In our sunny, soaring season,
Crowns us with a dream;
Bids us then drink in the sound
Of the wild wind whispering round,—
Bids us read the rose's leaf
For its moral, sweet and brief,—
Bids us listen, as we walk
By the murmuring of the sea,
To the soft, sweet Muse's talk
Of all that was and is to be.
True!—ay, true as are the flowers,
True as spring or winter rain,
True as are the starry hours
Are the children of the brain.
Heed not from what cell unknown
The wild Imagination springs,
Nor where the Phoenix burns alone,
Nor where the dying cygnet sings;
The splendour of the stars is here,
The music of the rain and wind,

The song of birds at eve and morn,
The perfume with the violet born;—
Here, too, the soul's creations,—clear
Unto the willing mind.
The beauty and the worth of things
Take not their common outward shape
At all times, but will oft escape
In subtler, airier, forms and sounds,
From the heart's profounder springs.
And these, like visions shown of old
To Prophets in the Hebrew days,
Reveal not to the vain and cold
Their nature, nor to vulgar gaze
Appear with kind familiar eyes,
But shine alone on good and wise.

You and I were born together,
O my love, my Dream!
You and I have sail'd together
Adown Life's stream.
Through the sun and stormy weather
We have laugh'd and wept together
Never did the wrath of June
Harm us with its burning noon,
Never did the Winter's rime
Chill us in our braver time.
Tell me,—O ye worldly Sages,
Toiling all for golden wages,
Lawyers subtle, grave physicians,
Skillful reckoners, sound logicians,
What deem'd ye, in age or youth,
The one great philosophic Truth?—
What was still your aim?—
Love?—or power?—wealth?—or fame?—
Tell me,—now that day is closing,
And your minds are calm, reposing
From the weary task of Life;
After all the storm and strife
And the struggle in the stream,
Tell me,—who hath aught beside him
Truer than a dream?

Miscellaneous.

THE LIVERPOOL CLASSICAL CHAMBER CONCERTS, under the direction of Mr. Edward Thomas, are announced to commence on the 23rd of this month. The following pianists are engaged for the series:—Miss Kate Loder; Mr. Charles Hallé; Mr. Brinley Richards, and Mr. Sterndale Bennett. The latter gentleman will perform at the first concert. In addition to these, the list contains the names of Mr. Edward Thomas, Mr. Seymour, Mr. Baetens, and Mr. Lidel.

THE NORTH SHIELDS THEATRE was burned on Tuesday last. It was the property of Mr. Samuel Roxby, brother of Mr. William Beverley, the scene painter. We regret to say that the theatre was not insured. The North Shields theatre was once the property of the Kemble family.

MISS DOLBY'S SECOND SOIREE MUSICALE was given on Tuesday evening. The performers on this occasion were Miss Eliza Birch, Miss Dolby, and Mr. T. Smith, vocalists; and Messrs. Blagrove, Clementi, R. Blagrove, Lucas, Regondi, Barre Motique, and Kate Loder, instrumentalists. Mr. Lindsey Stoper conducted the vocal music.

GRASSINI.—Her voice, though somewhat husky and guttural, was a perfect contralto, and possessed all the soothing and devotional softness, which distinguishes that class of voice when breathed from a female organ. She had evidently studied in a first-rate school; and though she had not much execution, what she did was elegant and finished, while she never attempted what was beyond her power. Those who have heard her in the preghiera "Oh Giove Onnipotente!" in the heartfelt trio "Madre amata, alfin giurai" or the beautiful cavatina "Paga fui," will admit that in the expression of the subdued and softer passions she has never been excelled. Add to this, she was beautiful, an actress above mediocrity, and combined with an elegant figure so much grace of attitude, that her every posture might be supposed to have been studied after the antique. Yet with all this, she was not at once, nor quickly, popular. The contralto voice was a stranger to the public, and the public is not always inclined to give a stranger welcome. Pisaroni had not yet arisen to teach us that a contralto voice may vie with a soprano in all that is pathetic or lively, serious or gay: and perhaps Pisaroni herself owed some of the warmth with which her early efforts were welcomed, to the remembrance of Grassini. When, however, the Ratto di Proserpina of Winter, was brought out, and the deep chalmieu tones of Grassini were heard in immediate contrast, at once, and in union with the flute-like warblings of Billington, the perfections of the new candidate were appreciated and her popularity stamped.

ROBERT DE LILLE, the author of the famous Hymne des Marseillais, thus speaks of its origin:—"I composed the words and air of this song at Strasburg, on the night following the proclamation of war, in April, 1792. It was at first entitled Chant de l'armée du Rhin, and became known at Marseilles, through the medium of a constitutional Journal, published under the auspices of the illustrious and unfortunate Diétrick. When this song made its explosion some months after, I was wandering among the mountains of Alsace, in order to save my life from the proscription which had been denounced against me, and from the effect of which I was the year following, being the commencement of the reign of terror, thrown into prison by Robespierre, from which I had the good fortune to be released the 9th Thermidor following."

MUSIC AND POETRY.—"Who is there that, in logical words, can express the effect music has on us? A kind of inarticulate, unfathomable speech, which leads us to the edge of the infinite, and lets us for moments gaze into that. Song seems somehow the very central essence of us; as if all the rest were wrappings and hulls! All inmost things are melodious; naturally utter themselves in song. The meaning of song goes deep. The Greeks fabled of sphere-harmonies; it was the feeling they had of the inner structure of nature; that the soul of all her voices and utterances was perfect music. Poetry, therefore, we will call musical thought. The poet is he who thinks in that manner. It turns still on powers of intellect; it is a man's sincerity and depth of vision that makes him a poet. See deep enough, and you see musically; the heart of nature being everywhere music, if you can only reach it."—CARLYLE.

LECTURE HALL GREENWICH.—Miss Binckes gave an admirable concert at the above room on Thursday the 27th, and succeeded, by an attractive list of performers, in bringing together a numerous and enthusiastic audience. In addition to the fair beneficiaire, were Madame Garcia, Miss Ransford (the Misses Alexander, Mr. W. H. Harrison, Mr. Irving, Mr. Haigh, and Signor Ronconi. The instrumentalists were Mr. Brinley Richards and Mr. R. J. Pratten. Miss Binckes, whose reception was highly flattering, was encored in each of her songs, and with Signor Ronconi, created a very favourable impression in the well known Duo, "Dunque io son." Miss Binckes possesses an excellent voice, and in addition to this, claims very considerable attention, by her neatness of execution, and her clearness of enunciation. Mr. Harrison was received with the usual honours of a popular vocalist and encored in the serenade from Don Pasquale, which he gave with considerable delicacy; and in Benedict's song "Ill-gifted Ring." Similar compliments were awarded to Madame Garcia for her brilliant interpretation of Rhode's "Not Unfamiliar," air, with variations; and to Miss Ransford, in a graceful song by Mr. Hopkins "There's Wisdom in the Summer Flower." Mr. Brinley Richards performed with great success, his fantasia on "Bohemian Airs," one of which, by the way, (although well known in the version published by Leopold de Meyer) is presented in such a form as to render it altogether a novelty; the finale is full of brilliant passages, and preserves the theme throughout with great effect. Mr. Richards was loudly applauded. In addition to this instrumental feature, were two exceedingly effective solos for the flute, by Mr. R. J. Pratten, who on this occasion justly realised his claims to popularity as one of our first flautists. His second solo introducing the "Trab Trab," proved so irresistible that his auditors demanded its repetition. The Misses Alexander gave a very pleasing version of the admired duett by Horn, "I know a Bank," and a similar commendation is due to Mr Allan Irving, who possesses a fine bass voice, and sang Benedict's dramatic scena, "Rage thou Angry Storm." Mr. Joseph Haigh, who accompanied himself, gave us an opportunity of renewing our acquaintance with Schubert's admired "Wanderer." He also sang Cimarosa's duett with Signor Ronconi; and the last named gentleman delivered an agreeable reading of the "Ave Maria." In the way of novelty the most extraordinary was a New Dramatic Trio called the Shipwreck, by Mr. Haigh. Nor shall we greatly err, in adding that the words have found an enthusiastic interpreter in the imagination of the composer. With only a "first" hearing, it is somewhat difficult to speak decidedly upon the school of music to which we should assign Mr. Haigh's Trio, which may, however, be commended to attention as possessing many of those peculiarities which abound in the "Battle of Prague," and in Russell's intellectual "Maniac." The manner in which Mr. Haigh deals with diminished sevenths is somewhat alarming, but it would be unfair to infer, that, because Beethoven introduced many of those harmonies in his symphonies, and because Clementi has written passages of double notes, that Mr. Haigh has copied either. Indeed we have no hesitation in saying that Mr. Haigh is remarkable for the original way in which his phrases and harmonies are written. Gunod, and Felicien David, were pronounced, each in their day, the "Coming Man;" who knows, that after all, this long desired personage may yet be found in the composer of the "Shipwreck?"—time alone, will tell us. As this writer is evidently a very young man, we may naturally anticipate at some future opportunity, the pleasure of obtaining a further acquaintance with an author, who has already manifested such extraordinary claims to public curiosity. The Lecture Hall is in a wretched state, as regards comfort or appearance, and we are surprised that the Directors do not endeavour to get rid in some measure of the "triste" impression which the Hall now creates, in the eyes of every visitor; so fine a room deserves a better fate.

MR. HANDEL GEAR.—A paragraph went the round of the newspapers, that this gentleman was about to leave England for America; such appears however, not to be the case, for we see by our advertisement pages, that Mr. Handel Gear announces his return to town for the season, and his intention to continue giving lessons in Italian, German, and English singing.

SIGNOR SAPIO, the once popular tenor singer, died a few days since in circumstances of great distress.

MADAME PASTA AND THE CHORUS GIRL.—On the first production of Norma, Madame Pasta had taken up the part of the Priestess with enthusiastic energy; but after six weeks study of the new opera she sent for the Milanese manager:—"We must have a change in the cast," she said. "It will never do for anything but a very beautiful girl to play the part of Adalgisa. Signorina ——— is very well as a singer, but she is very plain and for the full success of the opera, the audiences must see a reasonable excuse in the apparent plot. The centurion must have more shew of excuse for his infidelity to Norma than the present Seconda Donna would any way furnish. Now there is that beautiful creature among the chorus girls; she looks an Adalgisa, and we must teach her to sing it. Send her to me!" The beautiful chorus girl was Giulia Grial.—Yankee Paper.

OF THE MEDICINAL POWERS ATTRIBUTED TO THE MUSIC OF THE ANCIENTS, AND ITS INFLUENCE ON ANIMALS, &c.—The ancients have attributed many medicinal powers to music, as the sound of a trumpet curing deafness, and that the sound of the flute will cure epilepsy, and the Egyptians, Hebrews, Greeks, and Romans, used it as a remedy not only in acute but chronic disorders. And in the Memoires of the Academy of Sciences for 1707 and 1708, we meet with many accounts of diseases, which, after having resisted and baffled all the most efficacious remedies in common use, had at length given way to the soft impressions of harmony. Many accounts are related of the power of ancient music over different animals, and there are various opinions expressed respecting its influence over them, whether it gives them pleasure or pain, or in what way they

MRS. EDWIN FORREST—It may be remembered that Mr. Forrest, the American tragedian, brought an action for adultery against his wife (a daughter of Sinclair, the once popular vocalist), but failing to substantiate the accusation in the law courts of his native state, Pennsylvania, the lady is now suing for a divorce from her husband, upon similar grounds, in the state of New York, where Mr. Forrest's property is situated. The husband, possessed of wealth, and supported by the "rowdy" gangs of New York, employs every means to destroy her reputation, and intrigue follows intrigue to procure the postponement of the trial, which comes on next month. Mrs. Forrest's means being limited, she has, we are informed, determined to appear on the stage. Her cruel persecution has made her the object of general sympathy amongst the respectable inhabitants of New York, and she has had offers of engagements from various managers. She has at length accepted one, and appears at Brougham's Lyceum at the close of the present month, or the commencement of the next. Miss Cushman has taken a deep interest in the ill-used lady, and has devoted much time to her instruction in the histrionic art. Her speciality is tragedy, in which she makes her début. Her personal appearance is said to be very prepossessing; her figure is gracefully tall, and her features are handsome. Little doubt is entertained of her success, unless Forrest packed houses, and "rowdy" hostility prevent her from having fair play.

SAX MILITARY BAND INSTRUMENTS.

COUNCIL MEDAL, July 10a, 1725. Messrs. ROUSSELOT & Co., beg to announce that being the representatives of the eminent inventor of the Sax horn, who has gained the sole Council Medal for the Military Band Instruments, they are able to provide purchasers with genuine Sax Horns, French Brass Instruments of all kinds, and other instruments, &c., on the most advantageous terms. The admitted Instruments from the Exhibition are now on sale at 66, Conduit-street. List of prices forwarded on application. London, Rousselet and Co., 66, Conduit-street, Regent-street.

THE AMATEUR ORGANIST—a collection of soft and full Voluntaries, arranged in six Books, 3s. each, by EDWARD TRAVIS, and may be had elegantly bound, price 18s. "Mr. Travis has introduced to the musical world a new and interesting work for the Organ or Harmonium, under the title of 'The Amateur Organist.' Mr. Travis has availed himself of an extensive and classical music library, and selected with great taste the most beautiful morceaux of the great masters, Foreign and English. To lovers of classical music this work will be found to be the most superb selection that has ever issued from the musical press."—Vide Musical Review.

THE AMATEUR INTERLUDIST—a collection of short Interludes to play between the Verses of the Psalms, in one Book, price 4s., by EDWARD TRAVIS and J. P. DYER.

THE AMATEUR PRELUDIST—a collection of Preludes, with the Organ Stops carefully marked, in one Book, price 4s., by E. TRAVIS.

KELLER'S Collection of ANTHEMS, CHURCH SERVICES
CHANTS, &c., arranged for the Voice and Piano, in six Books, price 3s. each, with six beautiful and appropriate designs by Brandard, arranged by ALBERT KELLER. The six Books can be had in one Volume, elegantly bound, price 18s.

THE PSALMODIA BRITANNICA—a selection of Psalms and Hymns for the Voice and Organ, in six Books, price 3s. each, arranged by EDWIN FLOOD, and may be had in one Volume, neatly bound, price 19s.

N.B.—A New Edition of "Hark, the Sabbath Bells," by Edwin Flood.

ECONOMY being at all times commendable, Messrs. ROUSSELOT and Co. have established a new system for Hiring Pianos, including the tuning once a month, which presents not only a great saving, but also the advantage of having the instrument regularly kept in tune. Pianos, sold, exchanged, and repaired. For particulars apply to RousseLOT and Co., 66, Conduit-street, Regent-street.

MESSRS. RUST & STAHL, in calling the attention of Pianists and the Trade to their unique instruments, beg to intimate that they have just completed arrangements for the manufacturing of the upright pianos only, viz., the Piccolo and Cottage; hence they are enabled to give their undivided attention to this now almost universal class of instruments, which, combined with the terms to meet the present exigencies of the times, small profits and quick returns, will place their pianofortes beyond the possibility of competition. To this they need only add that their instruments combine all the modern improvements, and are made of the best seasoned materials, are warranted, and may be exchanged free of expense if not found to be in every respect perfect. Drawings and lists of prices forwarded post free.

Rüst and Stahl, 320, Regent-street. Manufactory, Edwards' Yard, Edward-street.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS!

CURE of a disordered Liver and Bad digestion. Copy of a Letter from Mr. R. W. Kirkus, Chemist, 7, Prescott-street, Liverpool, dated 5th June, 1851. To Professor HOLLOWAY, Sir,—Your Pills and Ointment have stood the highest on our sale list of Proprietary Medicines for some years. A customer, to whom I can refer for any enquiries, desires me to let you know the particulars of her case. She had been troubled for years with a disordered Liver and Bad digestion. On the occasion, however, the virulence of the attack was alarming, and the inflammation set in so severely, that doubts were entertained of her being able to bear up under it: fortunately she was induced to try your Pills, and she informs me that after the first, and each succeeding dose, she had great relief. She continued to take them, and although she only used three boxes, she is now in the enjoyment of perfect health. I could have sent you many more cases, but the above, from the severity of the attack, and the speedy cure, I think speaks much in favour of your astonishing Pills.

(Signed) R. W. KIRKUS.

Ague	Constipation	Of Fevers of all kinds	Lumbago	Tic Douloureux
Asthma	Of the Bowels		Piles	Tumours
Bilious Complaints	Consumption	Fits	Rheumatism	Ulcers
Debility		Head-ache	Retention of Urine	Worms of all kinds
Blotches on the Skin	Dropsy	Indigestion	Serofula or King's Evil	Weakness, from whatever cause
Bowel complaints	Dysentery	Ischmiation	Sore Throats	&c., &c.
Colic	Female Irregularities	Jaundice	Liver complaints	Stone & Gravel

Sold at the Establishment of Professor HOLLOWAY, 244, Strand (near Temple Bar), London, and by all respectable Druggists and Dealers in Medicine throughout the Civilized World, at the following prices—1s. 1d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., 7s., 2s., and 3s. each Box. There is a considerable saving by taking the larger sizes.

N.B.—Directions for the guidance of Patients in every Disorder are affixed to each Box.

The Musical World.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s.; Half year, 8s.; Three Months, 4s.; (Stamped Copies 1s. per Quarter extra Payable in advance, to be forwarded by Money Order, to the Publishers, Myers & Co., 22, Tavistock-st., Covent Garden).

No. 50.—VOL. XXIX.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1851.

Price Fourpence.
Stamped Fivepence

CICELY NOTT.

It is to the enterprising, intelligent, and we may add, in this instance, the provident and fortunate Jullien, that we are indebted for the appearance in public of the above young and charming artiste, who, as the Times observes, is in all probability destined to hold a high rank in her profession. It was Jullien who first discovered her talent, and brought her talent to light. It cannot be forgotten that it was Jullien who introduced our great English tenor, Sims Reeves, to the public, having first found him, and heard him in one of the Italian States, where, not unlikely, to this day—unless moved homewards by friendship, love, patriotism, or remembrance—he might have been delighting small potentates and their subjects with his fiery strains, had not the great conductor heard and felt his power, and transported him from the burning south to the frigid north; from the banks of the Adige, or Po, or shores of the Bay of Naples, to the quays of the Thames; from the Fenice, San Carlos, or La Scala, to Drury Lane, Exeter Hall, or the Hanover Rooms. But many Sims Reeves' could not at all times be discovered, and so, having no new stars with which to irradiate the public, Jullien contented himself for several years with acknowledged celebrities, and made his triumphs green with the laurels of a Persiani, a Jetty Treffz, a Miss Dolby, or a Miss Bassano. Nor must it be overlooked that, among his other discoveries, Jullien, the Columbus of the new artistic world, sweeping his intellectual telescope over Europe, lighted his gaze upon Bottesini, saw his splendour and glory, directed the world's attention thereto, and fixed him for ever among the stars of the first magnitude.

Some two or three years since, Jullien, for the first time heard Miss Cicely Nott sing in private. He soon discovered that she had a splendid organ, and was possessed of excellent musical abilities, and thinking it pity her talents should be wasted—as her father was a man of moderate means, and unable to spare sufficient money to bestow a liberal education—he resolved to make suitable provisions for her instruction, and to provide her the most competent masters. Jullien, accordingly, had Miss Cicely Nott placed at the Royal Academy of Music, where she learned the art in all its branches, and procured the celebrated vocal professor, Emanuel Garcia, brother of Malibran, and teacher of Jenny Lind, as her singing master. Of course, Jullien has borne all the expenses up to the present moment, and will continue to do so until Miss Cicely Nott's education be completed. At the Royal Academy the young pupil made great proficiency in her studies, and at this moment constitutes one of the brightest examples of the sound and admirable teaching of that establishment.

Miss Cicely Nott's voice is a true high soprano—the voce sfogato of the Italians—of the same register as that of Jenny Lind, Persiani, &c. She is, as far as appearance guides us, between eighteen or nineteen years of age. In person she is slender, elegant, and distingué, and her features are highly intelligent and expressive. Altogether Cicely Nott is an exceedingly prepossessing young lady, and a vocalist already of considerable acquirements, largely endowed by nature, and of transcendent promise. Miss Cicely Nott, however, is too young yet to sing in public, more especially in a large theatre, and in presence of a large audience. At eighteen or nineteen years of age the voice is not formed, and requires the utmost tenderness in the treatment. Singing too frequently, or too loudly, under such circumstances, is pernicious to the singer. Miss Cicely Nott should confine her efforts to singing frequently in her own room—where she may practise all day without disadvantage, by judicious exercise—and sing rarely in public. Let her not be led away with the idea that she can become a Malibran or a Persiani before she is out of her teens, or has left off the trammels of her novitiate. Every singer must bide his time; and no man or woman was ever a great artist before five or six-and-twenty—and many more after than at that period of life. Wherefore, let not the fair and talented Cicely jump at the moon, and fancy, because she is now the idol of the moment in public, and fed high with praises at Lord Blank's or the Dowager Blotche's, at mid-winter parties, when no one is in town, no excitement stirring, and a strange sensation is the more welcome on that account, that she has nothing more to learn; that her voice is of perdurable toughness, and immortal, and of india-rubber extensibility; that her throat is of brass, and her lungs of pounden buff; her stomach that of the boa, that can digest Witney blankets, with coloured selvages, and thrive on them; and that she may now sit with her basket of eggs before her, and reckon the chickens before they are hatched. Take care of the eggs, Cicely; they are very good eggs, and each, if looked to, will bring forth a bird destined to lay golden ones. But you must provide a hen, Cicely, and see that Mother Partlet be clacking, provident, and no nest leaver, else your eggs may not come to fruitful issue, or the chickens be spoiled in the rearing. Look to the future, Cicely, and let the present be but as the prologue to the golden round which Fortune awaits to crown you withal. And so farewell, fair Cicely, for a brief while, when we shall have more to discover of thee, and thy histories and pretensions, and manifold interests. Meanwhile, go not too frequently, and sing not too often, nor too loudly, at my Lord Blank's or my Lady Blotche's—the dowager's—and be sure to keep your feet dry. This is wholesome advice.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

Although no lover of good music could have felt otherwise than pleased to hear so fine a performance of Haydn's Seasons as that with which, in presence of a densely crowded audience, the Sacred Harmonic Society inaugurated its renewed series of performances at Exeter-hall, it is open to discussion whether such a work can, by any process of reasoning, be made to tally with the great object for which the society was originally projected, and which, since its foundation, the members have strenuously endeavoured to carry out. It is mere sophistry to attempt to impose a sacred character upon the Seasons. There is nothing sacred about it. The music of Haydn, like the poem of Thompson, is, for the most part, descriptive. Had the committee simply announced that a performance of the Seasons, by the members of the Sacred Harmonic Society, under the direction of Mr. Costa, would take place at Exeter-hall, without including it among the features of their regular plan, there would have been no room for cavil. But it is very questionable whether hunting and bacchanalian choruses, and compositions so essentially profane, not to say vulgar, as the duet "My constant, lovely Jane," and the air with chorus, "There was a squire, as I've heard say" (both, by the way, insipid and commonplace effusions), can be considered as legitimate media of edification to an assembly gathered together for the ostensible purpose of listening to the oratorios of those grave and renowned composers who drew their inspirations from the text of Scripture. That the Seasons, Haydn's last great effort, is rarely heard entire at the present time, even at our provincial festivals, is true; but the work itself has no more to do with the principles upon which the existence and prestige of the Sacred Harmonic Society are based, than the First Walpurgis Night of Mendelssohn. With the Passions and motets of Sebastian Bach, a few oratorios of Handel, the psalms and services of Mendelssohn, Cherubini, Mozart, &c., some rarely, others never, performed—not to speak of several oratorios by modern composers—to select from, there was, we conceive, no absolute necessity for the Sacred Harmonic Society to depart from its ancient professions, and, overstepping the limits of sacred music, to enter the domain of art which properly belongs to the concert-room and the theatre. These objections stated, we have nothing but praise to accord to the execution of Haydn's Seasons, which was an honourable to all concerned, and worthy of the reputation of the society and of its conductor (Mr. Costa), to whose energy and admirable talent so much of its actual prosperity must be attributed.

So familiar to the musical public are the origin, design, merits, and general character of Haydn's celebrated cantata,—of which, though the whole is seldom presented, the most striking pieces are constantly brought forward,—that it would be superfluous to enter into any description of it, either historical or analytic. It is enough to suggest, that, composed in 1800 (two years after the Creation), and first produced in England in 1813, it is regarded by many competent judges as the capital work of the master. We cannot, however, entertain that opinion, holding, as we do, that Haydn shone far more as a symphonist, and composer of instrumental music for the chamber, than as a vocal writer. True, his canzonets, and other songs, are deservedly esteemed; and, though his operas are forgotten, there are so many beauties, and such an inexhaustible vein of melody, both in the Creation and the Seasons, that, while they cannot reasonably be compared to those masterpieces of Handel and Mendelssohn, which have employed the resources of vast bodies of choral and instrumental executants with the most magnificent effect, they will always remain popular favourites, and possibly endure longer than many of the more profound and ingenious productions of their composer, who, in one especial branch, did more for the art than any other master. Haydn may be said to have invented and perfected the orchestral symphony; but in the higher dramatic element, in passion, and in sublimity, he was deficient—which is plainly shown—in works where such gifts, if possessed, would naturally have been demonstrated. With all its richness of melody, its clever and varied instrumentation, its spirit and its playfulness, the cantata of the Seasons presents evidences of the perruque, quite sufficient to prove that the materials of which it is composed were not imperishable. And here we may appropriately cite Haydn's own words after having completed the work:—"I have done. My head is no longer what it was; formerly ideas came to me unsought; I am now obliged to seek for them; and for this I feel that I am not formed." The great musician knew, better than any other, that the freshness and spontaneity of his invention had departed.

We have already hinted that the performance was first-rate. The orchestra and chorus had been evidently well trained by Mr. Costa, and there was scarcely a point to criticise in the execution. The chief vocalists, too, Miss Birch, Messrs. Lockey and H. Phillips, sang the recitatives, airs, and concerted pieces allotted to them with the best possible effect. Nevertheless, the attention of the audience, in many places, sensibly flagged, and a feeling of tameness and monotony was more than once made evident. The most striking executive displays of the evening were in the choruses, "Hark! the merry-toned horn," and "Shout, boys, shout," (Part III.—Autumn), the first of which, where the difficult horn obligato was skilfully played by Mr. Jarret, elicited a loud and unanimous encore. The same compliment was paid to Miss Birch for her spirited delivery of the air and chorus "There was a Squire." The fact that the parts of the cantata which gave most pleasure, and induced the audience to break through the wholesome regulation of altogether eschewing applause and repetitions, were precisely those the furthest removed from the sacred tone and character, may serve as a corollary to the objections we have urged.

Mr Costa was received with enthusiasm. The only important change remarked in the orchestra was the substitution of Signor Piatti for Mr. Lindley, as principal violoncello. The "father of the orchestra" may console himself, on retiring from public life, with the assurance that the place he has occupied with so much distinction for more than half-a-century will be worthily filled by his young and gifted successor now, beyond comparison, the first violoncellist in Europe. We must not conclude without a word of commendation for Professor Taylor's English version of the words, which, besides being far superior to the old one, adheres as closely to the text of the poet Thomson, where that is practicable, as the exigencies of the music allow. The next performance of the Sacred Harmonic Society will be the Messiah, on Tuesday, the 23rd inst.

MUSIC AT MANCHESTER.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Mr. Charles Hallé's Fourth Classical Chamber Concert took place on Thursday the 4th. The programme was as follows :

PART I.

Quartetté, pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello,
(in G minor) Mozart
Song—"The Mill-stream," Schubert
Grand Sonata—pianoforte (in C, op. 53) Beethoven

PART II.

Grand sextett, pianoforte, two violins, viola, violoncello, and contra-basso; (in E flat, op. 30) Onslow
Song—"The Alpine Horn" Proch
Miscellaneous selection, pianoforte, (in C sharp minor, op. 56) Heller—Chopin

We are afraid your readers will think we deal too much in hyperbole or fulsomeness in speaking, every fortnight, of the above recherche concerts. We cannot, certainly, write at all satisfactorily to ourselves about them; language fails us to express our feeling; and such as is at our command—wonder—delight—&c., loses its force and power of expression from constant repetition. Nathless, we must essay our best to report the fourth of this interesting series of concerts, however meagre and inadequate our record may appear to ourselves or to those of your readers, who can truly and heartily appreciate this classical school of chamber music. The feeling that oppresses us most, is, that nothing we can say, can do justice to Hallé himself; it is not only as the great pianist—the great interpreter of Beethoven's mighty conceptions for the pianoforte—but we have to speak in the highest terms of him, as the originator in Manchester, of this high class of vocal entertainment, and of his taste and judgment in the admirably varied selections he gives us as specimens of every variety of the chief writers for this particular school. We were particularly struck with this on glancing at the programme given above; here was a novelty, in a sextett for five-stringed instruments and pianoforte, by Onslow, that never was before heard in public, in Manchester; so it is, every concert differs remarkably from those which have gone before—yet is there no deterioration from the high standard already established.

With these remarks, we commence our task of reporting, in some faint degree, our impression of Hallé's last concert. The performers were chiefly as before. In addition to Hallé, Baetens was the tenor; Lidel, violoncello; Waud, contrabasso; to which were added, as first and second violin, two brothers, Messrs. Mollenhauer, who are and have been, for some time, resident here. Mozart's quartet, for violin, viola, violoncello, with pianoforte (in G minor), introduced to us one of the brothers as first violin; Lidel, Baetens, and Hallé, of course, completing the quartet. It was no slight disadvantage to M. Mollenhauer, that he should appear at these concerts so immediately after Herr Molique—it is a comparison forced upon us, under which few would appear advantageously. Molique's peculiar clearness of tone, we believe, is totally unsurpassed by any living artist, save Alard, (whom we never had the pleasure of hearing), consequently, it is no discredit to M. Mollenhauer, that in this especial particular he could not compare with his predecessor. Setting this aside, his performance was more than respectable; it was clever and artistic. Baetens, Hallé, and Lidel were all that could be desired, consequently Mozart's quartet was not only a fine example of that great master, but a most perfect performance. The Andante was very beautiful, quite Mozartean, and full of beauty, a flowing run taken by the left hand on the pianoforte—then by each string instrument in turn, was a very marked feature, and the full harmonies had quite a hymnal solemnity. The quartet was warmly applauded at its close. Hallé's performance of Beethoven's sonatas is surely the ne plus ultra of perfection. We have more than once listened with feelings of delight and astonishment at his performance of the one given on this occasion (the one in C, op. 53) but the 'appetite grows by what it feeds on' at each re-hearing, we are more and more entranced and spell-bound, listening most intently and rapturously whilst he is playing, regretting it is over when the sounds cease to fall on our enraptured ear, and our mind dwelling on the performance for hours afterwards. This is a feature peculiar to Hallé and his classical performances. We can remember no other solo player on any instrument that produced this after effect upon us that we have vainly attempted to describe. There is another charm in hearing Hallé play a sonata that we have heard from his hands before, in the familiar remembrance of former delight, that is vividly brought before us, and the pleasurable anticipation of beauties again to be rung in our ears, that we know must come during its performance. All this (and much more that we cannot describe) we felt on listening to Hallé's last sonata.

The second part of the concert opened with the marked feature we before alluded to, namely, Onslow's Sestett for pianoforte, two violins, viola, violoncello, and contra basso (in E flat op. 30). Hallé's subscribers may indeed be grateful to him, not only for the introduction of two clever violinists to them, in the Messrs. Mollenhauer, but for the first hearing of a very clever composition like this. We have heard chamber music by Onslow of a high character before, especially one or two of his quintets, but none boasting such beauty, variety, and excellence as this sestett. The other M. Mollenhauer now appeared as first violin, his brother taking the second; the way in which they attacked some of the most difficult passages, shewed they were masters of what was set before them; and notwithstanding a thinness of tone, (which was perhaps fancied from having Signor Molique so lately) they performed their part gracefully and well. Baetens delighted us more than ever. After Hill perhaps we are inclined to rank him as first tenor in England; anything more pure, oily, and flowing than his solo bits, or more equal than his tone throughout (being distinctly heard yet not too prominent) we never listened to. Lidel was equally fine; there was a passage of great beauty in unison for first violin and violoncello in the minuet, and a solo passage no less beautiful in the "Andante con Variazioni," for the violoncello, which showed Lidel to great advantage, and M. Mollenhauer acquitted himself exquisitely in the unison bit, with its graceful close. In one part was a peculiar wailing cry given out first by the violin and repeated in their different tones successively by tenor, violoncello, and pianoforte. There was another passage for the whole six crescendo united, it became a most powerful forte, when we could have imagined a full orchestra had stolen into the hall unperceived to join their forces to the sestett. Hallé was unobtrusive and unassuming as usual—yet the presiding genius throughout. We cannot particularize each movement; the impression on a first hearing was redolent of beauty, melody, harmony—a most impartial display of each instrument in turn—and a clever combination of them in concert together—technical terms are beyond us, we speak as one of a delighted audience, not as a musician. Hallé's selection was again a great treat, a serenade of Heller (in C sharp minor, op. 56) and two of Chopin's extraordinary Mazurkas. On Hallé's coming forward to play them he was received at first with a hearty round of applause, prolonged until the audience seemed to recollect all at once, that it was to Hallé they were indebted for all this intellectual feast, when the clapping of hands grew into a regular burst of enthusiasm—a genuine tribute to Hallé—which he must have felt from its variety Hallé's audience are most enthusiastic and apt listeners, but it is seldom they are loud in their plaudits. Mr. Perring we are glad to see again the solo vocalist; he gave us, with his usual good taste, in the first part, Schubert's (query, Curschman's?) "Mill Stream," accompanied by Hallé; in the second Proch's "Alpine Horn," in Italian, accompanied by himself; he was much and deservedly applauded. There is a finish and refinement about Perring which admirably qualifies him to sing at these chamber concerts.

The next is fixed for Thursday, the 8th instant.

The Messrs. Mollenhauer, we perceive, are about to give a concert at the Town Hall on Friday, the 12th instant, which we hope to see fully attended. Hallé and Lidel are engaged. Miss Scott, of Liverpool, as vocalist.

Again, after writing our notice of Hallé's concert, have we seen the Manchester Guardian's critique, which again agrees very much with the above as to the instrumental performances. We notice it solely on account of the very harsh treatment (to say the least of it,) of Mr. Perring; our poor judgment is totally opposed to that of the writer, whose remark we shall not give increased currency to by quoting, but leave the public to determine on the merits and demerits of Mr. Perring. His singing was exceedingly neat and finished. His accompaniment to Proch's song that of a thorough musician.

At the Theatre Royal, we perceive the benefits are fast bringing the season to a close. Mr. Charles F. Anthony, the chorus master, we are glad to see, takes a benefit on Thursday next for the first time; his unseen but useful labours deserve a bumper. It is rather unfortunate that Mr. Seymour should have accidentally fixed on the same night, for the first of a short series of four of his quartet concerts, which of course cannot now be helped. We wish well to both. Mr. Seymour has secured Mr. Perring as vocalist, and a Miss Samson is announced as solo pianiste (a pupil of Mendelssohn's). Thomas, Baetens, and Lidel will, we presume complete the quartet.

THE RECENT EVENTS IN PARIS.

[The following from a Correspondent of The Times, in the impression of Saturday, December 6th, will probably have some interest for musical readers.—Ed.]

As witness of some of the events of the last few days in Paris, and of the effect produced by them on the temper and deportment of the inhabitants, I have traced a few hurried remarks, which may, perhaps, be considered not without interest by your numerous readers, at a moment when all that comes from the French side of the channel is looked for with so much anxiety. Although anticipations of a coup d'état had been entertained and whispered in the cafés and public places for some time previous, the effect of the wholesale and decisive mandates posted and circulated all over Paris on Tuesday morning was electric, and the excitement universal. The Boulevards were unusually crowded. At the doors of the principal cafés and the corners of the principal streets dense groups were seen discussing with noisy vociferations the important and unexpected intelligence. There was no interruption, however, to the business and amusements of these immense thoroughfares which cut Paris into halves. The shops remained open and the cafés were crowded. As from time to time the military passed to and fro, the continued shouts of "Vive la République" had little of anger in their tone, and seemed rather like the friendly admonition of the people to their armed defenders, a memento of the cause which they both might be supposed to cherish. To a stranger, strolling leisurely where "circulation" was not impracticable, the scene bore the semblance of a carnival, and the passage of the military a pageant which attracted the attention and excited the cheers and applause of the populace. Meanwhile, however, as you know, events were being consummated and decrees enforced in other parts of the city, remote from that line of fashion and gaiety which stretches from the boulevard Montmartre to the Chausseé d'Antin, with a decision and severity that plainly declared there was no child's play on hand. On the previous evening (Monday) the Opera Comique was crammed to suffocation, the attraction being the Château de la Barbe Bleue, a new opera by M. Limnander, a young composer, who had acquired considerable reputation by his first essay, Les Monténégrins. All Paris was there, and the feuilletonistes looked as grave and attentive as though they were going to write their critiques as usual, and as though if written they would be printed, and if printed, read. M. Cavaignac and M. Thiers were among the audience, and strange enough, by the side of the former sat M. de Morny, Minister of the Interior, the only one who could be persuaded to affix his signature to those decrees of the President which on the following morning awoke the astonishments of the Parisians. On the evening of Tuesday, although grave forebodings of disaster had already spread themselves throughout the city, the Théâtre Italien was filled by a brilliant and well-dressed audience, to witness the début of the tenor, Guasco, in Ernani. A short calm, a brief suspension of military operations, and unimpeded circulation in the Boulevard des Italiens were enough to quiet the apprehensions of this amusement-loving people, whose elasticity of temperament is one of their most signal characteristics. The foyer this time was not in the theatre, but on the Boulevards, where numbers of the audience hurried, between the acts, to inform themselves about the aspect of affairs. Seeing nothing, however, but a moving crowd, hearing nothing but the same monotonous cry of "Vive la République," as the military passed up and down, they returned to the theatre, and for a time forgot the threatened crisis in the singing of Mlle. Cruvelli, the Elvira of the evening. After the opera had terminated most of the cafés were still open, and some few of them did not close their doors until an unusually late hour.

On the morning of Wednesday, and up till 2 o'clock in the afternoon, there was nothing in the beaux quartiers but the crowds of promenaders, passing without hinderance, and the groups at the doors of the cafés, to indicate that Paris was on the brink of a crisis. In the cafés there was a universal game of dominoes, the suspension of so many of the public journals, offering the habitués but a scanty supply of literary food. In the streets the vendors of the Patrie were more than usually numerous, and more than usually obstreperous. Later in the afternoon, however, as rumours of barricades and massacres floated up from the remoter and less fortunate departments of St. Martin and St. Antoine, the dominoes gradually ceased rattling, many persons stole quietly home, and a gloom began to settle upon the faces of the mob, whose cries of "Vive la République," hollow, suppressed, and at rarer intervals, assumed a tone of menace, as though a storm were not far behind. The physiognomy of the military, moreover, worn and fatigued by fast and waking, was more serious, stern, and anxious than before; no longer the gay and showy pageant in which ac-rabiniers, cuirassiers, and guides were but as glittering effigies of the reality—the figures of a gigantic puppet-show—but a real military display, a threat and an admonition to the crowd, who, in the features of their armed compatriots on horse and foot, found no sympathy and read no hope. The disastrous attempts of MM. Madier de Montjau, Esquiros, and Baudin, to form barricades in the Rue St. Marguerite, and the accredited report of the deaths of two out of three representatives of the Mountain, spread consternation among the groups, and gradually emptied the cafés of their visitors. One noticeable difference was remarked in the aspect of the crowd on Tuesday and Wednesday. On Tuesday a vast number of blouses and ouvriers was noticed; on Wednesday the appearance of these ancient abettors of revolution was exceedingly rare. Scarcely any of them, indeed, were observed. To some this brought confidence, to others fear. The latter thought, and not without a show of reason, that if the blouses were absent, almost to a man, it was presumptive evidence they were elsewhere more gravely occupied, and this by no means improved the prospect of what was likely to take place on the morrow—more especially since it was currently reported that the Socialists had been summoned by their chiefs to meet and consult that night.

From 9 o'clock p.m. the more dangerous parts of the Boulevards were comparatively deserted. Accompanied by a friend, I walked as far as the Boulevard du Temple; but with the exception of a few dispersed mobs, retreating at the approach of the military, there was nothing to disturb the almost dead tranquillity. From an individual in one of the flying groups, who had taken shelter in a café, we learnt that two of the people had been killed in an encounter, and that their bodies had been carried about by some of the boldest of their comrades, who made them a pretext to excite commotion; but that after a short period the corpses were captured by a detachment of soldiers, and despatched in an omnibus to an adjacent hospital. After midnight large bodies of military invested the Café de Paris, Tortoni's, and the Maison Dorée (one of the principal resorts of those Parisians who turn night into day.) The stragglers who were returning home from late reunions, were ordered off the great thoroughfare, and compelled to gain their domiciles by circuitous routes. Resistance or protest only led to a menace of immediate arrest, which no one was fool-hardy enough to set at defiance.

If the Boulevards, thronged by busy and animated crowds, their brilliant array of shops and cafés all open, be a sight to raise the wonder and delight of foreigners, anything more desolate and blank than their appearance when completely deserted by their peaceable inhabitants can hardly be imagined. Such was the picture presented to those who ventured within eyeshot of the scene on Tuesday, in the afternoon, when every shop was closed, and the interior of the cafés, dimly lighted by a solitary reverberé, left scarce the possibility for the few who hazarded to come within their precincts to recognise each other's faces. At the mouth of every street and every passage a picket of soldiers stayed the further progress of the people, who remained behind the barrier as spectators. But while the open thoroughfare of the Boulevards was abandoned, the windows and balconies of every house from top to bottom were alive with anxious faces, eagerly watching the growing numbers and inexplicable evolutions of the military, who soon filled up the space as far as the eye could reach, from the point of the Boulevard des Italiens at which I was situated. That something of consequence was about to be enacted was evident to every looker-on. Circulation, which at first had been partially allowed, was at length imperatively forbidden, and the half-opened doors of the cafés, from which the unemployed garçons, and even the cuisiniers, had been furtively peering, were shut by command. Unconscious of what was going to happen, however, the inhabitants remained at the windows and in the balconies, their curiosity outweighing their fears. The rapid passage to and fro of heavy artillery, directed to unknown points, the sound of distant cannon, which told an undeniable story, the croque-morts, as those members of the ambulances are called whose business it is to carry away the dead and wounded, the army surgeons in their regimental guise, the incessant departure and return of the guides, all at the gallop, these and other appearances no less suggestive, were insufficient to drive the people into their houses; the windows and the balconies continued to be busily occupied. At length, however, two or three successive motions of the hand from the general who was superintending the manœuvres of the troops gave warning that danger was at hand, and the greater number of the curious retired from the windows, although those in the balcon of the Café du Cardinal failed to take the hint, and it was not till two tremendous volleys of musketry made the Boulevards ring again that they became aware of the peril to which they stood exposed, and scrambled through the windows of the première étage. Those who have been to Paris will remember that the Café du Cardinal forms the rez de chaussée, or ground floor, of an enormous house, half of which faces the Boulevards and the other half the rue de Richelieu. The remainder of the house, from the first floor upwards, belongs to M. Brandus, the most extensive music publisher in Paris, who has recently leased the premises, and constructed, perhaps, the largest and handsomest magazin of its kind in Europe. It was in the balcon which appertains to this magazin that I was stationed, in company with seven or eight others, watching the evolutions of the troops, the magnitude and variety of which surprised everybody, in a quarter of the Boulevards from which usually little danger is anticipated in revolutionary times. To our astonishment and no small discomfort, our escape from the balcony of the music shop of M. Brandus had only interposed the walls and windows between our persons and the threatened danger. The fire was now immediately directed against the house in which we were, and the smashing of windows speedily incited to a move upstairs, where it was imagined we should be out of immediate peril. No such thing, however. Musket shots penetrated even the bedroom of M. Brandus. The consternation was as general as the cause of the aggression was incomprehensible. In a short time, while everybody was doing his best to get out of reach of the shot, the screams of the female servants, in the lower department of the house announced a fresh event, and the shouts of a hundred voices outside, crying "Ouvrez ouvrez!" declared the intention of the military to enter the building. No one daring to descend to obey the mandate, after a short period the door was broken open, and a number of soldiers rushed upstairs, and demolishing every obstacle searched each room in succession, until they approached the quatrième étage, where M. Brandus and his friends had repaired for safety. There information was given that a shot had been fired from the house upon the troops, and that the business of the invaders was to visit every apartment and examine the persons of all present. The scrutiny proved unavailing, but the soldiers insisting upon the fact of the shot having proceeded from the house, the whole party was forthwith arrested and taken before the General on the Boulevards. One of them happened, luckily, to be M. Sax, the well known inventor and manufacturer of the instruments that bear his name. Being recognised by the General, the protest of M. Sax was accepted, and the party allowed to escape into the Passage de l'Opéra, but not to re-enter the house. In that agreeable locale, we were compelled to wait, penned up like beasts of burden, until the military had evacuated the Boulevard des Italiens, when each was allowed to find his way home as well as he might, amid the bustle and confusion. It afterwards appeared that the suspected shot was attributed to the house next door to that of M. Brandus, and subsequently to the Café Anglais, which was in its turn almost demolished. Whether, on such a shallow pretext, the house of a peaceable citizen ought to be destroyed, the lives of its occupants endangered, and a heavy loss entailed upon its proprietor for repairs, I leave for those whom it concerns to answer. I speak simply as a looker-on, entirely ignorant of the cause of so imposing and grandiose a display of military tactics, which will doubtless be explained to you by more competent authority. The search for arms could surely have been effected without shattering the windows of the house with fusillades. How contemptible must the explorers have felt when they discovered nothing better in the whole building than a rusty fusil, unfit for use, which had served Mr Brandus in 1848, when he officiated as one of the most zealous and active officers of the Garde Nationale, and helped to maintain peace and tranquillity in the capital!

It is scarcely necessary to add that the theatres, as well as the shops, were closed on Thursday, of the chief events of which unpleasant day you will, of course, receive ample information. I cannot conclude, however, without complaining of the conduct of several of the hotel keepers, who declared that all the railroads would suspend business, when, on the contrary, every train left and arrived at the usual hour. Sceptical about this fact, I left my luggage at the hotel, and went on foot in search of a cabriolet, to convey me to the Chemin du fer du Nord. After much difficulty I succeeded in finding a coupe on the Boulevard des Capucins, the conductor of which, for the small consideration of 15f., with the proviso that he was not to go to the hotel for my luggage, consenting to take me to the station. On our way to Calais we heard at the various relais, not, as had been reported, that the "provinces were marching upon Paris," but that two men had been instantly put to death for attempting to cut away the wires of the electric telegraph, somewhere near St. Denis—for the truth of which report, however, I cannot pretend to vouch, although it was stated with confidence by my informer.

THE BARON VON B.

(Translated from the German.)

The Baron Von B., who visited Berlin about the year 1789, was one of the most wonderful critics that has ever appeared in the musical world; and, (as the writer of this learned from the mouth of a world-renowned violinist,) appears not unworthy of public notice.

I was, (so relates the Virtuoso) at that time very young, scarcely sixteen years old, and engaged in hard study of my instrument, which I loved with my whole soul. My worthy, though severe teacher, Concertmeister Haack, grew more and more pleased with me. He praised my great execution, the clearness of my intonation, at last he let me play in the opera orchestra; yes! even in the royal chamber concerts. Here I often heard Haack speak with the young Duport, Ritter, and other great masters, of the musical entertainments which the Baron of B. got up in his house with such elegance and taste, that the king himself did not disdain very often to attend. They mentioned the splendid compositions of the old and almost forgotten masters, which one could hear nowhere but at the entertainments of the Baron of B., who possessed the most complete collection of compositions, as well those of the most ancient, as of modern times, and especially music for the violin, which could anywhere be found. They spoke also of the splendid reception, and of the lordly creditable liberality with which the Baron treated the artists, and lastly, they were quite agreed that the Baron was truly a shining and brilliant star, which had lighted up the musical sky of Berlin. These frequent conversations greatly raised my curiosity: still more was it excited, when in such conversations the masters approached nearer each other, and I could only hear the name of the Baron, and a few disjointed words, but still sufficient for me to guess that they spoke of his giving instructions in the divine art. It appeared to me as though a sarcastic smile played on Duport's countenance, and as if every one was mocking the Concertmeister, who made only a weak defence, and could scarcely suppress a smile himself; till, finally, he turned quickly around, commenced tuning his violin, and called aloud, "He is, and always will be, a splendid man!" I could not help, notwithstanding the danger of being dismissed from his instructions, asking the Concertmeister to introduce me to the Baron, and take me to his soirées.

Haack stared at me from head to foot, and I began to be afraid that a small thunder storm would break loose; however, his grave look soon turned into a smile, and he said, "Ha! you are quite right with your request; you can learn very much from the Baron. I will speak to him about you, and I believe that he will admit you, for he is very fond of such young disciples in the art as you." Not long after, I had just played some very difficult duets with Haack, when one morning he said to me, "Now Karl, this evening put on your Sunday coat, and silk stockings, then come to me, and we will go together to the Baron's. You will find there only a few people, and will have a good opportunity to become acquainted." I trembled with joy; for I hoped, and I scarcely knew why, to learn something wonderful. We went, then. The Baron, a man of middle size, advanced in years, dressed in an old German embroidered suit, came to us as we entered the room, and shook hands with my teacher. Never had I felt, at seeing any distinguished man, greater reverence, and never had I formed such attachment for any one at first sight. In the features of the Baron one could distinguish the best of natures, and from his eyes sparkled that fire which so often distinguishes the true artist. All awe which I thought I should feel, vanished in a moment. "Well, how goes it?" began the Baron, in a clear sonorous voice, "how goes it, my good Haack—have you practised well my concerto? Well, we will hear it to-morrow. Aha! that is the young man, the brave little Virtuoso, of whom you spoke?"

I looked down ashamed, and felt that I blushed again and again, while Haack mentioned my name, praised my talent, and the great progress I had made in a short time.

"Well," said the Baron, turning to me, "you have chosen the violin for your instrument, my son? Have you well considered that the violin is the most difficult instrument of all? yes, that this instrument, appearing so simple, is a wonderful secret, containing the great richness of tone which is disclosed only to a few selected particularly by nature? Are you sure you can become master of this wonderful secret? A great many have thought so, and have remained bunglers their whole lifetime. I would not, my son, that you should increase the number of these. Well, well, you can play something to me, and I will tell you if you can make anything, and give you advice. It may be with you as it was with Karl Stamitz, who thought himself a wonder, and that he would become a great violin virtuoso; when I told him he was mistaken, he threw away his fiddle, and took instead the viola and viola d'amour, and did well on this instrument; he could play pretty well with his wide spreading fingers. Well, well, I will hear what you can do, my son."

I was greatly astonished at this first, and somewhat extraordinary speech of the Baron's. His words penetrated deeply to my soul, and I felt with internal disquietude that I, notwithstanding my enthusiasm, had, perhaps, having chosen for my study the most difficult of all instruments, undertaken a task to which I was not competent. They now prepared to play three new quartetts by Haydn, which had then just been published. My master took the violin from its case; but scarcely had he commenced tuning it, when the Baron stopped both ears with his hands, and cried out, as if beside himself, "Haack! Haack! how can you, for Heaven's sake, so spoil your whole performance with your pitiful, screeching fiddle?"

Now, the Concertmeister had one of the most splendid instruments that I had ever seen—a genuine Stradivari—and nothing could enrage him more, than to have anybody find fault with his favourite. Then how was I astonished, when he, laughing, replaced the violin in its case. I was anxious to know what was to follow. He had just locked the case, when the Baron, who had gone into the next chamber, came in with a case covered with purple velvet trimmed with gold lace, carrying it on both arms as if it was a wedding present. "I will confer an honour on you," said he, "you shall play my oldest and best violin to-day. It is a true Granuelo, and compared with the old master, his pupil, Giova Stradivari, is only a bungler. Tartini played on no other instruments. Take pains that Granuelo may let you hear all his magnificence." The Baron opened the case and I perceived an instrument, the appearance of which showed that it was advanced in years. By the side of it was the most curious bow I ever saw, which was so curved that it appeared to me more proper to shoot arrows with than to play the violin. The Baron took the instrument from its case with a solemn air, handed it to the Concertmeister, who received it with the same solemnity. "The bow," said the Baron, laughingly tapping the master on the shoulder, "the bow I shall not give you, for you do not understand how to handle it, and will never in your life be able to make a stroke with it. Such bows," continued the Baron, taking it out, and regarding it with a loving look, "such bows the great immortal Tartini used, and beside him, there are in the whole world only two of his scholars who have succeeded in discovering the secret of a stroke that fills the soul with pleasure—a stroke that can be made only with a bow like this; one of these is Nardini, now an old man, the other, as you gentlemen probably already guess, is myself. I am also the only one in whom the art of the true violinist still lives; and I spare no effort to make known that art, whose founder was the great Tartini. Well, well, let us commence, gentlemen."

The quartetts were now performed; and, as one can well imagine, with such perfection that nothing remained to be desired. The Baron sat in his chair with his eyes shut, and his head nodding to and fro. Then he jumped up, went nearer the performers, looked at the music with a grave countenance, then went softly back to his seat, leaned his head on his hand, sighed—groaned! "Halt!" suddenly he cried, at some beautiful passage in the adagio, "Halt! that was Tartini—but you have not understood him—once more, I beg of you;" and the master repeated the passage with a long stroke of his bow, and the Baron sobbed and wept like a child. When the quartett was finished, the Baron said, "A magnificent man, that Haydn; he knows how to reach the soul, but he does not understand composing for the violin. If he did understand it, and wrote in the only true manner, like Tartini, you would not have been able to play it."

Now I was obliged to play some variations which Haack had composed for me: the Baron placed himself near me, and looked over the music. One can well imagine with what anxiety I began, having the great critic at my side. Nevertheless, a splendid allegro soon quite captivated me, so that I forgot the Baron, and could apply all the power which I then commanded over the instrument. As I ended, the Baron patted me on the shoulder, and laughingly said, "You can remain by the violin, my son, but you do not understand anything of performing, because you have not probably had a very skillful teacher." We then sat down to supper, a meal being prepared, which, particularly on account of the very rich wines, could almost be called a banquet. Haack ate very heartily. The conversation, more and more enlivening, was almost exclusively on music. The Baron opened a treasure of the greatest knowledge. His criticisms, sharp and penetrating, showed not only the accomplished connoisseur, but also the perfect artist. Especially remarkable to me was the gallery of violinists which he criticised. As much as I can remember I will now relate.

"Corelli," so spoke the Baron, "first opened the way. His compositions can only be performed in Tartini's method, and that is sufficient to prove how well he understood the essence of violin playing. Paganini was a tolerable performer. He has tone and much comprehension, nevertheless his stroke is too weak in appoggiamento passages. How much I have heard of Geminiani! As I heard him the last time in Paris, thirty years ago, he played like a somnambulist, who wanders about in his sleep, and it sounded to me exactly as if I was dreaming—always tempo rubato without style or character. The confounded tempo rubato spoils the best performers, for in it they lose sight of, and neglect their bowing. I played to him my sonatas, he saw his error, and wished to take lessons of me, to which I willingly consented. However, the boy was too deep in his method, too old to change it. He was then ninety-one years old! God forgive Giardini, for he it was who first ate the apple of the tree of knowledge, and made all later violinists sinful men! He thinks only of his left hand, and of the elastic finger, and does not know that the soul of music is in the right hand—that all feelings that find place in the breast, flow out in its pulses; I wish every such man could have a Jomelli by his side, who would rouse him from his insanity with a box on the ear, as Jomelli really did when Giardini in his presence spoiled a most beautiful passage by his foolish trills, jumpings about, and runs. Lulli makes the maddest sort of gestures and wrong moves. He is a regular bungler; he cannot play an allegro, and his execution is only of that kind which ignoramuses, who have neither feeling nor understanding, admire. I told you that the true art of the violin dies with Nardini and myself. The young virtuoso is a splendid fellow—full of talent. He has to thank me for all he knows, for he was my illustrious scholar; but what avails it?—no patience, he left me. He profited much from my instruction, and will profit more from it when I return to Paris, if not here: I there meet him. My concertos, which you have practised with me and Haack, he lately played quite well; but he has no hand for my bow. Giarnovich shall never again cross my threshold. He is a stupid fool, who is insolent enough to turn up his nose at the great Tartini, the master of all masters, and to despise my instruction. I am curious to know what will become of that boy Rhode, when he has had the benefit of my lessons. He promises much, and it is possible that he will become master of my bow. He is," continued the Baron, turning to me, "the same as you, my son, but of a more grave and penetrating nature. From you, my dear Haack, I hope a great deal; since I have instructed you, you have been quite another man; only continue in your restless zeal and diligence, and neglect not a single lesson—you know that makes me angry."

I was almost petrified with astonishment at what I heard. I was all impatient to ask the Concertmeister if it was, then, true that the Baron was indeed the greatest violinist of the time, and if he, the meister himself, did really take lessons of him, and could not wait till we should go. Haack answered me that he certainly did not neglect to make use of the excellent instruction which the Baron offered him, and that I would do well to go to him some morning, and request him that he would favour me with his instruction. I asked many more questions about the Baron and his talent; but Haack would answer none of them, merely saying that if I did what he told me, I should probably learn all. A strange laugh that passed over Haack's countenance did not escape me, and it only served, without my having a presentiment of the reason, to raise my curiosity to the highest pitch. As I, then, bluntly told the Baron my wish, and assured him that I felt the most intense passion for the divine art, he first stared hard at me, but soon his look changed to one expressive of the greatest good nature. "My son, my son," he said, "that you apply to me, the only violinist now living, proves that the genuine spirit of the artist is stirring in thee, and that the image of a true violinist lives in your soul. How glad will I be to help you, but how find time? Haack gives me a great deal to do, and there is the young Durand here, who wishes to appear in public, and has perceived that it will not do at all, till he has taken a long course of me. Wait! wait a minute, wait a minute, in the forenoon—yes, I have one hour free, my son, come to me punctually every day, at twelve o'clock, and then I can play with you till one, then comes Durand!" You can well imagine how I, with a beating heart, hastened to the Baron's next day at the appointed hour. He would not allow me to produce a single note from the violin I brought with me. He put a very old instrument of Antonio Amati's make into my hands; never had I played on such a violin. The heavenly tones which the strings produced, inspired me. I quite lost myself in the beautiful passages, the stream of notes now rising in great restless waves, now sinking into little murmuring ripples; I thought that I played quite well, certainly better than many times since. The Baron shook his head, displeased, and said, "Son, son, you must forget all that; in the first place, you hold your bow miserably." He showed me how, according to Tartini's method, I must hold my bow; I thought I should not be able to produce a single note in this manner. My astonishment was not small, as I, by the request of the Baron, played the passages again; I saw in a few seconds the great advantage which the art of holding the bow gave me.

"Now," said the Baron, "we will commence our lessons. Strike G, my son, and hold it as long as you can. Spare the bow! spare the bow! what the breath is to the singer, that is the bow to the violin player." I did as he told me, and rejoiced that I succeeded in producing a vigorous tone, and increasing from pianissimo to fortissimo, and again diminishing with quite a long bow. "Do you not see, my son?" cried the Baron, "Do you not see, that you can make beautiful passages, runs, jumps, trills, and other ornaments, but are not able to hold out a tone at all? Now I will show you what it is to hold out a note on the violin." He took the instrument from me, put the bow in its place on the strings, but no—it is impossible for me to describe his actions. Close to the bridge he glided along with a trembling bow, rattling, piping quaking, mewling; one might compare the tone to that of an old lady, who, with spectacles on her nose, worried herself in an unsuccessful attempt to hit the pitch of some old song. The Baron cast his eyes upwards as if in extacy, and as he at last stopped and laid down the instrument, his eyes glistening, he cried out in an agitated voice, "That is the tone, that is the tone." I was so astonished that I remained perfectly quiet; if my impulse was to laugh, it was immediately checked, when I looked at the venerable countenance of the Baron, which was lighted up by enthusiasm. All this produced such an effect on me, that I almost imagined that a spectre was before me, so that I was not able to speak a single word. "That went to your very soul," said the Baron. "Did it not? You never imagined that such magical sounds could be conjured from that little thing there, with the four strings, hey? Well! well! drink, drink, my son."

The Baron poured out a glass of Madeira. I was obliged to drink, and eat of the pastry that stood on the table. Just at that moment it struck one. "Go, go, my son," cried the Baron, "you have had enough for to day; go now, and come soon again—there, take that." Saying this, the Baron put a little piece of paper in my hand, in which I found a smooth, beautiful, Dutch ducat. Quite alarmed, I ran quickly to the Concertmeister, and related to him all that had happened. He only laughed and said, "Do you not know how it is with the Baron and his instruction? He judges you as a beginner, and so gives you one ducat for each lesson, in comparison to the merit, according to his idea, so is the honour greater or smaller. I get a Louis d'or; and Durand, if I mistake not, gets two ducats." I could not refrain from saying, that I did not think it right to deceive the good old Baron so, and take his ducat from him. "You must know," replied the Concertmeister, "that the Baron's whole success consists in giving lessons in the manner you have just seen; and should we disdain his instructions, he will publish abroad, that I and other masters (for whom he is a competent critic) were poor, ignorant, bunglers; and finally, notwithstanding his conceit, the Baron is a man whose professional judgment may be of great advantage in many things to the master. Judge yourself, if I do wrong in cultivating his acquaintance, notwithstanding his foolishness, and in sometimes receiving a Louis d'or. Visit him often, do not listen to the foolish jingling of the madman, but to the sensible words of the really learned critic; you can learn much from him."

I followed the advice of the master: I found it often difficult to repress a laugh, when the Baron put his fingers on the cover, instead of the touch board of the violin, and passed over the strings with the bow, assuring me he was then playing Tartini's most beautiful solo, and that he was the only one living who could play it as it should be. But then he put the violin aside, and commenced a conversation, which added much to my knowledge, and inflamed my breast for the most glorious art.

If I then played at one of his concerts as well as I could, and succeeded in this or that particularly well, he looked round proudly and said, "He has to thank me for that; me, the scholar of the scholar of the great Tartini!" So the lessons of the Baron afforded me both advantage and amusement, and I was not at all displeased with the pretty round Dutch ducats.

So spoke the great violinist, whose name is celebrated in the musical world, concerning the Baron of B. It is a question if any of our present virtuosos, who may think themselves far beyond any instruction, would not be pleased with a few lessons given in the manner the Baron was accustomed to.

CHARACTERISTICS OF BEETHOVEN.

(From Rie's Notizen.)

As a proof of Beethoven's extraordinary faculties it may be quoted, that, at the first rehearsal of his pianoforte concerto in C major, which took place at his house, his piano proved to be half a tone lower than the wind instruments. He immediately desired these to tune in B instead of A, whilst he himself played his part in C sharp.

Ries gives us a curious instance of the manner in which the great master showed his originality. He says it is in the first movement of the Sinfonia Eroica that Beethoven has vented his spleen upon the horn. Previous to the motivo returning to the second part, he has indicated it through the horn whilst the two violins hold on the chord of the second. Those who are initiated into this secret of the score, must ever think the horn-player had miscounted, and made a wrong entry. At the first rehearsal of this symphony, which was a stormy one, and when the horn player came in correctly, I stood next to Beethoven, and, taking it for granted that the horn-player was wrong, I said, "Listen to that stupid fellow—can he not count—it sounds wretchedly!" I think my ears narrowly escaped being boxed, and Beethoven did not for some time forgive me. He played the same evening his piano quintett with wind instruments. Ram, the celebrated oboe-player of Munich, played also, and accompanied the quintett. At one of the pauses in the last allegro, previous to the subject coming on again, Beethoven of a sudden began to extemporise, taking the Rondo for his subject, thus amusing himself and the audience for some time. Not so his wind instruments; these lost their temper, particularly Mr. Ram, who was much incensed. It was indeed ludicrous to see these gentlemen, who were constantly expecting to recommence, putting up their instruments, and quickly taking them down again. At length Beethoven was satisfied, and returned to the Rondo, the whole company being in raptures.

If in playing to him, I made a mistake in passages, or if I happened to strike a wrong note where he required a particularly accented one, he seldom said anything; but if I showed any want of expression, if I omitted a crescendo, &c., or if I did not succeed in rendering the character of the piece, he became incensed: the former, he said, was chance; but the latter, want of knowledge, of feeling, or of attention. Indeed, he himself might often be reproached with the former defect, even when playing in public.

During a walk which I took with Beethoven, I was talking to him of two consecutive fifths, which occur in one of the earliest violin quartets in C minor, and which, to my surprise, sound most harmoniously. Beethoven did not know what I meant, and would not believe that they could be fifths. He soon produced a piece of music paper, which he was in the habit of carrying with him, and I wrote down the passage with its four parts. When I had thus proved myself to be right, he said, "Well, and who forbids them?" Not knowing what to make of this question, I was silent, and he repeated it several times, until I at length replied, in great amazement, "Why, it is one of the very first rules." He, however, still repeated his question, and I answered, "Marpurg, Kirnberger, Fuchs, &c., &c.,—in fact, all theorists." "Well, then I permit them," was his final answer.

Beethoven was most awkward and helpless, and his every movement was completely devoid of grace. He seldom laid his hand upon anything without breaking it; thus he several times emptied the contents of the inkstand into the neighbouring piano. No one piece of furniture was safe with him, and least of all a costly one: he used either to upset, stain, or destroy it. How he ever managed to learn the art of shaving himself still remains a riddle, leaving the frequent cuts visible in his face quite out of the question. He never could learn to dance in time.

ORCHESTRAL SOCIETY.

(From the Athenæum).

This ill-starred body of musical professors—although gathered with great pains and deliberation for the purpose of providing Londoners with a worshipful instrumental concert during the winter months—has melted into empty air; its members having proved themselves to be only professor, as distinguished from performers of their promises and fulfillers of obligations voluntarily contracted.—By the constitution of the defunct society all the members of the orchestra were bound to contribute their services to its performances, sharing the receipts in proportion to their several terms of professional remuneration:—a clause being introduced into the laws which, in the event of the absence of any one, enjoined him to forward due notice at the same time nominating a competent deputy. Such a clause, it is needless to point out, was introduced in order to provide for the rare emergencies of sickness and like grave casualties; having no reference to the normal state of the band. The laws and conditions of the Orchestral Society having been largely acceded to and signed by most of the leading instrumentalists in London, the Council some months ago published a list of the orchestra—with a view of inviting subscriptions—at the same time fixing the dates of the concerts—and more recently, as our own advertising columns have shown, they commenced operations by arranging a programme for the first concert, and communicating with the members selected to take part in the solo performances of the evening. Among other pieces advertised to be performed on that occasion, was a Septett for wind instruments. Some days after this had been promised to the public by repeated advertisements, and after the parts had been forwarded to the members necessary to its execution, the Council received notice from the first clarionet and the first bassoon that it was not their intention to appear on the first night,—it being well known by advertisement that they had taken engagements elsewhere for that evening. There were other similar desertions from the first rehearsal;—on which occasion the Council decided that being unable to keep faith with the public, by presenting not merely the solo performers but also the orchestra advertised,—the concert should be postponed till the case should be dealt with and the principle on which the society had been founded should once for all be established or repudiated. The orchestral members were accordingly convoked. On their meeting, it appeared that a majority of forty-seven treated the idea of fulfilling their engagements at the Orchestral Concerts, supposing other more immediately profitable engagements were offered to them, as a dream and a hardship. Under such circumstances, the Council of the Orchestral Society had but one honourable course to pursue. This was to decline going before the public under conditions so preposterous and humiliating, and to dissolve the society: which step has been accordingly taken.

On events like the above, comment is almost superfluous. Nobody need sit in judgement on those who prefer immediate gain to the advancement of their art—since such preference of itself classes those that exhibit it. But that a body of musicians after having voluntarily taken upon themselves certain obligations, should at the very commencement of a new enterprise voluntarily violate them, using for pretext a law intended to strengthen, not to weaken the executive powers of the orchestra, and deliberately break faith with the public attracted by their names, speaks unfavourably for the moral tone of the profession. Such an instance is calculated to arm its adversaries with their sharpest weapons of reproach and mistrust. As lovers of the art, we record the premature—but inevitable—dissolution of the Orchestral Society with no ordinary concern.

Original Correspondence.

GREGORIAN CHANTS.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

DEAR SIR,—Pray favour me with space to reply to the letter of "One of the Clergy," who has misunderstood some portions of my letters and misrepresented others. His letter is, I presume, to be viewed as a specimen of the knowledge of music possessed by the clergy, whom he denies to be more deficient on that subject than the laity. As such I will endeavour fairly to discuss the observations and deductions therein contained.

But first of all I beg to state that the observations I offered in the two letters to which "One of the Clergy" takes exception, were not intended to apply to the Clergy generally, as he erroneously supposes; but, as I distinctly stated, to "the advocates" of a "certain movement;" and what I stated might be the animus and ultimate aim of those who were conducting the agitation against the Protestant Church Music and in favour of the Gregorian Chants, "One of the Clergy" has turned into motives attached to such as have adopted them. This violation of my words and meaning is most unfair.

Such a party as that to which I referred, "One of the Clergy" admits does exist; he also allows that the Gregorian Chants are behind the musical taste and feeling of the present; adding, however, that they may still be made a suitable adornment of devotional praise, with the aid of modern harmony.

Is "One of the Clergy" aware of the amount of alteration and deviation from the original, which this adornment of the Gregorian Chants involves, or the doubt as to competent "knowledge" such an admission conveys?

Not many years since it was stated in a court of law,—and the position was admitted to hold good,—that a series of simple notes, could, in themselves possess no copyright or positive identity; because a different accent or different harmony would give them a totally different character. Now all that is original of a Gregorian Chant, (or rather, what is supposed to be), is a few simple notes in themselves unimportant and characterless. To render these tolerable in the present day, they are first harmonized,—harmony of the earliest and rudest kind not being discovered for five centuries after the establishment of the chants themselves; secondly, are phrased or accented,—bars not having been introduced for upwards of a thousand years after the establishment of the chants; and thirdly, they are transposed. Everything in fact is removed, hidden, destroyed, or softened down, that could mark their identity, antiquity, and supposed authenticity; yet in this completely transformed and altered state they are gravely produced and passed off as the veritable Gregorian Chants, although probably no one would experience greater difficulty in recognising them, could he hear them so rendered, than Pope Gregory himself.

Now let me illustrate the amount of absurdity involved in all this by a few parallels. If an historical painter were to produce in sober seriousness, a picture representing the landing of William the Conqueror, mounted on the paddle-box of a Margate steam-boat, his army wearing Albert hats, and carrying double-barrelled percussion guns, it is probable that its author would be considered the least eligible to be elected as president of a society of artists, in consequence of the confusion of historical facts, and dates of inventions presented in his handywork. Or, if a sketch for a proposed church were to be made, wherein features and details dating their rise five hundred or even a thousand years apart, were mixed up together, the draftsman, without doubt, would be considered a most unfit person to be engaged as an ecclesiastical architect. But when the subject becomes that of ecclesiastical music, by some extraordinary hallucination, that very moment all regard to historical accuracy is by some imagined to be a matter of not even the smallest moment or importance. Any amount of chronological absurdity is not only permitted, but, as exhibited by the letter of "One of the Clergy," positively encouraged and defended. The musical caricature and historical jumble which a harmonized, phrased, and transposed Gregorian Chant presents, is not only accepted and approved by "One of the Clergy," but, because the state of musical attainments unfortunately does not enable him to perceive the miserable incongruity, he fancies no one else can or ought to see it; or if they do so by reason of their greater knowledge, and demur at the attempt to force such a musical anomaly upon them, the childish cry must forthwith be raised that they are "bearing hard upon the clergy." Doubt has already too long existed as to whether music is entitled to be considered a high art; and if her historical distinctions and peculiarities are to be remorselessly confused as "One of the Clergy" is prepared to countenance, then an additional doubt as well as a stumbling-block is placed in her path, to impede her proving herself worthy of such distinction.

If "One of the Clergy" really prefers the Gregorian Chants on their own account let him be consistent and adopt them as they were written; they have their historical interests; but if he prefers harmonized chants let him have recourse to the best Anglican chants which are in the highest degree solemn, expressive, and devotional. Above all let him bear in mind that Gregorian chants in the shape he advocates are adaptations. The admission of "adaptations" into the church has done more harm than many are aware of to the cause of true church music; and it will be of little use organists striving to rid the church of them, if "One of the Clergy" and others, are at the same time encouraging the introduction of "cooking" that come under the same category.

Next, "One of the Clergy" takes umbrage at the mention of what was already well known, namely, that there was a ruse mixed up with the late outcry raised in favour of the Gregorian Chants. If the advocates of that revival were really and solely seeking such music as all could join in, music that was at once simple, good, and appropriate, it already existed in the greatest abundance among the Anglican Chants, which, from being written in harmony, would not have involved by their continued use any of the indecorum above pointed out. But, a dead set was made at these, which, although perfect in themselves, were tried to be displaced, and others not perfect in themselves, but requiring an enormous amount of renovation, were attempted to be thrust in their stead. The suppression of the Anglican Chants and the resuscitation of the Gregorians, were not necessary steps towards securing the use of simple and good music in the church, therefore, there must have been some other motive power behind, and if the transportation of the Gregorian Chants, and putting them in the tenor, was not for the purpose of suiting priests' voices, I would beg to enquire why they were revived, put in the tenor, or transposed at all. To say all this was done for the sake of "church music" or the benefit of "the people's voice" is, as I before stated, a mere ruse.

I must abruptly close, for this week, and beg to subscribe myself

Yours, very sincerely,

AN OLD CORRESPONDENT.

THE DOUBLE BASS.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—Will you be so kind as to inform me, in your next week's publication, as to the proper name for the instrument, commonly called double bass.

Yours, T. S.

Bradford, Dec. 9, 1851.

A SUBSCRIBER.

STRAUSS.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—Can you, or any of any of your readers inform me the exact time when Strauss, the composer, died; and what was his age?

Yours, INQUIRER.

Norfolk Crescent, Hyde Park.

BRINLEY RICHARDS AND THE "RECOLLECTIONS OF WALES."

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

MR. EDITOR,—When I tell you that as long as I can remember, I have been possessed with a morbid passion for Welsh rabbits and Welsh airs, you will understand how it happens that I have an itching to mix in a quarrel which does not otherwise concern me.

They say that the quiet looker-on sees more of the game than they who are playing it. If this be so, sir, you will, perhaps, allow me to volunteer my assistance in sorting the hand of one of your correspondents, who seems to think that he holds nothing but trumps.

Sir, I am but a plain thinker, but to me it appears, that the whole quotation turns upon this as a pivot; the two publications in question, are they the same works, or are they two different works?

Now Mr. Macfarren is a fully competent judge in this matter, and moreover has a character to lose. Mr. Macfarren declares in his letter inserted in your last number that the two works are not the same, that they are "dissimilar in every particular." The works then are not the same. The assurance that they are, is to assume that Mr. Macfarren is a fool or a knave, or both.

The next step of the argument assumes that the earlier work may be the better work; and in support of this assumption it is urged that "many poets and composers have considered their first work to be their best." Perhaps they have. But Mr. Brinley Richards does not consider his first work the best.

For truth Mr. Brinley Richards is now ashamed of the earlier work; and entreates the indulgence of the public towards it, as a mere juvenile effusion, written while he was a student. And here, sir, I think I can put you up to something. Ask Mr. Leoni Lee if Brinley Richards did not wait upon him with an offer to re-arrange the earlier work; and if Mr. L. L. did not denounce that work as mere trash, not worth keeping in print, and so dismiss the applicant.

Mr. Brinley Richards therefore, yearning to throw over the melodies of his native land the lustre of his mature talent, had nothing for it but to apply, to another publisher, one, by the way, who had civilly declined to print his earlier effusions, they were not worth it.

It may possibly be a point requiring metaphysical acumen, to determine, in the abstract, what works are new works. For my own part I have not the requisite penetration. Works which he for years in the escritoire of Mr. L. L. may, for aught I know, be new works. But Mr. Brinley Richards's work did not so lie. It was published ten years ago. Is a work which was published ten years ago, a new work? I suppose you say, Mr. Editor, certainly not. So do I.

As to the question about the dedication it is not one for argument. It is a question of fact. Inspect the titles.

The next question is dismissed as easily, viz: Did Mr. Richards perform the "Beauties" in public? First, Mr. Brinley Richards says he did not. Secondly, Mr. Macfarren, pledges his judgment to the effect that he could not, could not, because they were calculated only "for the advancement of little children."

But as we proceed with this curious case, we find Mr. Brinley Richards charged with "plagiarism." Plagiarism is a literary theft, that is stealing an author's thoughts and appropriating them to one's own use. But whose thoughts is Mr. Brinley Richards even supposed to have stolen, but his own? to have picked his own pocket. "Je suis mon voleur," says the Miser in Molière, when he lays hold of his own arm, fancying it to belong to the man who had robbed him.

But with the charge of plagiarism, is connected that of a "flagrant attempt" to injure character; which latter alone induced Mr. L. L., to put himself on his defence. With this before one's eyes, one would hardly suppose, (which is the fact) that Mr. L. L. was the first to begin the contest, which he did by obtruding upon the public a circular which some called defamatory and others called scurrilous, and all upon a matter which the public cared nothing about.

Mr. L. L. very considerably professes himself to be sorry for Mr. Brinley Richards, assuming, no doubt, that the latter gentleman is in a suffering condition. This, to be sure, is very kind of him. But it seems to be sympathy thrown away, for, as far as I can learn by enquiry, Mr. B. R. has nothing at all the matter with him.

As to the courtesy which Mr. Brinley Richards had to expect from his "former patrons" it is no doubt a very perfect thing of its kind. Of this courtesy Mr. L. L.'s published letters may be taken as samples. Still, Mr. Editor, as a plain man, I venture to express my opinion, that he was not well advised, by those who advised him to rush into print with those courteous effusions, and so "damn himself to fame."

As I happen to be neither a musical man nor a lawyer, I cannot pretend to determine anything in a perplexed case like that under consideration, but truth is truth, even from a humble individual like

Your's to command,

A SUBSCRIBER.

Reviews of Music.

"THE STANDARD LYRIC DRAMA," "Die Zauberflöte." Boosey & Co.

The first part of Mozart's great work is published for December. The Zauberflöte will make the tenth volume of the series already issued. We have received, for some time, the ninth volume, Ernani, but have not had time to give it due consideration. The editors, Mr. J. Wrey Mould, and Mr. W. S. Rockstro, in the work before us, follow up their original intentions with diligence and care; indeed, from what has been hitherto effected, "The Standard Lyric Drama" cannot be viewed otherwise than as a great accession to our musical literature. The first number of Die Zauberflöte bears all the impress of the editors' talents and applicability; and we have no doubt the work itself will be as complete and perfect as any of its predecessors. In order to ensure the more regular issue of the forthcoming parts, the publishers have engaged a new staff of engravers, who have commenced their work with the present number. The Messrs. Boosey are, certainly, determined to carry on their operations in the cause of "The Standard Lyric Drama;" and they are entitled to the highest patronage from the public.

"THE AMATEUR INTERLUDIST," being a collection of one hundred and forty-four interludes, and four preludes, in various keys, for organ or harmonium. Composed and selected by EDWARD TRAVIS and J. P. DYER. Leoni Lee and Coxhead.

This is no doubt intended as a companion to the "Amateur Organist," by the same authors, which we have reviewed some time since. This little work will be found very useful to the young organist, as affording him an excellent opportunity of making himself proficient in playing voluntaries; nor will it fail to lend assistance to the more practised organist, who will find, ready to his hand, interludes or preludes suited to any psalm or hymn. The "Amateur Interlist" carries with it its own recommendation.

Foreign.

NEW YORK.—(From the Musical Times, Nov. 22.)—In our last number we mentioned that quite an excitement had been created in the musical circles of our city, by the announcement that Miss Catherine Hayes had broken her engagement with Mr. Beale of London, and thus prevented the parties in this country from carrying out their intended series of concerts in the United States. The facts in few words, as we understand, are these. Miss Hayes made an engagement for her services in America with Thomas F. Beale of London. He subsequently made a new contract to let her out to Mr. J. H. Wardwell of this city, at a large per centage on the contract with Miss Hayes. She appeared in this city under the management of Mr. Wardwell, and gave a most successful series of concerts. From New York they went to Boston, where from various causes the receipts of the concerts were much reduced, and the result of the whole matter was a considerable loss to the contractors here. A proposition was made to annul the contract by payment to Mr. Beale's representative of a large sum of money, and thus release the bond. This offer was at first accepted and then declined. Subsequently a new state of things arose under certain developments made in regard to the terms of contract between Mr. Beale and Mr. Wardwell, and Miss Hayes by the advice of her friends decided to break the engagement with Mr. Beale, and thus disentangle herself from these annoyances. This, of course, prevented Mr. Wardwell from carrying out his arrangements. We are happy to state, however, that Miss Hayes has concluded her engagements directly with Mr. Wardwell, and that they are about commencing a series of concerts, which we doubt not will be equally successful with the first, since the enormous expenses incurred under the former contract are now very materially reduced. We wish them every success in their new relations.

The grand concert at Tripler Hall, on Saturday night, was very successful in everything but numbers. The storm prevented so full an attendance as might have been anticipated, yet there was a very good audience. M. Jaell's performances on the piano were rapturously received. His fantasia from Sonnambula, was encored with universal approbation, as was the Gipsy Polka, whereupon he played the Carnival of Venice, which was also encored, and the performance broken in upon several times, by the enthusiasm of the audience. We shall speak further of Mr. Jaell, after hearing him again. Of Steffanone, Bettini, Badiali, and the other favourites, we need not speak; they filled their parts to the entire satisfaction of the audience, and received a proper meed of praise. Bertucca was received with especial applause, in the Brindisi from Macbeth, which was encored, probably in some measure a special favour from the public, in view of her having sung in the Hayes' Concerts without remuneration. Hauser's violin performances were especially approved and encored. In fact, the concert was a great musical treat, the programme being one of the best ever offered in this city.

The opera of La Bayadere is now being performed at Brougham's Lyceum. Mr. Leach is the primo basso, and Mr. Henry Alleyne is the tenor, while Miss J. Barton makes a very respectable singing Bayadere. The opera is conducted by Mr. George Loder, but even his care cannot make the chorus keep time. The orchestra did well, as in fact they always do at this place. The principal attraction, however, has been the dancing of the Rousset family, who, by boldness and precision, rather than grace, created every night a perfect furor.

Since our last issue but one opera has been represented at the Italian Opera, viz. Maria di Rohan. It has been performed three times, by special request of the subscribers. Although we do not much like this opera, we admire the tact of the manager in giving it so efficient a cast. Badiali, Steffanone, and Bettini, gave a charm to the music which would otherwise have been wanting. The effect of the last trio was electrifying, and won the most rapturous applause.

On Wednesday evening, between the second and third acts of Maria di Rohan, the new celebrity, Mr. Jaell, appeared, and performed variations on the Carnival of Venice, to the great delight of the audience. In power, brilliance and delicacy of execution, we know of none superior to him.

The following is from the Boston Saturday Evening Gazette:—"The N. Y. Tribune says the engagement between Miss Hayes and Beale of London was for several years at thirty thousand dollars annually, either party to pay fifteen thousand dollars forfeit if the contract were broken or not fulfilled. This forfeit Miss Hayes concluded on Thursday last to pay and terminate her connexion with contractors, sub-contractors, hangers on, and puff writers. Wardwell engaged to pay Beale ninety thousand dollars for one year of his contract with Miss H. It is not stated how much the Boston correspondents of a musical journal in New York received for their services in puffing and blackguardism.—Their pay was probably regulated by the oyster and grog bill committee spoken of in the New York Herald."

The Boston papers are just now glorifying Marie Maberlini immensely. She is said to be very beautiful, to possess rare skill with the pencil, to speak in many tongues, and to sing as only Malibran could when in her prime. Her first concert takes place this week, and the Bostonians are being prepared to greet her with due fervour.

Parodi and Patti are soon to appear in New Orleans.

The popularity of Madame Thillon is undiminished. She appeared at Baltimore this week.

In reply to the various speculations, surmises and contradictions afloat respecting the great artiste Madame Sontag and her reported visit to this country, we have it upon the most unquestionable authority that her coming to the United States does not depend upon any contingency whatever, except her own life and health. We have ourselves seen and read the letter of Madame Sontag, signed by herself, in which she accepts the terms offered by the party engaging her, and agrees to arrive in New York during the month of August next. This ought certainly to settle the matter; and we may all "possess our souls in patience"—sure that one of the greatest artists the world ever saw, and in respect to whom there are no drawbacks, no diversities of opinion, will be with us, feeding our hearts with her marvellous melodies, at the commencement of the next season.

It is now positively announced that Alboni, the great, fat, beautiful contralto—the lionne of the coulisses—is preparing to make a visit to this country on her own account. She will indeed be welcome, both as a great artist and a new sensation.

(Day Book, Nov. 22).—What about Griani, Mario, and Carlotta Griani, together with Jullien, the grand and universal?

JENNY LIND arrives in the city this afternoon, and will share the hospitalities of Mr. Howard of the Irving House for a few days. She is on her way to Boston, where she is about to give a series of concerts—reappearing in New York about the middle of December.

Dramatic.

SURREY.—This theatre will positively close on this day week. Macbeth was revived last Monday, with Lock's music. Mr. Creswick, as Macbeth, received a flattering welcome on his return to his post. Miss Poole will take a benefit on Thursday, when she will appear in the The Daughter of the Regiment, and as Tom Tug in The Waterman. Miss Poole is, without doubt, one of the brightest ornaments of the English lyrical stage; and as this is her first benefit, we trust that the public will respond to the appeal by giving the fair artiste a bumper.—Dec. 6th.

SADLER'S WELLS.—The comic muse seems at length to be raising its head in good earnest here. Mr. Phelps, although he has hitherto rather opposed than promoted the production of comedies at Sadler's Wells, is known to be eminently gifted with the vis comica. Macklin's play of The Man of the World has been revived to crowded houses. This comedy, which long enjoyed the esteem of the public, has been but little heard of since the time of the famous George Cooke. It was revived many years ago at Covent Garden for Charles Young, who was only partially successful in it. The character of Sir Pertinax McSycophant, although it belongs to a large class of dramatis personæ, has some peculiar and striking features. Sordid and self-seeking parasite as he is, Sir Pertinax is at least no unconscious and self-deceived hypocrite; for he is not only ready to proclaim his enormities to all from whom he has no interest in hiding them, but ever glories in the avowal, and herein consists the strength as well as originality of the author's sketch. Mr. Phelps's delineation is unquestionably one of his happiest efforts. He gave his son the history of his fortunes, and enforced his principles on him, with a gusto that elicited incessant laughter and applause. After the paternal denunciation of his refractory pupil, at the end of the fourth act, Mr. Phelps was compelled to step forward and bow his acknowledgments. Miss Fitzpatrick played with the graceful vivacity which seems natural to her. The comedy is splendidly appointed. The scene of Sir Pertinax's drawing-room is almost unique for taste and elegance, without gaudiness.—G.

Provincial.

THE ENGLISH GLEE AND MADRIGAL UNION.

READING.—On Monday the 1st instant, the highly gifted company of vocalists, Mrs. Endersohn, Miss M. Williams, Messrs. Lockey, Francis, Land, and H. Phillips, forming the above Union, gave two of their justly celebrated concerts at our Town Hall, which, notwithstanding the severity of the weather, were attended by upwards of 1,400 persons, including the dile of the county and town. From such a combination of melodious voices, we anticipated a treat of no ordinary character, but our expectations were more than realized. It has been reserved for the modern artistes, fully to develop the numberless beauties of the ancient madrigal, and pure glee, which have laid almost silent, and unsung, during the present century. The morning performance opened with Linley's madrigal, "Let me, careless," in which all the voices were charmingly blended, presenting the first of a succession of pastoral delights, and landscape scenes, depicted in strains of delicious music; then followed three beautiful glees; one of which elicited an encore. The duet of "The Water Nymphs," by Mrs. Endersohn and Miss Williams, opened the second part, and was sung with great effect, followed by the ballad, "Oh! wilt thou be my bride, Kath'leen," pathetically delivered by Mr. Land. Mrs. Endersohn displayed much skill and finish in Hobbs's "Bird of the Greenwood." A new song: "You ask me oft if I forget," by Lockey, showed his fine tenor voice to perfection, and gained a unanimous encore. But the crowning achievement of the solo performances, and the one which made the greatest impression on the audience, was Miss M. Williams's song; "When sorrow sleepeth, wake it not!" composed expressly for her, by Mr. Land. The tender and delicate expression which Miss Williams threw into the opening of this sweet melody, riveted the attention of her hearers, her dulcet tones gradually swelled, until she attained the full force of her vocal powers, in the words "triumphant over woe;" and then, with marked, and beautiful contrast, her voice descended into the softest, and most subdued murmur, on the closing line, "When sorrow sleepeth, wake it not!" producing a charming effect, and a repetition was immediately demanded. The scena; "Revenge, Timotheus cries," delivered by Mr. H. Phillips, in his well known emphatic style, closed the second part. The concluding part comprised three glees, one of which; "The Midge's dance," from its pleasing, and sprightly melody, called forth an encore, and John Barnett's quaint and clever madrigal, "Merrily wake music's measure," terminated this most attractive Morning Concert. The Evening Concert.—At a very early period after the opening of the doors, the Town Hall was rapidly filled. The concert commenced with Gibbons's fine madrigal, "The silver swan," (1600) in which the voices blended in rich, and mellowed harmony. Horsley's "By Celia's arbour," followed, and was re-demanded; then came, perhaps the finest specimen of glee writing extant, wedded to Milton's immortal verse, "Blest pair of Syrens," by Stafford Smith, containing such a succession of beauties, that the audience were in silent admiration throughout the whole, and at the close, burst into most rapturous applause. In the second part Mr. Francis, who is one of the most pleasing counter-tenors of the present day, sang with peculiar sweetness and taste, the ballad of "The blooming Rose," and was encored. Miss M. Williams repeated, by particular desire, the gem of the morning selection; "When sorrow sleepeth, wake it not!" and produced an effect quite unrivalled. Webbe's magnificent glee, "When winds breathe soft," terminated this charming concert, in which the wonderful expression of the finely combined voices perfectly enchanted the audience, who at its close, reiterated their hearty plaudits.—Reading Mercury, December 6th.

GLASGOW.—At the Dunlop-street theatre Mr. Sims Reeves and a party of vocalists performed in the Musical Drama during four nights of last week. The operas selected were Sonnambula, Lucia di Lammermoor, and the Bohemian Girl. We have not space sufficient to enter upon such a critique of these performances as we would like. We must, however state that, in our opinion, Mr. Sims Reeves is much improved as an actor, while his fine voice has rather gained than lost in its force and brilliancy since his last appearance in Glasgow. By the way, we think that it would be as well to leave the low comedy part of his performance in the Bohemian Girl to Mr. Delavanti, who sustained the character of "Devil's Hoof," with much ability, though his tambourine accompaniment belonged rather to the "nigger" line of business than opera buffo. Mrs. Sims Reeves, whose voice is light and weak, sustained the parts of Amina and the Bohemian Girl, with considerable grace, though both required more power than she is physically capable of exercising. Mr. Stretton's part in the opera last named was judiciously gone through. The choral party, who are strangers to Glasgow, are well trained, and do their part of the business in an admirable manner. On Saturday evening, however, we observed that the orchestra and the chorus were not so well together as they might have been. In the beginning of one of the choruses the orchestra was a full note before the voices. Mr. Mori, the conductor, soon, however by a few well timed beats of his baton, brought them into accord. We are happy to have it in our power to announce that the operatists are to be with us this week, and we will be glad to be able to mention that they have had larger audiences. Such performances were never offered before on such reasonable terms, and they ought to be better attended.—Glasgow Herald, Dec. 8.

OXFORD.—(From our Correspondent).—Mr. Marshall's concert at the Star, on the 1st instant, was exceedingly well attended, both as to the number and quality of the audience. Mr. Marshall provided his visitors with a good orchestra, and a programme containing a larger infusion of classical music than is usually found at provincial concerts. The vocalists were Miss Dolby and Miss Messent, Messrs. E. Marshall and Whitehouse, the instrumentalists being Signor Regondi (concertina), and Mr. E. Marshall (flute). Miss Dolby and Miss Messent were the rival—or rather the twin stars of the evening, each receiving an encore almost every time she stepped into the orchestra. In the first act Miss Messent gave Flotow's air from Stradella, "Bear witness of my blissful feeling." Flotow does not possess in general much of the vis musica. This aria however is elegant and expressive, especially the last movement. Miss Messent did the whole of it ample justice, and was loudly applauded, although it was hardly fair to give her such lack-a-daisical verses to sing. Miss Dolby was encored in Meyerbeer's "Nobil Signor," and in Linley's ballad "Ida." If the words of this song, which contain several graceful lines, are by the composer, they are creditable to his poetic muse. Attwood's trio "The Curfew" followed, and was encored. We must not omit a solo on the concertina by Signor Regondi, who is unquestionably the greatest living performer on this instrument, if that be any consequence.

In the second act, Miss Messent delivered Weber's song "Long I've watched," and, aided by Mr. E. Marshall's flute accompaniment, in spite of the halting verses, obtained an encore for it. After a similar honour had been conferred successively on Mr. E. Marshall and Mr. Whitehouse, and Mendelssohn's "Wedding March," our native queen of the choirs, Miss Dolby, again stepped forward and delivered a ballad of Mr. Marshall's with the deep and round feeling peculiar to her, and in the call for a repetition, substituted "Bonnie Dundee." The admiration of the Oxonians for the fair twin stars of the evening was not yet exhausted. Miss Messent was afterwards called on for a repetition of Mr. Glover's pretty song "Gipsy Jane," and substituting the quaint Scotch "Gin a Bodie," gave the audience such a pleasant taste of her archness and vivacity, that she was also compelled to repeat the latter song. The spirit with which the concert went off, and the crowded state of the room, give favorable augury for the approaching winter season here.

Miscellaneous.

CITY OF LONDON LITERARY AND SCIENTIFIC INSTITUTION, ALDESGATE STREET.—(From a Correspondent).—An Amateur performance of the Messiah, was given in the theatre of the above Institution on Monday Evening, Dec. 1st, to celebrate the 7th Anniversary of the United Tradesman's Benefit Society, the Concert being given for the purpose of forming the basis of a superannuating fund, for its aged and decayed members. Upon no occasion since the opening of the Institute, has so large a mass assembled, above 900 persons being present, on the above evening. The chorus and band consisted of about 200 performers. The principal vocalists were Miss Eppy, Miss Roper, Mr. Wallis, Mr. Smith and Mr. Crome. Leader, Mr. Perkins, Trumpet, Mr. Ward, jun., and Conductor, Mr. Coventry. The Orchestra, built expressly for this occasion, deserves especial notice, for its very beautiful and novel appearance. It was designed and executed by one of the society's members, Mr. James Elliott, who, we understand, gave his very valuable and masterly services gratis, to further the interests of the society. To understand well the effect produced we here give a description of the orchestra as well as we are able without a drawing. Upon being viewed from the audience portion of the theatre, the orchestra appeared as if built of oak wood, beautifully carved in relief; but in reality it was only a highly finished painted and paper decoration in the strict gothic order. On the wall at the back was placed an oak painted screen, divided into sixteen panels, the ground of the panels being crimson, each panel containing a shield painted in proper Heraldic colours, every shield being different. Before this screen was placed an Organ case so nicely painted that when an Harmonium was placed in the recess left for the keys—and which was performed upon in a very masterly manner by Mr. Hoskins, Musical Professor, one of the Editors of the "New Theory of Music on the Gene-phonic System,"—no person in the audience could detect it from a real organ; it was one of those deceptions very rarely met with. The galleries on each side were also divided the same as the back, the front of the orchestra being precisely similar. The Conductor's box was one panel elegantly painted and the centre of which contained the arms of the City of London, surmounted in gold letters, by the motto, "Domine dirige nos;" on the frieze at the back also appeared in gold letters on each side of the organ, this motto, "Cast me not off in the time of old age; forsake me not when my strength faileth." The orchestra when lit up and full, was very beautiful, and this short explanation can convey but a slight idea of its novel appearance. The Solos and Choruses were very well rendered, the "Hallelujah" being redemanded. Another new feature in concert performance, which we have not heard before, was that after the Oratorio the Doxology "Praise God from whom &c." was sung by the four principal vocalists, accompanied by the organist only, and afterwards by the whole band, chorus and audience standing. Its effect can only be compared to the June meeting of the school children in St. Paul's. We sincerely hope the concert realized the object for which it was given.

EXETER HALL.—The first of a series of entertainments, entitled, "Illustrations of the National Music of England," were given on Thursday evening. The vocalists were Miss Dolby, Miss Louise Pyne, Miss M. Williams, and Mr. Swift. The gentleman made a very respectable debut, and sang "By Celia's Arbor" with great applause. Several madrigals were sung, and choruses, together with the usual compliment of solos for the stars. The concert passed off well, and the Hall was tolerably well attended.

MR. ELLA, the enterprising director of the Musical Union, is about to announce a series of six "Musical Winter Evenings," at Willis's Rooms. They commence on the 15th of January, and will be given fortnightly.

MR. WOOLGAR, father to Miss Woolgar, the popular actress of the Adelphi, has presented a farce to Mr. Webster for his approval. The piece is said to be of unusual excellence.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A SUBSCRIBER.—The gentleman's address is, we believe, 69, Great Portland Street.

JULLIEN'S CONCERTS.

THE BAL MASQUE.

We have this moment come from the fairy splendours of Drury Lane, "dazzled and drunk with beauty." It is the small hours, and the early waits call, or should call, "past 5 o'clock." We have little inclination to write, and less power to concentrate our mind upon fugitive criticism, after the fiery ordeals through which we have passed. We seem as though we had gone through the Eleusinian Mysteries, and penetrated into their most secret adyta. Our brain reels, our senses fail, our eyes grow dim, our hand trembles. Nay, reader, smile not! What, if we have supped with Mr. Gye in his private salon and drank freely of his champagne, can that account for this "wreck of matters and this crush of worlds," or this "crush of matter and this wreck of worlds," or this "crush of worlds and this wreck of matter," we quote Addison—Cato, my boy—but are not positive as to the collocation of the words? Sooner than write a line under such circumstances, we would have thrown our gold pen—Mordaunt's—into the fire—no, fire-place—and gone home in a Hansom cab. But what can we do? A column has been left blank—the printer's devil has waited up for the consummation of our article—we are to write about Jullien's masqued ball, and are entreated to say something new.

Something new about Jullien's masqued ball! The only decided novelties we saw at the ball were the Bloomers, who swarmed like bees in the spring time, but their novelty soon died away, and we had to fall back upon raptures of the olden times. What boots it to describe the fairy decorations, and the golden splendours which grew beneath the wand of the magician, hight, Sir Gye? What boots it to write roundly of cupids, flowers, muslin, lace, carpets, festoonery, upholstery, and the emanations of taste? What boots it to dedicate delicate dreamings to general effects, lights and shades, tonings, contrasts, brilliancies, reflections, refractions, and all the prismatic refulgence of the crystal curtain—never more refulgent, or more crystal than now; or what need to expend time, labour, and expletives on what every one has seen, and every one knows?

The Bloomers predominated; but their numbers did not materially interfere with the rich variety of dresses and appointments we were accustomed to see on such Jullien-carnival occasions. Here were captains of all regiments and of no regiments; naval officers of the line and out of all line; pretenders to all periods and no periods; dumb imitators of the drama; silent pleaders; representatives of the middle ages, old and young—these were all of the sex male, no lady being desirous of belonging to the middle age; bearded, semi-bearded, and beardless warriors, tinned as to head and body, booted, spurred, and accoutred; together with Esquimaux, Cherokees, Calmucks, Cossacks, Tartars, Negroes, Red Americans, Yankees, Hindoos, Greeks, Turks, Maltese, Arabs, Chinese, Persians, Indians, Burmese, Romans, Swiss, Dutch, Swedes, New Zealanders, Otaheitan, Jews, Spaniards, Scotch, no Irish—not admitted, by particular desire—Welsh, Italians, Bohemians, Australasians, Mexicans, Hottentots, Caffirs, Malays, Circassians, Hungarians, Russians, Prussians, Poles, Danes, Norsemen, Hanoverians, Brunwickers, Kamschatkans, Caucasians, Egyptians, Syrians, Mahomedans, and Frenchmen of all grades, classes, and ranks, Red-republicans having the advantage. Here were ladies of Piccadilian celebrity, squired by gents, periodically amorous, jubilant, bibulant, and lavish of pounds; light of head, loose of heel, and doubtful in the midst. Here were literaturists, savagely grand, unmasked and in undress, standing aloof, appe-rently without the least anger, looking on with eyes of condescension, as who should say, "We are the lords, and these be our pastimes! We shall not drown them in our ink, nor spit them on our goose quills! We shall have mercy! Very charming! How do you, old fellow?" Here were men about town, young aspirants for roaring fame, superenjoyous, resilient, and rotatory, making havoc among the dancers, heedless of all, divinely intent upon themselves, and ignorant of the days of the week! Here were middle-aged young boys, late of dinner, port-filled, pot-bellied, high-collared, thin coated, loud, swaggering, self-important, and vivaciously inclined to the allurements of Venus, looking thorough masks and under skirts, peering at lapet holes, mentally measuring circumferences, winking at ankles and sighing at neckties! Here were—but soft—my space is nearly filled, and I have no room for another line! Here, boy! Confound the fellow, he is fast asleep.

Advertisements.

SONGS OF FRANCE,

BY CHARLES GOUNOD. The words by Celebrated French Poets, and imitated in English, by H. P. CHORLEY, Nos. 1 to 6. Price, 2s. each.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent-street, and 67, Conduit Street.

PIANOFORTES.

MESSRS. RUST & STAHL, in calling the attention of Pianists and the Trade to their unique instruments, beg to intimate that they have just completed arrangements for the manufacturing of the upright pianos only, viz., the Piccolo and Cottage; hence they are enabled to give their undivided attention to this now almost universal class of instruments, which, combined with the terms to meet the present exigencies of the times, small profits and quick returns, will place their pianofortes beyond the possibility of competition. To this they need only add that their instruments combine all the modern improvements, and are made of the best seasoned materials, are warranted, and may be exchanged free of expense if not found to be in every respect perfect. Drawings and lists of prices forwarded post free.

Rust and Stahl, 320, Regent-street. Manufactory, Edwards' Yard, Edward-street.

HERE IS YOUR REMEDY!

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.

A MOST miraculous Cure of Bad legs, after 43 years' suffering.—Extract of a Letter from Mr. William Galpin, of 70, Saint Mary's-street, Weymouth, dated May 15th, 1861. To Professor Holloway, Sir,—At the age of 18 my wife (who is now 61) caught a violent cold, which settled in her legs, and ever since that time they have been more or less sore, and greatly inflamed. Her agonies were distracting, and for months together she was deprived entirely of rest and sleep. Every remedy that medical men advised was tried, but without effect; her health suffered severely, and the state of her legs was terrible. I had often read your Advertisements, and advised her to try your Pills and Ointment; and, as a last resource, after every other remedy had proved useless, she consented to do so. She commenced six weeks ago, and, strange to relate, is now in good health. Her legs are painless, without seam or scar, and her sleep sound and undisturbed. Could you have witnessed the sufferings of my wife during the last 43 years, and contrast them with her present enjoyment of health, you would indeed feel delighted in having been the means of so greatly alleviating the sufferings of a fellow creature. (Signed) WILLIAM GALPIN.

The Pills should be used conjointly with the Ointment in most of the following cases:—

Bad Legs	Coco Bay	Contracted and	Lumbago	Scurvy
Bad Breasts	Chiego-foot	Stiff Joints	Pilus	Sore-heads
Burns	Chilblains	Elephantiasis	Rheumatism	Tumours
Bunions	Chapped hands	Fistulas	Scalds	Ulcers
Bite of Mosche-	Corns (Soft)	Gout	Sore Nipples	Wounds
toes and Sand-	Cancers	Glandular Swell-	Sore-throats	Yaws
Flies		ings	Skin-diseases

Sold by the Proprietor, 244, Strand, (near Temple Bar,) London; and by all respectable Vendors of Patent Medicines throughout the Civilized World, in Pots and boxes, at 1s. 10d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 22s., and 33s. each. There is a very considerable saving in taking the larger sizes.

N. B.—Directions for the guidance of Patients are affixed to each Pot or Box.

MUSIC FOR THE ORGAN OR HARMONIUM.

THE AMATEUR ORGANIST—a collection of soft and full Voluntaries, arranged in six Books, 3s. each, by EDWARD TRAVIS, and may be had elegantly bound, price 18s. "Mr. Travis has introduced to the musical world a new and interesting work for the Organ or Harmonium, under the title of 'The Amateur Organist.' Mr. Travis has availed himself of an extensive and classical music library, and selected with great taste the most beautiful morceaux of the great masters, Foreign and English. To lovers of classical music this work will be found to be the most superb selection that has ever issued from the musical press."—Vide Musical Review.

THE AMATEUR INTERLUDIST—a collection of short Interludes to play between the Verses of the Psalms, in one Book, price 4s. by EDWARD TRAVIS and J. P. DYER.

THE AMATEUR PRELUDIST—a collection of Preludes, with the Organ Stops carefully marked, in one Book, price 4s., by E. TRAVIS.

SACRED VOCAL MUSIC.

KELLER'S Collection of ANTHEMS, CHURCH SERVICES, CHANTS, &c., arranged for the Voice and Piano, in six Books, price 3s. each, with six beautiful and appropriate designs by Brandard, arranged by ALBERT KELLER. The six Books can be had in one Volume, elegantly bound, price 18s.

THE PSALMODIA BRITANNICA—a selection of Psalms and Hymns for the Voice and Organ, in six Books, price 3s. each, arranged by EDWIN FLOOD, and may be had in one Volume, neatly bound, price 18s. London: LEE & COXHEAD, 48, Albemarle-street, and can be had of all Book and Musiciansellers.

N.B.—A New Edition of "Hark, the Sabbath Bells," by Edwin Flood.

PIANOFORTES FOR HIRE AT REDUCED PRICES.

ECONOMY being at all times commendable, Messrs. ROUSSELOT and Co. have established a new system for Hiring Pianofortes, including the tuning once a month, which presents not only a great saving, but also the advantage of having the instrument regularly kept in tune. Pianofortes, sold, exchanged, and repaired. For particulars apply to Rousselet and Co., 68, Conduit-street, Regent-street.

Now published,

AN ANTHEM FOR CHRISTMAS-DAY,

COMPOSED by G. W. MORGAN, Organist of South Hackney Church, and late Assistant of Gloucester Cathedral. Price 2s. 6d., Single Vocal Parts, 2s.

Just Published, a new National Anthem;

GOD SAVE THE QUEEN,

THE Words written by JONAS MALDEN, Esq., M.D., the Music composed and arranged by JABEZ JONES (late of the Cathedral Choir and Organist of St. Nicholas Church, Worcester), by whom it is most respectfully inscribed with permission to the Very Reverend John Peel, D.D., Dean of Worcester. Price 1s. 6d., Single Vocal Parts, 1s.

Persons wishing to have the Music as performed by the London Sacred Harmonic Society, should order Surman's Exeter Hall Edition, Office, No. 3, Exeter Hall. The Public and Choral Societies are cautioned against purchasing spurious and pirated copies of the Exeter Hall editions of the Oratorios. Mr. Surman's publications may be obtained of all respectable Music or Booksellers, and are sent in the country post paid or carriage free by enclosing the amount in post-office orders or postage stamps. The proper allowance to the trade and profession. Catalogues gratis.

BLACKWOOD & CO.'S REGISTERED MUSIC FILE.

THIS new and useful invention is designed to supersede the old portfolio. It will be found the most convenient article yet introduced for holding and preserving from dust unbound music. To be had of all Musiciansellers, and Wholesale at the Manufactory, 26, Long Acre, London.

AUCTION ROOMS FOR THESALE OF LITERARY PROPERTY, 191 PICCADILLY.

ESTABLISHED 1794.

MESSRS. PUTTICK and SIMPSON, in compliance with numerous requisitions upon the subject, beg to announce their intention to hold their sales of

MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS

for the future, periodically. The first of such sales to take place on WEDNESDAY, January 7th, 1853, and to be continued on or about the 5th of every successive month.

MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS of any kind can be received, or the descriptions may be forwarded, not later than the 25th of the month preceding the sale; and parcels of MUSIC, in large or small quantity, must be transmitted by that date, in order to their proper description and insertion in the Catalogues.

Collectors who do not regularly receive Messrs. P. and S.'s Catalogues of Musical property may have them on application.

WILHELM KUHE'S LA CORBEILLE DE FLEURS,

VALSE de Salon, and GALOP di BRAVURA. The most successful pieces of this popular composer. Campbell, Ransford, and Co., 53, New Bond-street.

BEAUTIES OF CAMBRIA,

By BRINLEY RICHARDS.

CONTAINING:—

- No. 1, The Live Long Night,
- " 2, Margaret's Daughter,
- " 3, The Ash Grove,
- " 4, Sweet Richard,
- " 5, Lady Owen's Delight,
- " 6, March of the Men of Harlech;

THE PRINCE OF CAMBRIA'S BAND MARCH.

Price 2s. each.

The "Beauties of Cambria," by Brinley Richards, were first performed by the author at an Annual Festival of the Cambrian Society of Ancient Britons on St. David's Day, at the Freemason's Tavern. The delight and enthusiasm which these national melodies produced on the company were immense. The "Prince of Cambria's Band March," by the author of "The Beauties of Cambria," threw the company into a state amounting to delirium. The Melodies were dedicated by permission to His Grace the Duke of Newcastle, by whose kind patronage this talented Ancient Briton became a student of the Royal Academy of Music, where he gained the honour of being elected a King's Scholar.

LEE and COXHEAD, 48, Albemarle-street.

Just published, price 18s.,

M. D'ALBERT'S PRESENTATION ALBUM FOR 1852.

CONTAINING a great variety of new Waltzes, Quadrilles, Polkas, &c.; and produced in a style to render it the most elegant and attractive musical price or present yet published.

D'ALBERT'S EDINBURGH QUADRILLE, price 3s.—Just published, the third edition of this, the best Quadrille on Scotch airs ever written.—"M. D'Albert has chosen airs that have not been hacknied, and has nevertheless produced the most inspiring quadrille on Scotch airs we have yet seen; as a right merry set it is unequalled." Musical Review.—Solos, 2s.; duets, 4s.; full orchestra parts, 5s.

D'ALBERT'S FAUST and DEW-DROP WALTZES, performed with enormous success by Coote's band at Her Majesty's State Ball, and since at all the great balls in London and the provinces. "These waltzes are perfectly different in style, but each a gem of its kind." Price 4s. solos and duets; full orchestra parts, 5s.

D'ALBERT'S NEWEST POLKAS.—Just published,

The Bloomer Mania Polka	2s. 6d.
The Kosuth Polka	2s. 6d.
The Holstein Polka	2s. 6d.
The Garland Polka	2s. 6d.
The Ladies' Polka	2s. 6d.
L'Enfant Polka	3s. 0d.

The above Polkas are beautifully illustrated by Brandard, and promise to exceed in popularity all the celebrated works of this highly popular composer; also to be had as duets and for full orchestra.

M. D'ALBERT'S POPULAR MUSIC.—New editions, beautifully illustrated, of the following favourite Quadrilles, Waltzes, &c.:—The Cherbourg Quadrille, the Paris Quadrille on French airs, Edinburgh on Scotch airs, Grenada on Spanish airs, Naples on Neapolitan airs, each 3s. The Bride's Polka, 2s.; Garland Polka, 3s.; Linnet Polka, 3s.; Coquette, Helena, and Bridal Polkas, each 3s. The Fairest of the Fair Waltz, 4s.; Star of the Night Waltz, 4s.; Margarita Waltz, 4s.; Queen of the Ball, 4s.; and the celebrated Hungarian or "New Schottisch," 2s. 6d. "The above are the gems of M. D'Albert's compositions."

The most favourite of the above works are also arranged by Mr. Tutton for a full military band.

Chappell, 50, New Bond-street.

NEW PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

SLOPER'S Studies, in two books	each	4s. 0d.
Do. do. complete	8s. 0d.
PRAEGER ... Libussa	2s. 6d.
PRAEGER ... Le Feu Follet	3s. 0d.
WALLACE ... La Grace	3s. 0d.
WALLACE ... Bohemian Melody	3s. 0d.
WALLACE ... Music Murmuring in the Trees	3s. 0d.
SILAS ... Amaranth	3s. 6d.

Cramer, Beale and Co., 301, Regent-street.

SOUVENIRS MUSICALES DE L'EXPOSITION.

LA PERLE DE L'EXPOSITION, Composed by Magnus; and performed by him nearly five hundred times on Erard's Grand Piano, in the main east avenue of the Crystal Palace. Price 2s. 6d.

FAREWELL TO THE EXHIBITION, the popular Air, composed by Ferdinand Sommer, and performed by him on the Sommerphone, in the Great Exhibition, arranged for the Piano, and beautifully illustrated with Portraits of the Royal Family and Herr Sommer, as performed before Her Majesty, by Command, on the 14th of October. Price 2s.

THE GREEK SLAVE, Ballad, illustrated with a beautiful Picture of the exquisite Statue. Price 2s. 6d.

London: Jewell and Letchford, 17, Soho-square.
Post free for Stamps.

NEW MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

ROBERT COCKS & Co., LONDON,
NEW BURLINGTON STREET.

BRINLEY RICHARDS'S

RECOLLECTIONS OF WALES.

Welsh Airs, price 3s. each, arranged in an elegant and modern style.

- | | |
|------------------------------|-------------------------------------|
| No. 1, Poor Mary Anne, | No. 4, March of the Men of Harlech. |
| " 2, The Ash Grove, | " 5, Of Noble Race was Shenkin. |
| " 3, The Rising of the Lark, | |

(To be continued.)

" It seems that some ten or a dozen years ago, when Mr. Richards was a student, he published some simple arrangements of our Welsh airs, which are as totally different from the splendid compositions entitled "Recollections of Wales" as light is from darkness."—Vide 'Carmarthen Journal,' Nov. 23, 1851.

NEW PIANO MUSIC BY JULES SCHULHOFF.

CHANT DU BERGER, 2s.; Dans les Montagnes, 2s.; Danse Rustique, 2s.; 3 Idylles, Set 1, 5s.; 3 id. to, Set 2, 4s.; Galop di Bravura, 4s.; Chanson des Paysans Bohèmes, 3s.; Souvenir de la Grand Bretagne, 5s.; Cantabile, 2s.; Souvenir de Vienne, 2s.; Sérénade Espagnol, 3s.; Minuet and Trio, from Mozart's Symphony in E flat, 3s.; Souvenir de Varsovie, Mazurka, 2s.; Carnaval de Venise, 4s.; &c., &c.

N.B.—In a few days will be published, another work by this admired composer.

NEW PIANOFORTE MUSIC BY T. OESTEN.

CHEERFUL INSTRUCTIONS, Easy Dances and Marches, fingered for small hands, books 1 and 2, each 2s.; Fantaisies, on favourite themes, from Grisar's opera, Les Porcherons, 4s.; a Casket of the most favourite operatic, national, and dance music, 2s.; Soirées Elysées: Danses de Concert—No. 1, Galop di Bravura; No. 2, Valse Elegante; No. 3, Polka Brillante; No. 4, Mazurka de Salon; No. 5, Polonaise brillante; No. 6, Boléro; No. 7, Valse brillante; No. 8, Tarantelle; each 3s. When the Swallows hasten home, 2s. 6d.; Die Lustigen Weiber von Windsor, by Nicolini, 2s. 6d.; Three Legend Fantaisies: No. 1, Legends of Gipsies; No. 2, Legends of Love; No. 3, Legends of Fairies, each 3s.; Variations on Weber's Preciosa, 2s. 6d.; Der Wilschütz, by Lörising, 2s.; Fantasia on the Froischütz, 3s.; Fantasia on Norma, 2s.; L'Elève Avancé, two instructive Rondos, each 3s.; P. ries de l'Opéra, twelve elegant pieces on favourite operatic themes, each 2s.; Petites Allemandes, six elegant Fantaisies on favourite German airs, each 2s. 6d.; Temple of Flowers, six pleasing and instructive Sonatinas for small hands, each 2s. 6d.; &c. New MSS. by Herr Oesten are in course of publication. All the above are the exclusive copyright of Robert Cocks and Co.

NEW PIANO MUSIC BY OSCAR COMETTANT.

MARCH BOHEMIAN, Spanish Chant, Les Rayons et les Ombres, St. Patrick's Day, La Brabançonne, La Marseillaise, God Preserve the Emperor, Russian Hymn, Christina Polka, La Fée des Nuits Polka, Exhibition Polka, Souvenir des Gisors, L'Aériette Etude, Schottische, La Vision Redowa, Carnaval de Venise, Fantasia Orientale, God Save the Queen, Rule Britannia, La Chinoise Etude, Exhibition Galop, Eoline Etude, Petits Oiseaux, 8 Valses Elegantes, Gabrielle, Etude de Vitesse. Each 2s., 2s. 6d., and 3s.

NEW PIANO MUSIC BY GUTMANN.

BALLADE, Op. 19, 4s.; 7th Nocturne, Op. 20, 2s. 6d.; Polonaise brillante, Op. 21, 4s.; Marche Hongroise, Op. 22, 2s.; Au bord du Ruissseau, Op. 17, 3s.; Pendant la Valse, valse, 3s.; Nocturne Barcarolle, 2s. 6d.; two Mazurkas, 2s.; two Nocturnes, 2s. 6d.; two Marches, 2s.; Cambourgy Valse, 2s.; two Nocturnes, Op. 13, 3s.; two Mazurkas, Op. 14, 3s.

TO BE HAD GRATIS,

A CATALOGUE THÉMATIQUE of all BEETHOVEN'S Works.

London: ROBERT COCKS and Co., New Burlington-street, Publishers to the Queen.

LINDSAY SLOPER'S

EDITION OF PIANOFORTE WORKS.

ALREADY Published:—No. 1, L'Absence, by F. David, 3s. No. 2, Reverie, by F. David, 2s. No. 3, Souvenir de Reissager, by F. Beyer, 2s. 6d. No. 4, Valse Brillante, by Burgmüller, 3s. No. 5, Valse de Salon, by A. Thomas, 2s. No. 6, Krüger's Lust March, by F. Beyer, 2s. 6d. No. 7, Le Torrent, by Marchallion, 2s. 6d. No. 8, Air and Variations, in F major, by Mozart, 2s. No. 9, Air and Variations, in A major, by Mozart, 3s. 6d. No. 10, Air and Variations, in G major, by Beethoven, 2s. No. 11, Reverie, in G, by Rossellen, 2s. No. 12, La Figlia del Reggimento, by E. Wolff, 3s. No. 13, Notturmo, by Commettant, 2s. No. 14, La Femme du Martin, by Kalckbrenner, 2s. 6d. To be continued.

Campbell, Ransford, and Co., 58, New Bond-street.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY,

EXETER HALL.

CONDUCTOR, MR. COSTA.—On TUESDAY, 23rd December, Handel's MESSIAH. Vocalists—Miss Birch, Miss Dolby, Mr. Lockey, and Mr. H. Phillips. The Orchestra, the most extensive in Exeter Hall, will consist of (including 15 double basses) nearly 700 performers. Subscriptions may be paid, and tickets obtained at the Society's office, 6, in Exeter Hall, any day from 10 till 5, also on Tuesday evenings during the rehearsal, from 7 till 10. Terms of subscription:—Central reserved seats numbered, £3 3s.; reserved seats, area or gallery, £2 2s.; body of the hall, £1 1s.—per annum. Tickets, 3s., 5s., and 10s. 6d. 6, Exeter-hall, Dec. 12, 1851.

Subscribers now entering will be entitled to double tickets for this performance.

LONDON SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY,

EXETER HALL.

ON MONDAY, December 22, 1851, Handel's Oratorio, MESSIAH. The Oratorio will be preceded by the new Christmas Anthem composed by G.W. Morgan. Vocalists—Mrs. Sunderland, Mrs. Temple, Miss Dolby, Mr. Lockey, and Mr. H. Phillips. The Band and Chorus will consist of 800 performers. Conductor, Mr. Surman, Founder of the Exeter Hall Oratorios. The Subscription to the Society is—£1 ls. per annum, or, for Reserved Seats, £3 2s. Subscribers joining previous to the 22nd of December will be entitled to Four Tickets, and Reserved Seat Subscribers a splendid copy of the oratorio.

THE ENGLISH GLEE AND MADRIGAL UNION.

(UNDER THE PATRONAGE OF HER MOST GRACIOUS MAJESTY).

MRS. Endersohn, Miss M. Williams, Mr. Lockey, Mr. Francis, Mr. Land, and Mr. H. Phillips, will give CONCERTS at Croydon, Dec. 15; Leicester, 16th; Derby, morning and evening, 17th; Town Hall, Birmingham, 18th; and Stourbridge, 19th. E. LAND, Hon. Sec. 8, Foley-place, London.

MISS DOLBY

HAS the honor to announce that the LAST of her ANNUAL SERIES of THREE SOIRÉES MUSICALES will take place at her residence, 2, Hinde-street, Manchester-square, on TUESDAY, the 16th inst., to commence at Eight o'clock precisely. Miss Dolby will be assisted by eminent vocal and instrumental artists. Tickets, half-a-Guinea each, to be had of Miss Dolby only.

Just published,

HERBST BLAETTER,

(FALLING LEAVES), new Valses for the Pianoforte, composed by ELIZABETH STEVENSON. Also the favourite Polka, "The Fairy Queen," by the same Composer. Messrs. Leader and Cock, 63, New Bond-street.

CHRISTMAS PRESENTS.

BOOSEY'S New Edition of the Opera, LA SONNAMBULA, complete and perfect for the Pianoforte Solo, beautifully engraved and printed in a handsome vol. (illuminated covers, gilt edges, &c.), price 5s. Also the same work in a wrapper, 4s. Orders must state which Edition is required. T. Boosey and Co., 28, Holles-street.

WHEN SORROW SLEEPETH, WAKE IT NOT.

SUNG by Miss M. Williams, with distinguished applause, at the concerts of the English Glee and Madrigal Union. The Words by M. A. STODART; the Music composed by E. LAND. 2s. Also, by the same composer, "The Vesper Dream," 2s., which gained the prize (1851) awarded by the Melodist Club. London, Addison and Hollier; Manchester, Hime and Addison.

SAX MILITARY BAND INSTRUMENTS.

COUNCIL MEDAL, July 10s, 1725. Messrs. ROUSSELOT & Co. beg to announce that being the representatives of the eminent inventor of the Sax Horns, who has gained the sole Council Medal for the Military Band Instruments, they are able to provide purchasers with genuine Sax Horns, French Horns, Trombones, Cornets with or without the patent slides, &c., at moderate prices. The admitted Instruments from the Exhibition are now on view at 66, Conduit-street. List of prices forwarded on application. London, Rousselet and Co., 66, Conduit-street, Regent-street.

Printed and Published for the Proprietor by MICHAEL SAMUEL MYERS, of No. 3, Studley Villas, Studley Road Clapham Road, in the parish of Lambeth, at the office of MYERS & Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, in the parish of St. Paul, where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed, post paid. To be had of G. Parkes, Dean Street, 8-10; Allen, Warwick Lane; Vickers, Holywell Street, and at all Booksellers.—Saturday, December 13, 1851.

The Musical World.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s.; Half year, 8s.; Three Months, 4s.; (Stamped Copies 1s. per Quarter extra.) Payable in advance, to be forwarded by Money Order, to the Publishers, Myers & Co., 22, Tavistock-st., Covent Garden.

No. 51.—VOL. XXIX.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 20, 1851.

Price Fourpence.
Stamped Fivepence.

THE OPERA AT DRURY LANE.

We have good news for our readers—good news for the public. There will be an opera at Drury Lane, and, thanks to Mr. Bunn's enterprise, ingenuity, and perseverance, there is every prospect that it will prove an attractive and a complete opera. We had our doubts that Mr. Bunn would have been enabled to constitute a company important enough for so large a theatre as Drury Lane, and indeed, we happened to know that Mr. Bunn himself had despaired of doing so not long since; but, within the last two months, he has made such good use of his eyes and ears, and, be it said, of his pen also, that he has formed, we are assured, a first-rate cohort of vocalists, chorus, and band.

Among the singers already mentioned we may point to the names of Mr. and Mrs. Sims Reeves, Madame Garcia—a fair cantatrice, who has lately created a sensation in the musical circles, but whence her name derived we know not—Miss Priscilla Horton, and Mr. Whitworth, as worthy of Mr. Bunn's great establishment, and his lofty undertaking. A French tenor of high repute, whose name has not transpired, query, Roger? is also spoken of as likely to commence the operatic season with Robert the Devil. Great preparations are, we hear, being made for the production of Meyerbeer's chef d'œuvre. Donizetti's Lucrezia Borgia is also, we understand, to be brought out with completeness and splendour, and will include in the cast, Madame Garcia, Miss P. Horton, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Mr. Whitworth.

Superficial thinkers may be led to conclude that Mr. Bunn acts with bad policy, in producing those works with which the public have already been surfeited at Her Majesty's Theatre and the Royal Italian Opera. But Mr. Bunn sees farther and knows more than these short-sighted individuals. He sees that the same class of people are not likely to visit Drury Lane, which patronised the Italian Operas; that English singers and operas in English have always had their section of supporters in the Metropolis; and that, even to the surfeited and the habitués of the operas, Mr. Bunn's theatre will prove, in no small degree, attractive, as it provides the greatest of all charms—novelty.

But still better news have we for our readers—better news for the public. Mr. Bunn has engaged Mr. George A. Macfarren to write a new opera, and Mr. George A. Macfarren is hard at work on a romantic libretto by John Oxenford. We have always had the greatest faith in Mr. George

A. Macfarren, as our most illustrious native composer; and in Mr. John Oxenford we put no less confidence and hope, as an accomplished poet, a wit, a scholar, and philosopher. In both we fix our utmost anticipations, not the less disinterestedly, seeing that they are numbered among the contributors to the Musical World. We hear also, by the way, that Balfe has completed an original opera, for Drury Lane, and that Mr. Frank Mori is involved in another. Balfe's music will, no doubt, be wedded to Mr. Bunn's poetry, or, more properly, re-wedded, and Mr. Bunn will, no doubt, choose one of those thrilling incidents of history or romance which erst engaged his pen and called forth his glowing numbers. Of Mr. Frank Mori we entertain the highest expectations. His music is replete with tune, and he shows the accomplished musician in all his writings. We shall be greatly mistaken if Mr. Frank Mori's first opera produced does not create an unusual sensation. In Fridolin, the new Cantata of Mr. Mori, and other works of his submitted to us, we espied a high dramatic colouring, and, more desirable still, a self-dependence, which demonstrated that the young composer had subjected himself to the trammels of no particular school; that he was influenced by no school; that he thought for himself and the world about him; and marched on with the times. These are the aspirations of genius, such as have influenced all original thinkers, from Mozart and Beethoven, to Auber and Meyerbeer.

If Mr. Bunn, in one season, be able to produce three original works, by three native composers, he will set aside for ever the vexed question of a "National Opera," and establish Drury Lane as the true "English Opera," which is exactly what we require. We trust and hope the public will support Mr. Bunn in his new undertaking. Now is the time to ascertain how far they will go to uphold their own artists, and their own composers, without, at the same time, directing their anathemas against all foreign products and producers.

Furthermore, by way of news, we may state that Signor Schira is engaged by Mr. Bunn, as conductor, and Mr. Lovell Phillips, as chorus master. The engagement of these two gentlemen, in their different capacities, is highly satisfactory, and will prove, in no small degree, beneficial to the interests of the opera.

The theatre will open, on boxing night, with a tragedy and a new pantomime. For the latter, we are pleased to announces, that the prince of burlesquists, W. H. Payne, is engaged, and has had a part expressly written for him.

We shall watch over the interests of Drury Lane with a shrewd eye, and a wishful mind. May its success satisfy our longings, and may Mr. Buan smile placidly every Saturday, at pay hour.

MUSIC AT MANCHESTER.

(From our own Correspondent.)

On Tuesday, the 11th instant, we were at the Theatre Royal, on the occasion of Mr. Chas. F. Anthony's benefit, when Mr. E. Loder's characteristic and excellent opera of the Night Dancers was given "for the last time this season." We were sorry to see so very moderate a house. The pit was pretty full, but no other part was half filled; and at such very low prices as galleries, 6d.; pit, 1s.; upper circle, 1s. 6d.; dress circle, 2s. 6d.; nothing less than a crowded house can leave any profit to the beneficiaire. The dress circle we were most disappointed about. The attendance of another hundred or two of Mr. Anthony's numerous friends and acquaintances here would have done him some good, and made all the difference. The performances were unequal; a considerable display of talent on the whole, but a short coming in some instances, which deteriorates materially from the general effect. We must, in the first place, give credit to the management, and all concerned, for the way the instrumental and choral adjuncts to the opera were supplied. No doubt some degree of this attaches to the composer, Mr. Loder; being himself there to conduct, he would naturally be anxious that the orchestra, if small, should be efficient and complete, as far as practicable. The excellence of the choral portion of the business we must attribute entirely to the efforts of the choral master, and beneficiaire, Mr. Charles Anthony. Both band and chorus deserve high praise, and if the principal singers had been equally good and efficient, Mr. Loder would have had as perfect a performance of his clever opera, as he could hope to have in the provinces; and Mr. Anthony would have furnished a high treat to his musical friends. Miss Isaacs is always pleasing, and more than respectable, both in her acting and singing; if she does not quite create a furor, she never offends. The music of Giselle's part is somewhat high for her voice; yet she delivered the whole of it very nicely. She looked the part charmingly; if anything, perhaps somewhat too stout to realize the idea of a bride turned wili; but we always like Miss Isaacs in whatever she undertakes. Mr. Allen's acting, as Albert, and his conception of the way in which the music of his part should be delivered, was as good as ever. Not so the voice, however, which has in some measure fallen away; yet Mr. Allen is still a young man; his taste and his management enable him to conceal its defects, and to render his performance superior, after all, to some tenors with more robust chest voice. Mr. Summers made the first display of inefficiency in Godfrey the miller's song, "Laugh my girl's," and he does not seem to have ever had a voice. Mr. Whitworth, on the other hand, possesses a very good one, and surprised us no little by the display of humour he gave us in Friar Colin; a part so totally opposite to the gentlemanly role of baritone or bass parts we have hitherto been accustomed to see him in—Count Rudolpho, Count Arnheim, &c. &c. He really did his part admirably, and sang his portion of the music better than we ever before heard it. There were no shortcomings in Mr. Whitworth's performance. Miss S. Kenneth sang the part of Mary, and acted it too very fairly. The less important parts of the Duke, and Bertha, were inefficiently represented; the first by Signor Gregorio; the second by a Madame Cherici. We could not tell one word the Duke said or sang, or in what language. Madame Cherici's voice appeared to us soft and sweet, but to want power for the area of the Theatre. In the lovely duet with Albert, "Peace to the dead!" this was painfully apparent. We could not help the comparison with the effect produced by Miss Sara Flower, in the same duet, with Allen, some four or five years ago. Allen came nearest his former excellence in the air "Wake from thy tomb, Giselle." After this the whole of the beautiful music of the wili, and the dances, were exquisitely given by the band, with a harp added to the orchestra. The female choristers, and coryphæes, the pretty chorus especially, "Pace, pace around the bed," went very well, with all the concert music which follows with Giselle, Corella, Astra, and Unda. Miss Isaacs deserves a special remark for her air, "What new delightful being's this?" and Mr. Whitworth's "Pretty sprites" was equally good. Mr. Allen and Miss Isaacs gave a finished effect to the close of the dream or wili portion of the opera by the admirable manner in which they gave together the duet, "Thou hast called," and with which Miss Isaacs gave Giselle's air, "Ah! no, you'll not forget me quite." With another word of praise to the latter, for her "Ave Maria," we must bring our somewhat long notice of this delightful opera to a close. There was some very clever dancing by the Le Clerq family, afterwards, in a ballet divertissement called "Halloween." Miss Le Clerq and her younger brother are exceedingly talented and graceful; they elicited the warmest applause of the night. An amusing farce, called Make your Will, prolonged the performance too much by half an hour, in which Mr. Wood certainly out-heroded Herod, and caused great laughter by his burlesque buffoonery—acting it cannot be called.

MESSES. F. AND E. MOLLENHAUERS' CONCERT PROGRAMME.

Adagio et rondo Russe for violin—Mr. F. Mollenhauer	De Beriot
Song—Miss Stott—"The Mermaid's Cave,"	Horn
Pianoforte solo—Mr. C. Hallé—Fantasia on Themes from the opera "Don Juan,"	Thalberg
Song—Miss Stott—"The Garland,"	Mendelssohn
Grand duo concertante for two violins—Messrs. F. and E. Mollenhauer	Mollenhauer
Rondo brillant for violin—Mr. E. Mollenhauer	Mollenhauer
Violoncello solo—Herr Lidel—Les Arpèges on le Tremolo, sur un thème de Beethoven	Kummer
Ballad—Miss Stott—"When Night Elves dance,"	Lee
Pianoforte solo—Mr. Hallé—Lieder ohne Worte,	Mendelssohn
Grand duo (Burlesque) for two violins—Messrs. F. and E. Mollenhauer—"Carnaval de Venise,"	Paganini

The above concert came off very successfully on the evening of Friday the 18th instant. Although not so full as at Hallé's concerts, the Town Hall room was fairly filled by a highly respectable audience. This is a good deal to say, the brothers Mollenhauer being almost strangers in Manchester. Still they have previously been heard, not only by the subscribers to Hallé's concerts, but at the Concert Hall, (as a private or undress concert,) and at the Concert for the People at the Free Trade Hall on the previous Monday. Mr. F. Mollenhauer opened the concert with an adagio and rondo on a Russian theme by De Beriot, which he played in masterly style, overcoming all the difficulties with artistic effect. He was ably accompanied by our young contra-bassist, Mr. Waud, who no doubt has been a pupil at the Royal Academy, where every player, on whatever instrument almost, must learn the pianoforte as well. And we may as well remark here that he accompanied all the pieces during the concert, of course excepting Charles Hallé's. The two brothers appeared at the close of the first part in a duo concertante for two violins of their own composition. We are not learned enough in string solo works to pronounce upon it as a work of art; but as a piece calculated to display the talent of the two brothers playing together in concert, we can pronounce it to be admirably written for the purpose. Their duet performances are very clever indeed. There is that simultaneousness of bowing and of piano-forte expression that is seldom arrived at, except by the constant opportunity of practice together afforded to members of the same family. Their duet was much and deservedly applauded. The younger brother, Mr. E. Mollenhauer, opened the second part with a rondo of his own, in which he again showed even greater mastery over all the difficulties of the instrument than his brother, with greater purity of tone, if not greater power. His harmonies were very clear and certain. His clever performance was most heartily received. The last piece the brother played was that poor unfortunate "Carnaval de Venise," which for the last twenty years (and in an increased ratio the last ten) has been so much attacked by violinists. It is no little credit to the brothers Mollenhauer, that in their harmonised version for two violins, they give a more pleasing effect than many we have heard of late on this too hacknied subject. We have purposely alluded first to the performances of the concert-givers;—we must now do justice to their able and kind assistants. Hallé gave us in the middle of the first part a very brilliant performance of Thalberg's Fantasia, or Themes from Don Juan, which we enjoyed very much, especially the last—the ball-room scene—where in the opera three distinct movements are going on at the same time. It is only such players as Charles Hallé can do justice to such a piece. Few but he or Thalberg could make a subject like the minuet stand out so amidst such a flood of sounds as rushes from their hands, from end to end of the piano-forte. We nevertheless prefer hearing Hallé in a Sonata of Beethoven's. In the second part he gave us three of Mendelssohn's inimitable "Songs without words," chosen as varied in style as possible, and played most exquisitely. Lidel was not so happy in the choice of his solo—a piece of Kummer's arrangement for the violoncello—the subject being the well-known "Tremolo," from Beethoven, a minor sonata for violin and pianoforte. He gave out the lovely motivo very sweetly indeed, but the variations and arpeggios, &c., afterwards, were mere displays of the performer's mastery over the most difficult passages, without any corresponding or compensating beauty in them. Miss Stott gave three songs during the evening, which, from timidity, or some other cause, were ineffective, although her voice seems to deserve a better success. On the whole the Messrs. Mollenhauer's concert passed off satisfactorily both to them and the audience. The Guardian had a long critique on Saturday on Mr. Seymour's first quartet concert for the season on the 11th instant, in which Mr. Perring gets warmly praised; but the critic still speaks of Perring's "fine voice" being "inchoate and inceptive, rather than positive and actual." The concert was highly successful, it appears. We were at Anthony's Benefit, so could not be present. In our last article a slight inaccuracy occurs, which we must have a line of space to correct. Speaking of Hallé's being the originator in Manchester of the class of entertainment his concerts belong to we are most unaccountably made to call them vocal entertainments. They are essentially pianoforte performances, more than anything else. We have had chamber music here for years before Hallé appeared amongst us. To Messrs. Seymour and Rudersdorf belongs the merit of introducing chamber concerts into Manchester: but theirs were essentially for stringed instruments—quartet concerts, in which the introduction of the pianoforte was the exception, not the rule. Hallé's, on the contrary, always contain a sonata—generally of Beethoven—with other minor pianoforte solos, and the quartet for stringed instruments without pianoforte is rarely introduced. The vocalities at both are quite a secondary matter, and neither can be alluded to as vocal entertainments. In speaking of Onslow's sextet, "There was a passage for the whole six crescendo united" should be "crescendo until it became a most powerful forte," &c. The enthusiastic applause awarded to Hallé—"he must have felt from its rarity," not variety. "The next concert is fixed for the 18th instant," and not the 8th. Again we must apologise for our own ill-gibility causing these slips.

THEATRE ITALIEN, PARIS.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

Dec. 13, 1851.

MY DEAR SIR,—According to your desire, I here write you the full particulars of my adventures on Thursday week.

Having an appointment with M. Solomée, the Regisseur of the Theatre de la Gaitée, I left home about half-past ten o'clock, and taking a voiture de remise, arrived without any obstacle on the Boulevard du Temple. I found all the shops closed, and very few people in the street, except in front of the seven theatres; before each, except the Opera National, there was a knot of persons, which I recognized as the companies of each theatre. They had very long faces, and seemed anxiously waiting the result of the day, to know if they played at night, having been obliged (in consequence of the military occupying the Boulevards) to close the previous evening. I had not been with M. Solomée ten minutes, when I received from my cabman (whom I had told to go round and wait for me at the stage door in the Rue Basse) a message that he could not wait long for me, as all carriages were escaping in consequence of the barricades having commenced in the Faubourgs St. Martin and St. Denis; and he thereby ran the chance of having his cab taken for one. In about ten minutes I had finished my business and descended into the street, but no cab to be found; it was gone. Having a heavy parcel of books with me, I got one of the Garçons de Theatre to carry them. I set off in search of another cab. Arrived on the Boulevards, we found an open coupée; but when the driver heard where we wanted to go (as he would have to cross the Rue St. Denis and St. Martin before he could get there) he declined, but on my offering him five francs, he said he would try to get to the Theatre Italien by taking a long round-about way. I and the man from the theatre got into the cab, and we started off down the Rue du Temple. We had, however, not gone two hundred yards, when we were met by several persons, who motioned us back. We turned round, crossed the Boulevards again, and went down the Faubourg du Temple. Here we met again the same reception. At this the cabman became very alarmed, and requested me to get out; but after a few encouraging words, and the promise of an extra franc, I persuaded my man to make a bold dash down the Boulevards. We again started off, but having arrived at the Theatre de l'Ambigu Comique, we met several cabs driving furiously. This was a settler for our man, who, turning round to me, declined my company and my six francs, and as soon as we had got out, he turned round and galloped off. Matters were becoming very interesting, and never having seen a barricade in my life, and as there were no signs of military for the moment, I determined to take a peep into the Faubourg St. Denis. On hearing this my companion refused to accompany me, and telling me he would carry my books to the theatre, left me. Taking a back street, I soon arrived at about the centre of the Faubourg St. Martin. Here every shop was closed, but every window occupied watching the progress of a barricade just commenced, consisting of an upset cart and a long ladder, which reached across the street—the crowd was very great. I stood for a moment watching the work, when a respectable old man came up to me, and said in a low voice, "Monsieur, ctez donc vos gants ; ne voyez vous pas ou ctez." I looked at the old man for a moment, not understanding his meaning ; but on remarking that I seemed to be the object of observation to several persons around me, I found that, in fact, I looked rather too respectable for the company in which I was ; and fearing to be taken for an aristot, as they call them, I made off ; besides, at this moment there was a cry that the troops were advancing, and everybody took to his legs. I crossed the Faubourgs St. Denis and Poissonnière without anything worthy of notice, except meeting several horses and drivers without coaches (no doubt by having been taken for barricades). When I arrived at the theatre, about one o'clock, I found that Gunco was ill and could not sing. After some little delay, Mr. Lumley settled on playing Semiramide ; letters were immediately sent round to all the artists, but in about an hour Mr. Lumley receives a letter from Mad. Barbieri Nini, in which she says that she is blockaded by the military, and it would be impossible to get out. I, however, promised Mr. Lumley that I would arrange the matter, and wrote a letter to her, in which I told her there was no danger, and that I would myself come and fetch her in a carriage : but when I wanted to send it off, it was impossible to find a messenger to carry it ; our men blankly refused to cross the Boulevards, it being occupied by the troops. Seeing no other chance, I started off myself to the Rue de Provence, where Mad. B. Nini resided. Arriving at the Boulevards, I found it as the men had said ; but through the kindness of an officer, to whom I made myself known (having luckily placed my pass in the morning in my pocket), I got safe across the Boulevards, and arrived at Mad. Barbieri Nini, who, after a great deal of persuasion, promised to sing. I now started off to return to the theatre. I wanted to go down the Rue Grange Batelière, but was prevented, it being occupied by the troops ; I therefore took the Rue Lepelletier, and had just arrived opposite the entrance of the Grand Opera, when I heard, as I thought behind me, a discharge of musketry (it came from the Rue Grange Batelière). I, and several gentlemen round me, took to our legs, and ran towards the Boulevards ; but at that very moment we heard another discharge on the Boulevards, and the lancers who were stationed there were thrown for a moment into disorder. I was just about to enter a chemist's shop which was being closed hastily by the owner, when down came a fire on us from the pistols of the lancers (who, seeing us running towards them, had no doubt mistaken us for insurgents, as they had just been fired on from the Boulevards, some persons say from the very street in which we were). The chemist, who was by my side, and to whom I was just about to speak, fell dead at my feet with a bullet in the head. This rather staggered me for the moment, and taking a few steps back, I had the luck to see a portecochere (No. 11), which they were just closing, into which I threw myself. The door was hardly closed, when down came another volley (from where I cannot tell). I and several gentlemen were most kindly asked up stairs by a lady and gentleman in the first floor, where we remained about half an hour, till all seemed quiet, when the other gentlemen left ; but I remained some short time longer, finding I had unconsciously found my way into the house in which Pardini lived, to whom I paid a visit, and then, taking the back streets till I arrived at the Chaussée d'Antin, was able to cross again the Boulevards and arrive at the theatre, which I now found deserted, and a relache announced ; but what amused me was the false rumours that were running, namely, that the Boulevards des Italiens were entirely destroyed. I got safe home about seven o'clock, and so ended my day's adventure. The next morning I went to the City Bergère, to see the poor devils that had paid for their curiosity with their lives, and also to have a peep, on the Boulevard Montmartre, at the house that had been peppered the day before by the cannon.

Truly yours,

A. HARRIS.

SPANISH MUSIC.

It would lead to an interesting as well as a useful disquisition, to inquire how it has happened that different musical instruments have become allied with the customs of different nations. The harp may be said to belong to Ireland, the bagpipes to Scotland, the flute to Germany, the violin to Italy, and the guitar to Spain. The high-born Spanish maiden still delights in this harmonious instrument ; the soldier takes it with him on his march, and into the camp ; the muleteer cheers his way over the mountains with its sound ! the carriers take it with them in their covered waggons ; the barber has one hung up in his shop, with which he amuses himself while waiting for a customer ; through every class, from the highest to the lowest, it is preserved with affectionate feelings ; it is the symbol of love, the consoler of care, and equally suited to the movements of the fandango and the bolero, as to the sweetness of Spanish song ; or rather the dance and the ballad have followed in their figure and tone, the genius of the guitar.

Hence the music of Spain bears a character quite original. The simple air, heard without the harmonies in the chords of the guitar, would seem to a foreigner to possess little merit. There are, indeed, some old airs of Spain which every nation must admire ; but, generally speaking, they are pretty, rather than powerful, and they depend a good deal upon the spirit and taste of the performer for their effect. The fandangoes, boleros, and rigadoons, are gay and peculiarly pleasing when well executed on the guitar, and the time marked by the motions of the dancers, and the blithe sounds of the castanets. These observations, however, chiefly apply to what may be called the ancient music of Spain, as compared with recent compositions. Beautiful as many portions of that music may be, there are none of them superior, nor perhaps equal, in point of melody, to some of the new patriotic compositions. There is a fire, and at the same time a tenderness, in the best pieces, which, whatever becomes of the constitution, promise them immortality.

I was detained a full hour one day in the streets, listening to two itinerant musicians performing a war song. One of them sung the air and played it at the same time on the violin, while his companion sung also and performed the accompaniment on the guitar. Both were blind, and neither sung nor played with much skill, and yet it was surprising how much effect they threw into the words of the song.—The air had occasional bursts of grandeur, which animated their sightless countenances with a flush of inspiration. In the intervals between the verses, the leader recited passages from a prose rhapsody, the object of which was to rouse the Spaniards to the remembrance of those injuries which France inflicted on the Peninsula during the late war, to flatter them with the event of the contest, and to bid them bind on their swords for the extermination of the approaching invaders. One would be surprised at the attention with which these two bards were listened to. Tears glistened frequently in the eyes of those who were crowded around them.

NATIONAL ENGLISH OPERA.

(From a Correspondent.)

In resuming the somewhat sad and worn subject of a National Opera, (for I am given to understand all hopes of old Drury are again at an end,) I shall place in juxtaposition the outlay that will be inevitable for the well-doing of the enterprise, and that which is necessary to secure its ruin. It is not difficult to write down a mass of figures, exhibiting a possible result, but it is very often distasteful, and therefore not easy, to obtain an unprejudiced calculation, to throw aside all unjust leaning in favour of our child. But if we commence by cheating ourselves, we shall not surely spare others. Bygone errors must be looked full in the face, and experience allowed its due weight. The most destructive mistake that has characterised former managements has been, I firmly believe, not so much in a reckless expenditure "in toto," as in the entire absence of a just discrimination in the laying out of certain sums. Where they were not wanted, there were they wasted, and when a real emergency occurred and funds were absolutely necessary, it was discovered they had been used up, and clean eaten away by trifles. The treasury had been exhausted for nothing, perchance in a gorgeous pageant, put together to insure a lingering death to a new thing, yclept an opera, and which, by dint of the said pageant's bolstering, had died in great agony of consumption, in lieu of apoplexy, surviving some half-dozen nights with a frightful loss to the management. This has been more or less the case pretty often, and future entrepreneurs, if they mean to keep a balance at their bankers, must be taught by example, and be as wary of their funds as their reputations. Not that I imagine any one but a fool would squander a shilling, if he thought sixpence would answer the purpose equally well. That is not the point at all. A musical or theatrical director may be judicious and politic to a degree in his own judgment, and yet, from an utter want of musical capability and practical knowledge of such matters, may destroy both his scheme and himself, either by a lavish outlay on absurdities, or a parsimonious neglect of important matters. Thus, we must not allow our chorus to be shorn of ten voices, that some half hundred extra crimson and gold banners may be added to the half hundred stock lot, nor is it an evidence of musical taste, that revolving wheels of blazing light, or roses with practical petals, bringing forth at will tiny fairies, or that springless vehicles of splendid hues, dragged by our old cream-coloured friend, who has done the Massaniello business for years past, or that a gaily-clad and interminable quantity of "retainers," should necessitate the placing of our orchestral acquaintances, "Smith," "Jones," and "Wiggins," on the reduced list. No, if we aim at establishing good music, we must first turn our attention to all requirements in that department, and then look to other details, which, although highly necessary, most undoubtedly hold second rank in importance. It is the principal singers, conductor, orchestra, and chorus, that have the first claim by a good bit. That granted, we may talk to our painters, machinists, &c., with advantage. The "mise en scene" is an excellent climax, but a very bad keystone, and notwithstanding my partiality to startling surprises and beauty of effect, waving ensigns, gorgeous banquets, lightning, and cannon, I should as soon dream of attending an opera, in the expectation of seeing such auxiliaries the principal attraction, as I should of hearing Messrs. Bruton and J. W. Sharpe sing a duet in an oratorio. Ears before eyes in a national opera, or we shall have Mr. Batty beating us with our own weapons over the water. The money must be spent when and where it is really wanted, and plenty of it too, if it can be got at by honest hook or crook.

Again,—we must especially eschew enormous rents, a cannibal staff of useless hangers-on; nor should we allow ourselves to be such abject creatures of necessity, ridden over roughshod by Prima Donna "Mademoiselle La Grippe," or Primo Tenore Robusto "Signor Catarrh," who by their quips and cranks, their influenzas, rheumatisms, and thousand and one fancies, will cause anger and disappointment to our patrons, and death to our project.

I am of opinion our work should be commenced in a moderately sized house, I would rather have it too small than too large. It would be ridiculous to think of entering upon an establishment that requires a whole host of supernumeraries in each department to keep it going. When Madame Vestris first took the Olympic, goodness knows how little either the house itself or the locale had to do with her success. The excellence of the acting, the completeness with which the pieces were put upon the stage, were the grand secrets of her prosperity. "Prestige" is a great deal, "locale" a great deal also, but both of them will be thrown away, unless backed up by the more important particulars urged above.

Complaint has been rendered by many, of the dearth of native talent, and the great difficulty of collecting home materials for the proper working out our undertaking. But this is not true, and if it were, who could wonder? A baker would be an uncommonly clever fellow to find means of existence, if people took it into their heads not to eat bread. And how is a poor devil of a musician to do so, if his countrymen refuse to support his trade? He comes into the world with as keen, if not a keener appetite than most folks, and requires to eat, drink, and clothe himself, and very like a family to boot. Besides which, if we deny our soil proper nourishment, how in the name of sense can we expect valuable productions to spring forth? But whether or no, the accusation I speak of is mainly false, got up, and chiefly propagated, by the fashionable amateur, who has been educated too highly, and judged too deeply, to risk his musical character (?) amongst the "haut ton," by turning a vulgar Protectionist. It is almost an insult to the profession to offer any instruction to such gentlemen,—to tell them, how that we have artistes amongst us, that are much more than good, second only to some one or two, and immeasurably superior to three-fourths of those foreign importations they are so mad to hear and applaud; but then, alas, on the contra, I get worsted. They do, I must even confess it, come of English stock. They are capable of eating roast beef, and drinking London stout. There is nothing delightfully ravissante and naughty in the female characters, little that is pale-faced, mustachiod, and wicked about the males. Well, well, it's a true bill, but withal a satisfactory one, and we must fain do our "possible" without such serious recommendations. But that there is abundant talent both in the vocal and instrumental departments, cannot for a moment be questioned, and I would, in illustration of this fact, mention the following artistes, without intending the slightest disparagement to any others, whose names do not immediately occur to me.

Sopranos.—Mesdames Clara Novello, and Sims Reeves; Miss C. Hayes, Louisa Pyne, Birch, Bassano.

Mezzo Sopranos and Contraltos.—Miss Dolby, Martha Williams, Miran, Fanny Huddart, and Poole.

Tenors.—Sims Reeves, Lockey, Harrison, Allen, Travers, Benson.

Barytones and Basses.—Weiss, Whitworth, Henry Phillips, Frank Bodda, Stretton, Lawler, A. Braham.

In the orchestral department we are stronger yet. The two great houses would necessarily thin our choice, but there would be plenty of able men left standing almost idle in the marketplace.

I subjoin a list composed exclusively of Englishmen, for the benefit of the fashionable and talented sceptic above mentioned, and I would invite him, in return, to name a phalanx of sixty foreigners in any one way superior if so efficient as my corps. I do not of course think of, much less talk about, individual merit. I only allude to general efficiency for orchestral purposes.

1st Violins—H. Blagrove (principal), V. Collins, H. Cooper, Dando, Day, Patey, Thirlwall, Willy. 2nd Violins—Watkins, W. Blagrove, Browne, H. Griesbach, Jay, J. Loder, Marshall, Mori. Tenors—Hill, R. Blagrove, Calkin, Glanville, Hughes, Ernst, Webb, Westlake. Violoncellos—Lucas, G. Collins, Guest, Hancock, Hatton, W. Loder, W. L. Phillips, Thorley. Double-basses—Howell, Castell, Mount, Percival, Pratten, Rowland, Russell, Severn. Clarionets—Lazarus, Maycock. Oboes—Nicholson, Horton. Flutes—Richardson, King. Bassoons—Winterbottom, Larkin. Horns—Jarrett, Calcott, Harper, Shaw. Trumpets—T. Harper, Davis. Trombones—Winterbottom, King, Smithie. Drums—Chipp. Bass Drums and Cymbals—Horton. Side Drum and Triangle—Hughes, junior.

Composers are abundant enough in all conscience, if they will only make up their minds to render good assistance; but what I said in my last paper about artistes, is in every way applicable to many gentlemen of this class. They must put aside all petty differences and prejudices such; tomfoolery is suicidal to the cause and themselves, and utterly unworthy their talent. Bishop, Balfe, Macfarren, Loder, Wallace, Barnett, Mori, Horsley, were all in the land of the living a few days since, and have each and all talent enough to make twenty times a fortune, if bona fide merit was the great passport to success. Would it were!

Of the chorus we need say nothing, for the sad unemployed abundance in this line, is patent to every musician.

It has been said that there are men, monied and influential, who, could they see any prospect of this national scheme coming to a head, would render valuable assistance; nor do I believe this to be an idle assertion, but the facts of the case stand thus: There have been so many enterprises nipped in the bud, begun, very probably, with a good spirit and intention, but unadvisedly withal; so many that have been entered upon by men whose incapability of management has been their least error, to use a mild term, and so much of folly and deceit employed to keep their heads above water, that honest men get frightened, and prefer to wait and see what comes of it before lending their names and interest in its behalf. This is one of a number of difficulties to be got over; for until we can in a great measure remove this feeling, we cannot look for much pecuniary assistance at the starting post.

In my next and final communication, I shall again speak of a government grant, and probably suggest a modus operandi for the setting it on foot. I shall also state my humble opinion as to what ought to be the nightly average cost of a National Opera in every way worthy of its name, entering somewhat into detail with each separate expense, such as rent, principal singers, orchestra, etc.: to put forth on the opposite sheet what I conceive to be a probable, not merely a possible result.

H. L. C.

Dramatic.

HAYMARKET.—On Tuesday the 9th ult., a new comedy was produced here, entitled The Man at Law. The Man at Law, Monsieur Destournelles (Mr. Webster) has been rejected by a haughty, scheming, woman of the ancien régime, Madame de Vaubert (Mrs. Sterling), and in order to be revenged, determines to overthrow the plots which he knows she has been hatching for her own aggrandisement, and which are all directed to one point—the marriage of her brother Raoul (Mr. Leigh Murray), with Helen de la Leiglière (Miss A. Vining). This marriage will, of course, by connecting the two families, cause all the property of the Marquis de la Leiglière (Mr. Lambert) to fall eventually to Raoul, and the Baroness will then share in her brother's good fortune. It appears, however, that the Marquis has not a particularly good right to the estates that he calls his own. At the period of the revolution, these estates, which belonged to the Marquis's ancestors, have been confiscated and come into the possession of one of the people who has purchased them with the fruits of his long labours. On the return of the Marquis to France, at the restoration, the Baroness has persuaded the old plebeian purchaser, who is dead at the commencement of the piece, to will away his acquisition to the Marquis, under the supposition that his son, the young plebeian, Bernard, (Mr. Howe) is supposed to have been killed at the battle of Moskowa. This, however, Destournelles finds out is not the case, and being well aware, that by the code, Bernard's father had not the right thus to disinherit his son, selects the young soldier as the means of his revenge, by undertaking the prosecution of his claims against the Marquis for the restitution of his property. But Destournelles finds he has a wily antagonist in the Baroness, who so completely gains over the heart of the frank, unsuspecting Bernard by her hearty welcome, and works on his feelings so effectually through his love for Mademoiselle de la Leiglière, that he becomes completely entangled in her meshes, and totally oblivious of his just claims. Destournelles is on the point of being beaten, when he is struck by a sudden idea. He may vanquish the Baroness with her own weapons. Why should not Bernard marry Mademoiselle de la Leiglière? for Destournelles is aware that she loves the gallant officer. He determines that he shall. Nichts gewaght, nichts gewonnen, as the Germans say. He accordingly sets his wits to work, and after a hard fought battle, overcomes the aristocratic prejudices of the old Marquis, who manifests a most noble reluctance to give up ease and affluence, and prefers that the blood of the La Leiglières should run warmly, although tainted by a plebeian admixture, than freeze untainted in aristocratic poverty.

The great merit of this piece, which is an adaption from Mademoiselle de la Leiglière, produced some time since at the Théâtre Français, consists in its exquisite delineation of character, and the elegance of its dialogue. We have no doubt that these qualities existed in the French piece, but to re-produce them, especially the last, in an English dress, is a task which requires almost as much talent as to create an original work, and which, in this case, has been most successfully accomplished by Mr. Webster, who is entitled to the highest praise.

The characters were all most admirably filled—nothing could be better than the Baroness of Mrs. Sterling, or more touching and gentle than Miss H. Vining, as Mademoiselle de la Leiglière. The character of Bernard, the frank, open-hearted soldier, is one that is especially fitted for Mr. Howe. We wish we could say as much for that of Raoul, which fell to the lot of Mr. Leigh Murray. It is the most insignificant in the whole piece, and afforded but a very poor opportunity for those talents which have raised Mr. Leigh Murray to the high position he deservedly occupies. Such, however, is the force of talent, that this gentleman managed to produce two or three very beautiful effects even from the namby-pamby rôle of Raoul. The gem of the comedy, however, was the performance of Monsieur Destournelles by Mr. Webster. We certainly think it is one of his very best parts, and those who are acquainted with Mr. Webster's talent, will understand how much this phrase is meant to convey.

The applause was unanimous and long protracted on Mr Webster's announcing, when summoned before the curtain that the Man at Law was from his own pen.

The brothers Brough have taken, as a subject for their Christmas extravaganza at this house, one of Count Anthony Hamilton's fairy tales, the Story of Mayflower. The piece opens with a prologue, in which Count Hamilton, in propria persona, apologising for the usually intricate nature of his plots, volunteers his assistance in introducing some of the principal characters to the audience, and explaining some of the leading features of the play. This he accordingly does in a parody on "The house that Jack built." The story then commences. Seated in state within the glittering walls of his barley-sugar palace, we find Hardbake the Great, King of Candy. (Mr. J. Bland, of course), surrounded by his courtiers, Lord Albert Rock, Count Vanille, Lord Bullseye, &c. It appears that the Princess Radiant (Mrs. L. S. Buckingham), the daughter of this illustrious monarch, has the misfortune to be so extremely beautiful, and to possess eyes of such dazzling lustre, as to kill or blind whoever looks at her. The nation is, in consequence, in the deepest distress; the returns of "killed and blinded" are getting every day more alarming. Fortunately, however, Prince Bullfinch (Mrs. Fitzwilliam), travelling under the assumed name of Pooh-Pooh, in quest of his lost brother, Prince Phoenix, arrives at the Court of Candy. He immediately undertakes the task of procuring a remedy for the princess's eyes, and, instructed by the fairy Serena, the good genius of the piece, starts for the residence of the witch Dentata (Mr. Buckstone), the evil genius, whom he is to deprive of three things which Serena demands as the price of the charm which will restore tranquillity to Candy. These three requisites are,—first, a beautiful maiden, named Mayflower (Miss Collins), kept a prisoner by the witch, and destined to marry her deformed son; secondly, a magical mare; and thirdly, a magical hat. Aided by Mayflower, with whom he falls immediately in love, Pooh-Pooh succeeds in running off with her, as well as the other treasures of which he has been in search; and with the flight of the lovers and the despair of the witch, the first act ends.

In the second act, however, we find affairs in a sad condition. Dentata, who has arrived at the Court of Candy, disguised as a Bloomer lecturer, has effected a coup d'état. She has roused not only the Princess Radiant, but all the female population, to a sense of woman's rights, and habited as Amazons, they have carried the town by storm. Pooh-Pooh and Mayflower, arriving at the outskirts of the city on their way to the fairy Serena, the latter is made prisoner by Dentata's Amazonian guards. Meanwhile, Prince Phoenix, who we are informed in the first act has been changed by Dentata into a parrot, for refusing to marry her, has arrived (still in feathered guise) at the Court, but unhappily for Dentata, who has not yet given up hopes of obtaining him, he has fallen in love with Radiant. To remove this obstacle are all her intrigues directed. She therefore wishes the Princess to marry Pooh Pooh, but then his affection for Mayflower interferes. To break off this, Dentata works a spell which changes the lovely Mayflower into a wrinkled and decrepid old woman, and subsequently causes her apparently to die. Pooh-Pooh's love is, however, proof even against this last trial, and though believing her dead, he still resolutely refuses to marry any other than Mayflower. In vain the King, who has been reinstated in power by a re-active movement, got up by Pooh-Pooh, implores him to marry his now harmless daughter. Pooh-Pooh is firm, and the fairy Serena, arriving in the midst of the discussion, rewards his constancy by restoring his beloved Mayflower to youth and beauty, and at the same time changing the parrot into the dashing Prince Phoenix's original form. Of course, the two pairs of lovers are united.

OLYMPIC.—During the last week, this theatre has been doing very good business. The bill of fare offered to Mr. Farren's patrons consisted of Lucile, Faint Heart never won Fair Lady, Plots for Petticoats, and The Love Man of the Ocean.

We have seen a great many actresses fill the part of the juvenile monarch, Charles of Spain, in the second of the above-named pieces, but we never beheld a prettier one than Miss Louisa Howard, whose appearance was such as to bring down a hearty round of applause as soon as she made her entry on the stage. We can hardly imagine a more fascinating and handsome young stripling; she was the very beau idéal of a young king of seventeen, such a one as Sir Peter Lely would have loved to paint, and romantic young ladies to fall desperately in love with. Her acting, too, was on a par with her looks: it was full of vivacious espèglerie, tempered with dignity, and conveyed to the audience the most perfect idea of a mad-brained, frolicsome, high-minded young and royal scapegrace. Mrs. Lingham, who made her first appearance at this theatre as the Duchess, is certainly an acquisition. Her acting was marked with great discrimination and considerable power. If there was a defect, it consisted in a want of dignity. Mrs. Lingham was perhaps not sufficiently the Duchess; that is, the Duchess of the Court of Spain—the most formal and ceremonious in the world, and where etiquette was so strictly observed, that, as history informs us, a Spanish king would rather be roasted to death, than move from the fire that was consuming him, because the proper officer did not happen to be near in order to lead him away; and the only reward a chivalrous gentleman received for saving a Spanish queen from destruction, was a sentence of death, because, forsooth, in rescuing her, he had suffered his hands to touch her royal person. The gay devil-may-care reckless young lieutenant of guards, Ruy Gomez, found a most efficient representative in Mr. Henry Farren, whose impersonation of the character formed a strange contrast with his masterly delineation of Shylock, and proved, beyond a doubt, the great versatility of his talent. At the fall of the curtain the whole of the dramatis personæ were recalled, to receive a well merited tribute of satisfaction from a delighted audience.

A second "first appearance" was that of Mr. Hoskins, from that ultima thule of the drama, Sadler's Wells. The character selected by this gentleman was that of Frank Finish, in Plots for Petticoats. His acting, which was warmly applauded, possesses great ease and lightness, and we have no doubt that Mr. Hoskins will prove as great a favourite here as he was at the theatre he has just left.

MUSIC AT LEEDS.

(From the Leeds Times.)

We have from time to time, and upon one occasion at considerable length, dwelt upon the unsatisfactory state of music in Leeds, from the simple fact of our musical friends, practically at least, forgetting that "union is strength," and that its opposite is no less true, that—division is weakness. With little or no aid from our contemporaries, we have steadily pursued the ungracious task; and apparently in vain urged to greater union. In the meantime the results became clearer and clearer. The two leading musical societies exist but in name;—the third, the Madrigal and Motet Society,—and without wishing for a moment to undervalue the exertions of its leading members,—owes its continued existence chiefly to the fact of its requiring no orchestral combination to give it effect,—and without which a Philharmonic Society is an absurdity,—nor the strength of numbers, both vocal and instrumental, so essential to an effective choral society.

It is, consequently, with unmingled satisfaction that we learn that, owing to a plan suggested by one of our leading professional musicians, Mr. Spark, an effort is being made for the formation of one grand and united society, under the title of the "Leeds Musical Union." Circulars are being issued under the auspices of the following five gentlemen, as Professional Honorary Secretaries:—the Revs. Messrs. Elwin and Conder; Messrs. J. W. Atkinson, and Martin Carwood, to convene a public meeting for Tuesday evening next, under the presidency of our excellent Mayor, of professional and amateur musicians, and of all who are likely to render effective aid towards this important and most desirable object. The leading aim of this meeting, and which we most heartily approve of, is to be to appoint an efficient and influential committee of non-professional men, to whom the entire management of the society shall be entrusted. It will and must be the endeavour of all to throw a complete veil over the past, to cast aside all jealousies and by-gone differences, and to act solely with the view of producing something in the future worthy of the metropolis of the West-Riding.

Many signs have of late appeared that Leeds is at last awakening to the fact, that, in many important points, we are behind other large towns. The fear of being left behind in the great race of commercial enterprise, has resulted in a Chamber of Commerce. The almost total absence of all architectural beauty in our public and private buildings, the existence and the want of much that makes Leeds so little desirable as a residence, except for the purposes of business, has produced "A Society for promoting Public Improvements in the Borough of Leeds." We hail this projected new society as a happy movement in the same direction.

Every day the conviction is growing stronger upon the minds of our most earnest philanthropists and public men, that innocent and refining public amusements are a most important element in the moral education of the people. Recreation and amusement are a desire and a necessity graciously implanted in our natures by a beneficent Creator. To direct such desires aright must hence be the duty of all who have the happiness and welfare of our crowded populations at heart. This conviction has been among the leading ones which has made the erection of a Town hall so popular a subject in Leeds; and the formation of this society will, we trust, act as a spur to our Town Council, to hasten its completion.

We have reason to believe that the project under consideration is meeting with the most undivided and enthusiastic approbation of our leading amateurs and public men. Of course it cannot be carried into effect without the hearty and cordial assent and co-operation of our professional musicians. We will not for a moment believe that there can be any one amongst them, whose aid would be valuable, so forgetful of the high claims of his noble profession, or so blind even to his own interest,—for in the special advantage of the profession it must ultimately result,—as to refuse his cordial aid. It is a great opportunity, which, if allowed to pass by, may not for years return again. Great indeed would be the responsibility, we might almost say guilt, of those who, either by a refusal to join in, or even by a cold assent, should be instrumental in wrecking so noble a project.

We feel persuaded that the committee, when appointed, will alike regard the interests of the profession and of the public. We shall, as occasion requires, recur to the subject, and afford it at all times all the aid in our power.

Foreign.

PARIS.—In another portion of our columns will be found several interesting particulars in regard to the late movements in Paris, together with some remarks on current musical matters, from Mr. A. Harris, the active and clever director of the mise en scene at Her Majesty's Theatre, which we trust will find favour in the eyes of our readers. But as many other interesting particulars, not alluded to by our correspondent, have taken place—such as the debut of Guasco at the Italiens, and the first appearance, this season, of Sophie Cruvelli in Ernani—we have deemed it necessary to furnish authentic accounts thereof, and have, accordingly, made a translation from the latest feuilleton of the witty, shrewd, and poetic Fiorentino, the critic of the Constitutionnel—the rival in esprit of Jules Janin. The writer, without preamble or preparation, begins his article thus:—

"The representations of Ernani have been neither less brilliant nor less attractive than those of Norma and Semiramide. Mademoiselle Sophie Cruvelli was entrusted, as at the end of last season, with the character of Dona Sol. The work and the artist have been, already, maturely weighed and judged at the first debuts of Mademoiselle Cruvelli. I have, then, but to return to my former observations. The young and beautiful cantratrice has displayed this time, as at her first appearance before the Parisian public, an ardour, a fire, an impetuosity, which nothing could surpass. She sang her cavatina tout d'un jet, running through the immense extent of her vibrating and powerful voice with the most extreme hardihood, daring everything, accomplishing everything; no gentilities, no ficelles—if I may be allowed to borrow a word from the argot of the coulisses—no evasions, no ruses. Mademoiselle Cruvelli plays an honest game, pays in honest money. One cannot cheat, playing with Verdi. You must pay with your person and with your voice. In the duo with Ernani, in the septuor "O Sommo Carlo," and more than all, in the final trio, she was touching, passionate, dramatic, irresistible; she electrified the house. She was vociferously applauded, fêted, and recalled. Henceforward, Mademoiselle Cruvelli should be blasée with her triumphs.

"Signor Guasco came to Paris preceded by a great reputation. He had left the stage, and was reposing, as I am told, upon his laurels, when he was snatched from his retreat by the persuasiveness of Mr. Lumley. One is hardly enabled to form an opinion, after a single performance, of an artist of such distinguished merit. M. Guasco has a voice touching, sympathetic, and very timbrée; he phrases well, accents with abundance of sentiment and energy. He exhibited moments of real inspiration in the grand trio "Solingo, errante, misero." His vocalization is, perhaps, a little hard, and his intonation sometimes at fault; but both of these may arise from the singer's want of practice, and the nervousness consequent on the occasion. We shall wait, before we pronounce definitely, whether the new tenor be perfect master of his means and resources; for we attribute any slight deficiency on his part more to emotion than incompetence. In any case, M. Guasco is a highly intelligent, conscientious artist, who penetrates into the character which he embodies, and communicates to his fellow artists the fire and zeal which animate himself. It was for M. Guasco Verdi wrote his principal operas; he obtained the intimacy and confidence of the master, and he responded by a devotion beyond bounds, and by a courage which reflects credit on him. At the rehearsals he supported, with much warmth, the rights of Verdi, and would not permit the orchestra to treat the Maestro cavalierly, a vexatious practice which they have taken to indulge in. It is necessary that the orchestra and the conductor should, bon gré mal gré, respect the intentions and movements indicated by the composer. Verdi is no scholar. We may or may not like his music; we can accept or refuse his works; but we should not receive them to correct them.

"Belletti is an excellent Sylva. It is some time since the Theatre Italien possessed a basso cantante gifted with more admirable qualities, and one who is a more thorough musician. Belletti's voice is equal through the entire register, is always correct in intonation, and is remarkable for suppleness and agility. As yet, we have only heard him in two serious parts, viz., Assur and Sylva. It is affirmed that in buffo parts Belletti is not less successful.

"The role of Carlo Quinto was sustained by a very young man, Signor Guislanzoni. This name, which wants nothing but pronunciation, has had an historical origin sufficiently curious. In the small town where the artist was born, all the inhabitants call themselves "Guislanzoni." When the Duke de Guise undertook the conquest of the kingdom of Naples, he brought in his train a great number of old soldiers, de vieilles lances, who dispersed themselves through many villages of Italy after the discomfiture of their chief. They called themselves the vieilles lances de Guise, the Guis-lanzoni, and the name descended to their posterity. The young barytone, who has just made his debut at the Italiens, has shown himself neither less brave nor less decided than his ancestors; but, like them, he has been betrayed by fortune. Behold what happened on the evening of his debut. It had been agreed upon, at rehearsal, I suppose, that the barytone should sing his air, in the second act, half a tone higher. Unfortunately the orchestra forgot this detail, and played the morceau as it is written. The barytone, without being in the least moved or discouraged, continued on bravely, like a true vieille lance de Guise, to sing half a tone higher. The conflict was disagreeable; the orchestra would not yield; the singer was persistent; and it was not until the end of the allegro, that he was finally unhorsed. From this fatal moment, all harmony ceased to reign between orchestra and singer, and when the youthful barytone sang,

'Vieni meco sol di rose Intrecciar ti vo la vita—'

the public groaned aloud that tout n'est pas rose at a theatre with a barytone of that force, and an orchestra so infatuated.

"New engagements, with new debutants, have been announced. It is necessary, above all, that the repertoire should make progress. When Mr. Lumley shall have defiled before our eyes all his troupe, the public will make a definite choice, and it is to be hoped there will be no more trials, essays, and experiments.

P. A. FIORENTINO."

Original Correspondence.

CHERUBINI.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—Your correspondent, "A Subscriber," who so nobly came to the rescue of Cherubini in October last from the attack of "Pyrrhus," mentioned at the time the Grand Mass in D minor as being Cherubini's chef d'œuvre. Will he be so obliging as to inform me whether the "Benedictus" of that mass is in the key of C major, and if so, whether it is the same as that published by Mr. V. Novello in his "Select Organ Pieces?"

I saw the full score of the Grand Mass in D minor at Paris last summer, but forgot to look at the "Benedictus."

The "Benedictus" in C major, published by Mr. Novello, is of singular originality and beauty, but I have not yet been able to find out, in any quarter, from what mass it is taken. It is not in the mass in F, nor in those in A, or C, nor in the Requiems in F or C minor.

If your correspondent can give me the desired information, he will confer an infinite obligation on

Your most obedient servant,

London, 16th Dec., 1851.

AN AMATEUR.

MUSIC AT LEEDS.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—I do not know who your correspondent at Leeds last week may be, but, whatever his position or calling, it is quite clear he has formed a very low estimate both of his own time and your valuable space when he sends for insertion in your journal a somewhat prosy account of a concert which took place six weeks ago, and which was, moreover, fully reported in your paper at the time.

If "A Correspondent" at Leeds is a constant subscriber to and reader of the MUSICAL WORLD—and if he is not, he ought to be—he must know full well that the concert given on the 28th of October last by the Glee and Madrigal Union—consisting of Mrs. Enderasohn, Miss Williams, Messrs. Lockey, Phillips, Francis and Land, was not only particularly reviewed in your paper of November 8th, but was the immediate cause of a rather lengthy letter of mine (inserted at the same time), in which I dwelt upon the peculiar claims of our national part music, and especially referred to the sensation which the singing of the party alluded to had caused in Leeds.

Your correspondent sends also his account of a concert which was given in our Music Hall last week by the Leeds Madrigal and Motet Society, but though a flattering notice, I feel it my duty, as conductor on the occasion, to say, that it contains several inaccuracies, two only of which I shall refer to:

1. No such individual as "Master Milner" appeared at the concert. 2. Mrs. Newton was not encored in "On mighty pens."

Possibly "A Correspondent" was not at the concert at all.

I am, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

WM. SPARK.

11, Park-square, Leeds, Dec. 10th, 1851.

GREGORIAN CHANTS.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—This week's MUSICAL WORLD brings me a letter from an old correspondent. I should not sit down to answer in any way his animadversions were it not for this, that like most persons who are not skilled in argument, he reasons altogether upon assumptions, in short all along begs the question, which has never been proved. Personally, I am not quite so unacquainted with music as your correspondent assumes. I did not need him to tell me that the eight tones or chants of St. Gregory were originally unharmonized for the plain reason that the science of harmony was not known, certainly not practised in any way, until the ninth century—which was two centuries after Gregory, not five, as your correspondent says. Again I did not, and do not, advocate the Harmonised Gregorian Chants as at all specimens of the old rude works, but I take your correspondent's assertion, who so neatly confutes himself by saying "that a series of simple notes, when freshly harmonised, lose their identity, and cease to be what they were," ergo, the modern adaptation of the Gregorian tones are, strictly speaking, Anglican Chants; and as such, I repeat, can be made "very suitable endowments of devotional praise."

There ceases to be any anachronism in speaking of modern Gregorian chants—but I do not, whether in the old shape or new, like them sufficiently to defend them. Thus far as regards any historical inaccuracy.

It is painful to think that the high art of music, as so badly defended by your correspondent, should be in any danger of such seeming inaccuracy in historical points. It is strange to think how certain church modes have been preserved as essential features of church music, and how largely they have entered into the compositions of Handel, Mendelssohn, and Zea, and of those three great founders of the school who preceded them, as Graun, Leo, Colonna, and others; yet because they are applicable now as then, there seems to be no great historical fœlle. Lastly, I must repeat again, I am at a loss to know where your correspondent picked up his strange notion of the classical ruses. I have a large acquaintance in the church, and really I cannot trace out or fathom what he means, except that like his reasoning it is wholly assumptive; for what object could the ruse be practised in a day like this, when everybody knows more or less of music, and could easily detect it?

Let professed musicians who have harmonised the Gregorian tones answer the question to him, unless, like the secret societies, they and the clergy are in league together to overthrow all that is sound and orthodox in sacred music!

In conclusion, I have no wish to engage in controversial weapons with one who I must say seems not over-skilled in using them, chiefly in this way, but all along he over-shoots his aim, and argues or concludes from premises which have never been granted or admitted; and as I must also add with some sorrow, one who seems to show unguardedly something of private animosity towards the clergy of the Church of England. As such, then, I beg now to take my final leave, and again begging you, Mr. Editor, to accept my apology for intruding in your columns,

I remain,

Your most obedient servant,

ONE OF THE CLERGY.

Notting Hill, 15th December, 1851.

HARMONY AND COMPOSITION.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—Could you furnish me with the address of any English musician who is fully competent to teach the rules of Harmony and Composition principally for the piano, and would be willing to give six lessons for a guinea to one in the profession?

A NEW SUBSCRIBER.

Coventry-street, Dec. 8th, 1851.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—Having read your article on our performance of Haydn's Seasons, in which I must admit with you that it is a work we, as a society established for the express purpose of sacred music, ought never to have performed, although I cannot agree with the Editor of the Illustrated London News, that the "Seasons" is a dull, heavy work, with its Storm and Hunting Chorus, the Tally Ho of which would certainly have been more creditable to the Melton Mowbray huntsmen than to us, professing to be "sacred harmonists;" but I think we shall find eventually that this is not the only instance in which we have departed from the principles for which we were originally established, as well as the Directors of Exeter Hall, for the purposes for which they now allow the Hall to be used. With as much consistency might Covent Garden theatre, or Drury Lane, be rented by some religious sect or denomination for preaching on a Sunday, as Exeter Hall be used for the style and character of a great portion of the music that was performed at the Wednesday and Thursday evening concerts. The use of the Hall for such performances may increase the dividends of the shareholders, but then it must injure the renters of the other establishments. The principal supporters of the sacred performances at Exeter Hall have been the religious public; and, I fear, if we attempt to combine the two styles in the same place, we should fail in finding supporters for either. But, I fear, Mr. Editor, the committee have been acting under the advice given them by one of the leading journals of the day, which, in September last, makes the following remarks:—

"It will be advisable, next season, to introduce some works hitherto unattempted. The list is ample, if the committee, with Mr. Costa's assistance, will please to refer to it. There are the Seasons of Haydn, according to German critics a greater work than the Creation, besides Belshazzur, Deborah, and other oratorios of Handel rarely performed, and Calvary, the reputed masterpiece of Spohr, of which the Norwich amateurs are so proud, and the London amateurs so ignorant!"

I fear the announcement of the latter work would cause as much difference of opinion among the frequenters of the Exeter Hall oratorios, as it did among the clergy at Norwich, when it was first performed at the Festival. And now that the committee have produced the Seasons, the same journal coolly tells them that it is mere sophistry to attempt to impose a sacred character upon the Seasons, that there is nothing sacred about it, that it cannot be considered as a legitimate medium of edification to an assembly gathered together for the ostensible purpose of listening to the oratorios of those grave and renowned composers who drew their inspirations from the text of Scripture, and that the work itself has no more to do with the principles upon which the existence and prestige of our Society are based than the Walpurgis Night of Mendelssohn; and they conceive there was no necessity for us to depart from our ancient professions, and overstep the limits of sacred music to enter the domain of art which properly belongs to the concert room and to the theatre. In conclusion, I must beg to remind our committee of the Old Man and his Ass, who, in trying to please everybody, pleased nobody, and lost his ass in the bargain.

I am, Mr. Editor,

AN EARLY MEMBER OF THE

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE "BRINLEY RICHARDS" CONTROVERSY.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—Since the correspondence in your valuable paper respecting the "Beauties of Cambria," and "Recollections of Wales," has taken an "Anonymous" turn, I crave your permission to reply to the letter of your correspondent calling himself a "Subscriber," which appeared in last week's publication; and, en passant, I may observe that if brevity be the soul of wit, your correspondent's long epistle at once puts him out of court as a claimant to the title of "un homme d'esprit." Mr. Richards seems to be unfortunate in his champions, more especially so in the case of "A Subscriber," who, in his zeal for the object of his idolatry, has evidently forgotten his manners. Mr. Richards has ample reason to exclaim, "Save me from my friends;" for the coarse allusions contained in the letter to which I refer are calculated to do even a good cause material injury.

Your "Subscriber" intimates that he has "long been possessed with a morbid passion for Welsh rabbits and Welsh airs." I am inclined to think, however, that he prefers hakes—as, for example, the "Beauties of Cambria" hot on Monday, cold on Tuesday, and hashed up on Wednesday—an economical process both to brains and pocket. Be this as it may, his elegant diction clearly proves that he does not contemplate mincing the matter. However, as your subscriber admits his passion to be a “morbid” one, I will not be so ungenerous as to speak harshly of so disagreeable an affliction.

Your correspondent declares that he is a “plain thinker.” This, sir, I believe to be a candid admission. He is evidently averse to change and progress—save that he loves an old friend dressed in a new suit—such, for instance, as the “Beauties of Cambria” metamorphosed from their swaddling clothes into “Recollections of Wales,” with a more elaborate dress. Verily Cambria, when she sees her national airs thus tormented by Mr. Brinley Richards, might reasonably exclaim, in the words of Poëlonius— and I must confess, Mr. Editor, that a composer's genius cannot be said to scintillate very remarkably, when a Welsh national air is made the victim upon which to ring all the changes of which the keys of a pianoforte are capable. But perhaps Mr. Brinley Richards is a disciple of the late Paganini, whose reputation was gained by playing on one string.

“Still harping on my daughter!”

Now, sir, for a bit of logic. Your sapient subscriber says, “Mr. Brinley Richards does not consider his first work the best.” Perhaps not. Authors are generally the worst judges of their own productions, ergo—the “Beauties of Cambria” may be superior to the “Recollections of Wales.”

Your correspondent happily states that he happens to be “neither a musical man nor a lawyer.” The truth of this is perceptible at a glance. Perhaps he will permit me to add that he is no prophet.

And now, Mr. Editor, allow me, in conclusion, to reply to “A Subscriber” concerning the graver portion of his charge. He insinuates that Mr. Brinley Richards had formerly received insult at the hands of Messrs. Lee and Coxhead. This I do not for a moment believe, nor will the public credit it; because, had such been the case, Mr. Brinley Richards would, in all probability, have introduced that allegation into the letter he recently addressed to the MUSICAL WORLD. Moreover, sir, I have taken some pains to make inquiries in various quarters, which, added to my personal knowledge of Messrs. Lee and Coxhead, lead me to infer that the antecedents of those gentlemen give a direct and unqualified refutation to any such charge; and I feel confident that so foul an attempt at literary Thuggism, emanating from an anonymous hand, will be duly appreciated by a British public. Depend upon it, Mr. Editor, no musical firm could establish a reputation like that enjoyed by the above-named gentlemen, if they confined themselves to publishing “Beauties of Cambria,” dished up in a variety of forms—first for children, then for “children of a larger growth,” and, finally, for proficients. Although national airs are not considered copyright, yet it must be confessed that, in a common-sense view of the case, Mr. Brinley Richards has been sailing rather close to the wind in thus displaying his partiality for “toujours perdrix.”

So much, sir, for your correspondent's “morbid passion for Welsh rabbits.” I trust he will ever earn his bread and cheese as creditably and honourably as the firm has done to which he unceremoniously and rudely attades under the safe shield of an anonymous meddler.

“Parvum parva decent.”

I enclose you my name and address, and beg to subscribe myself,

A LOVER OF FAIR PLAT.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—Can you, or any of your readers, inform me of the address of Mr. Albert Keller, or Mr. Adolphus Schubert, wishing to have it for reasons of which I will inform you at a future time, and that affect

Yours truly, A PROFESSOR.

London, Dec. 18th, 1851.

Probucial.

DONCASTER.—PRIVATE CONCERTINA CONCERT.—On Thursday (yesterday) evening se'nnight, a private concert of concertina music was given at the Guildhall, by Mr. and Mrs. Scates, of this town. The attendance was numerous and respectable, the Mayor and Mayoress and some of the principal families of the town, attending. Mr. Scates commenced by giving a brief sketch of the history and construction of the concertina. He then proceeded to the instrumental performance, commencing with two or three sacred melodies on the baritone concertina, and displayed the character of the instrument as an auxiliary to the choral services of small places of worship. The next piece was a solo from Lucia di Lammermoor, “Fra Poco,” which Mr. Scates performed with great taste and skill on the treble concertina, being accompanied on the pianoforte by Mrs. Scates. The performance elicited considerable applause, giving the audience a most favourable opinion of the musical talents of the performers. The Duet, on airs from Puritani, was performed on the treble concertina (Mr. Scates) and bass (Mrs. Scates), the two together forming a very extensive compass, the scale of the latter corresponding with that of the violoncello, but the tone of the instrument resembling the bassoon. A selection of Irish melodies was next performed by Mr. Scates on the treble concertina, and was followed by the “Scena” from Sonnambula, just mentioned, in which the airs “All is lost now,” and “Still so gently o'er me stealing,” were rendered with fine effect on the bass concertina, with pianoforte accompaniments. The “Fantasia on Scotch Airs” (treble and pianoforte) introduced one or two Scotch melodies, which Mr. Scates performed with taste and execution, giving, perhaps, as favourable an idea as could be conveyed of the action and melodious strains of which the concertina is susceptible in the hands of an accomplished performer. The concert was concluded with the “National Anthem,” on the treble and bass concertinas. The Mayor then proposed a vote of thanks for the great treat that had been afforded the company that evening, and Mr. and Mrs. Scates made their bow amidst the warmest and most deserved applause.—Doncaster Chronicle.

LEEDS.—MADRIGAL AND MOTET SOCIETY.—The first concert of the season was given by the society under the spirited management of Mr. Spark, on Wednesday evening last. The non-local performers consisted of Mrs. Alexander Newton, Mr. Hemingway, and Master Ward. Mrs. Newton will already be known to some of our readers as a lady of considerable musical talents and reputation. The notes of her upper register are remarkably pure and clear, and she uses them with so much ease and artistic skill as to produce the most charming effect. Throughout the evening, she was cheered with the most flattering reception, and in Bishop's song, “Lo, here the gentle lark,”—which might have been written for her, so perfectly does it suit her voice—she was greeted with a most enthusiastic encore. Master Ward accompanied the song on the concertina, an instrument which he seems to have completely mastered, and which, when either accompanying the human voice, or when played alone, produces a pleasing effect. But it should never be accompanied by the piano, which in no wise harmonises with it. This was most clearly manifest in the solo played by the same young gentleman. Mr. Hemingway is still too well recollected amongst us; and his performances on this occasion do not call for any special remarks. In the performance of the motets, madrigals, and choral pieces, there were clear evidences of improvement, showing that the society creditably carries out its appointed work. We did not hear the first motet, “Go not far from us,” but we have heard it highly spoken of. We must class the performances of Bertinanski's beautiful “Sanctus,” Himmel's semi-chorus, “Give ear, O God,”—a grand hymn of praise—and the madrigal, “In going to my lonely bed,” by Edwardes, amongst the most successful ones of the evening. In the rendering of the “Sanctus,” there was a subduedness of tone and a harmonising of voices, which showed that both conductor and performers had caught its true spirit. In Mendelssohn's beautiful trio and chorus, “Hearts feel that love thee,” the chorus failed to come in with due precision, and greatly marred its effect. We notice with real pleasure the engagement, for the second concert of the society, of that unique band, the members of the "English Glee and Madrigal Union," who produced so great an effect upon a recent occasion; including the names of Mrs. Endersohn, Miss M. Williams, Messrs. Phillips, Francis, Locket, and Land. We trust the public will reward this spirited engagement with a real bumper.—Leeds Times, Dec. 6th.

GLASGOW.—MR. JULIAN ADAMS' CONCERT. A gradual improvement has taken place in the audiences at these Concerts, the third of the series of which attracted a numerous assemblage on Wednesday evening, comprising the élite of the West-end; although it is somewhat unaccountable that "the million" should be so slow to avail themselves of the entertainment now liberally placed within their reach. The programme consisted of a selection from the operas of the elder masters, well studied to test the capabilities of an orchestra as unrivalled in the names of its solo performers as unsurpassed in its ensemble. The opening overture, Weber's La Gazza Ladra, was given with admirable precision and effect, and was well received by the audience, as was also a grand selection from Mozart's Don Giovanni, eliciting a warm reception for Mons. Barrett (an invaluable accession), whose oboe solo was a masterly achievement on a difficult instrument. In the same piece the Messrs. Winterbottom were each great in the solos for the clarinet and bassoon. The overture to William Tell, however, was the orchestral chef d'œuvre of the evening, and the encore which followed was equally unmistakable. Of the solo performances entitled to favourable notice, we may mention the able instrumentation of Mr. Rowland, a well-known master of the double-bass, of Mr. Nicholson, the accomplished flutist, and of Mr. Jones, the rich clear intonations of whose cornet-a-piston remind us of Koenig. But more than a passing word is due to Mr. Hausman's violoncello. He wields, indeed, a charmed bow, and literally spell-bound his audience by the thrilling manner in which he gave "Auld Robin Gray," and the fine old melody of "Galla Water," a combination of beauty and pathos with brilliancy of execution and delicacy of intonation such as genius of the high instinctive sort alone can reach. The spell was agreeably broken by a clever descent to the trickery of the instrument in which inferior artists find their chief reward. An enthusiastic encore called forth a repetition of the last named air, which was again applauded to the echo. In the vocal department the programme contained two names new to our musical circles—Miss Pearce and Miss Wells—the former possessing a soprano voice of great compass, which has evidently been subjected to careful culture; the latter a contralto of some power. In the case of both ladies, however, it would be unfair to pronounce decisively, as the indulgence of the audience was besought on account of indisposition; Miss Wells in particular evidently labouring under a severe cold. Both were well received under the circumstances, while Miss Pearce was deservedly encored in one of her songs. Altogether the success which has attended the third concert augurs well for the triumphant completion of the series. Mr. Julian Adams deserves, at any rate, a greater measure of public support than has yet been awarded to his spirited enterprise. (From the Glasgow Citizen, which must be instructed that Weber did not write La Gazza Ladra.—Ed. of M. W.)

HALIFAX.—PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—(From a Correspondent.)—The last Concert of this Society for the present year took place on Monday, the 15th instant, and attracted an unusually full and fashionable audience, who testified throughout, by their frequent and hearty applause, their gratification. It is to be hoped that the rapid progress towards excellence which the band of this Society has made under the able and unremitting drill of their efficient conductor, Mr. Frobisher, and which was so strikingly exhibited in the performance of the instrumental pieces at this concert, will in future secure for it an increasing support from subscribers, for without such support it is impossible for the Society to exist. The bill of fare on this occasion was excellent and various, and the performance altogether deserving of great praise. The fire and precision with which Herold's overture to Zampa was given evidently astonished the audience; and the effective execution of the overture to William Tell, with its occasional trying solos, was highly creditable to a provincial orchestra. Both stringed and wind instruments seemed trying to vie with each other in firmness and decision, and, particularly in Zampa, (to use a familiar phrase)

"they went like clockwork." These two overtures we have never heard so well played out of London. Charles Hallé had been engaged as solo performer, and was the great attraction of the evening, as he well deserved to be. With force and execution very little inferior to List, Leopold de Meyer, Madame Pleyel, and Thalberg, he evinces, to our mind, a deeper insight into, and a more delicate feeling for, the sound compositions of the great masters: and it is not too much to say that the exquisite delicacy and enthusiastic power with which he performed the well-known gem of all the Beethoven sonatas (the one in A Flat, Op. 26), could scarcely have been surpassed by any living pianist. Mendelssohn's charming Lieder were interpreted by him in such perfection as to draw forth an unanimous encore. Thalberg's fantasia was too long and intricate to be generally popular, but the concluding portion was striking, and shewed Hallé to be equal to any of the modern difficulties of execution. The vocal part of the programme is avowedly a secondary matter in this Society, as it is with the London Philharmonic. It was interesting on this occasion as introducing two local artistes who have been lately profiting by London studies. Miss Freeman, a young favorite here a year or two ago, has made good use of her time at the Royal Academy of Music, and a material improvement, especially in polish of style, has been the result. Her unassuming manner also creates sympathy, and she must have been well satisfied with the cordial greeting she received. She sang Mercadante's "Si m'abbandoni" with great care and taste, and if her naturally sweet voice should increase in volume, she promises to gain a high rank amongst our vocalists.

Mr. Winn has a baritone of great power and excellent quality, and he is very effective in the ballad style. With a little more care in his enunciation, he will soon shine in a wider range. Both vocalists obtained encores. On the whole this concert must be pronounced one of the best that has been heard in Halifax for some time past, and formed a worthy conclusion to the series.

BIRMINGHAM.—(From a Correspondent.)—I send you a brief account of the second concert of the Great Orchestral Festival, given by Mr. J. A. Baker, in aid of the funds of the General and Queen's Hospitals, which took place, at the Town Hall, on Thursday evening, December 11. I did not attend the first concert, so can send you no notice, but the following will give you a good notion how the Great Orchestral Festival was conducted. The hall was very well filled, and the greatest propriety was manifested throughout, no encores or applause being allowed. The band was very good, and played the overtures to Massaniello, William Tell, and La Gazza Ladra, and Haydn's Surprise symphony. The singers were Miss Fanny Huddart, Miss Amelia Hill, Madame Garcia, and Mr. Leffler. Instrumentalists:—Mr. Willy (violin), Mr. Richardson (flute), Mr. Stimpson (organ), Mr. T. Harper (cornet-a-piston), and Miss Kate Loder (pianoforte). Madame Garcia pleased very much in her solos, which were "Lo! hear the gentle lark," and a song from the Prophete. Miss Amelia Hill made a highly favourable impression in a song of Donizetti's, and another by Fesca, and Mr. Leffler and Miss Huddart assisted by their talents in rendering the entertainment varied and agreeable. Among the instrumental solo players I must particularly allude to Mr. Willy and Miss Kate Loder. The young lady, one of our most distinguished pianists, played Mendelssohn's G minor concerto, with full orchestra, and Prudent's "Lucia Fantaisie." The sound classical style and musician-like feeling in the first were no less to be admired, than the fine and brilliant execution displayed in the latter. Miss Kate Loder's performances were evidently felt throughout the hall. I must not omit Mr. Richardson, who displayed all his marvels on Siccama's patent flute. On the whole, the concert was decidedly successful.

BECCELES.—We have received a letter from a gentleman in this place, respecting the Choral Society there, written with so much real modesty and good feeling, that, although not intended for publication, we cannot forego the pleasure of inserting it in our columns. We have inspected the programme alluded to, and find it to be excellent; and the rules of the Beccles Choral Society sent us, and also mentioned by Mr. Corbyn, we find to be all that he has stated. We shall be most glad, as far as lie in our power, to lend a helping hand to the Beccles Choral Society. "Sir, being a constant reader of the Musical World I thought you might not have any objection to hear what is doing, in the musical way, in this part of Suffolk. I therefore enclose you a programme of the concert, given by our Choral Society last week. As I am unknown to you I enclose my card, by which you will see I am only an amateur, but Mrs. Corbyn is in the profession, and as we are the conductors and managers of the Society, of course it does not become me to speak of the way in which the music was executed. Our class numbers about ninety members, and we have a band of nearly twenty, but we are at present quite in our infancy. I enclose you a copy of our rules, by which you will see we do not make it a very expensive matter, but we find, from the facilities offered in the purchase of cheap music, that our funds are nearly sufficient, and the cheaper it is made the more popular our class becomes, and the more support we meet with. On the night of the Concert our elegant Assembly room was completely filled, and all the leading families of the town, with hardly one exception, were present, and the performances, I am told, have given the greatest satisfaction. We make it a rule to take all the solos, &c., ourselves, thereby preventing the necessity of our requiring any extra assistance, which would only entail much expense, and our patrons would expect more, and they are quite as well satisfied by having everything done by the members of the class. I may perhaps state that the Society is carried on by Mrs. Corbyn and myself solely from a desire to encourage a taste for music, in the town and neighbourhood, as we have hitherto been very backward in that respect, and we make it a rule that no emolument should accrue from this source. Our next concert will be given for the benefit of one of our local charities. I am, Sir, yours respectfully, J. B. Corbyn. The free use of the Assembly room, for our weekly meeting, is kindly granted to us by the Mayor and Corporation."

MANCHESTER—ARDWICK GENTLEMEN'S GLEE CLUB—A very gratifying meeting of this rapidly rising Society was held on Wednesday evening last, at the George and Dragon inn, Ardwick Green. The professional vocalists engaged were Messrs. Edmondson, Walton, Phillips, and Smith, Mr. Richard Leed officiating as pianist and conductor. The scheme was judiciously selected, and contained, among others, the following glees: "Awake, Eolian lyre," Danby; "Oeo, Oeo!" I. Cooke; "The fairest flowers"—"The Isles of Greece," Dr. Smith; "Hohenlinden," I. Cooke; "The merriest time of all the year," Aldridge; "Begin the gay chorus," Pyne; "Father of Heroes," Callcott; "Haste, my boy," Dr. Smith; "Under the greenwood tree," Bishop; "Fill me, boy, as deep a draught," I. Cooke. We have seldom heard glees more effectively given, the voices being well balanced, and amalgamating with a beauty rarely found in provincial singers. After the concert, there was a great variety of glees, songs, catches, &c., given by the company present, who throughout the evening manifested the warmest enthusiasm in the whole proceedings. We are glad to hear that this little club already numbers upwards of seventy members; and the increasing interest given by the prize competition having shortly to be determined, will, doubtless, lead to a still further accession of subscribers. From what we could glean from casual observation, we should say there is here infused some young blood who are evidently bent on deserving success, if they cannot command it.—(From a Correspondent).

Reviews of Music.

THE STUDENT'S PRACTICE; A Collection of Compositions, of a Moderate Degree of Difficulty, intended as an Introduction to the Classical Pianist; Edited by Brinley Richards, Professor at the Royal Academy of Music.—Robert Cocks and Co.

An able contributor to our musical literature justly remarks that "the diffusion of a taste for music, and the increasing elevation of its character, may be regarded as a national blessing. The tendency of music is to soften and purify the mind. The cultivation of a musical taste furnishes to the rich a refined and intellectual pursuit, which excludes the indulgence of frivolous and vicious amusements, and to the poor a 'laborum dulces lumen,' a relaxation from toil more attractive than the haunts of intemperance. All music of an elevated character is calculated to produce such effects." Every work, then, which promotes, however unambitiously, the increase of a pure taste for music, is worthy of commendation. We, therefore, gladly avail ourselves of an opportunity of so introducing to the notice of all teachers of the pianoforte, the "Student's Practice." Its design is indicated in the title-page, as a "collection of compositions of a moderate degree of difficulty," arranged with a view of inculcating, at an early period, a taste for the writings of the great masters, and as an agreeable and useful introduction to their more elaborate compositions. The "Student's Practice" will form an important item in the history of pianoforte publications, and, as it has in view a special and determined purpose, it must prove one of the most valuable works which have yet been presented to the pianoforte teacher. We, therefore, give it our hearty recommendation. The names of the great masters have too often been causes of alarm and dislike in the minds of beginners, conveying to them ideas of a very different signification, from those by which they are considered by skilful proficient. But in this publication, the moderately informed pupil will find classical subjects for practice, and solos which will have the double effect of forming the judgment, as well as the hand. Independent of the intrinsic merit of the pieces here published—to criticise which would now be quite unnecessary—the work will, to all pianoforte teachers, have a very important consideration as a means of economising time. Every one conversant with the duties of tuition has too often had just cause to deplore the valuable moments wasted in a fruitless endeavour to search after music for moderately advanced pupils. Such a subject for complaint will, in a great degree, be removed by this work. For in the "Student's Practice" the professor will find at once, and without difficulty or loss of time, music adapted to every performer's capabilities and intellect; and its importance as an educational work must ensure for it a reception wherever music is taught, and especially by every professor who has in any way reflected upon the responsibilities of tuition, and of the allegiance he owes to his art. The numbers already published amount to twelve, and these, we observe, are to be added to. The list presents the names of Steibelt, Clementi, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, &c. The labours of editing have been performed in a way which we were justified in anticipating from an accomplished musician like Mr. Brinley Richards; and the publication of such a series of really good solos for the purpose of instruction, is highly creditable to the enterprise of the publishers, to whose announcement of the more elaborate work, "The Classical Pianist," we look forward with much interest. Mr. Brinley Richards is entitled to the thanks of all those who are seriously interested in the sound education of musical students; and we shall be much mistaken if the publication of the present work will not obtain for it the approbation and the welcome of every musical professor.

WHEN SORROW SLEEPETH, WAKE IT NOT.—Song; Words translated from the German, by Miss M. A. Stodart; Composed by Edward Land.—Addison and Hollier.

Mr. Land's Song has already received the approval of the public. It has been sung several times by Miss M. Williams, for whom it was expressly composed, at the Concerts of the English Glee and Madrigal Union, with much success. "When Sorrow Sleepeth, wake it not," deserved all the success it obtained. The melody is plaintive and expressive, and the accompaniments exceedingly well written. Altogether it makes an excellent contralto song. The words are neatly and pointedly translated, and do much credit to Miss Stodart's poetic feeling.

THE BIRTH-DAY MARCH.—Duet, for the Piano-forte; Joseph Thomas Cooper.—Cramer, Beale, and Co.

We can recommend the above as a useful teaching piece for two performers, which will be found neither too difficult, nor too trivial. Mr. Cooper has accomplished all he intended. To do more would be to have shot an arrow over the mark. In the instance before us the writer has hit the bull's eye.

Miscellaneous.

ATHENÆUM, ISLINGTON—(From a Correspondent).—A most interesting musical lecture, with illustrations, was given on Monday evening last, the 15th inst., at the above institution, by Mr. Samuel Pearsall, of Her Majesty's Concert, Exeter Hall, Lichfield Cathedral, &c. &c., to a crowded audience. Mr. Pearsall's lecture conveyed much instruction on the art and its composers. He was in excellent voice, and sang with fire and energy Handel's celebrated song, "Deeper and deeper still," which was received with great applause. He was equally effective in his other illustrations, among which we may mention Mendelssohn's "If with all your heart," "In native worth," "When the lads of the village," "The soldier's dream," "Four-leaved shamrock," and "The death of Nelson," given by especial request, some of which were vociferously encored. We beg to congratulate the Society on again introducing this gentleman to the members of their very excellent institution, feeling convinced that lectures of this character are always most acceptable, being both pleasing and intellectual. Mr. Force, organist of St. Mark's Church, presided at the pianoforte with great ability. A vote of thanks having been presented to Mr. Pearsall by the chairman, for his very able and instructive lecture, the audience separated, having been highly delighted with the evening's entertainment. Mr. Pearsall was announced during the evening as one of the lecturers engaged for the ensuing half-yearly course, which was received with loud applause.

MR. WHITWORTH.—This talented basso has, we hear, been engaged by Mr. Bunn for his operatic corps at Drury Lane. The Manchester Guardian, in speaking of the various artists who have been performing at the Manchester theatre under the direction of Mr. Loder, during the season which terminated on Saturday last, says:—"Mr. Whitworth has won himself into high favour with the public by the fine taste and careful preparation which characterise all he does, no less than by his great musical talent and manly presence. He 'makes-up' with the eye of a painter; he is a study in that respect; indeed, his stern old warrior in the 'Puritans' looks like one of Vandyck's pictures imbued with life. If Mr. Whitworth is somewhat deficient in the excessive vivacity of the Italian basso cantante, his superb voice is heard to great effect in flowing music; and, on the whole, we consider him our best English basso; in some characters he is unapproached."

MISS KATE LODGE, the eminent pianist and composer, was married on Tuesday last, at St. Marylebone Church, to Henry Thompson, Esq., of Wimpole Street.

MUSARD.—The first opera ball for the season is announced to take place this evening in Paris, under this veteran maître d'orchestre.

MADAME VIARDOT GARCIA is now in Paris, where she purposes remaining during the winter.

ALBONI is at Marseilles, where she is electrifying the musical world.

HENRI STREICH, the composer, died lately, aged 30 years. He was organist to the church "Bonne Nouvelle" in Paris, and was also an excellent pianist.

RUDOLPH WILLMERS, the pianist, is at Cologne.

HERB FORMES, the celebrated basso, has been presented by the Emperor of St. Petersburg with a splendid diamond ring, valued at 3,000 francs.

THE DISTINS.—This clever Sax Horn (not Saxon) family, have just returned to London for the season from a successful provincial tour. Their last concert was at Boston, not in the United States, but Lincolnshire. They have been well received throughout.

WESTMINSTER COUNTY COURT, Dec. 9th.—HALE & SONS, Music Sellers, against ROBERT ALLISON, Pianoforte Maker, Regent Street.—This was an action for the balance of £3, on an account stated and settled between the parties in December, 1849. The plaintiffs produced the letters of the defendant admitting the debt, and an account signed by him under the style of "Allison, Lennett and Co." £2 of the amount was for cash lent to him in Cheltenham. The defendant alleged that he was then only a traveller for the firm, and that his letters and the account were written and signed by, and the money lent to him, in that capacity. On the other hand, the plaintiffs stated that he had held himself out to them as the proprietor of, or partner in, the business carried on under the above style, and that their dealings with him had been solely in that character. Verdict for plaintiffs, with the expenses of one of them from Cheltenham as a witness to London to prove the case.

A NEW THEATRE.—On the site where formerly stood the Gallery of Practical Science, a new and elegant theatre has been erected. The entertainment is to consist of tragedies, comedies, farces, operas, burlesques, and ballets, so that all tastes will be duly provided for. To carry out, to the fullest extent, this wide scope, a troupe has been engaged, amounting to more than 180 performers, which, report states, contains talents of the very highest order, in the several and antagonistic walks of the drama. The dresses and scenery will be of the most refined and gorgeous description. The most striking point, however, of this extensive dramatis personæ, is the entire absence of professional jealousy or envy, no actor of this troupe having ever been heard either to complain that his talent was not appreciated by the manager or the public; and the greatest unanimity and good fellowship is said ever to have prevailed, from the exponent of the loftiest tragic emotions, down to the punniest exclamation of farce. The ballet is unique in every respect, not a single danseuse having ever been suspected of making a faux pas. The theatre will, it is expected, be opened the week after Christmas.

Advertisements.

PIANOFORTES.

MESSRS. RÜST & STAHL, in calling the attention of Professors and the Trade to their unique instruments, beg to intimate that they have taken the spacious and convenient manufactory of Zeitzler and Co., New Cavendish-street, where they have made arrangements for the manufacturing of the upright pianos only, viz., the Piccolo and Cottage; hence they are enabled to give their undivided attention to this now almost universal class of instruments, which, combined with terms to meet the present exigencies of the times, small profits and quick returns, will place their pianofortes beyond the possibility of competition. To this they need only add that their instruments combine all the modern improvements, and are made of the best seasoned materials, are warranted, and may be exchanged free of expense if not found to be in every respect perfect. Drawings and lists of prices forwarded post free.

Rüst and Stahl, 320, Regent-street. Manufactory, New Cavendish-street (late Zeitzler and Co.)

JULLIEN AND CO.'S CHRISTMAS PRESENTS.

JULLIEN AND CO. have now completed their collection of musical Albums, Annuals, Bijoux, Cateaux, and all musical publications suited for Christmas Presents and New Year's Gifts; the whole of which are arranged for inspection. The great advantage of this exposition is, that purchasers can see in one collection all the works published in London, and after comparing the merits of each, secure a more satisfactory selection than can elsewhere be obtained. Jullien and Co., 214, Regent-street.

THE ROAD TO HEALTH.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS!

CURE of a disordered Liver and Bad digestion. Copy of a Letter from Mr. R. W. KIRKUS, Chemist, 7, Prescott-street, Liverpool, dated the June, 1851. To Professor HOLLOWAY, Sir,—Your Pills and Ointment have stood the highest on our sale list of Proprietary Medicines for some years. A customer, to whom I can refer for any enquiries, desires me to let you know the particulars of her case. She had been troubled for years with a disordered liver and bad digestion. On the last occasion, however, the virulence of the attack was so alarming, and the inflammation set in so severely, that doubts were entertained of her not being able to bear up under it; fortunately she was induced to try your Pills, and she informs me that after the first, and each succeeding dose, she had great relief. She continued to take them, and although she only used three boxes, she is now in the enjoyment of perfect health. I could have sent you many more cases, but the above, from the severity of the attack, and the speedy cure, I think speaks much in favour of your astonishing Pills.

(Signed)

R. W. KIRKUS.

These celebrated Pills are wonderfully efficacious in the following complaints:—
 Ague Constipation of the Bowels kinds Lumbago The Douleur
 Asthma the Bowels kinds Piles Rheumatism Ulcers
 Bilious Com- Consumption Fits Retention of Urine plaints Debility Gout Stomach of Worms of all Blotches on the Dropsy Head-ache kinds
 Skin Dysentery Indigestion Scrofula or King's Weakness, from Bowel-complaints Erysipelas Inflammation of the Eye whatever cause
 Colic Female Irregularities Jaundice Sore Throats &c., &c.
 It is also a Liver complaints Stone & Gravel

Sold at the Establishment of Professor HOLLOWAY, 244, Strand (near Temple Bar), London, and by all respectable Druggists and Dealers in Medicines throughout the Civilized World, at the following prices—1s. 1d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 21s., and 35s. each Box. There is a considerable saving by taking the larger sizes.

N.B.—Directions for the guidance of Patients in every Disorder are affixed each Box.

MUSIC FOR THE ORGAN OR HARMONIUM.

THE AMATEUR ORGANIST—a collection of soft and full Voluntarys, arranged in six Books, 3s. each, by EDWARD TRAVIS, and may be had elegantly bound, price 18s. "Mr. Travis has introduced to the musical world a new and interesting work for the Organ or Harmonium, under the title of 'The Amateur Organist.' Mr. Travis has availed himself of an extensive and classical music library, and selected with great taste the most beautiful morceaux of the great masters, Foreign and English. To lovers of classical music this work will be found to be the most superb selection that has ever issued from the musical press."—Vide Musical Review.

THE AMATEUR INTERLUDIST—a collection of short Interludes to play between the Verses of the Psalms, in one Book, price 4s. by EDWARD TRAVIS and J. P. DYER.

THE AMATEUR PRELUDIST—a collection of Preludes, with the Organ Stops carefully marked, in one Book, price 4s., by E. TRAVIS.

SACRED VOCAL MUSIC.

KELLER'S Collection of ANTHEMS, CHURCH SERVICES, CHANTS, &c., arranged for the Voice and Piano, in six Books, price 3s. each, with six beautiful and appropriate designs by BRANDARD, arranged by ALBERT KELLER. The six Books can be had in one Volume, elegantly bound, price 18s.

THE PSALMODIA BRITANNICA—a selection of Psalms and Hymns for the Voice and Organ, in six Books, price 3s. each, arranged by EDWIN FLOOD, and may be had in one Volume, neatly bound, price 18s. London: LEE & COXHEAD, 48, Albemarle-street, and can be had of all Book and Musiciansellers.

N.B.—A New Edition of "Hark, the Sabbath Bells," by Edwin Flood.

PIANOFORTES FOR HIRE AT REDUCED PRICES.

ECONOMY being at all times commendable, Messrs. ROUSSELOT and Co. have established a new system for Hiring Pianofortes, including the tuning once a month, which presents not only a great saving, but also the advantage of having the instrument regularly kept in tune. Pianofortes, sold, exchanged, and repaired. For particulars apply to RousseLOT and Co., 66, Conduit-street, Regent-street.

Now published,

AN ANTHEM FOR CHRISTMAS-DAY,

COMPOSED by G. W. MORGAN, Organist of South Hackney Church, and late Assistant of Gloucester Cathedral. Price 2s. 6d., Single Vocal Parts, 2s.

Just Published, a new National Anthem,

GOD SAVE THE QUEEN,

THE Words written by JONAS MALDEN, Esq., M.D., the Music composed and arranged by JABEZ JONES (late of the Cathedral Choir and Organist of St. Nicholas Church, Worcester), by whom it is most respectfully inscribed with permission to the Very Reverend John Peel, D.D., Dean of Worcester. Price 1s. 6d., Single Vocal Parts, 1s.

Persons wishing to have the Music as performed by the London Sacred Harmonic Society, should order Surman's Exeter Hall Edition, Office, No. 9, Exeter Hall. The Public and Choral Societies are cautioned against purchasing spurious and pirated copies of the Exeter Hall editions of the Oratorios. Mr. Surman's publications may be obtained of all respectable Music or Booksellers, and are sent in the country post paid or carriage free by enclosing the amount in post-office orders or postage stamps. The proper allowance to the trade and profession. Catalogues gratis.

BLACKWOOD & CO.'S REGISTERED MUSIC FILE.

THIS new and useful invention is designed to supersede the old portfolio. It will be found the most convenient article yet introduced for holding and preserving from dust unbound music. To be had of all Musiciansellers, and Wholesale at the Manufactory, 26, Long Acre, London.

AUCTION ROOMS FOR THESALE OF LITERARY PROPERTY, 191 PICCADILLY.

ESTABLISHED 1794.

MESSERS. PUTTICK and SIMPSON, in compliance with numerous requisitions upon the subject, beg to announce their intention to hold their sales of

MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS

for the future, periodically. The first of such sales to take place on WEDNESDAY, January 7th, 1859, and to be continued on or about the 5th of every successive month.

MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS of any kind can be received, or the descriptions may be forwarded, not later than the 25th of the month preceding the sale; and parcels of MUSIC, in large or small quantity, must be transmitted by that date, in order to their proper description and insertion in the Catalogues.

Collectors who do not regularly receive Messrs. P. and S.'s Catalogues of Musical property may have them on application.

NEW DUET FOR THE PIANOFORTE,

BY JOSEPH THOMAS COOPER, "THE BIRTH-DAY MARCH," price 4s. Cramer, Beale, and Co., 301, Regent-street.

BEAUTIES OF CAMBRIA,

By BRINLEY RICHARDS.

CONTAINING:—

- No. 1, The Live Long Night,
- " 2, Margaret's Daughter,
- " 3, The Ash Grove,
- " 4, Sweet Richard,
- " 5, Lady Owen's Delight,
- " 6, March of the Men of Harlech;

THE PRINCE OF CAMBRIA'S BAND MARCH.

Price 2s. each.

The "Beauties of Cambria," by Brinley Richards, were first performed by the author at an Annual Festival of the Cambrian Society of Ancient Britons on St. David's Day, at the Freemason's Tavern. The delight and enthusiasm which these national melodies produced on the company were immense. The "Prince of Cambria's Band March," by the author of "The Beauties of Cambria," threw the company into a state amounting to delirium. The Melodies were dedicated by permission to His Grace the Duke of Newcastle, by whose kind patronage this talented Ancient Briton became a student of the Royal Academy of Music, where he gained the honour of being elected a King's Scholar.

LEE and COXHEAD, 48, Albemarle-street.

Just published, price 15s.,

M. D'ALBERT'S PRESENTATION ALBUM FOR 1852.

CONTAINING a great variety of new Waltzes, Quadrilles, Polkas, &c.; and produced in a style to render it the most elegant and attractive musical price or present yet published.

D'ALBERT'S EDINBURGH QUADRILLE, price 3s.—Just published, the third edition of this, the best Quadrille on Scotch airs ever written.—"M. D'Albert has chosen airs that have not been hacknied, and has nevertheless produced the most inspiring quadrille on Scotch airs we have yet seen; as a right merry set it is unequalled." Musical Review.—Solos, 3s.; duets, 4s.; full orchestra parts, 5s.

D'ALBERT'S FAUST and DEW-DROP WALTZES, performed with enormous success by Coot's band at Her Majesty's State Ball, and since at all the great balls in London and the provinces. "These waltzes are perfectly different in style, but each a gem of its kind." Price 4s. solos and duets; full orchestral parts, 6s.

D'ALBERT'S NEWEST POLKAS.—Just published,

The Bloomer Mania Polka	2s. 6d.
The Kossuth Polka	2s. 6d.
The Holstein Polka	2s. 6d.
The Garland Polka	3s. 0d.
The Ladies' Polka	3s. 0d.
L'Enfant Polka	3s. 0d.

The above Polkas are beautifully illustrated by Brandard, and promise to exceed in popularity all the celebrated works of this highly popular composer; also to be had as duets and for full orchestra.

M. D'ALBERT'S POPULAR MUSIC.—New editions, beautifully illustrated, of the following favourite Quadrilles, Waltzes, &c.:—The Cherbourg Quadrille, the Par's Quadrille on French airs, Edinburgh on Scotch airs, Grenada on Spanish airs, Naples on Neapolitan airs, each 3s. The Bride's Polka, 3s.; Garland Polka, 3s.; Linnet Polka, 3s.; Coquette, Helen, and Bridal Polkas, each 3s. The Fairest of the Fair Waltz, 4s.; Star of the Night Waltz, 4s.; Margarita Waltz, 4s.; Queen of the Ball, 4s.; and the celebrated Hungarian or "New Schottisch," 2s. 6d. "The above are the gems of M. D'Albert's compositions."

The most favourite of the above works are also arranged by Mr. Tutton for a full military band.

Chappell, 50, New Bond-street.

NEW PIANOFORTE DUETS.

ROSELLENS	...	Deux Melodies de Donizetti, books 1 and 2, each	4s. 0d.
RILAS	...	Primavera	3s. 0d.
COOPER	...	Birthday March	4s. 0d.
BEYER	...	Krieger's Lust March	3s. 0d.
ROSELLENS	...	Le Val d'Audorre	4s. 0d.
KALLIWODA	...	Invitation à la Danse	4s. 0d.
THALBERG	...	Requiesce de Tenda	6s. 0d.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 301, Regent-street.

SOUVENIRS MUSICALES DE L'EXPOSITION.

LA PERLE DE L'EXPOSITION, Composed by Magnus; and performed by him nearly five hundred times on Erard's Grand Piano, in the main east avenue of the Crystal Palace. Price 2s. 6d.

FAREWELL TO THE EXHIBITION, the popular Air, composed by Ferdinand Sommer, and performed by him on the Sommerphone, in the Great Exhibition, arranged for the Piano, and beautifully illustrated with Portraits of the Royal Family and Herr Sommer, as performed before Her Majesty, by Command, on the 14th of October. Price 2s.

THE GREEK SLAVE, Ballad, illustrated with a beautiful Picture of the exquisite Statue. Price 2s. 6d.

London: Jewell and Letchford, 17, Soho-square.
Post free for Stamps.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY, EXETER HALL.

CONDUCTOR, MR. COSTA.—On TUESDAY NEXT, Handel's MESSIAH. Vocalists—Miss Birch, Miss Dolby, Mr. Lockey, and Mr. H. Phillips. The Orchestra, the most extensive in Exeter Hall, will consist of (including 16 double basses) nearly 700 performers. Subscriptions may be paid, and tickets obtained at the Society's office, 6, in Exeter Hall, any day from 10 till 5, also on Tuesday evenings during the rehearsal, from 7 till 10. Terms of subscription—Central reserved seats numbered, £3 3s.; reserved seats, area or gallery, £2 2s.; body of the hall, £1 1s.—per annum. Tickets, 3s., 5s., and 10s. 6d. 6, Exeter-hall, Dec. 13, 1851.

Subscribers now entering will be entitled to double tickets for this performance.

LONDON SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY, EXETER HALL.

ON MONDAY, December 22, 1851, Handel's Oratorio, MESSIAH. The Oratorio will be preceded by the new Christmas Anthem composed by G.W. Morgan. Vocalists—Mrs. Sunderland, Mrs. Temple, Miss Dolby, Mr. Lockey, and Mr. H. Phillips. The Band and Chorus will consist of 800 performers. Conductor, Mr. Surman, Founder of the Exeter Hall Oratorios. The Subscription to the Society is—£1 ls. per annum, or, for Reserved Seats, £2 2s. Subscribers joining previous to the 22nd of December will be entitled to Four Tickets, and Reserved Seat Subscribers a splendid copy of the oratorio.

WHEN SORROW SLEEPETH, WAKE IT NOT.

SUNG by Miss M. Williams, with distinguished applause, at the concerts of the English Glee and Madrigal Union. The Words by M. A. STODART; the Music composed by E. LAND. 2s. 6d., by the same composer, "The Vesper Dream," 2s., which gained the prize (1851) awarded by the Melodists Club. London, Addison and Hollier; Manchester, Hime and Addison.

SAX MILITARY BAND INSTRUMENTS.

COUNCIL MEDAL, July 10a, 1725. Messrs. ROUSSELOT & Co. beg to announce that being the representatives of the eminent inventor of the Sax Horns, who has gained the sole Council Medal for the Military Band Instruments, they are able to provide purchasers with genuine Sax Horns, French Horns, Trombones, Cornets with or without the patent slides, &c., at moderate prices. The admired Instruments from the Exhibition are now on view at 66, Conduit-street. List of prices forwarded on application. London, Rousselet and Co., 66, Conduit-street, Regent-street.

LA DANSE.

Just published,

COULON'S HAND BOOK, containing a full description of every drawing-room dance, including all the figures of the Cotillon, &c., &c.; illustrated with numerous woodcuts. Price, in an elegantly bound cover, gilt edged, One Shilling; postage free: 1s. 6d.

Jullien and Co., 214, Regent-street.

JULLIEN'S KEEPSAKE FOR 1852.

Price 6s., just published,

CONTAINING a new Waltz, Polka, Quadrille, and Galop, performed this season at M. Jullien's Concerts, at Drury Lane Theatre. This highly popular work, illuminated, gilt edged, and bound in elegant cover, embossed in gold and colours, price 6s., postage free, on application to Jullien and Co., 214, Regent-street.

JULLIEN'S ALBUM FOR 1852.

Second Edition.

THIS favourite annual is now ready, beautifully illustrated with an original subject after Watteau, executed in oil colours by Baxter, patentee; also with a variety of subjects designed in colours by J. Brandard. It contains upwards of 100 pages of the most popular dance and vocal music by Jullien, Koenig, Commettant, Wallace, Linley, Loder, Angelini, &c. Price 18s. and 21s., or bound in silk and velvet, £1 11s. 6d., and £2 2s.

Jullien and Co., Musical Presentation Library, 214, Regent-street.

JULLIEN'S CADEAU FOR 1852.

Price 6s.

THIS elegant musical present is now published, and contains the newest set of Quadrilles, Waltz, Galop, and Polka by Jullien and Koenig, with a new illustration in gold and colours by Brandard, beautifully printed on full music sized paper, gilt edged, and tied with ribbon, in an elegantly embossed cover; forwarded postage free.

Jullien and Co., 214, Regent-street, and all Music-sellers.

DISTIN AND SONS

BEG to announce they have returned to London for the season. All communications to be addressed to Henry Distin, Sax Horn and Cornet Manufactory, 31, Cranbourn-street, Leicester-Square.

Now ready, Distin's SOUVENIR DE DANSE, beautifully illustrated, and containing seventy-five pages of music for pianoforte, price 12s. Cornet accompaniment to ditto, 6s.

MESSRS. COCKS & CO.'S NEW MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

RECOLLECTIONS OF WALES. BY BRINLEY RICHARDS, FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

- | | |
|------------------------------|-------------------------------------|
| No. 1, Poor Mary Anne, | No. 4, March of the Men of Harlech. |
| " 2, The Ash Grove, | " 5, Of Noble Race was Shenkin. |
| " 3, The Rising of the Lark, | Each 3s. |

" It seems that some ten or a dozen years ago, when Mr. Richards was a student, he published some simple arrangements of our Welsh airs, which are as totally different from the splendid compositions entitled 'Recollections of Wales' as light is from darkness."—Vide 'Carmarthen Journal,' Nov. 23, 1851.

ALSO, BY THE SAME AUTHOR,
The Angel's Song, the Vision, Far from all I wander, 2s. each; and the Sturm March Galop, 8s. The CLASSICAL PIANIST, fingered by Brinley Richards, 19 books; and the STUDENT'S PRACTICE, fingered by ditto, 15 books, at various prices.

WHEN SHALL WE MEET AGAIN?

VOCAL DUET. STEPHEN GLOVER.

Price 2s. 6d.

"THE prevailing characteristics of Mr. Glover are very striking in this duet, which is a smooth, flowing, and graceful melody, with compact and effective harmonies, and will rank with his 'What are the Wild Waves Saying?'—Vide 'News of the World,' Nov. 15.

NEW MUSIC.

WE have just received Part IX. of the Messrs. ROBERT COCKS AND CO.'S GENERAL CATALOGUE OF NEW MUSIC, vocal and instrumental; and we have been surprised at the vast amount of all descriptions of rare melody and choice song, which we perceive by the Catalogue have issued from their princely establishment. Would that this unhappy country had a few such enterprising publishers like the Messrs. Cocks, how many idle hands would obtain employment. The Catalogue in question may be had gratis and postage free in any part of these kingdoms, by application to Messrs. Cocks and Co., New Burlington-street, London.—Vide the 'Wexford Independent,' Dec. 13, 1851.

CRAMER'S STUDIES.

THE First Volume of these celebrated Studies are now divided into Four Parts, and printed in the upright form, revised and corrected by the author, price 6s. each.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent-street.

NEW WORKS OF MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLDY.

- | | |
|--|--------------|
| Allegro brillant, pianoforte duet, Op. 92 | 5s. 0d. |
| The Music to "Oedipus," pianoforte score, Op. 93 (the Chorus parts are in the press) | 15s. 0d. |
| Infelice—Scena for a Soprano, with pianoforte accompa. and English version, Op. 94 | 4s. 0d. |
| Overture to Ruy Blas, Op. 95:— | |
| The full score | 9s. 0d. |
| The Orchestra parts | 13s. 6d. |
| Pianoforte duet | 5s. 0d. |
| Do. solo (publishing) | |
| Six original Melodies, arranged for harp and piano by Oberthur, Op. 81 | 7s. 0d. |
| The Airs from the operetta, "Son and Stranger," arranged for pianoforte solo, in 3 books | each 3s. 0d. |

Ewer and Co., Newgate street.

CHRISTMAS PRESENTS.

- | | | |
|----------------------|---|----------------|
| Clappison. | Album de Chant pour 1852, contains 10 Romances, Mélodies ou Chansonnettes | Price 12s. 0d. |
| Henrion, P. | Album de Chant pour 1852, contains 12 Romances, Mélodies ou Chansonnettes | Price 15s. 0d. |
| Puget, Loisa. | Album de Chant pour 1852, contains 6 Romances, Mélodies ou Chansonnettes | Price 10s. 6d. |
| Beyer, Ferd. | Album pour le Piano pour 1852, contains 6 Morceaux élé-gants sur des airs Allemands favoris:— | |
| | No. 1. Der Trompeter, by W. Speier | |
| | " 2. Die schönsten Augen, by G. Stigelli. | |
| | " 3. Des Mädchens Klage, by F. Schubert. | |
| | " 4. Du lieber Engel Du, by C. L. Fischer. | |
| | " 5. Auf Flügeln des Gesanges by Mendelssohn. | |
| | " 6. Spielmann's Lied, by F. Gumbert. | |
| | Bound | Price 6s. 0d. |

At Schott and Co.'s, 89, St. James's-street.

Printed and Published for the Proprietor by MICHAEL SAMUEL MYERS, of No. 3, Studley Villas, Studley Road, Clapham Road, in the parish of Lambeth, at the office of MYERS & Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, in the parish of St. Paul, where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed, post paid. To be had of G. Parkes, Dean Street, Soho; Allen, Warwick Lane; Vickers, Holywell Street, and at all Booksellers.—Saturday, December 30, 1851.

The Musical World.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY MORNING.

Terms of Subscription, per Annum, 16s.; Half year, 8s.; Three Months, 4s.; (Stamped Copies 1s. per Quarter extra.) Payable in advance, to be forwarded by Money Order, to the Publishers, Myers & Co., 22, Tavistock-st., Covent Garden.

No. 52.—VOL. XXIX.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 27, 1851.

Price Fourpence.
Stamped Fivepence.

CATHERINE HAYES IN AMERICA.

For the first three or four weeks after the Irish prima donna landed on the American shores, the newspapers teemed with articles on her talents and accomplishments. There were to be seen long panegyrics, elaborate criticisms, multifarious biographies, cunning comparisons, and doubtful versicles,—all devoted to the cause of the fair Swan of Erin. Nothing short of another Jenny Lind furor was anticipated, and the public mind was apparently inclined to carry out the second sensation to as great an extent as the first. We ourselves made copious extracts from the pregnant journals, and might, had we so pleased, have filled the MUSICAL WORLD, ten times over, with praises and adorations of Catherine Hayes. Suddenly we missed the name of Catherine Hayes altogether from the papers, or read some curt and cold paragraph, devoted to a mere account of the concert in which she sang. There was evidently some strong cause for this; and when we learned that Catherine Hayes had broken her engagement with Mr. Beale, we were at no loss for a clue to guide us to the motives that held the journalists silent. The Americans are purely a commercial people, and any infraction of an agreement is looked upon by them in a very serious light. We therefore inferred, and naturally, that Miss Hayes had brought down upon herself the indifference of the press, and had determined to adopt a new line of policy from all preceding prima donnas.

The question to which at present we wish more immediately to direct the reader's attention, is the violation of Miss Hayes's engagement with Mr. Beale, and the consequences accruing therefrom. The statements which have appeared in the New York and Boston Journals are all at variance, and none of them correct. We wish, therefore to set the public right in a mere matter of fact, and let them judge for themselves as to the merits of the case.

And first it is necessary to see on what terms Mr. Beale and Miss Hayes stood with each other, at the time the engagement was broken.

It is well known that the success achieved by Miss Catherine Hayes, on her debut at the Royal Italian Opera, was not of the most brilliant kind, nor did the fair artiste aggrandize her reputation by her subsequent engagement at Mr. Lumley's theatre. In fact, at the Italian Operas, Miss Catherine Hayes proved herself an excellent comprimaria and nothing more; and, had it not been for the subsequent steps taken by Mr. Beale, it is more than probable that the name of Catherine Hayes would have passed away, with hundreds of others, into the ocean of oblivion. But Mr. Beale perceived that Miss Hayes, had great talent, and imagined that, by judiciously turning it to account, the public would be compelled to recognize and acknowledge it. Filled with this notion, and always enthusiastic in what he undertakes, he took Catherine Hayes by the hand, and determined to make her name great before the eyes of the world. By skilful management, by perseverance and industry, by great expenditure and large losses, and immense influence, Mr. Beale succeeded in his determination, and Catherine Hayes's name was made great in the eyes of the world.

It may be said that Miss Hayes, by her own abilities, made her name great. Undoubtedly; but unless managed as it was, she never would have risen to her present eminence, and every step of her position she owes to Mr. Beale.

After the second visit of Miss Hayes to Ireland, which proved an immense success, Mr. Beale offered Miss Hayes £600 per month, with a sixth of the profits, to go on a tour to the American States for a certain time, all expenses to be paid by him. To this Miss Hayes acceded; but when every thing was arranged, and made ready, she demurred, and demanded £50 a month more, with further expenses for her mother and sister, who were to accompany her. Mr. Beale consented, and Miss Hayes and her party, under the direction of Dr. Joy, the active and indefatigable, started for America. It is not necessary to enter into details. Mr. Beale and Miss Hayes were bound to keep their engagement, or forfeit £3,000. After Miss Hayes arrived in America, and great noise and stir were made about her, a certain Mr. Wardwell, with two Christian names, offered Mr. Beale certain terms for Miss Hayes and party, which certain terms, had they been followed out, would have remunerated Mr. Beale, and paid him in part for all his previous trouble and outlay, and what was more to be wished for, would have liberated him from all anxiety and doubt. Mr. Beale and Mr. Wardwell came to treaty, and were bound by a forfeit of £4,000. Subsequently, this agreement, for obvious reasons, was found unsuitable to both parties. Mr. Wardwell, with the two Christian names, managed matters so badly that the receipts of Miss Hayes's Concerts fell from £800 to £100. He grumbled, and refused, or delayed, to pay the stipulated sum to Dr. Joy, Mr. Beale's delegate. Seeing how matters stood, of course Mr. Beale was anxious to rescind the agreement, and Mr. Wardwell seemed, or seemed to seem pleased with his liberation from the bond. Meanwhile, as it appears to us, Mr. Wardwell, with two Christian names, was calculating a deeper move. Before the bond of agreement could be annulled, he went to Miss Hayes, and represented to her the enormous sacrifices she was making to realize the fortunes of the great London firm of Cramer, Beale and Co.; and how she was obtaining only the petty sum of £7,000 yearly, with every expense paid; how she was standing in her own light; how Jenny Lind was nothing to her in point of talent; how he, Mr. Wardwell, with two Christian names, was the only person on earth who would deal honourably by her and act disinterestedly in her behalf; with many more etceteras, which only Yankee tongue could syllable, and Yankee audacity hazard. Alas! for the soft heart of an Irishwoman! Catherine Hayes was melted and made credulous; her head was literally turned topsy-turvy; till overcome by vanity and interest, mirabile dictu! she yielded to the eloquence and persuasiveness of the gentleman with the two Christian names, and entered into a new engagement with him on the spot, heedless of all consequences, uninfluenced by ties of gratitude, and totally regardless of what the public would think of so unparalleled a proceeding. By this simple act of disinterestedness, Mr. Wardwell coolly pocketed a thousand pounds of Mr. Beale's money; since Miss Hayes having broken her engagement with Mr. Beale, Mr. Beale is therefore necessitated to break his engagement with Mr. Wardwell; and as Mr. Beale receives from Miss Hayes £3000, and pays Mr. Wardwell £4000, it follows Mr. B. is minus £1000. To make use of an American phrase, we consider this "a tarnation cute dodge."

In addition to the losses already entailed, a further consequence of the infraction of Miss Hayes's engagement with Mr. Beale is the expense involved in having thrown on his hands the gentlemen who made up the party on the transatlantic tour, and whose engagements remain up to a certain time.

We have no comments to make; the case speaks for itself. The premises are clear; the conclusion self-evident. In future, let directors put not too much faith in artists, and let them secure themselves so as not to be entirely dependent on a prima donna's weakness, and the artifices of an American sub-mauager.

THE LOVERS OF MUSIC.

THE OLD GENERATION AND THE NEW.

In the justness of many of the complainings of the aged, we can by no means acquiesce. Whatever they may affirm to the contrary, it is our conviction that the world is growing wiser and better; and if we did believe in the golden age, which we do not, we should say that it will be, not that it has been. Nevertheless there are some things in reference to which our seniors have good cause to complain. In regard to many of them, there is a class of grievances not imaginary but real. To one of these causes of their most justifiable dissatisfaction we now wish to direct attention; and all the more so, because it belongs to our art, and falls within the scope of our purposes.

Go where we may, and especially in the provinces, we find a number of aged persons passionately fond of music, but who have never received a musical education. Now these grand-sires can hardly ever have played or sung to them music they thoroughly enjoy. Their tastes are never consulted, their wishes are altogether disregarded, so far as music is concerned, by those whose filial duty it ought to be, to minister to them the pleasures of melody. When a child returns home from school, or, when a niece or a grandson goes to spend a few days at the family mansion, among other festive and social enjoyments, recourse is had to music. So far so good. But just let us for a moment open their folio and examine its contents. There are none of the melodies or dances of a by-gone-day, none of those good old marches, for instance, to which, at the sound of fife and drum, the grey-haired yeoman marched with something of military pride, a volunteer in the service of his country. If we turn to the vocal part of their selection, things are no better. Not a single piece can we find that dates its rise and popularity from the era of Waterloo; and even if we should perchance find some good old composition, it is so twisted and distorted by variation and accompaniment, that if the ghost of its author were to steal Banquo like into the drawing room, he would fail to recognise his own production. The old bridal song no more awakes the echoes of the Baronial hall; the voice of the minstrel is silent, and the national airs and the hornpipe are alike forgotten.

Now, however good the substitute may be, the withdrawal of the music of a former day is most ungenerous and culpable on the part of our young friends. We are sure they cannot as yet have thought of the happiness they are withholding from those who are so much more advanced in years than themselves, or they would not have the heart to persevere in a practice so selfish and disreputable. The music they sneer at as old-fashioned, was popular in the days of their parents' youth. It is the record of their joys and sorrows, the witness of their early hopes and fears, a portion of their history; or, to sum up all in one, it is interwoven with the texture of their hearts' core. Whenever the melody of these time-honoured compositions is evoked, the excited frame, the enlivened countenance, the brightening eye, of the aged listener bespeak the depths of his emotion. A thrill of pleasure passes through him just as though he again stood face to face with a true but long absent friend of his early youth. Past scenes, buried in the grave of a worn-out memory, live again with all the freshness of yesterday; their entire youth is reproduced, and, as these gay and happy visions float before them, every chord of the heart is touched. The memory of joyous and festive hours, the garland and the wreath, the skill of a departed friend long since gone home, the ardent attachment of an early companion to some particular air, are re-created, and pressed upon the old and fast decaying spirit, with the tenderness of spring, and the genial warmth of new-born life.

It is not ours to boast of much practical skill in music, but we have occasionally sat and played to a few friends. They were bending under the weight of years; and as we played their own favourite melodies, through the long winter evenings, we have seen the tears flowing down the cheek furrowed with time and care. But stay; these things are sacred to our own social life, and must not be revealed. Suffice it to say that we were never happier than when thus giving pleasure and enjoyment to those who loved us best and needed such pleasure most. Go, my young friend, go and do likewise; and if in the transient excitement of one short evening, thou canst make an old man happy, thou shalt so far consecrate the domestic hearth for the time when thine own eyes shall be fireless, and thine own head hoary.

We know that this remonstrance will be unheeded by our young friends generally; while a few of them, more courageous than the rest, will brand the point at issue as sentimental, for it happens to have been reserved for this artificial age to scoff at the many pleasing associations of a happy home, as being mere poetic sentiment and not real life. Here and there one may be sufficiently domestic and affectionate as to profit by our advice, but numbers will go and scream their floundering way through some modern difficult piece which they never can master; or, if they sit down to the piano, they will scramble and rattle like some galvanized corpse, or else fall flat and dead in the middle of the monstrosity, like some broken-winded butcher's hack. In vain does the kind-hearted grandmother adjust her spectacles and beg for Rule Britannia, or Home Sweet home. Still, still they dash on, helter-skelter; the voice screeches like a steam engine, the piano twangs like a cracked fiddle-string; all is confusion and wild uproar; the poor old grandmother stops her ears, flies from the scene, and the room is deserted save by those wise-aces who are about equal fools with our august performers. Well, well! rattle on, ye musical apes, but know, ye shall not always be young; and as your parents have suffered a musical martyrdom at your hands, you in your turn, shall not escape the same infliction. Grey hairs and the spectacles and the staff shall overtake you one day; and then the same musical misery you have doled out to your parents shall be given to you in larger draughts, by your own children; with this difference—in their case it will be retribution, but in yours it is wanton.

Let us not be misunderstood, and indeed we need entertain very little fear, for this is not the first rubbing down, by many a long paragraph and parental lecture, which our young friends have had on this subject. We by no means adopt the nil admirari in reference to all modern music. We adore whenever we meet with anything worthy our adoration. Much of modern musical compositions is more than equal to anything ever produced in former times. We do not sympathise with that blind extravagance which says, that there is neither beauty, poetry, nor wisdom to be found anywhere, except in the classics of Greece and Rome. And even if we did go to such an extreme it would avail nothing touching the present question. Musical composition has no Sappho, no Virgil, no Demosthenes, because the world is not old enough. One age can produce a poet, but many ages have sometimes been unable to produce a musical composer worthy of immortality. Our young friends will now see that we do not love what is old simply and only because of its age. By all means learn whatever is of sterling worth in modern music. But these things oughtest thou to have done, and not to have left the other undone. We protest against the execution of mere combinations of mechanical difficulties, except in so far as they shall give the performer more power and command over the true music; the music of feeling and the passions, the divine language of the soul; and we further protest against a mere amateur, of ordinary ability, attempting the achievement of those high excellences which can only be secured by an uninterrupted life of labour. We do think it a very hard case that those who pay for the education of our youth should have their hearts' fountain sealed, and thus be cut off from the pleasures of early years. If many of our young friends want to know why they are not allowed to learn music, we have now given the explanation. Who on earth would give their guineas for the transformation of their children into intolerable bores?

Foreign.

PARIS.—Donizetti's opera, La Figlia del Reggimento, has been given this week, at the Italiens, Sophie Cruvelli in the character of Marie, which she played charmingly, her well-assumed manners of the camp and military brusquerie in the first act, and her mingled airs of dignity and vivacity when among her noble relations, quite captivating the public, yet thrilling with the emotions created by her sublime portraits of the hapless Norma, and her glowing impersonation of the impassioned bride of Ernani. She was in great spirits, sang admirably, and was immensely applauded, particularly in the second act. Notwithstanding her success, however, with the general public, we must, for ourselves, own to some secret dissatisfaction. The great difficulty Mlle. Cruvelli has to contend against, with us, and some who think as we do (a small, but, we flatter ourselves, highly respectable minority), are the recollections of herself, and the ineffaceable impressions she has left in the deeply-affecting characters above-named—impressions which it is, perhaps a questionable policy to disturb or impair. La Figlia is an agreeable production, well fitted for the meridian of the Opera Comique, for which it was composed, but scarcely entitled to the honour of transplantation to the Italian stage, and, above all, unworthy the talent of Cruvelli. We admire the versatility, but regret, at least, as much as we admire. It is like Rachel condescending to the modern drama of Scribe, or the great tragedian Kean exhibiting his agility to win the plaudits of the crowd. The genius of Mlle. Cruvelli can afford to look higher, and should be of that loftier order which, in the words of the Venusian poet—

"Cæsusque vulgares et udam Spernit humum fugiente pennâ."

We were glad to see M. Calzolari once more, after his unaccountably long absence. His fresh voice and always elegant and musician-like style gave infinite pleasure, though the part is a very poor one. Ferranti, who we had begun to think had set out for California, turned up in his old part of the Sergente, and was, as formerly, lively and amusing. Suini's rich bass told well in some of the choruses, which, we must add, in the early part of the opera surprised us by their inefficiency. The theatre was fully and fashionably attended, and the marks of satisfaction bestowed at the close of the opera were loud and general; but, while we record this fact, which tells something against our own opinion, it does not at all diminish our gratification to know that La Figlia is to-night to give place to Ernani, one of the indisputable and legitimate triumphs of our young prima donna.

Mme. Tedesco appeared at the Grand Opera on Wednesday in Fides, in Le Prophète, with a considerable share of success, but without creating any very marked impression, though her acting and singing of the part were much above the ordinary level. Apart from the enthusiasm of the claque, which is becoming a perfect nuisance, her first and only real success was in the bravura Comme un éclair, which she gave with a power and brilliancy which drew down reiterated plaudits, and was followed by an earnest and unanimous recall. Every performance of Mme. Tedesco confirms the opinion of her being a distinguished artiste, just stopping short of the excellence required to make a leading attraction. The demands of the part of Jean on the moyens of M. Roger become more obviously and painfully oppressive on every representation. Although he was supported by the unremitting encouragement of the audience, it is evident that the Grand Opera will speedily have to seek a new tenor. On the whole, the general performance was scarcely to be called satisfactory, the orchestra and chorusses alone displaying evidence of the extraordinary care and time bestowed on the production of this opera. Complaints have been sometimes made by certain London journalists—whose musical appetites must be voracious—of some excisions made in this opera, for its representation in that city. We only wish that the example had been followed here; its length is positively overpowering.

Mlle. Rachel, after her long foreign tournee, which commenced, we understand, much more prosperously than it terminated, has returned to her post at the Theatre Français. Her first representation was Camille, in Corneille's Horace, probably the greatest of her characters. The crowded house, and her enthusiastic reception, must have gone far to console the fair tragedian for the slights and indifference she encountered in most parts of Italy. She has since appeared in Adrienne Lecouvreur and Andromaque, and in all with the same success as attended her many previous performances of the same parts. A new tragedy, by M. Ponsard, Ulysse, with chorusses, in imitation of the Greek tragedies, set to the music of M. Gounod's Sappho, is announced to be in preparation at this theatre.

The second revue of the season, La Course au Plaisir, has been produced at the Variétés, and backed by nearly a dozen of the prettiest actresses of the Boulevards, promises to have as long a run as most of these ephemera enjoy. There is considerable whim in this bagatelle—among other things, several of the well-known streets and buildings of Paris are personified, and the piquant characteristics of some of the localities give room for couplets and jeux de mots, many of which are highly amusing. The affair ends with a tombola, and the desire of obtaining a prize is by no means the least interesting part of the entertainment, which nightly attracts crowds.

M. Felicien David's popular symphony, Le Désert, is now being performed on alternate nights at the Opéra National, with the same Maestro's opera, La Perle du Brésil, the success of which increases. The orchestral instrumentation is very creditable, but the performance of the choruses leaves still a great deal to be desired. A new opera, by Maestro Sarmiento, a composer of reputation in Italy, is in active rehearsal, under the title of Les Trois Châteaux, of which the conoscenti form great expectations. The first concert of the France Musicale took place on Thursday at Herz's, the principal vocalists being M. Jourdan, Mme. Taccani-Tasca, and Mlle. Vera. The salle was crowded by a distinguished company, and the performance had the double merit of being well selected, and not too long. A morceau on the violoncello, by M. Offenbach, was very favourably received, as was an air by M. Jourdan. But the honours of the concert were altogether for the ladies. Mme. Taccani sang the cavatina from the immortal Barber, an air which, in the hands of a real Rossinian artiste (now so rare), still comes upon the public with all the freshness and beauty of spring. Her execution of this air, particularly the allegro, can only be expressed by one word—perfection, and was followed by shouts of applause. Formed in the true Italian school, her style abounds in that sparkling brilliancy which only the most finished artists can essay. Mme. Taccani afterwards sang the celebrated variations on "Il dolce Incanto," by Rode, boldly entering the lists with Sontag herself, and more finished and elegant marvels of execution we certainly never heard. The enthusiasm of the auditory was without bounds, and cries of bis resounded from every part of the salle. She repeated the last variation with renewed brilliancy, introducing a novel trill at its close, which occasioned a perfect hurricane of applause. The duo from Mathilde de Shabran, with Mlle. Vera, concluded this display, both being admirable. Mlle. Vera also sang an air of Gordigiani's, which merited all the warmth of approbation it was received with. It was stated that Mr. Lumley was in the salle with a view of hearing Mme. Taccani, and every lorgnette was in quest of the impresario.—Galigiani.

TURIN.—Mlle. Alboni has continued the series of her representations at Turin, as Rosina in Il Barbiere. The enthusiasm she excited is described as altogether without bounds.

VIENNA.—M. Capecelatro, a composer well known in Italy and Germany, is engaged on a new opera for the Karntnirtheater Theatre at Vienna, where it will be sung next spring by Mmes. Albertini and Mitrovich, and Messrs. De Bassini and Frascchini. The libretto is founded on Alexandre Dumas's Fille du Regent.

ST. PETERSBURGH.—The last opera was La Gazza Ladra, with Mmes. Grisi and De Meric, and Messrs. Ronconi, Tamburini, and Pozzolini; the honours of the representation were for Ronconi and Pozzolini, a young tenor before-mentioned, of very great promise.

ALEXANDRIA.—The Italian opera is going on swimmingly. The last opera, Lucia, is said to have been extremely successful, with Mlle. De Grassi and the barytone Carapia. The tenor, M. Guerra, appears to have been a failure.

BOSTON, Dec. 2nd, 1851.—The second farewell concert of Mlle. Jenny Lind was announced to take place on Tuesday, but was afterwards postponed until Friday, on account of her indisposition. The desire to hear the performances of this greatest of vocalists is as strong as ever, and those whose time will not permit of their tarrying at the ticket office for an hour or more, to procure their admissions, find no fault with paying a large premium to the speculators. On Friday evening, the tickets were all disposed of at an early hour, and after the doors were open, not one could be found for love or money. The countenance of Miss Lind, which had appeared so dejected at the previous concert, shone with a radiant expression which called to mind her first appearance before a Boston audience; she was then so cheerful and happy in her movements, that it seemed impossible for her ever to be otherwise, but the fatigue which has attended her tour thus far in America seems to have taken strong hold upon her, and rendered her naturally animated countenance a scene of mental uneasiness. But this had gradually worn away, before the close of the concert, and the excellent manner in which she rendered the aria from the Nozze di Figaro, sufficiently showed that it was not a mere external effort, but that the soul was with it. This was the happiest performance of the evening. The third concert of Miss Lind was given at the Melodeon, last evening, to a very large audience. The performance commenced with a solo for the clarionette, executed by Signor E. Belletti. An instrumentalist, who appears in a concert like that of Jenny Lind's, must make up his mind to be contented with a small share of applause, for those persons who pay three or four, or even two dollars, for admission to a concert of this character, go only to hear an artist like Jenny Lind, and the best instrumental performer in the world would stand a small chance of being appreciated by an audience at one of these concerts. For this reason Mr. Goldschmidt, who is one of the most finished pianists we have heard, need feel no chagrin for want of proper regard being shown for his talents, on the part of the audience of Miss Lind's concerts.

Mr. Joseph Burke's performance of a fantasie caprice of Vieux Temps was received with favour. Signor Salvi added much to the pleasure of the evening by his performance of a Romanza from Lombardi, a cavatina from Mercadante, and more particularly by the cavatina "Fra poco" from Lucie. Miss Lind has given us six pieces. The prayer from Frey-schutz, scena and aria from Somnambula, "Non mi dir" from Giovanni—this was her happiest effort; also the Bird Song, "John Anderson my Jo," and "Comin' thro' the rye," for that portion of the audience who like to hear what they call tunes. Jenny Lind will give two more concerts in Boston, on Thursday and Saturday, these being probably the last she will give in this city. Mlle. Maberlini will positively make her first appearance in America, on Tuesday evening next. The inhabitants of Taunton, New Bedford, and Fall River are speculating about the chances of Jenny Lind singing at those places. A French Opera Troupe has arrived at New Orleans from Paris. Madame Thillon and Mr. Hudson, gave, a concert at Newark, on Thursday evening. Catherine Hayes' concerts have thus far been completely successful. At her last performance in Utica, the house and even the street was crowded. Parodi gave a concert at Nashville, on Wednesday last. The Handel and Haydn Society, of Boston, announce a series of six concerts—three performances of "David" and three of "Samson." Jenny Lind's farewell concert in Boston, takes place December 6th. Marie Maberlini's first concert takes place December 9th. The Boston Musical Fund Society announce, that in consequence of Jenny Lind's concert being fixed for December 6th, their concert will be postponed to the 13th.

THE FANDANGO.

(From the German.)

This favourite dance, so much in vogue amongst the Spanish and their descendants, but which is in fact of Moorish origin, is designed to represent, as is well known, the different stages or shades in the progress of the tender passion,—love, desire, hope, proud disdain, and relenting tenderness. Cold refusal and warm confession of the "soft impeachment," are vividly represented by means of the modulations of the music, and the voluptuous movements of the dancers. Temperament and custom have rendered the Fandango and Bolero (the last of which is but a continuation of, or a sequel to the former) expressive of the intoxicating joy of successful love, the especial favourites of the Spanish, and usually form the finale of all social pleasures. The reserve and characteristic hauteur of the Spaniard instantly quit the field when the light tinkling of the guitar calls him to the wanton Fandango.

It is recorded that the Roman clergy, shocked at the immoral nature of the Fandango, resolved in solemn assembly upon its suppression. A consistory was commissioned to make it the subject of inquiry; and after due deliberation, when they were about to pronounce sentence upon and banish the dance, one of the cardinals, actuated by sentiments of right and justice, and acting upon the principle that no defendant should be condemned unheard, urged that the Fandango, the accused, be brought before the bar of the court in propria persona. The justness of the benevolent cardinal's views was at once acknowledged; and accordingly two of the most noted Spanish dancers were summoned to appear before the court, by way of counsel for the defendant; or in other words, to introduce the Fandango before the august tribunal.

The dance commenced; the holy fathers, with contracted brows, looked for a while unmoved; at length the seductive charms and irresistible loveliness of the dance exhibited their effect in chasing away the wrinkles from the foreheads of its austere judges. Hostile indications and bellicose intentions with reference to the dance, by imperceptible degrees, merged into lively interest and fixed attention; now as its charms more fully developed themselves one of the reverend gentlemen so far forgot himself and his position, as to be guilty of the manifest impropriety of beating time to the movements of the music.

The dance went on, becoming still more and more seductive, when one of the worthy clergy suddenly bolted from his seat, and commenced executing the movements of the dance. Another, and another followed; the furor became general: the judge's bench became empty—all were whirling in the dance; and what was late a clerical court was suddenly metamorphosed into a dancing saloon. It is needless to record the verdict: the Fandango was reinstated with all its former rights and privileges, and its glorious triumph has proved its security against all similar attempts on the part of the clergy.

Great is the Fandango!

Reviews of Music.

ŒUVRES POSTHUMES DE N. PAGANINI, POUR VIOLIN, avec Acc. de Piano, L'Orchestre séparément et en Partition. Schott & Co. No. 1. Op. 6, Premier Concerto.

" 2. Op. 7, 2nd Concerto (clochette).

" 3. Op. 8, Le Streghe.

" 4. Op. 9, God save the Queen.

" 5. Op. 10, Le Carnaval de Venise.

" 6. Op. 11, Moto Perpetuo.

" 7. Op. 12, Non Piu Mesta.

" 8. Op. 13, I Palpiti.

" 9. Op. 14, Etudes en 60 variations, sur l'air Barucaba.

Long ere the talent of Paganini had acquired popularity beyond Italy, a collection of studies for the violin had been published under his name, unknown to French violinists, and created a deep impression. So many novelties were accumulated, the difficulties presented so problematical, and under forms so peculiar, that many professors doubted their possibility of execution; and went so far as to look upon the publication of that work as a mystification. However, the composer Andreozzi, who had brought to Paris the copy from which Pacini published his edition, attested that there was in Italy a man who executed those difficulties as though they were trifles, and who would astound the professors and the pupils of the Conservatory if they heard him. This man was the author himself, Paganini. At the same time Blangini, on his return from Italy, also spoke of Paganini with enthusiasm, and likewise affirmed that his talent bore no affinity to the great masters down to his time, and that he was destined to revolutionize the art of playing the violin. The struggle between Lafont and Paganini resuscitated the confused recollection of his name, and the prodigies he effected were the subject of serious conversation; the journals confirmed it, and the name of the artist gradually acquired popularity. However, fame blazoned forth his name as a violinist only, not as a composer. The twenty-four studies of the first work was then the only one known in France more than twenty years after it was published. It was only after he had enchanted all Paris, and had traversed France, gaining triumphs wherever he played, that the value of his compositions occupied attention. They were sought for. Italy and Germany were written to for copies of his concertos, his fantasias, and his airs with variations, but they had never been published. The list of works which appeared of this artist, comprised the following only, viz., Op. 1, Ventiquattro Capricci per Violin Solo, Op. 2; Sei Sonate per Violin e chitarra, op. 3; do, do, Op. 4; the grand quartette, Op. 5; do, do. Paganini said of this work that it was not his, but formed from some of his themes badly arranged. These are the only positive productions of Paganini published up to the present publication of the above nine compositions; all that has appeared previously, must be considered as commercial trickeries, or as extracts from preceding works, or as simple fugitive recollections—instance, Ghys published at Paris and Berlin, le Carnaval de Venise tel que le jouait Paganini. Ernst and Sivori have also given as exact traditions of this musical pleasantry, versions differing more or less, which gave rise at the time to discussions in the newspapers. The publication, by Messrs. Schott & Co., of the veritable Carnival de Venise of the illustrious violinist, will remove all uncertainty in this respect. Paganini at his death left twenty-four works in manuscript. Unfortunately many of these compositions are incomplete. Those original scores without omissions which have been found in the two concertos in E b and in B b minor (it is in this the celebrated rondo of la Clochette is found), the allegro of a sonata, entitled Movement Perpetuo; the famous variations le Streghe (the Witches), with orchestral parts, "God save the King," with do., "Di tanti palpiti" with parts, variations upon "Non Piu Mesta," accento al fuoco with parts, the Carnival de Venise, 24 variations upon the popular Venetian air, "Oh, mama!" and 60 variations in three series, with accompaniment for piano or guitar, and the Italian air "Barucaba." These were written by Paganini at Genoa, in February 1835. The variations are studies of various kinds of difficulties, and are one of his latest works. It will be seen the complete works of Paganini which have been found, are the nine published as above by Messrs. Schott & Co. It is to be deplored that, among these high class productions, the splendid concerto that this great artist wrote for Paris, and which he played at his third concert at the Opera the 25th of March, 1831, should be wanting; also the Grand Military Sonata upon the fourth string, in which he displayed such marvellous ability in a compass of three octaves, with harmonic sounds, and finally his variations upon "Nel cor piu."

The compositions of Paganini are novel in idea, elegant in form, rich in harmony, and diversified in the effects of instrumentation. These qualities are especially found in his concertos, which have exercised great influence on compositions of this nature which have been published. They differ in form in many points of the classic from Viotti's concertos. There is that uniformity and increasing interest which it were well all violinists would meditate upon. In general, without diverting attention from the solo, by over-elaborated passages, the instrumentation possesses an interest which cannot be separated from the principal design. The entrées are neither cold nor symmetrical, and the effect is always new and varied.

The premier concerto is in E flat, for the orchestra, but the violin solo is written in D; the four strings of the instrument are consequently tuned a semi-tone higher. The tutti is bold and flowing, and very effective. Its form is reminiscent of the old concerto more than those of Paganini. It was composed in 1811. In the Rondo Paganini first employed tenths, combined in various ways, producing wonderful effects. The character of the piece is bold, and the second solo, nearly all on the 4th string, and in harmonies, produced an extraordinary sensation, nothing similar having been heard prior to its introduction. The second concerto is in B minor. The commencement is broad and impassioned—the instrumentation clear and rich. In this work Paganini has evinced much daring in the combination of difficulties, both for the bow and the left hand. He has introduced a double shake descending in thirds, in the execution of which he was incomparable, both in brilliancy and in perfection of instruction. The Adagio (in D) is a most charming cantabile. The Rondo, with the obligato bell accompaniment, is delightfully fanciful, the most incomprehensible feats of skill being introduced. The Clochette was listened to with wonder throughout Europe. The Allegro of the sonata, entitled Movimento Perpetuo, is remarkable as a study for detached bowing of the most interesting description. Few pieces of music have obtained more fame than the Streghe (the Witches), either from the prodigious execution of the great violinist, or, perhaps, because some superstition attached to the title. The original M.S. indicates that the introduction and the variations are composed upon an original air—however, if tradition is to be depended upon, the air was taken from the ballet of Il Noce di Benevento. In "God save the King" the melody is played with the bow, and the other parts of the accompaniment in pizzicato. The execution of this piece requires extraordinary dexterity. In the fantasia or "di tanti," the orchestra is written in B flat. Paganini effected this change with so much cleverness that it was never perceived at his concerts. The piece commences by an introductory lughette, followed by a recitative. The subject which follows is quite simple and without difficulties, with the exception of a very rapid scale in harmonies. The same remarks will apply, in some degree, to "Va pin Mesta"; it is written in E flat, and the solo violin is tuned a semi-tone higher. The twenty variations on the Carnival de Venise, which has been so frequently imitated, is remarkable for the distinct character given to each—all the bow and finger effects imagined by Paganini are concentrated: some extraordinary effects are produced in those strange freaks, to which the marvellous dexterity of the artiste lent an irresistible charm. The sixty variations on the air "Barucaba," are studies in which the composer has given each style of bowing, with all the difficulties of bowing, all the combinations of harmonics, upon which his school is founded. By a singular notion nearly all these variations are written in different keys.

That these works of the greatest violinist that ever lived will be sought for by all the great performers through Europe, we have no doubt. They are engraved and produced in the best and cleverest style, so that the publishers may fairly anticipate reaping a rich harvest for their enterprise and spirit in producing them.

W. G.

Original Correspondence.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—Permit me to correct an error inadvertently made in the flattering notice you were pleased to take of my song, "When sorrow sleepeth, wake it not," with reference to the words. Miss M. A. Stodart is the authoress, and not the translator; she wrote the song as an illustration of the German proverb "Wenn die sorge schlaft, wecke sie nicht." The German translation was added to the song at the request of some musical friends.

Believe me, dear Sir,

Yours very faithfully,

EDWARD LAND.

Provincial.

CROYDON.—THE ENGLISH GLEE AND MADRIGAL UNION.—The first concert of this Union of English Vocalists, viz., Mrs. Endersohn, Miss M. Williams, Mr. Lockett, Mr. Francis, Mr. Land, Mr. Hobbs, and Mr. Henry Phillips, took place at the Greyhound Hotel on Monday evening last, and never did the value and purpose of unity manifest its effects more than on that occasion. It has been reserved for the vocalists under notice to exhibit the human voice in combination—we say it unhesitatingly—in greater perfection than it has for years past been heard in the Concert Room. They have shewn to the country—and through the good opinions won of foreigners during the past year to the world—that the National English Glee and Madrigal, and English voices, need only the right direction, and a generous encouragement, to produce rich and melodious treasures which have hitherto been lying latent, and only awaiting the touch which has now happily struck the chords, and which we hope may long vibrate through the length and breadth of the land. There is scarcely a town of importance in the united kingdom that has not its amateur Glee Club—their performances are often, with the best intentions, sad perversions of the composer's intention; but some there are whose rendering of this particular style of music often approaches excellence—and why? It is because they are united, and that they rehearse and practice together! Now, if this applies to the crude and imperfect powers of mere amateurs, what may not be expected of those who have been nurtured in music? whose voices, and minds, have been trained, formed and matured; and who, from an emulation in their art, have boldly stood forward to shew that England has a national music, and English voices to give it full efficiency. Honour, then, to the Glee and Madrigal Union! and many additions to the laurels which they won on their debut to a Croydon audience! On the singers presenting themselves, a hearty burst of welcome resounded from every part of the room, which, by-the-bye, was so crowded as to mar in some degree the first glee, through many of the audience being unable to obtain seats—but by the time "With sighs sweet rose" was pouring forth its harmony, the room was "hushed like a child's repose," the counter tenor voice (Mr. Francis) claiming especially eager attention. Next came, par excellence, the glee of the evening, "Blest pair of Sirens." The words by Milton, one of his fugitive poems, and the music by Stafford Smith.

This was a treat indeed, and was as perfectly rendered as the most ardent musician could have desired, and although its performance lasts a quarter of an hour, there was an inexpressible desire for its repetition, indeed, to quote the words, it was "voice and verse," "wed your divine sounds, and mixed power employ." Horsley's pleasing Madrigal, "Nymphs of the Forest," closed the first part. The second part opened with a duet, charmingly sung, by Mrs. Endersohn and Miss Williams. Mr. Land then sang a chaste and manly love song, "Oh, wilt thou be my bride, Kathleen," with that pure musician-like taste for which he is so distinguished. Mrs. Endersohn earned good opinion in her rendering Hobbs's prize song (Mrs. Heman's words) "Bird of the green wood; and Miss M. Williams won all hearts, and a loud encore, in Mr. Land's new and charming song, "When sorrow sleepeth wake it not." It was a fine specimen of poetic and refined singing, and the subdued, almost bird-like shake and dying cadence at the end, shewed how thoroughly the singer had caught the inspiration of the composer; and Lockey sang a very pretty ballad. Mr. H. Phillips worthily wound up the second part with the recitative, and air from Haydn's Seasons, "With joy the impatient husbandman," and never did we hear it more finely delivered. Part three resumed the selection of glees, and, by desire, commenced with "Oh, Nanny," harmonised for four voices, and be it remembered, although claimed as Scotch, an old English air. Bishop's ever-welcome glee, "Blow gentle gales," as a quintett, was enthusiastically encored, and Miss Williams's thrilling voice deserves especial mention in it; nothing more perfect could be attained in part singing. The same may be applied to Stofforth's glee, "The spring, the pleasant spring." The concert closed amidst the applause of a most delighted audience, whose subdued whispers of delight during the pieces, and occasional outbreaks of applause, testified their intense enjoyment, but the truest compliment was the expression, that the concert was too short. It has now been so daily evident from the public journals that this particular style of music has, at length, met its meed of welcome, that little more need be said in its praise—suffice it to say, that there must have been close study and determination of purpose to have enabled seven voices to become as one, each blending in unalloyed harmonious concord with the others—every effect of poetry and passion—of light and shade, being afforded, as though ONE MIND gave the impulse—in fact, accomplishing the perfection of part singing, and affording a lasting lesson to those who love a "concord of sweet sounds." Excepting "Blow gentle gales," the whole of the glees were unaccompanied, and when the first note was struck by the voices, it appeared that what had been done by the "Russian horn band" and the "Distins" for instruments, had now been developed with that more beautiful instrument—the human voice—by the "English Glee and Madrigal Union." We cannot in justice to Mr. Land, the accompanist and conductor, omit most honourable mention of his judicious and intelligent accompaniments at the pianoforte: it is rarely that we have heard singing so ably aided and cared for; and, in a parting tribute of thanks to the lady performers, we hail Mrs Endersohn, new to us, as likely to become a valuable soprano in our concert room, and Miss Williams, an established favourite in Croydon, as coming before us with a finish and earnestness that may fairly entitle her to the rank of one of our very first contraltos and best of vocalists. Her rendering of "Deep as our despair," warrants this assertion. Thus closed a musical treat not easily to be forgotten—and while with true and honest pen we offer our tribute to the performers, let it be recorded that the audience, both numerous and select, comprised the principal families in the town and neighbourhood, whose ready patronage on the first announcement showed their desire to encourage native talent, and to "help young merit into fame." There was barely standing room to be found for the company, and had the concert room been double the size it would have been filled.—Surrey Standard, Dec. 20th.

GLASGOW.—The City Hall concerts have increased nightly in attraction; the large hall on Saturday was crowded to overflowing. Julian Adams has brought together a phalanx of talent, instrumental and vocal, which may be rarely sought for, except in London, and at charges for admission which will perhaps seem fabulous—promenade, one shilling; gallery, sixpence! Our space at present precludes a detailed notice of the various pieces executed on Saturday evening—we may advert to the manner in which the overtures to "Semiramide" and "William Tell" were rendered; as also to the fantasia on Scottish airs, with solos for all the principal instruments—this latter excited a perfect furor. The vocalists were all re-demanded—there were no less than seven encores during the evening.—Glasgow Courier, Dec. 23.

Dramatic.

SADLER'S WELLS.—On Thursday se'nnight this theatre closed until the holidays, with the comedy of The Provoked Husband, for the benefit of Miss Fitzpatrick, who undertook the part of Lady Townley, and fully maintained her rising reputation. If Miss Fitzpatrick does not, as yet, possess that refinement and polish of manner so requisite in such a peerless votary of the drawing-room as Lady Townley, the defect must be attributed to immature experience; for, in other respects, her acting is highly felicitous. Miss Fitzpatrick was visibly affected by the loud and prolonged applause with which she was received at the fall of the curtain. Mr. Barnett's John Moody, at present, may defy competition. After The Provoked Husband, Miss Fitzpatrick appeared as "Neighbour Constance," a part in which she is greatly improved since she first played it here two years ago. Miss Fitzpatrick has, we understand, concluded an engagement with Mr. Bunn at Drury Lane; and, as she is thus going to assault the very citadel of the drama, we may have to record her debut at old Drury in the words of the poet—

Divisum imperium cum Nisbette Fitzpatrick habet.

The Christmas fun, which is said to be both racy and rare, in our next.

SURREY.—This theatre closed its operatic performances last Saturday, after a season of unexampled prosperity. Miss Poole's benefit took place on Thursday se'nnight. The opera was The Daughter of the Regiment, followed by a Concert, in which Mrs. A. Newton, Miss Messent, Mr. G. Tedder and Mr. Henri Drayton were encored in some of their favourite songs. The novelty of the evening was Miss Poole in the character of Tom Tug in The Waterman. The part is not well suited to her, nor perhaps to any woman, but she sang charmingly, and was encored in "The Jolly Young Waterman" and "Wapping Old Stairs." She also introduced the popular melody, "Pray Goody," which she was compelled to sing three times. Miss Harriot Coveney was encored in "The Dashing White Sergeant." The entertainments concluded with Bombastes Furioso.

Miscellaneous.

THE NORWICH CHORAL SOCIETY have contributed ten guineas towards the purchase of some testimonial to Dr. Bexfield, in commemoration of the first performance of "Lara Restored," and in token of their respect for his musical talent.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—The examination of the candidates for the King's Scholarship took place on Friday week. The board of examiners consisted of Mr. Cipriani Potter, Mr. Goss, Mr. Lucas, Mr. H. Blagrove, Mr. Howell, Mr. G. A. Macfarren and Mr. W. Dorrell. There were thirty-three candidates (seventeen boys and sixteen girls). The verdict was given in favour of Miss Rosetta Vining and Master John Barnett, and certificates of having highly distinguished themselves to Miss Jannette Aylward (sister to the talented young violoncellist), Master Walter Pettit, and Master Henry Baumann.

NATIONAL MUSIC.—The Russians and Danes are rich in possession of an original and most touching national music; Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, are alike favoured with the most exquisite native melodies, probably, in the world. France, though more barren in the wealth of sweet sounds, has a few fine old airs, that redeem her from the charge of utter sterility. Austria, Bohemia, and Switzerland, each claim a thousand beautiful and characteristic mountain songs. Italy is the very palace of music; Germany its temple. Spain resounds with wild and martial strains; and the thick groves of Portugal with native music, of a softer and sadder kind. All the nations of Europe—I presume those of all the world—possess some kind of national music, and are blessed by heaven with some measure of perception as to the loveliness of harmonic sounds. England alone, England, and her descendant America, seem to have been denied a sense, to want a capacity, to have been stinted of a faculty, to the possession of which she vainly aspires. The rich spirit of Italian music, the solemn sound of German melody, the wild free Euterpe of the Cantons, have in vain been summoned by turns to teach her how to listen; 'tis all in vain—she does listen painfully; she has learnt by dint of time, and much endurance, the technicalities of musical science; she pays regally her instructors in the divine pleasure, but all in vain; the spirit of melody is not in her, and in spite of hosts of foreign musicians, in spite of the King's Theatre, in spite of Pasta, in spite of music-masters paid like ministers of state, in spite of singing and playing young ladies, and criticising young gentlemen, England, to the last day of her life, will be a dunce in music, for she hath it not in her; neither—or I am much mistaken—hath her daughter.—Fanny Kemble.

MISS DOLBY'S most interesting series of Concerts were brought to a close on Tuesday evening, the 16th. Miss Dolby was assisted by eminent vocal and instrumental talent, including the popular Miss L. Pyne, who delighted her audience with the delightful aria "Non paventar," from the Zaubersflöte, and a far less interesting ballad by Mr. Knight, the promising Miss C. Nott, who created a highly favourable impression in "Batti, batti," and Mr. Whitworth. Mr. L. Sloper performed in one of Mendelssohn's Trios in a most brilliant and finished style, ably supported by Mr. Lucas and Mr. Blagrove. We were much delighted for the first time to hear the lately-adverted-to pianoforte duet of Mendelssohn, played by Mrs. John Macfarren and Mr. W. H. Holmes, with infinite grace and delicacy. Miss Dolby charmed every one with her touching version of Mr. Holmes's ballad, "The Blind Flower Girl," as indeed she cannot fail to do in everything she graces with her talent. Mr. Blagrove and Mr. Lazarus sustained their well-earned reputations by the performance of Solos on their respective instruments.

CONNECTION BETWEEN HARMONY AND MELODY.—The ancients, by Harmony, meant only being in tune. But the moderns have appropriated the term to the combination of such sounds as are agreeable when heard simultaneously; while they use Melody for the arrangement of such sounds as are agreeable when heard in succession.

The same scale of sounds which enables us to produce harmony, produces melody. The difference between the sounds uttered in the attempt to sing by a person who has not a musical ear and one who has, is, that the sounds of the first are not in the intervals of the scale which produces harmony, and those of the other are.

The reason why the intervals which produce harmony produce also melody, seems to be, that melody is retrospective harmony, or depends on a perception of harmonical relation to the sounds that have preceded. And it appears to be no objection to this, that some persons—as is supposed to have been the case with some of the ancients—are acquainted with the practice of melody, but not of harmony or music in parts. For their not being acquainted with the practice of harmony in its modern and most extended sense, does not prove that their consciousness of the effects of melody is not dependent on a perception of harmonical relation to sounds that have preceded.

The connection between harmony and melody is nowhere so apparent as in the Arpeggio passages so common in music for the guitar. For these arpeggios are in fact chords, spread out by the notes being sounded in succession instead of together, as the means of obviating the want of sostenuto tone inherent in the instrument. And no person can for an instant doubt that the composition of these arpeggios—in respect, for instance, of the determination of the form of a dissonance—ought to be the same as if the notes were to be sounded together as a chord.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—The Messiah was performed for the first time this season on Friday, the 12th inst., and was repeated on Tuesday last. The vocalists were the same on both nights; viz., Misses Birch and Dolby, and Messrs. Lockey and H. Phillips. Exeter Hall was filled on both occasions.

LONDON SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—The customary performance of the Messiah was given by this society on Monday night. The singers were Mrs. Sunderland, Miss Dolby, Mrs. Temple; Messrs. Lockey and H. Phillips. The attendance was very large.

SAMUEL WESLEY.—The late Alexander Barry, Esq., who affected a knowledge of music and patronage of its professors, one day meeting S. Wesley, said to him, "Your brother Charles is coming to one of my little musical parties to-morrow night, and I should be delighted if you will also favour me with your company." Sam knowing pretty well the sort of treat he was to expect, and thinking the amateur unreasonable in requiring the assistance of two such men upon the occasion, replied, "Why, my dear Sir, you cannot want us both, for one Punch you know is enough for a puppet-show."

DR. BEXFIELD.—A few words in reference to the career of Dr. Bexfield may not, at the present time, be unacceptable to our readers. At the early age of seven he was recommended as a chorister by Mr. Buck, who is always anxious to secure boys of talent for our Cathedral choir, and to give every encouragement to genius. His gifted pupil, at the age of 11, composed an anthem in eight parts, which, though full of grammatical errors, fully satisfied Mr. Buck that he deserved every assistance, and he at once determined to educate him for the profession of music. During the eight years he was a chorister, his singing was the constant theme of praise, by rigid judges, and though his voice was not equal to many others, he gave so much expression and character to every thing he sang, that he was a favourite chorister for some years. At the age of 21 he became a candidate for the situation of organist at Botolph Church, in Lincolnshire, celebrated not only as a magnificent building, but for its noble organ. He was the successful candidate, and having supplanted a Mr. Binfield, the former organist, a wit wrote the following impromptu:—

The arrangement of these rival names
Would make a stoic grin;
Since Mr. Binfield now is ex,
And Mr. Bexfield in.

In the same year (1846) he took his Bachelor's Degree in Music, and received a highly complimentary letter from Dr. Crotch (the then Professor of Music at Oxford), on the compositions written for the degree. In 1848 he left Boston, and was a candidate for the organist's situation at St. Helen's, Bishopgate, London. There were 35 competitors, who played behind a curtain, and were only known by numbers, which were drawn for. The celebrated Vincent Novello was the umpire. Mr. Bexfield was again pronounced the successful candidate. He took his Doctor's degree at Cambridge, at the age of 24. In 1847 he gained a prize in London, which was open to public competition, for the best anthem, and a splendid baton was awarded to him; the same with which he conducted his overture on Thursday evening. A prize of ten guineas, for the best glee, was open to competition, the same year at Huddersfield; this the youthful composer also gained.—The umpire on this occasion was Sir Henry Bishop, who arranged that each candidate should send his name under a sealed envelope, which was not opened until the decision had been made. As an organ player Dr. Bexfield stands very high in London, and his readiness in extemporising on any given subject is perfectly extraordinary. In 1850, Dr. Bexfield married the daughter of J. Millington, Esq., of Boston, Lincolnshire. In addition to the extraordinary talent of this young man, it is both satisfactory and gratifying to know, that in every private relation his conduct was most exemplary, and that he avails himself of every opportunity of shewing his gratitude to his early instructor and patron Mr. Buck. —(From the Norwich Gazette.)

ON THE TRIGONUM, OR ANCIENT EGYPTIAN TRIANGULAR HARP.—One of the most remarkable ancient Egyptian instruments used by the priests in sacrifices and religious ceremonies was called the Trigonum or Triangular Harp, and as they were of various kinds, a description of them will not be uninteresting. One of them is a triangular shape, V and has ten strings, and is taken from an ancient painting in the museum of the King of Naples, in which it is placed on the shoulder of a little dancing Cupid, who supports the instrument with his left hand, and plays upon it with his right. Another species of Triangular Lyre or Harp is of a much larger size and has twenty-three strings V and is held in the hands of a very uncouth figure, who appears to be seated. It is copied from one of the most remarkable from Rossellini. It is played upon with both hands by one of those moustiers which the Egyptian mind was so prolific in producing; and whether we consider its size, its peculiar character and form, no instrument of the kind claims a more attentive consideration.

There is also one of a very simple construction, and most essentially belongs to the same class of Tryangular Egyptian instruments, and which is also given in Rossellini, not from a painting, but from a real instrument found in Egypt, and deposited in the Museum at Florence. In this, the strings (originally ten in number, as appears from the pegs) form a triangle by their extension from the upper end of a piece inserted at right angles into a large harmonical body of wood, with which the strings are at the other extremity connected (as shewn in the drawing); portions of the strings still remain, and appear to have been formed from the intestines of animals. Remembering that Solomon obtained wood for his "Psalteries" by distant commerce, it is remarkable that the wood of this instrument is what Rossellini calls a mahogany from the East Indies, and which the Egyptians must have obtained through commercial channels. Athenæus mentions a certain musician, called Alexander Alexandrinus, who was so admirable a performer on the trigonum, and gave such proofs of his abilities at Rome, that he made the inhabitants musically mad. The performer being a native of Alexandria, as his name implies, makes it probable that it was an Egyptian instrument upon which he gained his reputation at Rome.—From T. H. Tomlinson's Lectures on Ancient Music.

Advertisements.

WHEN SORROW SLEEPETH, WAKE IT NO.

SUNG by Miss M. Williams, with distinguished applause, at the concerts of the English Glee and Madrigal Union. The Words by M. A. STODART; the Music composed by E. LANDI. 2s. A/s, by the same composer, "The Vesper Dream," 2s., which gained the prize (1851) awarded by the Melodists Club. London, Addison and Hollier; Manchester, Hime and Addison.

BLACKWOOD & CO.'S REGISTERED MUSIC FILE.

THIS new and useful invention is designed to supersede the old portfolio. It will be found the most convenient article yet introduced for holding and preserving from dust unbound music. To be had of all Musicians, and Wholesale at the Manufactory, 26, Long Acre, London.

THE ENGLISH GLEE AND MADRIGAL UNION,

(UNDER THE PATRONAGE OF HER MOST GRACIOUS MAJESTY).

MRS. Endersohn, Miss M. Williams, Mr. Lockey, Mr. Francis, Mr. Land, and Mr. H. Phillips, will give CONCERTS at Chester, on Tuesday, 6th January (morning), and Liverpool Philharmonic Society the same evening; Leeds, Madrigal and Motet Society, 7th; Huddersfield, 8th; Sheffield, Athenæum, 9th; Manchester, Free Trade Hall, 13th and 14th; Bury, Town Hall, 15th; and commence a FIRST SERIES OF FOUR EVENING CONCERTS at Willis's Rooms, St. James's, on Monday, 19th January.
E. LAND, Hon. Sec., 3, Foley-place, London.

SOUVENIRS MUSICALES DE L'EXPOSITION.

LA PERLE DE L'EXPOSITION, Composed by Magnus; and performed by him nearly five hundred times on Erard's Grand Piano, in the main east avenue of the Crystal Palace. Price 2s. 6d.
FAREWELL TO THE EXHIBITION, the popular Air, composed by Ferdinand Sommer, and performed by him on the Sommerphone, in the Great Exhibition, arranged for the Piano, and beautifully illustrated with Portraits of the Royal Family and Herr Sommer, as performed before Her Majesty, by Command, on the 14th of October. Price 3s.
THE GREEK SLAVE, Ballad, illustrated with a beautiful Picture of the exquisite Statue. Price 2s. 6d.

London: Jewell and Litchford, 17, Soho-square.
Post free for Stamps.

SAX MILITARY BAND INSTRUMENTS.

COUNCIL MEDAL, Jury 10a, 1725. Messrs. ROUSSELOT & Co. beg to announce that being the representatives of the eminent inventor of the Sax Horns, who has gained the sole Council Medal for the Military Band Instruments, they are able to provide purchasers with genuine Sax Horns, French Horns, Trombones, Cornets with or without the patent slides, &c., at moderate prices. The admired Instruments from the Exhibition are now on view at 66, Conduit-street. List of prices forwarded on application. London, Rousselet and Co., 66, Conduit-street, Regent-street.

PIANOFORTES.

MESSRS. RÜST & STAHL, in calling the attention of Professors and the Trade to their unique instruments, beg to intimate that they have taken the spacious and convenient manufactory of Zeitter and Co., New Cavendish-street, where they have made arrangements for the manufacturing of the upright pianos only, viz., the Piccolo and Cottage; hence they are enabled to give their undivided attention to this now almost universal class of instruments, which, combined with terms to meet the present exigencies of the times, small profits and quick returns, will place their pianofortes beyond the possibility of competition. To this they need only add that their instruments combine all the modern improvements, and are made of the best seasoned materials, are warranted, and may be exchanged free of expense if not found to be in every respect perfect. Drawings and lists of prices forwarded post free.

Rüst and Stahl, 320, Regent-street. Manufactory, New Cavendish-street (late Zeitter and Co.)

HERE IS YOUR REMEDY!

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.

A MOST miraculous Cure of Bad legs, after 43 years' suffering.—Extract of a Letter from Mr. William Galpin, of 70, Saint Mary's street, Weymouth, dated May 15th, 1851. To Professor Holloway, Sir.—At the age of 13 my wife (who is now 61) caught a violent cold, which settled in her legs, and ever since that time they have been more or less sore, and greatly inflamed. Her agonies were distracting, and for months together she was deprived entirely of rest and sleep. Every remedy that medical men advised was tried, but without effect; her health suffered severely, and the state of her legs was terrible. I had often read your Advertisements, and advised her to try your Pills and Ointment; and, as a last resource, after every other remedy had proved useless, she consented to do so. She commenced six weeks ago, and, strange to relate, is now in good health. Her legs are painless, without seam or scar, and her sleep sound and undisturbed. Could you have witnessed the sufferings of my wife during the last 43 years, and contrast them with her present enjoyment of health, you would indeed feel delighted in having been the means of so greatly alleviating the sufferings of a fellow creature. (Signed) WILLIAM GALPIN.

The Pills should be used conjointly with the Ointment in most of the following cases:—
Bad Legs Coco Bay Contracted and Lumbago Scurvy
Bad Breasts Chilgo-foot Stiff Joints Piles Sore-heads
Burns Chills Elephantiasis Rheumatism Tumours
Bunions Chapped hands Fistulas Scalds Ulcers
Bite of Mosquitoes Gout Sore Nipples Wounds
Toes and Sand- Glandular Swellings Sore-throats Yaws
Flies Skin-diseases

Sold by the Proprietor, 244, Strand, (near Temple Bar,) London; and by all respectable Vendors of Patent Medicines throughout the Civilized World in Pots and boxes, at 1s. 1/6d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., 11s., 22s., and 36s. each. There is a very considerable saving in taking the larger sizes.

N. B.—Directions for the guidance of Patients are affixed to each Pot or Box.

CRAMER'S STUDIES;

THE First Volume of these celebrated Studies are now divided into Four Parts, and printed in the upright form, revised and corrected by the author, price 6s. each.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent-street.

PIANOFORTES FOR HIRE AT REDUCED PRICES.

ECONOMY being at all times commendable, Messrs. ROUSSELOT and Co. have established a new system for Hiring Pianofortes, including the tuning once a month, which presents not only a great saving, but also the advantage of having the instrument regularly kept in tune. Pianofortes, sold, exchanged, and repaired. For particulars apply to Rousselet and Co., 66, Conduit-street, Regent-street.

NEW PIANOFORTE DUETS.

ROSELLENS ...	Deux Melodies de Donisetti, books 1 and 2, each	4s. 0d.
SILAS ...	Primavera ...	3s. 0d.
COOPER ...	Birthday March ...	4s. 0d.
BEYER ...	Krieger's Lust March ...	2s. 0d.
ROSELLENS ...	Le Val d'Andorre ...	4s. 0d.
KALLWODA ...	Invitation à la Danse ...	4s. 0d.
THALBERG ...	Beatrice de Tenda ...	6s. 0d.

Cramer, Beale, and Co., 201, Regent-street.

BEAUTIES OF CAMBRIA,

By BRINLEY RICHARDS.

CONTAINING:—

- No. 1, The Live Long Night,
- " 2, Margaret's Daughter,
- " 3, The Ash Grove,
- " 4, Sweet Richard,
- " 5, Lady Owen's Delight,
- " 6, March of the Men of Harlech;

THE PRINCE OF CAMBRIA'S BAND MARCH.

Price 2s. each.

The "Beauties of Cambria," by Brinley Richards, were first performed by the author at an Annual Festival of the Cambrian Society of Ancient Britons on St. David's Day, at the Freemason's Tavern. The delight and enthusiasm which these national melodies produced on the company were immense. The "Prince of Cambria's Band March," by the author of "The Beauties of Cambria," threw the company into a state amounting to delirium. The Melodies were dedicated by permission to His Grace the Duke of Newcastle, by whose kind patronage this talented Ancient Briton became a student of the Royal Academy of Music, where he gained the honour of being elected a King's Scholar.

LEE and COXHEAD, 46, Albemarle-street.

MUSIC FOR THE ORGAN OR HARMONIUM.

THE AMATEUR ORGANIST—a collection of soft and full Voluntaries, arranged in six Books, 3s. each, by EDWARD TRAVIS, and may be had elegantly bound, price 18s. "Mr. Travis has introduced to the musical world a new and interesting work for the Organ or Harmonium, under the title of 'The Amateur Organist.' Mr. Travis has availed himself of an extensive and classical music library, and selected with great taste the most beautiful morceaux of the great masters, Foreign and English. To lovers of classical music this work will be found to be the most superb selection that has ever issued from the musical press."—Vide Musical Review.

THE AMATEUR INTERLUDIST—a collection of short Interludes to play between the Verses of the Psalms, in one Book, price 4s. by EDWARD TRAVIS and J. P. DYER.

THE AMATEUR PRELUDIST—a collection of Preludes, with the Organ Stops carefully marked, in one Book, price 4s., by E. TRAVIS.

SACRED VOCAL MUSIC.

KELLER'S Collection of ANTHEMS, CHURCH SERVICES, CHANTS, &c., arranged for the Voice and Piano, in six Books, price 3s. each, with six beautiful and appropriate designs by Brandard, arranged by ALBERT KELLER. The six Books can be had in one Volume, elegantly bound, price 18s.

THE PSALMODIA BRITANNICA—a selection of Psalms and Hymns for the Voice and Organ, in six Books, price 3s. each, arranged by EDWIN FLOOD, and may be had in one Volume, neatly bound, price 15s. London: LEE & COXHEAD, 46, Albemarle-street, and can be had of all Book and Musiciansellers.

N.B.—A New Edition of "Hark, the Sabbath Bells," by Edwin Flood.

LONDON THURSDAY CONCERTS, EXETER HALL.

THE SECOND CONCERT of the SERIES will take place on THURSDAY, January 8th, upon which occasion the following eminent artists will appear:—Vocalists, Miss Louisa Pyne, Miss Pyne, and Miss Binckes, Mr. Swift (the new Tenor), Mr. Young, Mr. C. Cotton, and Herr F. Jenghmanns. Instrumentalists—Pianoforte, Miss Goddard (who performed with such immense success at the National Concerts at Her Majesty's Theatre), also Mr. Richardson. In addition to the above talent, the GRAND MADRIGAL CHOIR (consisting of nearly 60 professional singers), which elicited such enthusiastic applause at the first concert, will again appear. Conductor, Mr. T. H. SEVERN. Doors open at half-past Seven, commence at Eight. Admission, 1s.; Reserved Seats, 2s.; Stalls (numbered) 4s. Tickets to be had at the Musiciansellers.

RECITATIONS MUSICALES.

MR. WILLIAM BINFIELD'S FIRST RECITATION of CHAMBER MUSIC, Solo to Setette, will be given at the NEW BEETHOVEN ROOMS, 37, Queen Anne-st., Cavendish-square, on TUESDAY EVENING, Feb. 3rd, at Eight o'clock. Vocalists—Mdlle. E. Garcia, Mr. William Binfield. Instrumentalists—Misses Margaret and L. Binfield, Messrs. W. R., Henry, and A. Binfield. Tickets, 4s.; Double, 5s.; Reserved Seats, 7s. At the principal Music warehouses.

MR. FRANK BODDA

BEGS to announce to his Friends and Pupils, that having recovered from his long and severe illness, he will resume his professional avocations, and re-commence Teaching on Monday next, the 29th inst. 42, Hart-street, Brompton-square.

£2,000 WORTH OF PIANOFORTES,

By Broadwood, Collard, Tomkinson, Wornum, &c.

MR. KELLY, MUSICAL INSTRUMENT AUCTIONEER, will, on WEDNESDAY, January 14th, at 12 for 1 o'clock, SUBMIT for SALE at the rooms, 21, Old Bond-street, upwards of EIGHTY PIANOFORTES by the most celebrated makers, together with a large number of other Musical Instruments. May be viewed the day prior and morning of Sale. Catalogues forwarded on application to the Auctioneer, 8, High-street, Kensington.

Mr. Kelly's Sale of Musical Instruments takes place the second Wednesday of every month. Parties desirous of placing MUSIC on MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS of any description in his hands for disposal will be kind enough to communicate with him prior to the 5th of January.

Just published, price 15s.,

M. D'ALBERT'S PRESENTATION ALBUM FOR 1852.

CONTAINING a great variety of new Waltzes, Quadrilles, Polkas, &c.; and produced in a style to render it the most elegant and attractive musical price or present yet published.

D'ALBERT'S EDINBURGH QUADRILLE, price 3s.—Just published, the third edition of this, the best Quadrille on Scotch airs ever written.—"M. D'Albert has chosen airs that have not been hacknied, and has nevertheless produced the most inspiring quadrille on Scotch airs we have yet seen; as a right merry set it is unequalled." Musical Review.—Solos, 3s.; duets, 4s.; full orchestra parts, 5s.

D'ALBERT'S FAUST and DEW-DROP WALTZES, performed with enormous success by Coote's band at Her Majesty's State Ball, and since at all the great balls in London and the provinces. "These waltzes are perfectly different in style, but each a gem of its kind." Price 4s. solos and duets; full orchestral parts, 5s.

D'ALBERT'S NEWEST POLKAS.—Just published,

The Bloomer Mania Polka ...	2s. 6d.
The Kossuth Polka ...	2s. 6d.
The Holstein Polka ...	2s. 6d.
The Garland Polka ...	2s. 6d.
The Ladies' Polka ...	2s. 6d.
L'Enfant Polka ...	2s. 6d.

The above Polkas are beautifully illustrated by Brandard, and promise to exceed in popularity all the celebrated works of this highly popular composer; also to be had as duets and for full orchestra.

M. D'ALBERT'S POPULAR MUSIC.—New editions, beautifully illustrated, of the following favourite Quadrilles, Waltzes, &c.:—The Cherbourg Quadrille, the Paris Quadrille on French airs, Edinburgh on Scotch airs, Grenada on Spanish airs, Naples on Neapolitan airs, each 3s. The Bride's Polka, 3s.; Garland Polka, 3s.; Linnet Polka, 3s.; Coquette, Helena, and Bridal Polkas, each 3s. The Fairest of the Fair Waltz, 4s.; Star of the Night Waltz, 4s.; Margarita Waltz, 4s.; Queen of the Ball, 4s.; and the celebrated Hungarian or "New Schottisch," 2s. 6d. "The above are the gems of M. D'Albert's compositions."

The most favourite of the above works are also arranged by Mr. Tutton for a full military band.

Chappell, 30, New Bond-street.

Printed and Published for the Proprietor by MICHAEL SAMUEL MYERS, of No. 3, Studley Villas, Studley Road, Clapham Road, in the parish of Lambeth, at the office of MYERS & Co., 22, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, in the parish of St. Paul, where all communications for the Editor are to be addressed, post paid. To be had of G. Parkers, Dean Street, Soho; Allen, Warwick Lane; Vickers, Helywell Street, and at all Booksellers.—Saturday, December 27, 1851.

EDA KUHN LOEB MUSIC LIBRARY

3 2044 043 849 835

